MIDDLETON-QUERNHOW, a chapelry in that part of the parish of WATH which is in the wapentake of HALLIKELD, North riding of the county of YORK, 5 miles (N.N.E.) from Ripon, containing 102 inhabitants.

MIDDLETON-SCRIVEN, a parish in the hundred of STOTTESDEN, county of SALOP, 5½ miles (S.S.W.) from Bridgenorth, containing 86 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £4. 6. 8. T. Rowley, Esq. was patron in 1812. The church is dedicated to St. John the Baptist.

MIDDLETON-TYAS, a parish in the eastern division of the wapentake of GILLING, North riding of the county of YORK, comprising the townships of Middleton-Tyas with Kneeton, and Moulton, and containing 805 inhabitants, of which number, 569 are in the township of Middleton-Tyas with Kneeton, 5½ miles (N.E.) from Richmond. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £15. 10., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is a handsome uniform structure.

MIDDLEWICH, a parish comprising the township of Weever in the first division of the hundred of Edisbury, the market town of Middlewich, and the townships of Byley with Yatehouse, Clive, Croxton, Kinder-ton with Hulme, Minshull-Vernon, Mooresbarrow with Parme, Newton, Occlestone, Ravenscroft, Sproston, Stublach, Sutton, and Wimboldsley, in the hundred of NORTHWICH, county palatine of CHESTER; and containing 4450 inhabitants, of which number, 1212 are in the town of Middlewich, 21 miles (E.) from Chester, and 167 (N.W.) from London. The name of this town is derived from its central situation with respect to the Wiches, or salt towns; and it is probable that the Romans had an establishment here, or in the vicinity, as there are traces of a Roman road, and in the township of Kinder-ton is an intrenched camp, supposed to be the site of the Roman station called Condote. The earliest notice of it is in the reign of Edward the Confessor, when it appears to have been held by the Earl of Mercia under the king: after the Conquest it was annexed to the earldom of Chester, and subsequently to the crown, under which it is held by the present lessee. It was formerly one of the burghs of the palatinate, and the burgesses received grants of various privileges from some of the baronial proprietors, which they pleaded in reply to a writ of Quo Warranto issued against them in the 15th of Henry VII. On the occasion of a contest here between the royalists and the parliamentary forces, March 13th, 1642, the former experienced a signal defeat; but in a second engagement, about nine months afterwards, the parliamentarians were vanquished in consequence of a reinforcement of their opponents by troops from Ireland. The town, which is neat and well built, and extends into the townships of Kinderton and Newton, is divided by the Grand Trunk, or Trent and Mersey, canal, here crossed by the river Dane; and the rivers Croco, Weever, and Wheelock, also run through the parish: upon the two latter are several corn-mills. A branch from the Chester canal is now in progress from Wardle to Middlewich, from which considerable benefit to the trade of this town is anticipated. The trade consists principally in salt, which is obtained from powerful brine springs: there are likewise some silk manufactories. The market is on Tuesday; and fairs are held on Holy Thursday, August 25th, and October 29th. Constables are appointed at the court leet of the lessee of the manor. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £14, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £1000 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Rev. Isaac Wood. The church, dedicated to St. Michael and all Angels, presents indications of various styles of architecture, having been the work of different periods; it has a handsome tower; at the eastern end of each of the aisles is a chapel, or chancel, separated by a screen. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists. A free school was founded in the sixteenth century, for a few poor boys, custom having limited the number to eight, who are taught reading only; the master is nominated by Lord de Tabley: it is endowed with £160, and a house and school-room in the township of Newton, the inhabitants of which have added a small portion of land, to entitle them to send a proportionate number of boys for instruction. The Rev. Theophilus Lindsey, a Unitarian divine, and theological writer, was born here in 1723; he died in London, in 1808.

MIDDLEZOY, a parish in the hundred of WHITLEY, county of SOMERSET, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.W. by N.) from Langport, containing, with a part of Boroughbridge, 605 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the jurisdiction of Glastonbury, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £12, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bath and Wells. The church is dedicated to the Holy Cross. The river Parret is navigable on the south-west.

MIDDOP, a township in the parish of GISBURN, western division of the wapentake of STAINCLIFFE and EWCROSS, West riding of the county of YORK, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.W. by W.) from Colne, containing 100 inhabitants. A school, erected by subscription on the waste, was endowed, in 1819, by the Rev. Thomas Bland, with money now producing about £10 per annum.

MIDGHAM, a chapelry in that part of the parish of THATCHAM which is in the hundred of FAIRCROSS, county of BERKS, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E.) from Speenhamland, containing 329 inhabitants. The chapel, dedicated to St. Margaret, was rebuilt by John Hillersdon, Esq., in 1714. There are almshouses erected by the late William Poyntz, Esq. The Kennet and Avon canal passes in the vicinity.

MIDGLEY, a township in the parish of HALIFAX, wapentake of MORLEY, West riding of the county of YORK, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Halifax, containing 2207 inhabitants.

MIDHOPE, a chapelry in the parish of ECCLESFIELD, northern division of the wapentake of STRAFORTH and TICKHILL, West riding of the county of YORK, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. S.W.) from Penistone. The population is returned with the parish. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Major-General Bawille.

MIDHURST, a borough, market town, and parish, in the hundred of EASEBOURNE, rape of CHICHESTER, county of SUSSEX, $11\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Chichester, and $49\frac{1}{4}$ (S. W.) from London, containing 1335 inhabitants. This is evidently a place of great antiquity, having been a large town prior to the Conquest, and having enjoyed its privilege of parliamentary representation ever since the reign of Edward II. The town is agreeably situated upon a gentle eminence surrounded by hills, and on the banks of the river Rother: the streets are clean and the houses well built; and the inhabitants are remarkable for longevity, which is attributed to the great salubrity of the atmosphere. The market is on Thursday: fairs are held on April 8th and October 27th. The Rother, or Arundel, navigation commences at this town. A bailiff is chosen annually at the court leet of the lord of the manor: the petty sessions for the hundred are held at the Angel Inn. The borough comprises a plot of ground without the boundaries of the present town, probably the site of some more ancient place: there is not a single house upon it, but the situation of the burgage tenements is accurately marked by large stones set up for that purpose. Midhurst is a borough by prescription, and has sent members to parliament ever since the 4th of Edward II.: the right of election is vested in about one hundred and twenty burgage-holders, and the bailiff is the returning officer. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chichester, endowed with £400 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of William Stephen Poyntz, Esq. The church, which is dedicated to St. Denis, has a south chapel at its east end, which contains some handsome monuments of the family of Browne, Viscounts Montague, the most remarkable being that of Anthony, first Lord Montague, and his two wives: he is represented in his robes of the garter, with armour and ruff, kneeling at a square pedestal or altar, on which his helmet is placed. This church has received an addition of one hundred and thirty-three free sittings, for which the Incorporated Society for enlarging churches and chapels contributed £50. The free grammar school was founded by Gilbert Hannam, of Midhurst, in 1672, who during his life granted a rent-charge of £20 for ever, for the education of twelve boys in Latin, Greek, and arithmetic, and at his decease, in 1677, bequeathed a moiety of his estate for the further support of the master: it is open to the sons of inhabitants who have resided seven years in Midhurst, and the late head-master, Dr. Bailey, having made large additions to the school-house, it has now become a classical school of considerable importance: the total annual income arising from the above-mentioned benefaction is £32. 18. A National school is supported by subscription. At a short distance from the town are the picturesque ruins of Cowdray House, once the magnificent seat of the Montague family, which was accidentally destroyed by fire in 1793.

MIDLEY, a parish in the liberty of ROMNEY-MARSH, though locally in the hundred of Martin-Pountney, lathe of SHEPWAY, county of KENT, 3 miles (W.S.W.) from New Romney, containing 33 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £30, and in the patronage of — Eve, Esq. The church has been demolished.

MIDLOE, an extra-parochial liberty, in the hundred of TOSELAND, county of HUNTINGDON, containing 43 inhabitants.

MIDRIDGE, a township in the parish of HEIGH-INGTON, south-eastern division of DARLINGTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E. by S.) from Bishop-Auckland, containing 201 inhabitants. The school-room, built in 1817, was enlarged in 1821, and is used as a chapel of ease, the curacy having been endowed with £27. 6. a year, by the late Bishop of Durham, who also endowed the school with £10 per annum, which is further supported by the subscriptions of the Earl of Eldon and others.

MIDRIDGE-GRANGE, a township in that part of the parish of AUCKLAND ST. ANDREW which is in the south-eastern division of DARLINGTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.E.) from Bishop-Auckland, containing 58 inhabitants.

MID-VILLE, a township in the eastern division of the soke of BOLINGBROKE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, containing 139 inhabitants. This township is independent of any parish, it having been so created by act of parliament, in 1812, on occasion of an extensive drainage of fen-lands.

Seal and Arms.

Ivel, on the high road from Yeovil to Shaftesbury. The manufacture of sail-cloth, dowlas, lindsey-woolsey, and stockings, has been superseded by glove-making and leather-dressing. Fairs are held on June 5th and October 28th, for cattle and pedlary. There are nine pieces of borough land, or burgage tenements, and the persons to whom they are conveyed by the proprietors are called capital bailiffs; two of them in rotation preside annually, being called reigning bailiffs, who, at a court leet held

MILBORNE-PORT, a borough and parish (formerly a market town) in the hundred of HORETHORNE, county of SOMERSET, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.E. by E.) from Sherborne, and 115 (W.) from London, containing 1440 inhabitants. This town, which is irregularly built, and consists chiefly of detached houses, is situated at the bottom of a hill, adjoining the river in October, appoint two deputies, or sub-bailiffs; and there are two stewards of the commonalty lands, or public property, belonging to the parish, which is divided into three tythings, Milborne-Port, Milborne-Wick, and Kingsbury-Regis. At the last a court baron is held annually, when a constable, tythingman, and hayward, are appointed. Milborne-Port is a borough by prescription, and returned members to parliament from the 26th to the 35th of Edward I., from which time, until the reign of Charles I., it ceased to exercise the privilege, but in 1628 the franchise was restored: the right of election is in the nine capital bailiffs, their two deputies, the two commonalty stewards, and the inhabitants paying scot and lot; the number of voters is about eighty: the two sub-bailiffs are the returning officers, and the predominant influence is in the Marquis of Anglesey and Sir William Coles Medlycott. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £14. 1. 3., and in the patronage of the Marquis of Anglesey. The church, dedicated to St. John the Evangelist, is an ancient cruciform structure, with a large quadrangular tower, and has recently received an addition of four hundred sittings, of which three hundred and fifty are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having contributed £200 towards defraying the expense. There is a place of worship for Independents.

MILBOURN, a tything in the parish and hundred of MALMESBURY, county of WILTS, 1 mile (E.N.E.) from Malmesbury, containing 115 inhabitants.

MILBOURNE (ST. ANDREW), a parish in the liberty of DEWLISH, Blandford (North) division, though locally in the Dorchester division, of the county of DORSET, 8 miles (S.W.) from Blandford-Forum, containing, with Milbourne-Churchstone, 244 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, with that of Dewlish, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £13. 6. 8. T. Gundry, Esq. was patron in 1800. In this parish is an oblong double-intrenched camp, the area of which is about seven acres. Cardinal Morton, Archbishop of Canterbury in the reign of Henry VII., was born here.

MILBOURNE-CHURCHSTONE, a tything in the parish of MILBOURNE ST. ANDREW, liberty of DEWLISH, Blandford (North) division of the county of DORSET. The population is returned with the parish.

MILBOURNE - STYLEHAM, a parish in the hundred of BEER-REGIS, Blandford (South) division of the county of DORSET, adjacent to Milbourne St. Andrew's, containing 264 inhabitants.

MILBROOK, a chapelry (formerly a market town) in that part of the parish of MAKER which is in the southern division of EAST hundred, county of CORNWALL, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from Saltash. The population is returned with the parish. The inhabitants are chiefly occupied in an extensive fishery. Fairs are held on May 1st and September 29th. Milbrook is said to have anciently sent members to parliament. Courts leet and baron are still held, annually about Michaelmas, for what is called the borough of Milbrook, and the manor of Inswork, at which, by a jury appointed and sworn, a portreeve, clerk of the market, and other officers, are chosen, but their powers are become obsolete from disuse. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Maker. The chapel, which contains six hundred sittings, of which three hundred and fifty-seven are free, was erected at the expense of £300, contributed by the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

MILBURN, a township in the parish of PONTELAND, western division of CASTLE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 11 miles (N.W.) from Newcastle upon Tyne, containing 82 inhabitants. Coal and limestone are obtained in the parish.

MILBURN, a chapelry in the parish of KIRKBY-THORE, EAST ward, county of WESTMORLAND, 7 miles (N. by W.) from Appleby, containing, with Milburn-Grange, 303 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Carlisle, endowed with £500 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Earl of Thanet. The chapel, dedicated to St. Cuthbert, was founded by William de Lancaster, about 1355. Sarah Atkinson, in 1790, left £100 for the education of poor children, the interest of which is about £4. 10. a year. There are some inferior veins of coal and lead-ore in the neighbourhood, but neither of them is worked. On the southern end of Greenfell there are vestiges of a circular fort, deeply moated, called Green Castle, near which was found an altar inscribed "DEO SILVANO."

MILBURN-GRANGE, a township in the parish of PONTELAND, western division of CASTLE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 11½ miles (N.W.) from Newcastle upon Tyne, containing 32 inhabitants.

MILBURN-GRANGE, a hamlet in the parish of KIRKBY-THORE, EAST ward, county of WESTMORLAND, 5½ miles (N. by W.) from Appleby. The population is returned with the chapelry of Milburn.

MILBY, a joint township with Humberton, partly in the parish of KIRBY on the Moor, wapentake of HALLIKELD, North riding, and partly in that part of the parish of ALDBOROUGH which is in the lower division of the wapentake of CLARO, West riding, of the county of YORK, 1 mile (N. by E.) from Boroughbridge. The population is returned with Humberton. The river Ure, which separates this place from Boroughbridge, was, before the Conquest, crossed by a wooden bridge, on the line of the great north road; some remains of it are still visible when the water is low.

MILCOMBE, a chapelry in the parish and hundred of BLOXHAM, county of OXFORD, 6 miles (N.W. by W.) from Deddington, containing 220 inhabitants.

MILCOTT, a hamlet in that part of the parish of WESTON upon AVON which is in the Alcester division of the hundred of BARLICHWAY, county of WARWICK, 2¾ miles (S.W.) from Stratford upon Avon, containing 14 inhabitants.

MILDEN, a parish in the hundred of BABERGH, county of SUFFOLK, 3 miles (S.W. by W.) from Bildeston, containing 167 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Sudbury, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £10. 13. 4. Mrs. M. Hallward was patroness in 1827. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. A trifling rent-charge, the gift of the Rev. William Burkitt, in 1700, is applied in teaching poor children.

MILDENHALL, a parish in the hundred of SELKLEY, county of WILTS, 1½ mile (E.N.E.) from Marlborough, containing 414 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Wilts, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £17. 8. 9., and in the patronage of the Executors of the late Rev. Richard Pococke. The church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, was repaired by the Rev. Charles Francis, late rector, at a considerable expense; he also built and endowed a "Protestant" free school, for the education of poor children. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. On the right of the London road leading from the forest to Marlborough are slight traces of the ancient Roman station Cunetio; where many Roman coins, tessellated pavements, &c., have been discovered.

MILDENHALL (ST. ANDREW'S), a market town and parish in the hundred of LACKFORD, county of SUFFOLK, 38½ miles (N.W.) from Ipswich, and 70 (N.N.E.) from London, containing 2974 inhabitants. The town is situated on a tributary of the river Ouse, called the Lark, which is navigable along the south and west boundaries of the parish, on the high road from Norwich to London through Newmarket. It is large, including, besides one principal and several smaller streets, others of considerable extent, forming detached portions, reaching towards the fens on the east. The streets are neither lighted nor paved, but the inhabitants are plentifully supplied with water from wells and springs. There is a small spinning-mill for raw silk, which affords employment chiefly for children; but the principal branch of commerce is the exportation of grain and other commodities. A market is held on Friday, which is well supplied with fish, wild fowl, and provisions in general; and there is a fair on the 10th of October, for toys, pedlary, &c. A manorial court is held twice or thrice a year, as occasion requires. A high constable is annually appointed; but the town is within the jurisdiction of the county magistrates, who meet occasionally for the despatch of business. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Sudbury, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £22. 8. 1½., and in the patronage of Sir Henry Edward Bunbury, Bart. The church, which is dedicated to St. Mary, is a large handsome structure with a lofty tower; the ceiling is of wood-work, richly carved, and the entrance is through a highly-finished old English porch; in the interior are several ancient monuments. There are places of worship in the parish for Baptists, those in the late Countess of Huntingdon's Connexion, and Wesleyan Methodists. A National school for children of both sexes is supported by subscription. An almshouse for four widows was founded, in 1722, by Sir Thomas Hanner; the inmates have 2s. 6d. a week, and an allowance for coal, clothes, &c.

MILE-END, a district in the parish of STEPNEY, Tower division of the hundred of OSSULSTONE, county of MIDDLESEX, 1 mile (E.) from London, comprising Mile-End Old Town, containing 22,876 inhabitants, and Mile-End New Town, containing 7091. In the rebellion under Jack Cade, in the reign of Henry VI., the insurgents who attacked the metropolis encamped for some time at Mile-End; and in 1642, at the commencement of the civil war, fortifications were raised here, by order of the parliament, for the defence of the city. The Old and the New Towns form one of the most extensive suburbs of London, extending, in a line from west to east, along the principal road to Essex, and comprising many handsome ranges of buildings, and detached houses, and two recently-erected squares, viz., Tredegar-square, on the north side of the road, and Beaumont-square, on the south. The streets are partially paved, and lighted with gas, and the inhabitants are supplied with water chiefly from the West Ham water-works, the reservoir belonging to which is situated to the north of the high road. Here are some extensive breweries, a large distillery, floor-cloth manufactories, and a tobacco-pipe manufactory, also a considerable nursery-ground. The Regent's canal crosses the turnpike-road here, under a stone bridge, and on its banks are several coal and timber wharfs. This district is within the magisterial jurisdiction of the police office at Lambeth-street, Whitechapel; and here is one of the stations of the new police. It is also within the jurisdiction of the Tower Hamlets' court of requests, for debts under 40s., established by act of parliament in the 23rd of George II. The only episcopal places of worship here are the chapels belonging to certain almshouses. The principal places of worship for Dissenters are, one for Calvinistic Methodists, built in 1780, and Brunswick chapel, for Independents.

The charity school at Mile-End Old Town was established, by voluntary contributions, in 1714, and has been subsequently endowed with various benefactions, producing £143. 16. per annum; the surplus of the annual expenditure, about £470, arising from subscriptions: one hundred and sixty boys and one hundred and five girls are educated on the Madras system; a school-room for the girls and other apartments were erected at Stepney-green, in 1786, and the school for boys is situated in Mile-End-road. The Stepney Meeting charity school, for Mile-End Old Town, was founded, by voluntary contributions, in 1783, and afterwards endowed with various benefactions producing £188 per annum: the annual expense is about £400, which is defrayed principally by subscriptions, for which one hundred and thirty boys and sixty girls are instructed, partly on Dr. Bell's, and partly on Lancaster's plan. The charity school for Mile-End New Town was established by voluntary contributions, in 1785, for thirty boys and thirty girls: the permanent income arises from £715 four per cents., and the annual expense, about £230, is chiefly defrayed by subscriptions. Here are almshouses in the patronage of the Vintners' Company, originally founded in 1357, in Thames-street; but having been destroyed by the fire in 1666, they were rebuilt at Mile-End, but taken down and rebuilt a second time, in 1802, in consequence of the bequest of £2250 from Mr. Benjamin Kenton, for that purpose: they consist of twelve sets of apartments, with a chapel, and they are appropriated to the benefit of widows of freemen of the Vintners' Company, who receive about £36 per annum each; and there is a chaplain who performs weekly service, and has a salary of £52. 10. per annum. The almshouses erected by the Brethren of the Trinity-house, consist of twelve sets of apartments, with a handsome chapel in the centre, in the front windows of which are some armorial bearings in stained glass. Francis Bancroft gave, by will, in 1727, in trust to the Drapers' Company, property then valued at £28,000, to found and endow twenty-four almshouses, and a school for one hundred boys: the buildings, which were completed in 1736, consist of two parallel rows of houses, and a central range containing a chapel, a school-room, and other apartments. The present income of this charity, arising from landed property, from £40,800 three per cent. consols., and from £33,400 three per cent. reduced annuities, is more than £4000 per annum; the almsmen have £20 per annum each, and there is a chaplain whose salary is £31. 10. per annum. Twelve almshouses were founded, in 1592, by John Fuller, with an endowment of £50 per annum, for twelve poor single men; and there are almshouses for four poor women, founded in 1698, by John Perner. At Mile-End Old Town is the Jews' hospital for aged poor, and the education and employment of youth, founded in 1806, and enlarged in 1818: the building, which is handsome and spacious, is adorned in front with a central pediment and Ionic pilasters: it is situated on the south side of the road, and nearly opposite to it is the Spanish and Portuguese Jews' hospital, instituted in 1747, for sick poor, lying-in women, and as an asylum for the aged, and supported by voluntary contribution. On the north side of the high road are two large cemeteries belonging to the Portuguese Jews, and a third belonging to the German, or Dutch Jews, in which are interred several of the rabbins and other distinguished Jews. At Mile-End is the East London lying-in institution, supported by voluntary contribution.

MILE-END (ST. MICHAEL), a parish within the liberty of the borough of COLCHESTER, county of ESSEX, 1 mile (N.) from Colchester, containing 447 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Colchester, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £7. 10. The Countess de Grey was patroness in 1817.

MILEHAM, a parish in the hundred of LAUNDITCH, county of NORFOLK, $6\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W.) from East Dereham, containing 516 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £11. 1. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$. The Rev. C. B. Barnwell was patron in 1825. The church is dedicated to St. John the Baptist. The river Nar rises in the parish. Charles Ward, in 1743, bequeathed £200 for teaching children, and clothing the poor. A strong castle was erected here, soon after the Conquest, by Alan, son of Flaald, ancestor of the Fitz-Alans, Earls of Arundel, vestiges of which may be traced within a double intrenchment enclosing an area of twelve acres, and the site of the keep encompassed by an inner trench. Sir Edward Coke, Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench, was born here; he died September 3rd, 1634.

MILFIELD, a township in the parish of KIRK-NEWTON, western division of GLENDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W.) from Wooler, containing 259 inhabitants. This was the residence of the Saxon kings of Bernicia, after the death of Edwin. South of the village is a fine plain, the scene of a battle fought, before that of Flodden, between the English and the Scots, in which the former were defeated. Under an immense heap of stones, supposed by some to have been raised by the Britons, a Roman urn, containing ashes and burnt bones, was discovered in 1823.

MILFORD, a village partly in the township of BELPER, and partly in the hamlet of MAKENY, in the parish of DUFFIELD, hundred of APPLETREE, county of DERBY, 1 mile (S.) from Belper. The population is returned with the parish. This flourishing little place, which is situated on the road from Derby to Chesterfield, Matlock, &c., prior to 1781, consisted only of eight houses, and had a small iron-forge: at that period Messrs. Strutt built a cotton-mill, and subsequently a handsome stone bridge over the river Derwent, which is now a county bridge. An extensive trade is carried on in spinning, dyeing, and bleaching cotton goods, which affords employment to about seven hundred persons. There are places of worship for Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists. A school has been built, and is supported by the proprietors of the different works, for the education of poor children.

MILFORD, a parish partly in that part of the hundred of RINGWOOD which is in the New Forest (East) division, but chiefly in the hundred of CHRISTCHURCH, New Forest (West) division, of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 3 miles (S. W.) from Lymington, containing, with the tythings of Keyhaven and Pennington, 1332 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Hordle, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £20. 13. 1½., and in the patronage of the Provost and Fellows of Queen's College, Oxford. The parish is bounded on the south-east by the Isle of Wight channel.

MILFORD, a tything in that part of the parish of LAVERSTOCK which is in the hundred of UNDERDITCH, county of WILTS, ½ a mile (E.) from Salisbury, containing 489 inhabitants.

MILFORD, a joint township with Kirkby-Wharf, in that part of the parish of KIRKBY-WHARF which is in the upper division of the wapentake of BARKSTONE-ASH, West riding of the county of YORK, 3½ miles (S. S. E.) from Tadcaster. The population is returned with Kirkby-Wharf.

MILFORD (SOUTH), a township in the parish of SHERBURN, partly within the liberty of St. PETER of YORK, but chiefly in the upper division of the wapentake of BARKSTONE-ASH, West riding of the county of YORK, 4¾ miles (N. by E.) from Ferry-Bridge, containing 631 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

MILKHOUSE-STREET, a hamlet in the parish and hundred of CRANBROOKE, lathe of SCRAY, county of KENT, 1¼ mile (N. E.) from Cranbrooke. Here are the interesting remains of a chapel, dedicated to the Holy Trinity. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. A small manufacture for hop-bagging is carried on.

MILLAND, a chapelry in that part of the parish of TROTTON which is in the hundred of EASEBOURNE, rape of CHICHESTER, county of SUSSEX, 6 miles (N. W.) from Midhurst. The population is returned with the parish.

MILLAND-VILLE, an extra-parochial liberty, adjacent to the city, and within the liberty of the soke, of WINCHESTER, Fawley division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, containing 101 inhabitants.

MILLBROOK, a parish in the hundred of REDBORNESTOKE, county of BEDFORD, 1¼ mile (W. by N.) from Ampthill, containing 405 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Bedford, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £9. 16. 3., and in the patronage of Lord Holland. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. Here was anciently a small cell of Benedictine monks, subordinate to the abbey of St. Alban's, who were afterwards removed to the Hermitage of Moddry, belonging also to St. Alban's.

MILLBROOK, a parish in the hundred of BUDDLESGATE, Fawley division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 2 miles (W. N. W.) from Southampton, containing, with the village of Redbridge, 2124 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £10. 6. 3., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Winchester. The church, dedicated to St. Nicholas, and lately rebuilt, has received an addition of four hundred sittings, of which two hundred are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £200 toward defraying the expense, the remainder having been defrayed, partly by subscription and partly by a rate levied on the parishioners. There was formerly a chapel at Shirley, in this parish. A commodious school-house has been recently erected, in which about one hundred and twenty children are taught upon the National system. Here is an iron-foundry, also a manufactory for agricultural implements, at which about sixty persons are employed; and at Shirley are iron-works for the manufacture of spades, shovels, and various descriptions of edge-tools. At Redbridge, where the river Test is crossed by an ancient bridge of five arches, and discharges itself into Southampton water, there was formerly a considerable trade in timber, coal, corn, malt, &c., for which its situation is peculiarly well adapted, but of late years it has much decreased, though by means of the Andover canal, which commences here, there is still some traffic in those articles with the interior of the county. Ship-building, both for the naval and merchant service, was, till within the last few years, carried on to a greater extent than it is at present; sloops of war, mounting from twenty-eight to thirty-two guns, and schooners of a particular construction, having been built here about the close of the last century. A court is held annually by the lord of the manor. This parish is within the jurisdiction of the Cheyney Court held at Winchester every Thursday, for the recovery of debts to any amount.

MILLFORD, a hamlet in the parish of DUFFIELD, hundred of APPLETREE, county of DERBY, 6 miles (N.) from Derby. The population is returned with the parish: about seven hundred persons are employed in the spinning and bleaching of cotton. There are places of worship for Wesleyan Methodists and Unitarians. There is also a Lancasterian school, in which about four hundred children are taught.

MILLINGTON, a township in that part of the parish of ROSTHERN which is in the hundred of BUCKLOW, county palatine of CHESTER, 4½ miles (N. N. W.) from Nether Knutsford, containing 334 inhabitants.

MILLINGTON, a parish partly within the liberty of St. PETER of YORK, but chiefly in the Wilton-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, East riding of the county of YORK, 3 miles (N. E.) from Pocklington, containing 282 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Great Givendale, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Dean of York. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. John Wilkinson, in 1801, bequeathed £200 for the education of ten children, and William Flint, in 1804, gave £100 for teaching four others. Four ancient roads meet at this place, which is supposed to be the Roman Del- govicia, where are traces of a strong camp defended by immense earth-works, from sixty to ninety feet in height, carried indiscriminately over hills and vallies, and encompassed with four, and in some places six, ditches, enclosing altogether an area of four thousand one hundred and eighty-five acres, within which are several tumuli. About half a mile north-east from the village foundations of a circular temple and two oblong buildings, Roman pavements, tiles, coins, and various other relics of antiquity, have been discovered.

MILLO, a hamlet in the parish of DUNTON, hundred of BIGGLESWADE, county of BEDFORD, 3 miles (E. S. E.) from Biggleswade. The population is returned with the parish. The chapel has been demolished.

MILLOM, a parish (formerly a market town) in ALLERDALE ward above Darwent, county of CUMBERLAND, comprising the chapelries of Thwaites and Ulpha, and the townships of Birker with Austhwaite, Chapel-Sucken, Lower Millom, and Upper Millom, and containing 1815 inhabitants, of which number, 460 are in the township of Lower Millom, and 320 in that of Upper Millom, 12 miles (S. E. by S.) from Ravenglass. This parish is bounded on the west and south by the Irish sea, and on the east by the river Duddon, which forms a bay famous for cockles and muscles, and abounding with salmon and sand-eels. The mineral productions are limestone, slate, and iron and copper ore; the limestone alone is found in quantities sufficient to be worked with advantage. A market and a fair were granted in the reign of Henry III., but have been long disused. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £8. 5. 8., endowed with £610 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the King, as Duke of Lancaster. The church, which is dedicated to the Holy Trinity, is an ancient structure, and contains a mural tablet, with effigies to the memory of the Huddleston family. A school was endowed by this family with £200, which has long been lost, but the children of the parish are entitled to instruction in a grammar school at Whicham, and there are charity schools at Millom, with small endowments from a benefaction by William Atkinson, in 1809. Here are the remains of Millom castle, the ancient seat of the Lords of Millom. In Upper Millom are several springs, called Holy wells, impregnated with a purgative salt. In 1824, a curious battle-axe and other relics were found at Lowscals.

MILLSHIELDS, a joint township with Espershields, in the parish of BYWELL ST. PETER, eastern division of TINDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 10½ miles (S. E. by S.) from Hexham. The population is returned with Espershields.

MILNROW, a chapelry in that part of the parish of ROCHDALE which is in the hundred of SALFORD, county palatine of LANCASTER, 2 miles (E. by S.) from Rochdale. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, endowed with £400 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Rochdale. John Collier, otherwise "Tim Bobbin," the popular author of "The Lancashire Dialect," an eccentric caricaturist, poet, and musician, resided fifty-seven years at this place, as the village school-master.

MILNTHORPE, a market town, and joint township with Heversham, in the parish of HEVERSHAM, KENDAL ward, county of WESTMORLAND, 32 miles (S. W. by S.) from Appleby, and 256 (N. W. by N.) from London, containing, with the township of Heversham, 1401 inhabitants. This town is situated on the northern bank of the river Belo, near the mouth of the Kent, and consists chiefly of one long street; the houses are in general of neat appearance, and some of them are handsome. Flax and paper mills, with the spinning of twine, the manufacture of sheeting, bed-ticks, sacking, sails, &c., and some carding and spinning of wool, furnish employment to the working class: there is also some tanning, and in the vicinity are quarries of marble and limestone. This is the only sea-port in the county, being a member of the port of Lancaster, and is accessible by none but very small vessels. The market is on Friday, but not for corn; and fairs are held on May 12th and October 17th, for cattle, sheep, and horses: the former is of ancient institution, and is proclaimed by the steward of the lord of the manor and a procession of gentlemen: during its continuance tolls are collected. Courts leet and baron are held annually, and petty sessions every alternate Wednesday. The parochial church is at Heversham, one mile north of the town. There is a place of worship for Independents, built in 1820. A National school was established in 1819, and is supported by voluntary contributions, George Wilson, Esq. contributing about one-third of the expense: one hundred children, exclusively of Sunday scholars, are educated. A workhouse, for the use of sixteen incorporated townships, was erected at a short distance north-east of the town, in 1813, at an expense of £4,990: the premises occupy two acres of ground; the paupers are employed in weaving; and a meeting of visitors and guardians is held monthly. Detached from the house, on an eminence, is a fever ward in connexion with it.

MILSON, a parish in the hundred of OVERS, county of SALOP, 3¼ miles (S. W.) from Cleobury-Mortimer, containing 125 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Neen-Sollars, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford. The church is dedicated to St. George.

MILSTEAD, a parish in the hundred of MILTON, lathe of SCRAY, county of KENT, 3 miles (S. by W.) from Sittingbourne, containing 191 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £8. 15. Sarah T. Patterson was patroness in 1819. The church, dedicated to St. Mary and the Holy Cross, is in the early style of English architecture. There are almshouses for five poor persons. John Wyatt, in 1722, gave land now let for £20 a year, for the education of eight poor children of this parish, and the same number of that of Frinsted.

MILSTON, a parish in the hundred of AMESBURY, county of WILTS, 2¾ miles (N.) from Amesbury, containing, with Brigmis, 98 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £12. 15. 2½. P. Templeman, Esq. was patron in 1802. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. Joseph Addison, the distinguished essayist and poet, was born at the parsonage-house, in 1672, his father being then rector.

MILTHORPE, a hamlet in the parish of ASLACKBY, wapentake of AVELAND, parts of KESTIVEN, county of LINCOLN, containing 86 inhabitants.

MILTON, a parish in the hundred of OCK, county of BERKS, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by W.) from Abingdon, containing 421 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Berks, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £17. 9. 7., and in the patronage of the Dean and Canons of Christ Church, Oxford, on the demise of the present incumbent, and another individual named in the will of the late Rev. J. G. Warner. The church is dedicated to St. Blaise. The Rev. J. G. Warner, late rector, gave the dividends on certain property in the public funds, for the education of poor children of the parish; the income is about £67 per annum, for which twenty of each sex are taught on the National system. The manor-house was erected by Inigo Jones.

MILTON, a parish in the hundred of NORTHSTOW, county of CAMBRIDGE, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.E. by N.) from Cambridge, containing 341 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Ely, rated in the king's books at £4. 16. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$., endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Rector: the rectory is a sinecure, rated at £4. 7. 1., and in the patronage of the Provost and Fellows of King's College, Cambridge. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

MILTON, a joint township with Weaverham, in the parish of WEAVERHAM, second division of the hundred of EDDISBURY, county palatine of CHESTER, 4 miles (W. by N.) from Northwich. The population is returned with Weaverham.

MILTON, a hamlet in the parish of PRITTLEWELL, hundred of ROCHFORD, county of ESSEX, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile (S. by E.) from Prittlewell, with which the population is returned. This hamlet is situated on the coast, and was once a distinct parish, which has been encroached on by the sea; at low water some remains of the church were visible not long since. Here are fine beds of oysters.

MILTON, a parish in the hundred of WESTGATE, lathe of ST. AUGUSTINE, county of KENT, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.W. by W.) from Canterbury. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £4. 14. 4., and in the patronage of W. P. Honeywood, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas. This parish contains only one house and two hundred acres of land.

MILTON, a chapelry in the parish of EAST ADDERBURY, hundred of BLOXHAM, county of OXFORD, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.N.W.) from Deddington, containing 190 inhabitants. The chapel has been demolished.

MILTON, a chapelry in the parish of SHIPTON under WHICHWOOD, hundred of CHADLINGTON, county of OXFORD, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. by E.) from Burford, containing 567 inhabitants.

MILTON, a parish in the hundred of CHRISTCHURCH, New Forest (West) division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by N.) from Christchurch, containing 702 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Provost and Fellows of Queen's College, Oxford. The church is dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene. There is a place of worship for Independents. The parish is bounded on the south by Christchurch bay, where there is a preventive station.

MILTON next GRAVESEND, a parish in the hundred of TOLTINGTROUGH, lathe of AYLESFORD, county of KENT, comprising part of the town of Gravesend, and containing 2769 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Rochester, rated in the king's books at £16. 5. 10., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the alternate patronage of the Crown and the Bishop of Rochester. The church is dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul. Over the porch is a curious dial, constructed by Mr. Giles, master of Gravesend school, and within the church are painted the crests of the kings of England, from Edward III. to James I. The parish is bounded on the north by the Thames, and the Thames and Medway canal passes through it. Milton is incorporated with the town of Gravesend, the corporation being styled "The Mayor, Jurats, and Inhabitants of the parishes of Gravesend and Milton." It has a fair, commencing on the festival of the Conversion of St. Paul, and continuing a week. Here was formerly a free chapel, or hospital, under the government of some Regular friars. For an account of the school, &c., See GRAVESEND.

MILTON (GREAT), a parish partly in the hundred of BULLINGTON, but chiefly in that of THAME, county of OXFORD, 4 miles (W. by N.) from Tetsworth, containing, with the hamlets of Ascott and Chilworth, 701 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Prebendary of Great Milton in the Cathedral Church of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £15. The Rev. O. Manning was patron in 1800. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. Here was formerly a monastery, a cell to that at Abingdon.

MILTON (LITTLE), a chapelry in the parish of ADDERBURY, hundred of THAME, county of OXFORD, 5 miles (W.) from Tetsworth, containing 442 inhabitants. The chapel, dedicated to St. John, has been demolished.

MILTON next SITTINGBOURNE, a market town and parish in the hundred of MILTON, lathe of SCRAY, county of KENT, 12 miles (N. E. by E.) from Maidstone, and 40 (E. by S.) from London, containing 2012 inhabitants. This town was anciently called Middletun, a Saxon appellation, indicative of its central position in the county, and also "the king's town of Milton," having probably been, in early ages, the place of residence of the kings of Kent, as well as a part of the demesne of the crown. Its proximity to the Swale, which separates the Isle of Sheppey from the main land, rendered it easily accessible to the invading Danes, by whom it was frequently plundered in the ninth century. Here their veteran chief, Hastings, attempted to establish himself in the time of Alfred; and the remains of his encampment, or fortress, in the marshes of Kemsley, between Milton church and the north end of the creek, are still visible. The ancient town, together with the palace of the Kentish kings, was burnt by Earl Godwin, about the year 1052. Milton appears to have been rebuilt, and to have become a place of importance in the time of the Conqueror, who, according to Domesday-book, held the manor, which, for a long while afterwards, was vested in the crown, and frequently granted in dower to the queens of England.

From Isabella, the consort of Edward II., the grant of a market and an annual fair for four days was obtained. In the reign of John the right of the fishery in the manor and hundred of Milton was granted to Faversham abbey, but at the dissolution, becoming again vested in the crown, the manor continued to be royal property till it was finally alienated by Charles I. The town is situated about half a mile from the high road from London to Dover, on a hill sloping down to a small creek, or channel, which separates it from the Isle of Sheppy; the streets are narrow and badly paved. The commercial business consists chiefly in shipping, for the London market, the agricultural produce of the neighbourhood, and in bringing goods in return. The oyster fishery affords employment to a great number of the inhabitants; the right of this fishery is now held on lease by a company of free dredgers, about one hundred and forty in number, who are governed by laws made in the court baron of the manor: the oysters, under the name of native Milton oysters, are very fine and in great request. There are extensive yards for making bricks of a very superior quality, which, together with flints dug in the neighbourhood, and wild fowl, of which there is a decoy in the marshes, are sent to London. The market is on Saturday; and a fair for cattle is held on the 24th of July: the market-house and shambles are near the centre of the town. A portreeve for the hundreds of Milton and Marden, who is supervisor of weights and measures, is chosen, with a warden, on the 25th of July, at a court baron held before the steward of the manor, by such of the inhabitants as pay church and poor rates. The manor courts and public meetings are held at the market-house, under which is the town gaol.

The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £13. 2. 6., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury. The church, which is dedicated to the Holy Trinity, is large and handsome, with portions in the decorated style of English architecture: it consists of a nave, south aisle, and two chancels, with a heavy embattled tower at the west end, built of square flints; in the south chancel, or chapel, which belonged to the ancient family of Northwood, are a piscina and two stone seats: it also contains several ancient monuments. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. A free school is endowed with £10 per annum from benefactions by Elizabeth Morley, in 1714, and John Knotts, in 1718, for which ten children are educated; both the master and the children are appointed by the minister and churchwardens. National schools, for more than two hundred children of both sexes, are supported by voluntary contributions. In the western part of the parish is a coppice of several hundred acres, and one adjoining it extends five miles southward: these woods are noted for chesnut trees, many of which are very ancient, and serve as "termini," or boundaries, as well for private property as for parishes. The remains of the Danish fortress at Kemsley-down form a square, surrounded by a high vallum and a broad ditch; and being overgrown by trees and underwood, it has received the appellation of Castle-rough: a raised causeway, leading from it to the sea-shore, may be distinctly traced.

MILTON (SOUTH), a parish in the hundred of STANBOROUGH, county of DEVON, 2 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. S. W.)

from Kingsbridge, containing 356 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of West Allington, in the archdeaconry of Totness, and diocese of Exeter.

MILTON upon STOUR, a hamlet in the parish and liberty of GILLINGHAM, Shaston (West) division of the county of DORSET, 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W.) from Shaftesbury. Here was formerly a free chapel.

MILTON (WEST), a chapelry in the parish and liberty of POORSTOCK, though locally in the hundred of Eggerton, Bridport division of the county of DORSET, 3 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Bridport. The population is returned with the parish.

MILTON-ABBAS, a parish (formerly a market town) in the hundred of WHITEWAY, Cerne subdivision of the county of DORSET, 7 miles (S. W. by W.) from Blandford-Forum, containing 767 inhabitants. The present appellation of this place is a contraction of its ancient name of Middleton, implying its central situation within the county; the adjunct being given from its ancient lords, the abbots: it was formerly much larger than it is at present. In 1658, the upper part of the town was destroyed by fire, and a brief was granted for rebuilding it in 1661. A Benedictine monastery was founded here, in the year 933, by King Athelstan, and dedicated to the honour of St. Mary, St. Michael, St. Sampson, and St. Branwalader, the revenue of which, at the dissolution, was valued at £720. 4. 1. The church, which stood northward of the abbey, was destroyed by lightning, on September 2nd, 1309: it was handsomely rebuilt, with the exception of the nave, in the reign of Edward II., and is now used as the private chapel of the Damer family: it consists of the choir, transepts, and tower of the abbey church; the former is in the decorated, and the two latter in the later English, style of architecture. The conventual buildings, with the exception of the ancient hall, were taken down in 1771, and replaced by the present splendid mansion, called Milton Abbey, erected from a design by Sir William Chambers, in imitation of the later style of English architecture. An ancient chapel, dedicated to St. Catherine, has long been desecrated. A market was granted by King Athelstan and confirmed by Edward I., who also granted a fair, to be held on the 27th and 28th of July: the market was originally held on Monday, and afterwards on Tuesday, but has wholly declined. In the 22nd of Charles II., a fair was granted to John Tregonwell, Esq., which was held at Windmill-Ash, on the 5th of June, and lasted a week, until its removal to Milton-Abbas, when it fell to decay. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the jurisdiction of the peculiar court of Milton-Abbas, rated in the king's books at £10, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Lady Caroline Damer. The church, dedicated to St. Mary and St. Sampson, was built at the expense of the first earl of Dorchester. Here is a free school, with a considerable endowment: the school-room was burnt in 1658, and rebuilt four years afterwards. An almshouse for six poor persons was founded and endowed by John Tregonwell, Esq., in 1674: the inmates receive a pecuniary allowance weekly, and some articles of clothing and money annually on St. Thomas' day.

MILTON-ABBOT, a parish in the hundred of TAVISTOCK, county of DEVON, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Tavistock, containing 1151 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Totness, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £19. 13. $6\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Duke of Bedford. The church is dedicated to St. Constantine. In this parish, which is watered by the river Tamar, is the Anglo-Swiss domain of the Duke of Bedford, distinguished for its beautiful scenery and landscape gardening.

MILTON-BRYANT, a parish in the hundred of MANSHEAD, county of BEDFORD, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E.) from Woburn, containing 346 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Bedford, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £11. 16. 3., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

MILTON-CLEVEDON, county of SOMERSET.—See CLEVEDON (MILTON).

MILTON-DAMERELL, a parish in the hundred of BLACK TORRINGTON, county of DEVON, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) by N.) from Holsworthy, containing 661 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with the perpetual curacy of Cookbury, in the archdeaconry of Totness, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £26. 13. $6\frac{1}{2}$.. Lord Viscount Courtenay was patron in 1799. The church is dedicated to the Holy Trinity.

MILTON-ERNEST, a parish forming, with the parishes of Clapham and Oakley, a detached portion of the hundred of STODDEN, county of BEDFORD, 5 miles (N. W. by N.) from Bedford, containing 364 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Bedford, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £7. 6. 8. Edmund Turnor, Esq. was patron in 1825. The church is dedicated to All Saints. An almshouse for six poor persons was founded, in 1693, by Sir Edmund Turnor, who endowed it with lands now producing about £40 per annum.

MILTON-KEYNES, a parish in the hundred of NEWPORT, county of BUCKINGHAM, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by E.) from Newport-Pagnell, containing 338 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £20, and in the patronage of the Earl of Winchilsea. The church is dedicated to All Saints: the southern porch has an ancient open-work screen on each side. Dr. Francis Atterbury, Bishop of Rochester, was born here in 1662; he died an exile in France, in 1731; and Dr. William Wotton, a learned divine, critic, and historian, the author of "Reflections on Ancient and Modern Learning," was rector of this parish from 1693 till his death in 1726.

MILTON-LILBORNE, a parish in the hundred of KINWARDSTONE, county of WILTS, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (E. by N.) from Pewsey, containing 632 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Wilts, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £7. 13. 6., endowed with £600 parliamentary grant. P. Pulse, Esq. was patron in 1800. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, has lately received an addition of sixty-nine free sittings, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £25 towards defraying the expense.

MILTON, or MIDDLETON-MALZOR, a parish in the hundred of WYMERSLEY, county of NORTHAMPTON,

$3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by W.) from Northampton, containing 492 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £16. 15. 10., and in the patronage of the Rev. J. C. Miller. The church is dedicated to the Holy Cross. There is a place of worship for Baptists. The Northampton canal crosses the north-western part of the parish. Six poor children are instructed for a trifling rent-charge bequeathed, in 1756, by Elizabeth Gaffield.

MILTON-PODIMORE, county of SOMERSET.—See PODIMORE (MILTON).

MILVERTON, a market town and parish in the hundred of MILVERTON, county of SOMERSET, 26 miles (W. by S.) from Somerton, and 151 (W. by S.) from London, containing 1930 inhabitants. The present name of this town, which is a place of very great antiquity, is considered to be a corruption of Mill-ford-town: it was formerly a royal borough, and the king, as superior lord, still receives certain chief rents and fines. Milverton is delightfully situated, amidst woodland scenery, upon an eminence just above the western extremity of the vale of Taunton-Dean, over the whole of which it commands an uninterrupted view: it consists of three irregular streets, which are neither paved nor lighted; but the inhabitants are well supplied with water. Here was formerly an extensive manufacture of serges, druggets, and flannels; at present the chief employment is silk-throwing, and this has much declined of late years. The market is on Friday: a fair, chartered by Queen Anne, formerly held on Easter Tuesday, is now disused; but one is held on the 10th of October, for broad cloth and pedlary. A portreeve and subordinate officers are appointed annually; but the town is under the jurisdiction of the county magistrates, who hold petty sessions here. The living is a vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Langford-Budville, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Archdeacon of Taunton, as Prebendary of Milverton in the Cathedral Church of Wells, rated in the king's books at £21. 19. 2. The church, which is dedicated to St. Michael, is a spacious edifice, supposed to have been one of the numerous churches in this county which were built in the reign of Henry VII. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends and Independents. In 1721, Mary Lamb devised £300 for the education of children, and the funds having accumulated for several years, the present income is £54. 2. per annum; twenty boys and twenty girls are instructed by a master, whose salary is £40 per annum. An old house, called the parsonage-house, is said to have been erected by Cardinal Wolsey, whose arms are visible over the door: he had considerable property in this town. John de Milverton, a Carmelite friar in the fifteenth century, who distinguished himself by writing against Wickliff, was a native of this place.

MILVERTON, a parish in the Kenilworth division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, county of WARWICK, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (N. N. E.) from Warwick, containing, with Edmonscott, 193 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Coventry, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant. The Earl of Warwick was patron in 1792. The church is dedicated to St. James. Six children are instructed for a rent-charge of £3, left by John Ayeares in 1775.

MILWICH, a parish in the southern division of the hundred of PIREHILL, county of STAFFORD, 5 miles (E.S.E.) from Stone, containing 567 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Stafford, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £4. 3. 4. Lewis G. Dyve, Esq. was patron in 1803. The church is dedicated to All Saints. Ten children are instructed for £5 a year, the gift of Elizabeth Harrison.

MIMMS (NORTH), a parish in the hundred of DACORUM, though locally in that of Cashio, or liberty of St. Alban's, county of HERTFORD, 4 miles (S.S.W.) from Bishop's Hatfield, containing 1007 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Huntingdon, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £10, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Mrs. Gaussen. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is built of flints, with a square tower embattled, and surmounted by a lofty spire; it contains many effigies, and brasses with inscriptions in black letter, and other ancient memorials of the dead. On the north side of the chancel is the chantry chapel of St. Catherine, founded in 1328, by Simon de Swonlond, the windows of which exhibit, in stained glass, various shields and coats of arms, principally of the Coningsby family.

MIMMS (SOUTH), a parish in the hundred of EDMONTON, county of MIDDLESEX, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.N.W.) from Chipping-Barnet, containing 1906 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Middlesex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £12. 3. 4. W. P. Hammond, Esq. was patron in 1812. The church is dedicated to St. Giles.

MINCHINHAMPTON, county of GLOUCESTER. — See HAMPTON (MINCHIN).

MINCHINTON, a tything in the parish of HANDLEY, in that part of the hundred of SIXPENNY-HANDLEY which is in the Shaston (East) division of the county of DORSET, 7 miles (W. by N.) from Cranborne. The population is returned with the parish.

MINDTOWN, a parish in the hundred of PURSLOW, county of SALOP, 5 miles (E.N.E.) from Bishop's Castle, containing 31 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £4. 13. 4., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty. The Earl of Powis was patron in 1820. The church is dedicated to St. John the Baptist.

MINEHEAD, a borough, market town, and parish, in the hundred of CARHAMPTON, county of SOMERSET, $38\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.N.W.) from Somerton, and 160 (W. by S.) from London, containing 1239 inhabitants. At the Conquest this town, then called Manheved, was given by the Conqueror to William de Mohun: between the years 1550 and 1654 it was repeatedly visited by the plague, and has also at various periods suffered from fires: it is situated on the shore of the Bristol channel, and consists of the Church town, which is composed of mean irregular streets, on a sloping eminence called "Greenaleigh;" the Lower town, which is the principal part, comprising some respectable streets, and the town hall, lately erected at the expense of John Fownes Luttrell, Esq.; and the Quay town, near the water's edge, including the custom-house: the quay is a solid piece of masonry, with a parapet towards the sea, into which it extends about a quarter of a mile, affording a tolerable shelter for small vessels. The climate here is so mild that myrtles and geraniums flourish in the open air during the whole winter, and vegetation is supposed to commence earlier than in any other part of England. Minehead is occasionally visited by invalids from Bristol, Bath, &c., for the purpose of sea-bathing, but its reputation as yet is not sufficient to give it the title of a bathing-place. The inhabitants were formerly engaged in foreign commerce to a great extent, and even at the commencement of the last century, forty vessels from this harbour were in constant communication with Ireland alone: at present five or six vessels only belong to the port, two of which trade with Bristol in grain, malt, bark, timber, flour, and leather, and are freighted back with grocery, iron, &c.; the rest convey similar commodities to Wales, and return with coal, culm, and limestone. A considerable number of herrings is taken on the coast; and there is an annual importation of cattle, sheep, and pigs, but the vessels return with ballast. By an act of parliament, granted in the 13th of William III., and subsequently extended, the harbour and quay are supported and kept in repair, by eleven trustees, including the lord of the manor, from certain duties chargeable upon goods entering the port. There is a custom-house, with a collector and other officers. The market, for fish and provisions, is held on Wednesday; and there is a chartered fair, for pedlary, &c., on the Wednesday in Whitsun-week. Under a charter granted by Elizabeth, the town was governed by a portreeve; but now only by two constables, who are annually elected at the court leet of the lord of the manor. The borough first sent members to parliament in the reign of Elizabeth: the elective franchise is vested in all the parishioners of Minehead, and the inhabitants of that part of the parish of Dunster which is within the manor of Minehead, who are housekeepers not receiving alms: the constables are the returning officers, and the influence of John Fownes Luttrell, Esq. is predominant. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Taunton, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £18. 9. 7., and in the patronage of John Fownes Luttrell, Esq. The church, which is dedicated to St. Michael, is spacious and handsome, with an embattled tower at the west end. In the chancel is an ancient monument, supposed to be that of Judge Bracton, Chief Justice of England in the reign of Henry III., and author of the earliest treatise on the Laws of England extant; likewise a handsome statue of Queen Anne, the gift of Sir Jacob Bankes, once a representative of the borough. There is a place of worship for Baptists. A free school for thirty boys is supported by the lord of the manor. An almshouse for eleven poor and impotent persons was built and endowed by Robert Quirke, about 1648: it has been used as a parish workhouse, but is about to be restored to its original purpose. By an act of parliament passed in the 18th of Charles II. it was enacted, that the importation of cattle into Minehead should be considered a nuisance after February 1st, 1666, and that they should be forfeited, half the value to be applied for the use of the poor, and the other half given to the captors: a certain capture having been made, the moiety was laid out in the purchase of an estate, the rental of which, amounting to about £30 per annum, together with the interest of £1197. 5. 7.

three per cent. consols., arising from unappropriated accumulation of income, is distributed annually to the poor in money and clothing; this charity is called the "Cow charity." A species of shell fish is found, at low water, on the rocks off Minehead, which affords a peculiar fluid, having the property of communicating to linen a purple tint, supposed to be similar to the murex, which produced the Tyrian purple mentioned by Pliny. The celebrated lawyer above mentioned, Henry de Bracton, is said to have been born at Bratton Court, an old English mansion here: over the principal gateway which remains is a room called the Judge's Chamber, traditionally reported to have been his study; but the building is of a later period than the age in which he lived. Dr. Brocklesby, the friend of Johnson and Burke, distinguished as a physician and medical writer, was likewise a native of Minehead.

MINETY, a parish chiefly in the hundred of CROWTHORNE and MINETY, county of GLOUCESTER, though partly in the hundred of MALMESBURY, county of WILTS, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Malmesbury, containing 562 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Wilts, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £7. 7. 6., endowed with £12 per annum private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Archdeacon of Wilts. The church, dedicated to St. Leonard, with the parsonage-house and some other houses, and about forty acres of land, is in Wiltshire, and surrounded by that part of the parish which is in Gloucestershire, though the entire parish is bounded on every side by the former county. There is a spring in the parish, the water of which is impregnated with iron.

MININGSBY, a parish in the western division of the soke of BOLINGBROKE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 6 miles (W. by S.) from Spilsby, containing 134 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £9. 8. $6\frac{1}{2}$., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the King, as Duke of Lancaster. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew.

MINLEY, a tything in the parish of YATELY, hundred of CRONDALL, Basingstoke division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 3 miles (E. by N.) from Hartford Bridge, containing 33 inhabitants.

MINSHULL (CHURCH), a parish in the hundred of NANTWICH, county palatine of CHESTER, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Nantwich, containing 528 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of J. Brooke, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Bartholomew. There is a place of worship for Independents. A school, erected by subscription in 1785, is endowed with about £15 per annum.

MINSHULL-VERNON, a township in that part of the parish of MIDDLEWICH which is in the hundred of NORTHWICH, county palatine of CHESTER, 4 miles (S. W.) from Middlewich, containing 349 inhabitants.

MINSKEP, a township in that part of the parish of ALDBOROUGH which is in the lower division of the wapentake of CLARO, West riding of the county of YORK, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S. by W.) from Boroughbridge, containing 243 inhabitants.

MINSTEAD, a parish in the northern division of the hundred of NEW FOREST, New Forest (East) division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Lyndhurst, containing, with a part of Cadnam, 1007 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £7. 12. 6., and in the patronage of H. C. Compton, Esq. The church is dedicated to All Saints. Near Malwood Castle lodge, and within this parish, stands a triangular stone about five feet in height, erected in 1745, by John, Lord De la Warre, commemorating the site of the tree from which Tyrrell's arrow glanced and killed William II., in the year 1100: the place was visited by George III. and his Royal consort, June 27th, 1789.

MINSTER, a parish in the hundred of LESNEWTH, county of CORNWALL, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Bossiney, containing, with a part of the small sea-port of Boscastle, 425 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £22. 17. 11, and in the patronage of Thomas John Phillips, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Metharian: near it are some slight remains of a priory of Black monks, founded by William de Bottreaux, as a cell to the priory of Tywardreth.

MINSTER, a parish in the hundred of RINGSLOW, or Isle of THANET, lathe of ST. AUGUSTINE, county of KENT, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Ramsgate, containing 920 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £33. 3. 4., and in the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a handsome cruciform structure, in the early style of English architecture, with a lofty spire steeple; in the choir are eighteen stalls. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The river Stour runs along the southern boundary of the parish, and its navigation to Sandwich is materially shortened by a canal called Stonar Cut. Minster once possessed a charter for a market and a fair: the former is disused, but the latter, for pedlary and toys, is still kept on Good Friday. Courts leet and baron are held here. About half a mile south-east from the church is Ebbsfleet, where Hengist and Horsa first landed in 449, St. Augustine in 596, and subsequently, from France, St. Mildred, the first abbess of a convent of seventy nuns, founded here about 670, in honour of the Virgin Mary, by her mother Domneva, a niece of King Egbert. In 980, and 1011, this convent was pillaged and burned, and its inmates murdered, by the Danes; after which only a few Secular priests occupied the remains, its possessions having been given to the monks of St. Augustine's abbey, Canterbury, who removed the body of St. Mildred to their own church. About a mile to the eastward of St. Mary's, St. Eadburgha, in 740, built another convent, in honour of St. Peter and St. Paul.

MINSTER in SHEPPY, a parish in the liberty of the Isle of SHEPPY, lathe of SCRAY, county of KENT, 3 miles (E. by N.) from Queenborough, containing, with Sheerness, 8414 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, endowed with £1400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Robert Mitchell, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Mary and St. Sexburg, has a large square tower crowned with a turret. There is a place of worship for Independents. A convent was founded here, in 675, by Sexburg, the mother of Egbert, King of Kent, for seventy-seven nuns, who suffered much during the invasions of the Danes, by whom their house was finally destroyed; but in 1130 it was rebuilt and dedicated to St. Mary and St. Sexburg, by William, Archbishop of Canterbury, for Benedictine nuns, whose revenue, at the dissolution, was estimated at £122. 14. 6: the ruins are still visible near the church. The port of Sheerness, at the western extremity of the parish, and formerly within its limits, has been made a separate vill, with an independent civil jurisdiction.

MINSTER (SOUTH), a parish in the hundred of DENGIE, county of ESSEX, 3 miles (N. by E.) from Burnham, containing 1445 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Essex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £21, and in the patronage of the Governors of the Charter-house, London. The church, dedicated to St. Leonard, is a cruciform structure, and has lately received an addition of three hundred and sixty sittings, of which two hundred and fifty are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £400 towards defraying the expense. There are slight remains of a chapel at Southminster hall. The Independents have a place of worship here. A National school was established by the late vicar. The parish is bounded on the south-east by Crouch river, and on the east by the North sea.

MINSTER-LOVELL, a parish in the hundred of CHADLINGTON, county of OXFORD, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Witney, containing 326 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Oxford, rated in the king's books at £8. 9. 7., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Provost and Fellows of Eton College. The church, dedicated to St. Kenelm, is a large ancient structure, with a tower rising from the centre; in the chancel is a splendid monument, encircled with military trophies, to the memory of Henry Heylyn, Esq., a distinguished officer in the service of Charles I. Minster-Lovell is situated on the declivity of two opposite hills, between which runs the river Windrush, dividing the parish into what is termed Great and Little Minster. An Alien priory of Benedictine monks, a cell to the abbey of St. Mary de Ibreio, was founded here in the reign of John, and at the suppression granted to Eton College.

MINSTERLEY, a chapelry in the parish of WESTBURY, hundred of FORD, county of SALOP, $9\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W.) from Shrewsbury, containing 758 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Westbury, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford, endowed with £800 parliamentary grant. The chapel is dedicated to the Holy Trinity. There is a place of worship for Baptists, and another for Independents.

MINSTERWORTH, a parish in the duchy of LANCASTER, county of GLOUCESTER, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Gloucester, containing 462 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £10. 13. 4., endowed with £800 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £500 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bristol. The church is dedicated to St. George. The parish is bounded on the east and south by the navigable river Severn, in which is a considerable salmon fishery. A great quantity of cider is made in the neighbourhood. Daniel Ellis, in 1784, bequeathed £100 for the erection of a school, which was built, in 1808, on land given by Jeremiah Hawkins: there is an endowment of £4 per annum, left by Susannah Crump in 1763, and paid to this charity for teaching ten children.

MINTERN (MAGNA), a parish partly in the liberty of FORDINGTON, Dorchester division, partly in the hundred of CERNE, TOTCOMBE, and MODBURY, but chiefly in the liberty of PIDDLETRENTHIDE, Cerne subdivision of the county of DORSET, 10 miles (N. by W.) from Dorchester, containing, with the tything of Hartly, 311 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £12. 14. 2. Mrs. Sturt and another were patrons in 1798. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew: round the north aisle, which is the burial-place of the Napiers, are coats of arms, and inscriptions to the memory of several members of that ancient family.

MINTERN (PARVA), a tything in the parish and hundred of BUCKLAND-NEWTON, Cerne subdivision of the county of DORSET, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Dorchester, containing 105 inhabitants.

MINTING, a parish in the southern division of the wapentake of GARTREE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Horncastle, containing 270 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £5. 7. 11., and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of St. John's College, Cambridge. The church, dedicated to St. Andrew, was given, before 1129, to the abbey of Leyr in France, upon which an Alien priory of Benedictine monks was established and continued here till its suppression by Henry V., who granted it to the Carthusian priory of Mountgrace, and, as parcel of its possessions, it was given in exchange to the Dean and Chapter of Westminster.

MINTLYN, a parish in the Lynn division of the hundred of FREEBRIDGE, county of NORFOLK, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Lynn-Regis, containing 30 inhabitants. The church, which was dedicated to St. Michael, has been demolished.

MINVER (ST.) HIGHLANDS, a parish in the hundred of TRIGG, county of CORNWALL, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Padstow, containing, with St. Minver Lowlands, 1028 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £13. 10. $2\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of William Sandys, Esq., who, in 1810, presented the beautiful window of stained glass erected in the chancel of the church. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists, also a disused meeting-house, with a cemetery, belonging to the Society of Friends. Trewornan bridge was built, through the exertions of Mr. Sandys, about 1721, across a dangerous and frequently impassable ford at high tides, on the road between St. Minver and Egloshayle, and has since been made a county bridge. The stream separates these two parishes, and, by the flowing of the tide, it is rendered navigable up to Amblebridge in the parish of St. Kew.

MINVER (ST.) LOWLANDS, a chapelry in the parish of ST. MINVER HIGHLANDS, hundred of TRIGG, county of CORNWALL, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (E.) from Padstow, containing 315 inhabitants. The chapel, dedicated to St. Michael, and commonly called Porthilly church, is situated on the margin of Padstow river. The village of that name has long been deserted, owing to the drifting of the sands.

MINWORTH, a township in the parish of CURDWORTH, Birmingham division of the hundred of HEMLINGFORD, county of WARWICK, 4 miles (N. W. by W.) from Coleshill, containing 287 inhabitants.

MIRFIELD, a parish in the lower division of the wapentake of AGRIGG, West riding of the county of YORK, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Dewsbury, containing 5041 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £6. 1. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$., endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Sir G. Armytage, Bart. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, has lately received an addition of four hundred and ninety-eight sittings, of which two hundred and eighty are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £250 towards defraying the expense. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Richard Thorpe, in 1667, conveyed to trustees certain houses and lands, now producing about £53 a year, for teaching fifteen poor children. This income, with the sum of £2. 10. a year, given by Joseph Lidgard and Thomas Holdsworth, are applied to the free instruction of twenty children, in a school-room erected by the inhabitants. The river Calder runs through the parish, in which the woollen manufacture is carried on to a great extent. Up to 1261, Mirfield formed a part of the Saxon parish of Dewsbury; but the lady of Sir John Heton, on her way to Dewsbury church, before dawn on Christmas-day, was attacked by robbers, and her attendant murdered, in consequence of which, at the intercession of her husband, then at Rome, the Pope granted permission to build a chapel here, which became parochial, and is the present parish church. Near it is a conical mount, thrown up by the Saxons for the defence of the ancient mansion, still called Castle-hall. The plague raged here with great fury in 1631, and swept off a great number of persons.

MISERDEN, a parish in the hundred of BISLEY, county of GLOUCESTER, 5 miles (E. S. E.) from Painswick, containing 514 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £8. 13. 4., and in the patronage of Sir Edwin Sandys, Bart. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew. There are quarries of limestone and some tile-kilns in the parish. Of Miserden castle little more remains than loose fragments of stone strewn about its ancient site.

MISSENDEN, a hamlet in the parish of HITCHIN, hundred of HITCHIN and PIRTON, county of HERTFORD, 3 miles (S. by E.) from Hitchin, with which the population is returned.

MISSENDEN (GREAT), a parish in the hundred of AYLESBURY, county of BUCKINGHAM, 26 miles (S. E. by S.) from Buckingham, containing 1735 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln. William Astle, Esq. and others were patrons in 1820. The church is dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul.

There is a place of worship for Baptists. A free school on the British system was established here on the 1st of January, 1827, by Mr. John Hull, and is attended by about one hundred and fifty pupils. An abbey for Black canons, in honour of the Virgin Mary, was founded here, in 1133, by Sir William de Missenden, the revenue of which, at the dissolution, was £285. 15. 9. John Randall, an eminent divine in the reign of James I., was born here.

MISSENDEN (LITTLE), a parish in the hundred of AYLESBURY, county of BUCKINGHAM, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Amersham, containing 814 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £13. 3. 9., and in the patronage of Earl Howe. The church is dedicated to St. John the Baptist.

MISSON, a parish in the Hatfield division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, county of NOTTINGHAM, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Bawtry, containing 720 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Nottingham, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £6. 4. 4 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Crown. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. A free school, erected here in 1693, by Thomas Mowbray and John Pinder, is endowed with land, &c., now producing an annual income of about £65, for teaching poor children.

MISTERTON, a parish in the hundred of GUTHLAXTON, county of LEICESTER, 1 mile (E. by S.) from Lutterworth, containing, with the chapelry of Walcote, and the hamlet of Poultny, 539 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Leicester, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £16. 13. 4., and in the patronage of Jacob Henry Franks, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Leonard. The river Swift, which at times rises and falls very rapidly, runs through the parish. James Blick, in 1730, left a trifling sum to provide books for poor children.

MISTERTON, a parish in the North-clay division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, county of NOTTINGHAM, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W.) from Gainsborough, containing, with the chapelry of West Stockwith, 1429 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the lord of the manor of Gringley on the Hill, rated in the king's books at £10. 5., endowed with £10 per annum, and £200 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £1100 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of York. The church is dedicated to All Saints. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists, and a Roman Catholic chapel. The Chesterfield and Trent canal, also Bycar Dyke, from the stop of the river Idle, passes through the parish.

MISTERTON, a parish in the hundred of CREWKERNE, county of SOMERSET, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (S. E. by S.) from Crewkerne, containing 362 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Taunton, and diocese of Bath and Wells, endowed with £500 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Winchester. The church is dedicated to St. Leonard.

MISTLEY, a parish in the hundred of TENDRING, county of ESSEX, $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile (E.) from Manningtree, containing 778 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, with the curacy of Manningtree, and the vicarage of Bradfield, in the archdeaconry of Colchester, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £16. 13. 4. F. H. Rigby, Esq. was patron in 1811. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, stands about a mile north-west from the site of the former structure, and was consecrated in 1735, having been rebuilt, principally at the expense of Edward Rigby, Esq. The river Stour is navigable at the village, where are good quays and commodious warehouses for corn, malt, and coal, in which articles much business is carried on: the quay, port, and warehouses, at Mistley, belong to the proprietor of Mistley hall. The petty sessions for the division of Tendring are held here on Mondays, once in five weeks, alternately with Thorpe, Manningtree, and Great Bromley.

MITCHAM, a parish in the second division of the hundred of WALLINGTON, county of SURREY, 9 miles (S.S.W.) from London, containing 4453 inhabitants. This place, anciently Michelham, or the great dwelling, is beautifully situated on the river Wandle, a stream abounding with excellent trout, and remarkable for the transparency of its waters, and in the centre of extensive grounds appropriated to the culture of aromatic and medicinal plants. Sir Walter Raleigh resided here in an old mansion, of which the remains are at present occupied as a private dwelling-house; and Sir Julius Caesar, Master of the Rolls to Queen Elizabeth, had the honour of entertaining Her Majesty at his seat in this parish. The village is irregularly built, and sheltered by surrounding eminences, among which, Box Hill, so called from the trees planted on its southern declivity by the Earl of Arundel, in the reign of Charles I., having its northern side shaded with yew trees of venerable appearance, forms an interesting and picturesque object. The houses are in general respectable; and the inhabitants are amply supplied with water from the river. The environs afford delightful promenades, and abound with elegant villas, inhabited by opulent individuals, who, from the retirement of its situation, the beauty of its scenery, and its proximity to the metropolis, have been induced to select it as a place of residence. The trade is principally in calico-printing, for which there are extensive and convenient grounds, and on the banks of the Wandle are numerous mills, for corn, logwood, and tobacco. Rhubarb, liquorice, peppermint, and lavender, are extensively cultivated here for sale. The rail-road from Croydon passes through the parish. The annual fair commences on the 12th of August, and continues for three days. Mitcham is within the jurisdiction of the court of requests for the hundred of Blackheath, established by an act passed in the 6th of George III., for the recovery of debts under 40s., which was extended to the hundred of Wallington, and its powers to the recovery of debts not exceeding £5, by an act passed in the 47th of the same reign.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Surrey, and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £10, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Mrs. Simpson. The church, dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul, an ancient structure of flint and stone, having become greatly dilapidated, was taken down, and the present beautiful edifice, in the later style of English architecture, with a square embattled tower, was erected in 1821: five hundred and fifty-five additional sittings, of which five hundred and twenty-one are free, have been lately provided, at an expense of £600, granted by the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. The Sunday school has an endowment of £62. 11. 10. per annum, arising from accumulated savings, amounting to £1600, vested in the three per cent. consols., and from donations: the school-room was built by subscription, in 1788. There are various charitable bequests for distribution among the poor.

MITCHELDEVER, a parish in the hundred of MITCHELDEVER, Basingstoke division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 6½ miles (N. by E.) from Winchester, containing, with the tythings of Northbrook, West Stratton, and Weston-Colley, 828 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, with the perpetual curacies of Northington, Popham, and Stratton, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £26. 13. 4., and in the patronage of Sir Thomas Baring, Bart. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

MITCHELMERSH, a parish in the hundred of BUDDLESGATE, Fawley division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, comprising the hamlets of Awbridge, Brushfield, and Mitchelmersh, and containing 908 inhabitants, of which number, 374 are in the hamlet of Mitchelmersh, 3½ miles (N.) from Romsey. The living is a rectory, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Incumbent, rated in the king's books at £26. 12. 8½., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Winchester. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. The Andover canal runs through the parish. A Sunday school is endowed with about £8. 10. per annum, arising from some small bequests. Mitchelmersh is within the jurisdiction of the Cheyney Court held at Winchester every Thursday, for the recovery of debts to any amount.

MITCHEL-TROY, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of RAGLAND, county of MONMOUTH, 2¾ miles (S.W.) from Monmouth, containing 305 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with the perpetual curacy of Cwmcarvan, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaff, rated in the king's books at £12. 8. 1½., and in the patronage of the Duke of Beaufort. The church is dedicated to St. Michael.

MITFORD, a parish comprising the townships of Edington and Molesden in the western division of CASTLE ward, and the townships of Benridge, High and Low Heighley, Mitford, Newton-Park, Newton-Underwood, Nunridge, Pigdon, Spittle-hill, and Throple in the western division of MORPETH ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, and containing 625 inhabitants, of which number, 178 are in the township of Mitford, 1¾ mile (W. by S.) from Morpeth. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Northumberland, and diocese of Durham, rated in the king's books at £10. 6. 8., endowed with £400 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £1100 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Durham. The rivers Wansbeck and Font run through the parish. Here are the remains of a castle formerly belonging to Sir Gilbert Middleton, for whose treasonable practices it was demolished by order of Edward II.

MITMEECE, a township in the parish of ECCLESHALL, northern division of the hundred of PIREHILL, county of STAFFORD, containing 131 inhabitants. It is within the peculiar jurisdiction of the Prebendal Court of Eccleshall.

MITTON, a parish comprising the township of Old Laund-Booth in the higher division, and the township of Aighton with Bailey and Chaigley in the lower division, of the hundred of BLACKBURN, county palatine of LANCASTER; the chapelries of Grindleton and Waddington, and the townships of Bashall-Eaves, West Bradford, and Mitton, in the western division of the wapentake of STAINCLIFFE and EWCROSS, West riding of the county of YORK; and containing 4925 inhabitants, of which number, 324 are in the township of Mitton, 3 miles (W. S. W.) from Clitheroe. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £14. 7. 8½, and in the patronage of the Rev. John Wilson. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, was erected in the reign of Edward III. The chapel of St. Nicholas, on the north side of the choir, is the burial-place of the Sherburnes, and contains numerous memorials to that knightly family. It stands near the confluence of the rivers Calder, Holder, and Ribble, the neighbourhood of which was the scene of a great slaughter committed by the Scots, in one of their irruptions into England, during the existence of the plague, in 1319. Helen Heighton, in 1795, devised a school-house and certain messuages, the annual income arising from which, viz., £38. 10., is applied to the free instruction of about twenty children. There is also a rent-charge of £4. 10. bequeathed by William Parkinson, towards the support of a Sunday school.

MITTON, a township in that part of the parish of PENKRIDGE which is in the eastern division of the hundred of CUTTLESTONE, county of STAFFORD, 2½ miles (W. N. W.) from Penkridge. The population is returned with the parish.

MITTON (LITTLE), a township in that part of the parish of WHALLEY which is in the higher division of the hundred of BLACKBURN, county palatine of LANCASTER, 3¼ miles (S. W.) from Clitheroe, containing, with Coalcoates and Hewthorn, 99 inhabitants.

MITTON (LOWER), a chapelry in the parish of KIDDERMINSTER, lower division of the hundred of HALFSHIRE, county of WORCESTER, and containing, with the town of Stourport, 2544 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Kidderminster. The chapel, dedicated to St. Michael, is a small unadorned edifice of brick, erected in 1790, the chancel at the expense of John Folliott, Esq., as lord of the manor of Lickhill. In Leland's time, Mitton was distinguished for the number of its corn-mills, for the establishment of which, the river Stour, branching here in various directions, afforded great convenience. There are now a manufactory for worsted-yarn, an iron-foundry, a tannery, and a vinegar-yard. The Staffordshire and Worcestershire canal joins the Severn at this place, and, by uniting that river with the Trent, affords an extended line of inland navigation for the conveyance of goods; whence the origin and growth of the adjoining town of Stourport, now a depôt for the manufactures and agricultural produce of the surrounding counties, and described under its proper-head.

MITTON (UPPER), a hamlet in the parish of HAR-

TELBURY, lower division of the hundred of HALFSHIRE, county of WORCESTER, ¾ of a mile (N. E.) from Stourport, containing 181 inhabitants.

MITTONS, a hamlet in the parish of BREDON, middle division of the hundred of OSWALDSLOW, county of WORCESTER, 1 mile (N. E.) from Tewkesbury. The population is returned with the parish.

MIXBURY, a parish in the hundred of PLOUGHLEY, county of OXFORD, 8 miles (N. by E.) from Bicester, containing, with the hamlet of Fulwell and the township of Willason, 336 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Oxford, rated in the king's books at £15. 9. 4½, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Rochester. The church is dedicated to All Saints. The river Ouse runs through the parish.

MOAT, a township in the parish of KIRK-ANDREWS upon Esk, ESKDALE ward, county of CUMBERLAND, 4½ miles (N. N. E.) from Longtown, containing 300 inhabitants. On the banks of the Liddel are the ruins of a strong square tower, called Liddel Strength, surrounded by a double moat. It more than once fell into the power of the Scots, and on one occasion was the scene of a barbarous act of David, King of Scotland, who, after making himself master of the place, caused the two sons of the Governor, Sir Walter Selby, to be strangled.

MOBBERLEY, a parish in the hundred of BUCKLOW, county palatine of CHESTER, 3 miles (E. N. E.) from Nether Knutsford, containing 1198 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £23. 3. 4., and in the patronage of the Rev. J. H. Mallory. The church, dedicated to St. Wilfrid, has a rich screen, the remains of a rood loft, and some stalls in the chancel: it was thoroughly repaired and the tower rebuilt with stone in 1533, at the expense of Sir John Talbot. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. A free grammar school was founded, in 1569, by the Rev. William Griffith, who endowed it with the interest of £200. The manufacture of cotton is carried on at this place, a large factory affording employment to about one hundred persons. Three distinct courts baron are annually held for the several manors within the parish. A priory of Black canons, in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary and St. Wilfrid, was founded here, in 1206, by Patrick de Modberley, who having only a life interest in the property with which he endowed it, the establishment existed but a short time.

MOCCAS, a parish in the hundred of WEBTREE, county of HEREFORD, 9½ miles (W. N. W.) from Hereford, containing 185 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £6. 4. 4., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Sir G. Cornewall, Bart. The church is dedicated to St. Michael.

MOCKERKIN, a hamlet in the parochial chapelry of LOWESWATER, ALLERDALE ward above Darwent, county of CUMBERLAND, 5 miles (S. S. W.) from Cocker-mouth. The population is returned with Loweswater. This hamlet forms a constablewick with Sosgill.

MODBURY, a market town and parish in the hundred of ERMINGTON, county of DEVON, 35 miles (S. W. by S.) from Exeter, and 208 (W. S. W.) from London, containing 2194 inhabitants. This place, called in Latin records "Motberia," was in the possession of Wado at the time of the Confessor; it subsequently became the property of the Valletorts, Okestones, and Champernownes. In 1334, Richard Champernowne obtained permission to fortify his manorial residence at Modbury. During the contest between Charles and the parliament, this fortress was taken by the garrison at Plymouth; and, in February 1643, Sir N. Stanning, when intrenched here with two thousand soldiers, was defeated by the Devonshire clubmen. The town is situated at the junction of the roads leading to Plymouth, Kingsbridge, and Dartmouth, and occupies the bottom and declivities of a valley: it consists of four streets, which meet at right angles, the point of junction being in the lowest part of the town: the inhabitants are supplied with water from two conduits, which are connected by pipes with a neighbouring spring. A new line of turnpike-road is in progress, from Dartmouth, Kingsbridge, and Salcombe, through this town to Plymouth: the new London mail road from Plymouth to Exeter passes about a mile from Modbury. The manufacture of woollen goods, which was formerly considerable, has decayed: there is still some weaving of long ells for the East India Company, also a tolerable trade in corn and malt. A creek, navigable for barges, extends from the æstuary of the river Erme, which bounds this parish on the west, to within two miles of the town, and thus facilitates the importation of coal, and the export of the produce of the soil. The principal general market is on Thursday, and there is another on Saturday for butchers' meat; also a great cattle market on the second Tuesday in every month, to which the navy contractors and others resort. Of the two fairs once held on St. George's and St. James' days, only the former is retained; it takes place on the 4th of May, unless that day fall later in the week than Thursday, in which case the fair is postponed till the following Tuesday. The town is governed by a portreeve (usually styled mayor), constables, and other subordinate officers, who are annually appointed at one of the courts leet, which are held at Michaelmas and Lady-day, the mayor being returned by a jury of twelve householders. This borough sent two members to parliament in the 34th of Edward I., but was afterwards relieved from making returns, on the plea of poverty.

The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Totness, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £19. 11. 0½., and in the patronage of the Provost and Fellows of Eton College. The church, which is dedicated to St. George, and stands upon an eminence south-westward of the town, is an ancient embattled structure, with modern additions; the tower, which was rebuilt in 1622, is surmounted by a spire: the interior is very neat and spacious, and contains some mutilated monuments of the Champernowne family. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists. A free school was established, in 1730, by subscription: the permanent income is £12 per annum, and twelve poor boys are instructed in reading, writing, and arithmetic. Sunday and infant schools are supported by voluntary contributions. There are some remains of a Benedictine priory, founded here in the reign of Stephen, and dedicated to St. Gregory, as a cell to the abbey of St. Peter sur Dive, in Normandy: its possessions, valued at £70. per annum, were given by

VOL. III.

Henry VI. to Eton College, afterwards bestowed by Edward IV. upon the abbey of Tavistock, but eventually restored to Eton, to which foundation it still belongs. Sir John Fortescue, a celebrated lawyer, Lord Chief Justice in the reign of Henry VI., was a native of this place; and Sir George Baker, M.D., President of the Royal College of Physicians, and author of some valuable medical works, was born here in 1722.

MOGGERHANGER, a hamlet in the parish of BLUNHAM, hundred of WIXAMTREE, county of BEDFORD, 4½ miles (N. W. by N.) from Biggleswade, containing 405 inhabitants.

MOLDASH, a parish in the hundred of FELBOROUGH, lathe of SCRAY, county of KENT, 5 miles (E. N. E.) from Charing, containing 378 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Chilham, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

MOLESDEN, a township in that part of the parish of MITFORD which is in the western division of CASTLE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 3½ miles (W. by S.) from Morpeth, containing 21 inhabitants.

MOLESWORTH, a parish in the hundred of LEIGHTONSTONE, county of HUNTINGDON, 4½ miles (E. by S.) from Thrapston, containing 191 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Huntingdon, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £11. 10., and in the patronage of the Archbishop of York. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

MOLLAND, a parish in the hundred of SOUTH MOLTON, county of DEVON, 7 miles (E. N. E.) from South Molton, containing 456 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage not in charge, united to that of Knowstone, in the archdeaconry of Barnstaple, and diocese of Exeter. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. Eight poor children are educated by a schoolmistress for £4 a year, the gift of Thomas Clarke, in 1776. There are vestiges of an ancient earth-work within the parish.

MOLLINGTON, a chapelry in that part of the parish of CROPREDY which is in the hundred of BLOXHAM, county of OXFORD, and the Burton-Dasset division of the hundred of KINGTON, county of WARWICK, 4¾ miles (N. by W.) from Banbury, containing 310 inhabitants. The chapel is dedicated to All Saints. The chapelry is within the jurisdiction of the peculiar court of Banbury in the Cathedral Church of Lincoln.

MOLLINGTON (GREAT), a township in that part of the parish of BACKFORD which is in the higher division of the hundred of WIRRAL, county palatine of CHESTER, 2¾ miles (N. W. by N.) from Chester, containing 122 inhabitants.

MOLLINGTON (LITTLE), a township in that part of the parish of St. MARY, CHESTER, which is in the higher division of the hundred of WIRRAL, county palatine of CHESTER, 2¼ miles (N. W. by N.) from Chester, containing 28 inhabitants.

MOLSCROFT, a township in that part of the parish of St. JOHN which is within the liberties of the borough of BEVERLEY, East riding of the county of YORK, 1¼ mile (W. N. W.) from Beverley, containing 111 inhabitants.

MOLTON (NORTH), a parish in the hundred of SOUTH MOLTON, county of DEVON, 3 miles (N. N. E.) from South Molton, containing 1847 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Twitchen annexed, in the archdeaconry of Barnstaple, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £16. 16. 1., endowed with £600 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £1100 parliamentary grant. The Earl of Morley was patron in 1820. The church, dedicated to All Saints, is furnished with a rich pulpit: there were formerly three chapels of ease in the parish. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Almshouses for six poor families were founded and endowed by an ancestor of George Parker: there is also a small sum, the gift of William Mourman, for teaching six boys. A weekly market, formerly held at this place, has been long disused.

Corporate Seal.

MOLTON (SOUTH), an incorporated market town and parish, having separate jurisdiction, though locally in the hundred of South Molton, county of DEVON, 28 miles (N. W. by N.) from Exeter, and 181 (W. by S.) from London, containing 3314 inhabitants. This town derives its name from the river Mole, on the western bank of which it is situated, having Exmoor on the north, and Dartmoor faintly perceptible on its southern boundary: over the river, which falls into the Taw about four miles hence, is a bridge of three arches: the streets are well paved and lighted, and the inhabitants are supplied with water from wells. Monthly assemblies are held in the town hall, which stands in the market-place; and there is a subscription reading-room. The principal branch of manufacture is that of woollen goods, considerable supplies of which are occasionally furnished to the East Indies; shalloons, serges, and coarse woollen cloth, are the articles chiefly made. The general market is on Saturday; others are held on Tuesday and Thursday: there are cattle fairs on the Wednesday before the 22nd of June, and on the Wednesday after August 26th: great markets also are held on the Saturday after February 13th, which is noted for its fine show of North Devon cattle, March 25th, August 1st, October 10th, and December 12th. For several successive weeks in the spring, there are large markets for sheep, one year old. The sale for cattle is almost constant, the landholders here being chiefly breeders. On the river are several flour-mills and a fulling-mill. The charter of incorporation was granted by Elizabeth, and confirmed by Charles II. The municipal government is vested in a mayor, recorder, three capital burgesses, and thirteen common council-men, with a town clerk, serjeants at mace, and other officers: the mayor is elected annually by a majority of the corporation. The mayor, recorder, and two capital burgesses, are justices of the peace, and hold quarter sessions, with power to transport; also a court of record, called the three weeks' court, for the recovery of debts under £40, by charter of Elizabeth; but this court is seldom resorted to, on account of the expense of the proceedings. The county magistrates hold petty sessions for the hundred in a building over the corn market. The freedom of the borough is obtained by birth, every son of a freeman being entitled to it, whether born in or out of the parish; it is also conferred by gift of the corporation:

every freeman is exempt from serving on county juries, and the inhabitants do not pay county rates. The town sent representatives to parliament once in the reign of Edward I. The town hall is a handsome building of Portland stone; and a new prison is in progress of erection, to comprise four cells, two dwelling-houses for the serjeants, and a place of confinement for less criminal offenders.

The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Barnstaple, and diocese of Exeter, endowed with £400, and a stipend of £30 per annum, private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Dean and Canons of Windsor. The church, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene, is a very spacious structure, in the ancient style of English architecture; it has been considerably enlarged by bringing out the walls of the north and south aisles almost to the angles of the transepts, whereby its ancient form of a cross has been destroyed: in the interior is a richly-carved pulpit of stone: from the summit of the tower, Hartland point and Lundy island are discernible. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. The free school was founded, in 1686, by Hugh Squier, who also endowed it with lands for the education of twenty poor children: the annual income is £57. 9., and twenty boys are instructed. The Blue school was established by subscription, in 1711, since which period many augmentations have been made to its funds: the present income is about £112. 13. 3. per annum, out of which a salary of £26. 17. 6. is paid to the master and mistress: forty-five boys and twenty girls, appointed by the corporation from the poor of this and the neighbouring parishes, are instructed and clothed annually. There are numerous benefactions for the relief of the poor. A Sunday school, in which one hundred and fifty children of both sexes are instructed, is supported by voluntary contributions. Iron-ore is found in the neighbourhood, which also abounds in a species of slate, or flag-stone, enclosing within its bed a considerable portion of limestone. Fragments of encrinites and corallines have been discovered. Some vestiges of an ancient encampment are visible at Cadbury, near this place. The late Mr. Justice Buller received the early part of his education at the grammar school here; and the Rev. Samuel Badcock, who distinguished himself in a controversy with Dr. Priestley, and assisted Dr. White in writing his celebrated Bampton Lectures, was born here in 1747; he died in London in 1788.

MONCKTON (BISHOP'S), a chapelry in that part of the parish of Ripon which is in the liberty of Ripon, West riding of the county of YORK, 4 miles (S. S. E.) from Ripon, containing 479 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the jurisdiction of the peculiar court of Ripon, belonging to the Archbishop of York; endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Ripon. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

MONCKTON (TARRANT), a parish in the hundred of Monckton up Wimborne, Shaston (East) division of the county of Dorset, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Blandford-Forum, containing 236 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Tarrant-Launceston, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £17. 16. 8., endowed with £200 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £300 parliamentary grant. J. Farquharson, Esq. was patron in 1822. The church is dedicated to All Saints. The river Tarrant runs through the parish, in which there was formerly a monastic establishment, whence the derivation of the name Monckton.

MONCKTON up WIMBORNE, a tything in the parish and hundred of CRANBORNE, though locally in the hundred of Monckton up Wimborne, Shaston (East) division of the county of DORSET, 2 miles (W.) from Cranborne, with which the population is returned. The river Allen has its source here.

MONNEWDEN, a parish in the hundred of LOES, county of SUFFOLK, 5 miles (W. N. W.) from Wickham-Market, containing 188 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £8. 13. 4. C. Archdeckne, Esq. was patron in 1803. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

MONGEHAM (GREAT), a parish in the hundred of CORNILO, lathe of ST. AUGUSTINE, county of KENT, 2 miles (W. S. W.) from Deal, containing 281 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £18. 5., and in the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The church, dedicated to St. Martin, is a large handsome structure, in the early English style. A market on Thursday, granted by Henry III., has been long disused, but a fair for cattle and pedlary is held on October 29th.

MONGEHAM (LITTLE), a parish in the hundred of CORNILO, lathe of ST. AUGUSTINE, county of KENT, 2½ miles (W. S. W.) from Deal, containing 113 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £5. 15., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The church has fallen into ruins.

MONGEWELL, a parish in the hundred of LANGTREE, county of OXFORD, 1½ mile (S.) from Wallingford, containing 142 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Oxford, rated in the king's books at £9. 9. 4½. Uvedale Price, Esq. was patron in 1792. The church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, has some portions in the Norman style remaining.

MONINGTON, a township in the parish of Vowchurch, hundred of WEBTREE, county of HEREFORD, 10 miles (W. by S.) from Hereford. The population is returned with the parish.

MONKHILL, a township in the parish of PONTEFRAC, upper division of the wapentake of OSGOLD-CROSS, West riding of the county of YORK, containing 40 inhabitants.

MONKLAND, a parish in the hundred of STRETFORD, county of HEREFORD, 2½ miles (W. S. W.) from Leominster, containing 187 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £11. 0. 9., and in the patronage of the Dean and Canons of Windsor. The church, dedicated to All Saints, with the manor, was, in the time of William Rufus, given by Ralph Tony to the abbey of Conches in Normandy, upon which a cell of Benedictine monks was established here, the possessions of which, at the suppression, were granted to the Dean and Canons of Windsor. Courts leet are occasionally held here.

MONKLEIGH, a parish in the hundred of SHEBBEAR, county of DEVON, 2¼ miles (W. N. W.) from Great Torrington, containing 509 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Barnstaple, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £12. 14. 7. Mrs. Saltern was patroness in 1815. The church, dedicated to St. George, contains a wooden screen, an altar-tomb under an arch in the later English style, and some interesting monuments, among which is one to the memory of Sir William Hankford, Chief Justice of the King's Bench, who died here in 1424, or, as tradition relates, was accidentally killed by his park-keeper, near a tree still called Hankford's oak.

MONKRIDGE-WARD, a township in the parish of ELSDON, southern division of COQUETDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 8 miles (N. E.) from Bellingham, containing 109 inhabitants.

MONKSEATON, a township in the parish of TYNE-MOUTH, eastern division of CASTLE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 2½ miles (N.) from North Shields, containing 537 inhabitants, many of whom are employed in the neighbouring collieries. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Within the township is a large brewery. On Monkhouse farm are the remains of an old cross, called the Monks' stone, with this inscription, "O horror, to kill a man for a pig's head;" concerning which a curious tradition prevails of a monk of Tynemouth having been scourged on the spot by a Mr. Delaval, for having cut off a pig's head whilst roasting in the kitchen of the latter, and, dying within a year and a day, his brethren charged Mr. Delaval with his murder, who, in order to obtain absolution, assigned to the monastery the manor of Elswick and other estates, and erected an obelisk on the spot where he chastised the monk.

MONKS-ELEIGH, a parish in the hundred of BABERGH, county of SUFFOLK, 2¼ miles (W. S. W.) from Bildeston, containing 713 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £14. 18. 11½. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

MONKSILVER, a parish in the hundred of WIL-LITON and FREEMANNERS, county of SOMERSET, 7 miles (N. by W.) from Wiveliscombe, containing 306 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Taunton, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £9. 8. 1½., and in the patronage of the Dean and Canons of Windsor. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

MONKSTON, a parish in the hundred of ANDOVER, Andover division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 3¼ miles (W.) from Andover, containing 257 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £14. 12. 11., and in the patronage of the Provost and Fellows of King's College, Cambridge.

MONKSWOOD, an extra-parochial liberty, in the lower division of the hundred of Usk, county of MONMOUTH, 2¾ miles (N. W. by W.) from Usk, containing 156 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaff, endowed with £1000 royal bounty. The Duke of Beaufort was patron in 1788.

MONKTON, a parish in the hundred of COLYTON, county of DEVON, 2 miles (N.E. by N.) from Honiton, containing 136 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Colyton, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Dean and Chapter of Exeter. The church is dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene.

MONKTON, a joint township with Jarrow, in the parish of JARROW, eastern division of CHESTER ward, county palatine of DURHAM, 5 miles (E.) from Gateshead. The population is returned with Jarrow: the inhabitants are chiefly employed at the adjacent coal works. This is said to be the birthplace of Venerable Bede: a well, lately used as a bath for weakly or diseased children, and the spot where the rustics celebrated the eve of Midsummer-day, still retain his name.

MONKTON, formerly a distinct parish, but now in the parish of OTTERDEN, hundred of EYHORNE, lathe of AYLESFORD, county of KENT. The church has been long since demolished.

MONKTON, a parish in the hundred of RINGSLOW, or Isle of THANET, lathe of St. AUGUSTINE, county of KENT, 7 miles (W.) from Ramsgate, containing 348 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Birchington, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £13. 8. 4. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. The river Stour runs along the southern boundary of the parish. A market, formerly held here, is now disused; but fairs are still kept on July 22nd for hogs, and October 11th for toys, &c.

MONKTON (MOOR), a parish in the ainsty of the city, and East riding of the county, of YORK, comprising the townships of Hessey and Moor-Monkton, and containing 430 inhabitants, of which number, 269 are in the township of Moor-Monkton, 7 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.W. by W.) from York. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £16. 19. 7., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to All Saints, is an ancient structure, situated half a mile from the village. A free school has been endowed by Sir Saville and Lady Sarah Slingsby, for twelve poor children. Red House, built in the reign of Charles I. by Sir Henry Slingsby, commands a noble and extensive view, including the city and cathedral of York.

MONKTON (NUN), a parish in the upper division of the wapentake of CLARO, West riding of the county of YORK, 8 $\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N.W.) from York, containing 344 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, endowed with £400 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £300 parliamentary grant. S. J. Tuffnell, Esq. was patron in 1815. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, formerly belonged to a priory of Benedictine nuns, founded in the reign of Stephen, by William de Arches and Ivetta his wife, which, before the dissolution, possessed a revenue of £85. 14. 8. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. A school for twelve poor boys was founded and endowed by Thomas and Leonard Wilson, about 1716; and another, for the like number of girls, by Mary and Dorothy Wilson; the annual income is £30.

MONKTON (WEST), a parish forming a detached portion of the hundred of WHITLEY, county of SOMERSET, 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.E. by N.) from Taunton, containing 1004 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Taunton, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £26, and in the patronage of the Rev. J. F. Maddison. The church, dedicated to St. Augustine, has lately received an addition of sixty-two sittings, of which fifty are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £34 towards defraying the expense. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyan Methodists. The navigable river Tone, and the Taunton and Bridg-water canal, run through the parish. Nearly adjoining the town of Taunton is the Spital almshouse, founded, in 1270, by Thomas Lambret, destroyed by fire in the reign of Henry VIII., and rebuilt soon afterwards by an abbot of Glastonbury: it is endowed with several parcels of land, producing an annual income of about £44. 10., and at present affords an asylum to eleven poor widows. John Claymond gave £15 per annum to establish an exhibition at Brasenose College, Oxford, for boys from this school.

MONKTON-FARLEY, a parish in the hundred of BRADFORD, county of WILTS, 4 miles (N.N.W.) from Bradford, containing 347 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £7. 15. 2 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Salisbury. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. Here are some remains of a convent of Cluniac monks, founded, about 1125, as a cell to the priory of Lewes: it was dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene, and at the dissolution had a revenue of £217. 0. 4.

MONMOUTH, a borough, market town, and parish, having separate jurisdiction, though locally in the lower division of the hundred of Skenfreth, county of MONMOUTH, of which it is the chief town, 130 miles (W.N.W.) from London, containing 4164 inhabitants. This place, which derives its name from being situated at the mouth of the river Monnow, is by some antiquaries supposed to have been the Blestium of Antoninus, but no Roman antiquities have been discovered to confirm that opinion. It was a place of considerable importance during the time of the Saxons, who, to secure their conquests between the Severn and the Wye, and to repel the frequent incursions of the Britons, erected a stately castle, and fortified the town with walls of immense strength; of the former, a small portion is still remaining, and of the latter, one of the gateway towers, at the entrance from the Ross road, is almost entire, and several other vestiges may be traced in various parts of the town. At the time of the Norman Conquest, it was bestowed upon William Fitz-Baderon, one of the Conqueror's followers, who, from that circumstance, assumed the name of William de Monmouth. The celebrated John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, resided for some time in the castle; which was also the birthplace of Henry V., who passed his infancy here, and whose cradle, and the sword which he used at the battle of Agincourt, are deposited in Troy House, belonging to the Duke of Beaufort, at a short distance on the road to Chepstow.

The town is beautifully situated on the banks of the river Wye, near its confluence with the Monnow, in a luxuriant vale, environed by hills of various elevation, some of them being richly crowned with wood, and consists of one spacious street extending from the market-place to the river Monnow, over which is an ancient stone bridge with an arched gateway, erected in 1272, forming an entrance from the Abergavenny road, and of several other streets diverging in different directions to the river Wye, over which is also a handsome stone bridge. The houses are in general well built; many of those in the principal street have gardens and orchards attached to them, and in various parts of the town are ancient buildings interspersed with handsome modern houses; the streets on the side towards the Wye contain several ranges of respectable buildings: the town is well paved and lighted, and amply supplied with water from springs, and with soft water, for culinary purposes, by carts which convey it to the houses of the inhabitants at a moderate charge. The public library is well furnished with modern works; and assemblies are held occasionally at the Beaufort Arms and at the town hall. Chippenham meadow, an extensive plot of ground, forms a delightful promenade on the bank of the Wye, and is intersected by the river Monnow, which empties itself into that river: races are annually held in October, and are well attended. On the opposite side of the river, and on the acclivities of the hills which rise from its banks, numerous picturesque and beautiful villas are irregularly scattered at different elevations: on the Kymin, a lofty hill commanding an extensive view of the windings of the river through a finely varied tract of country, and of the town lying at its base, a marine pavilion has been erected in honour of the distinguished Lord Nelson, and other naval heroes, whose achievements are recorded by paintings and inscriptions. Beaulieu Grove is a rich wood, through which many pleasing walks have been made, commanding in different points of view agreeable prospects of the scenery in the neighbourhood. The steep banks of the Wye, clothed in many places with the most luxuriant verdure, are rich in every variety of beauty; and the windings of the river lead through a succession of scenes not surpassed by any of like character in the country. The beauty of the landscape, the mildness of the air, and its peculiar adaptation as a place of retirement, have made it the retreat of many respectable families, who have erected on the shores of the river, and on the heights which crown its banks, numerous handsome villas. The trade principally arises from the navigation of the river Wye, in the traffic carried on with Hereford and Bristol; and the preparation of bark from the forests of the Upper Wye, of which a great quantity is sent to Chepstow for exportation to the south of England and different parts of Ireland, and in which a considerable number of men, women, and children, are employed. The iron and tin manufactures were introduced into this kingdom, and established at Monmouth, by a native of Switzerland, and are now carried on to a considerable extent: the town is well supplied with coal from the neighbouring Forest of Dean, from which a rail-road has been constructed, passing through Coleford and Newland. Paper is largely manufactured at mills situated on streams near the town, and there are also several corn-mills. The market, which is well supplied, is on Saturday, and a market is held on the first Wednesday in each month, for the sale of cattle, sheep, and pigs: the fairs are on Whit-Tuesday, for toys; the Wednesday before the 20th of June, for wool and cheese; and September 4th, and November 22d, for cattle, hops, and cheese.

Corporate Seal.

The inhabitants were first incorporated by Edward VI., who confirmed the preceding privileges granted by Henry VIII., which were afterwards extended by Charles II., by whose charter the government is vested in a mayor, recorder, two bailiffs, and fifteen common council-men, assisted by a town clerk, chamberlain, coroner, two serjeants at mace, and subordinate officers. The corporation hold quarterly courts of session for the trial of misdemeanants within the borough. The assizes for the county, and the petty sessions for the upper division of the hundred of Usk, are held here. The town is within the duchy of Lancaster, and subject to the jurisdiction of the duchy courts. The town hall is a substantial stone structure on piazzas, and ornamented with a statue of Henry V.: the lower part is appropriated to the use of the market, and the upper part contains the court-rooms for the assizes and the sessions, and a spacious assembly-room. The county gaol and house of correction is a spacious stone building in the form of a castle, on the road to Hereford, and contains forty-one cells, ten day-rooms, and seven airing-yards, in one of which is a tread-wheel, for the classification of prisoners. The borough first exercised the elective franchise in the 27th of Henry VIII., in conjunction with those of Usk and Newport: it returns one member to parliament. The right of election is vested in the resident burgesses of these several boroughs, the number of whom is about eight hundred, chiefly in the interest of the Duke of Beaufort: the mayor and bailiffs are the returning officers. The election of knights for the shire also takes place in Monmouth, as the county town.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the arch-deaconry and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £9. 2. 3., endowed with £200 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Duke of Beaufort. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, was anciently the conventual church of a Benedictine priory, founded here in the reign of Henry II., the revenue of which at the dissolution was £56. 1. 11. The body of the church has been rebuilt in the modern style, and the only part remaining of the original building is the tower, surmounted by an elegant and finely-proportioned spire, in the early style of English architecture, two hundred and ten feet high, and forming an interesting feature in the view of the town. St. Thomas, a chapel of ease to the vicarage, is an ancient edifice with a low tower, exhibiting good specimens of the early English and the Norman styles, with some portions of an earlier period; it is supposed to have been founded prior to the Conquest, and is now undergoing repair, on the completion of which it is proposed to assign to it a district, under the authority of the commissioners for building new churches. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists, and a Roman Catholic chapel. The free grammar school was founded in the reign of James I., by William Jones, a native of Newland in this vicinity, and citizen and haberdasher of London, who bequeathed £9000 for the endowment of a school and almshouse, and for the establishment of a lectureship in the church: the school is open to all children of the neighbourhood, with preference to those of this parish, for instruction in the Latin and Greek languages: the premises, near Wye bridge, are handsomely built, comprising houses for the master, who has a salary of £120 per annum, the usher, who has £60, and the lecturer, whose stipend is £140 per annum. The English language, writing, arithmetic, and the mathematics, are taught by an additional master, recently appointed, with a salary of £60 per annum. The almshouses consist of twenty separate tenements, with a garden to each, for twenty aged men and women, who have a weekly allowance of six shillings each, with a supply of coal and clothing: the school and almshouses are under the direction of the corporation and the Haberdashers' Company. A National school, supported by subscription, and in which nearly one hundred boys and upwards of ninety girls are instructed, is kept in an ancient room, with a fine oriel window, part of the priory of Benedictine monks, said to have been the study of the celebrated Geoffrey of Monmouth, a native of this town, who resided many years in that convent. Of the hospitals of the Holy Trinity and St. John, founded here, in the early part of the thirteenth century, by Wihenoc de Monemue, there are no remains. At the distance of a mile from the town, on the road to Staunton, is a rocking-stone of very large dimensions, called the Buck stone: it is twenty-four feet high, fifty-seven feet in circumference at the upper surface, and three inches and one-sixth at the base; and near it is a flight of nine steps, above which is a large stone, having the appearance of a baptismal font, with a cavity for holding water; they are supposed to be Druidical remains. Monmouth formerly gave the title of duke to James, natural son of Charles II.

MONMOUTHSHIRE, a maritime county, bounded on the west by the counties of Glamorgan and Brecknock, in South Wales; on the north by part of Brecknockshire and by Herefordshire; on the east by Gloucestershire, from which it is separated by the river Wye; and on the south-east and south by the river Severn and the Bristol channel. It extends from 51° 28' to 51° 54' (N. Lat.), and from 2° 42' to 3° 19' (W. Lon.), and comprises an area of four hundred and ninety-eight square miles, or three hundred and eighteen thousand seven hundred and twenty acres. The population in 1821 amounted to 71,833. At the time of the second Roman invasion of Britain, Monmouthshire formed part of the territory of the Silures. In the reign of the Emperor Claudius, when Ostorius Scapula had succeeded to the chief command, that general, leaving garrisons in the chain of forts which his predecessor Aulus Plautius had established upon the rivers Avon and Severn, crossed the latter with his army, and landed, according to some authors, at a place called Aust-ferry, but, according to others, and with greater probability, at Caldecot-pill. The conquest of the Silurian territory, however, owing to the difficulties of the ground and the spirited and persevering resistance of the British inhabitants, proved to be a task much more arduous than the Romans, so accustomed to triumph over hordes of barbarians, had anticipated: their commander fell a victim to the fatigue, anxiety, and chagrin, which he experienced in this expedition, and it was left for Julius Frontinus, in the reign of Vespasian, to achieve the final conquest of this portion of Britain. That part of it which now constitutes the county of Monmouth then became a portion of the Roman division called Britannia Secunda. From the many stations and camps which those conquerors here established, and from the numerous fragments of their buildings and sculptures that have been discovered, it appears that the fine climate and great natural beauty of this pleasant county rendered it a favourite resort of the Romans, in the elegant and luxurious, though declining, age of Rome.

At a period not long subsequent to the Saxon conquests, Monmouthshire, together with the rest of the country west of the Severn, continued free from the Anglo-Saxon dominion; and Caerleon, at that time its capital, was one of the most flourishing cities of the Britons. Wales, which name was given to this part of the country by the Anglo-Saxons, then included three regions or principalities, viz., Gwynnedd, containing the greater part of the present North Wales; Powysland, comprising part of North Wales and parts of Shropshire and Worcestershire; and Dehenbarth, including the present South Wales, parts of Herefordshire and Gloucestershire, and the whole of Monmouthshire. In those remote and obscure times it is difficult to trace the particular history of this county, which sometimes formed a separate territory under the name of Gwent, and at others was comprehended in Morgannoe, which included Glamorgan-shire and part of Carmarthenshire. The petty chieftains of this latter province were professedly tributary to the Prince of South Wales. The attempts of the Anglo-Saxon sovereigns to subjugate Wales were opposed by the Gwentians with extraordinary courage; nor does it appear that they were ever completely conquered during the Anglo-Saxon period. Canute entered Gwent, in the year 1034, with a powerful army, on which occasion he defeated Rytherch Ap Jestin, Prince of South Wales; but his conquest seems not to have been permanent. In the reign of Edward the Confessor, when Harold, afterwards king of England, penetrated into the interior of the country, defeated Gryffidd, Prince of North Wales, placed a prince upon the throne of South Wales, forced the inhabitants to swear fealty to the English crown, and took hostages for the payment of the customary tribute, the Anglo-Saxons, or English, appear to have occupied Monmouth, Chepstow, Caerwent, and Caerleon, and Harold is said to have erected a palace at Portscutt. After the Norman Conquest, when various Norman adventurers received permission to make incursions into Wales, and endeavour to establish themselves upon the Welch territory, several of those petty feudal sovereignties were here established. These lands, having been holden per baroniam, with full power to administer justice to the tenants, were invested with jura regalia, so that the king's writs did not run in them. But in case of a contest between two lords marchers (as these territorial proprietors were denominated), concerning the limits of their respective territories, they had recourse to the king as their supreme lord, and justice was administered to them in the superior courts of the realm. This system of feudal jurisprudence was continued here, as in the other Welch marches, until Henry VIII., in 1535, abolished the government of the lords marchers, divided Wales into twelve shires, and included Monmouthshire among the counties of England. As regards the administration of justice, however, Monmouthshire appears to have been considered a Welch county until the reign of Charles II., when it was first included in the Oxford circuit: and even since that time it seems to have been affected in some degree by the ancient border law, as the jurisdiction of the supreme court of the lords marchers, usually held at Ludlow, in Shropshire, was not absolutely and finally abolished until the first year of William and Mary, when it was suppressed by act of parliament, on petition of the gentlemen and inhabitants within the principality of Wales. Reverting to the course of national events which occurred within the limits of this county subsequently to the Norman Conquest, the following appear to be the most remarkable:—In 1171, Caerleon was taken by Henry II. in his progress to Ireland. In 1215, Abergavenny castle was taken from the forces of King John, by Llewellyn, Prince of Wales. In 1233, November 12th, at Grosmont, Henry III. was surprised in the night, and defeated by Richard Marshal, Earl of Pembroke. In 1405, at Usk, Owen Glyndwr was defeated and driven to the mountains by the forces of Henry IV. In 1645, Chepstow castle, which had been garrisoned for the king, surrendered to the parliamentarians. In 1648, the royalists, under Sir William Kemeys, re-possessioned themselves of it, but on the 25th of May of that year, the parliamentarians, under Colonel Ewer, retook it. On the 19th of August, 1648, Ragland castle, under the celebrated Henry Somerset, first Marquis of Worcester, after a most vigorous and protracted defence, was surrendered to Sir Thomas Fairfax.

Monmouthshire is included in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaff, with the exception, however, of six parishes, three of which, Welch-Bicknor, Newton-Dixon, and St. Mary's in Monmouth, are comprised in the diocese of Hereford, and the other three, those of Old-Castle, Llantony, and Cwmyoy, in the diocese of St. David's: it is within the province of Canterbury, and is divided into the deaneries of Abergavenny, Netherwent, Newport, and Usk, containing one hundred and twenty-three parishes, of which forty-four are rectories, thirty-nine vicarages, and forty perpetual curacies. For civil purposes it is divided into the six hundreds of Abergavenny (Lower and Upper), Caldicott (Lower and Upper), Ragland (Lower and Upper), Skenfreth (Lower and Upper), Usk (Lower and Upper), and Wentlloog (Lower and Upper). It contains the borough, market, and sea-port, town of Newport, the borough and market towns of Monmouth and Usk, the market and sea-port town of Chepstow, and the market towns of Abergavenny, Caerleon, and Pontypool. Two knights are returned to parliament for the county, and one representative for the boroughs of Monmouth, Newport, and Usk conjointly. This county is included in the Oxford circuit: the assizes are held at Monmouth, and the quarter sessions at Usk. The county gaol is at Monmouth. There are thirty-nine acting magistrates. The rates raised in the county, for the year ending March 25th, 1827, amounted to £32,144. 5.; the expenditure to £31,851. 7.; of which £23,734. 1. was applied to the relief of the poor.

The general aspect of the county is pleasingly diversified: much of it is mountainous and rocky, and those parts abutting upon the mountain-ridges are sterile, and afford but a scanty subsistence for the flocks which feed upon them; but the rich land in the valleys, and on the slopes of the hills, is finely chequered with woods and pastures, intermingled with spots of tillage. The beautiful scenery on the banks of the Wye has often afforded subjects for the pencil and the pen: the course of that river is particularly sinuous, and its banks generally lofty, and much diversified with woods and projecting rocks. In the hundreds of Wentlloog and Caldicott, sea-walls have been raised for a considerable extent, and at a vast expense, to keep off the sea at high tides and in stormy weather, particularly during the prevalence of such winds as blow from the southwest, from overflowing the spacious marshes in this district, which would otherwise be subject to continual damage by frequent inundations. Some of these walls are of the height of twelve or fourteen feet, falling back from the sea by a gradual slope, the stone-work in front being supported by a large embankment of earth: in other parts, particularly in the level of Wentlloog, where they are not required to be so high nor so strong, they are wholly constructed of earth. The walls of Caldicott extend from that village almost the whole distance to Goldcliff: the length of those of Wentlloog is upwards of fifteen miles and a half. These expensive works are kept in repair by the contributions of the several proprietors, assessed according to the value of their estates in the respective levels; they being under the control of a court of sewers, and subject to the same laws and regulations as Romney Marsh in Kent. This land is divided by parallel ditches, in some of which the water is stagnant, while in others it runs in constant streams, called rheens, which at ebb tides fall through flood-gates, or gouts, into the sea. The general humidity of the western districts of the kingdom is felt in this county: the rains are frequently of long continuance, more particularly towards the sea-coast; the great æstuary of the Severn attracting the clouds that rise from the western ocean, and causing torrents of rain to fall on its northern and southern shores much more frequently than on the inland parts of Wales and the West of England. Of the general salubrity of the atmosphere the longevity of the inhabitants affords numerous proofs.

In an agricultural point of view Monmouthshire may be divided into three districts. The first, comprising the southern part of the county, consists partly of large tracts of moor or marsh land, having in some parts a rich loamy soil of great depth, and in others a vast body of black peaty matter: other portions, again, consist of a light loamy soil, which produces fine timber of various kinds, while in another part there is a mixture of clay and loam, forming fertile meadows, and above them an excellent reddish soil, well adapted to the growth of corn, turnips, or potatoes. The second division includes the eastern part of the county, and extends for a considerable distance along the banks of the river Usk: the soil is of a light red colour, and such are its natural advantages and fertility that the whole district has the appearance of a garden. The third division comprises the western and more hilly portion of the county, the soil of which, upon the hills, is generally thin, of a peaty nature, and covering strata of stone lying upon beds of coal, or iron-ore. The low or marshy lands are chiefly in a state of meadow and pasture; the uplands are partly pasture, and partly arable.

The corn chiefly cultivated is wheat, barley, and oats; and a few peas, or beans, are sometimes sown: the common artificial grasses, such as clover, ray-grass, and trefoil, are also cultivated. Notwithstanding that much of the county is mountainous and rocky, and that it contains numerous wastes and commons in comparatively an unproductive state, yet the amount of agricultural produce is considerably greater than is required for the consumption of its inhabitants: much of this surplus is conveyed to Bristol and other markets. Lime forms the principal manure; and the system of summer fallowing is very general. The oxen are principally bred in the northern parts of the county, and fed in the southern: they are, for the most part, of a large useful kind, of a deep red and brindled colour, rather short in the leg and compact in the body, being evidently a cross between the breeds of the two adjacent districts to the north-east and south-west, the Hereford and Glamorgan: some, indeed, are the pure breed of each. They generally grow to a large size, weighing, when fattened, from seven to nine hundred weight: when young they are in great demand for the graziers, who purchase them at the great cattle fairs when about three years old, and sell them again for the labours of the field: after they have been worked for a certain period, they are also frequently purchased in store condition, and then fed for the market. The sheep are in general particularly small, and partake of the properties so conspicuous in the mountain breed of South Wales: the wool is of a coarse and rather short staple, but the flesh is fine in grain and of delicate flavour: many of these characteristic qualities are owing to their migratory mode of feeding, and continual exposure to the vicissitudes of the weather. This breed is now chiefly prevalent in the mountainous parts of the county: in the middle and lower districts are found some of the true Ryeland breed; and numerous crosses have been tried with the Cotswold, South Down, and Dorset breeds. The horses are of an inferior kind, being meagre, light, and not well adapted either for the business of the road, or the labours of the field. Numbers of mules, and those among the finest in the kingdom, are bred and worked in this county: they are strong in bone, and of exquisite symmetry, selling at very high prices; and are chiefly employed in carrying coal in the mountainous districts, and heavy articles from the navigable rivers and canals, iron-ore from the mines, and manufactured iron to the respective depôts, whence it is forwarded to the different markets. A considerable portion of the land is in sheep-walks; the quantity lying in commons is very considerable: Greenmore common is supposed to contain about five thousand acres, and that of Caldicott about eight hundred, besides those of Devandon, Chepstow, and various others of smaller extent; much ground is occupied by the extensive mines and quarries. The woods and coppices are numerous, and contain a great quantity of various kinds of timber, particularly beech and oak.

The most important mineral productions are iron, coal, limestone, and various other kinds of stone, valuable for building, and other purposes. The iron-ore is found in such a quantity as to form, in consequence of the district abounding with coal also, its principal branch of manufacture. Although the mines had been partially worked in very remote times, the works in this and the neighbouring county of Glamorgan were carried on with little spirit until the latter part of the eighteenth century, since which time great facilities have been obtained by the application of the steam-engine, by improvements in hydraulic machinery, and by the adoption of rollers instead of forge hammers. The present works on the Welch border are of considerable extent and importance, producing both pig and bar iron: attached to some are wire-works. Lead-ore is also found; and the coal obtained furnishes more than sufficient fuel for the supply of the inhabitants. Limestone of the finest kind is found in almost every part of the county, and, besides innumerable quarries of it, there are some of brescia, for mill-stones, and of other valuable kinds of stone. In addition to the manufacture of iron, there are, at Caerleon and Rogerstone, some tin-works. The manufacture of flannel has been long established, but is of very limited extent. Some few coarse cloths, woollen stockings, and coarse caps, are made by the inhabitants among the mountains, and brought to the great fairs for sale. The caps, which are much in demand for seafaring men, were formerly manufactured in much larger quantities than at present, the principal part of this trade having been removed to Bewdley, in Worcestershire, the few caps still manufactured there being called "Monmouth caps." A manufactory of japanned goods, celebrated under the name of "Pontypool ware," from its having been first invented in that town, in the reign of Charles II., was formerly carried on both there and at Usk, but has nearly declined, that trade having been transferred to the towns of Birmingham, Wolverhampton, &c. Hats are manufactured at Abergavenny, Monmouth, and Newport; and in the vicinity of Monmouth are several paper mills. The commerce, though considerable, yet being chiefly carried on through the medium of Chepstow and Newport, is identified with the imports and exports of those places.

The principal rivers are the Severn, the Wye, the Usk, the Rumney, the Monnow, and the Ebwy; besides which are numerous smaller rivers and streams, flowing through different parts of the county. When the Severn first touches this county, which it does at the angle where it receives the waters of the Wye, it is a river of great magnitude, with a strong tide, and in its progress, which is in a south-westerly direction, it widens rapidly, and forms the Bristol channel. The Wye first reaches Monmouthshire, from Herefordshire, at Newton-Dixon, and then forms a long line of separation between this county and Gloucestershire, falling into the Severn below Chepstow: the course of this river is peculiarly winding: it is navigable for large vessels only to Chepstow bridge, but for barges, with some difficulty, as high as Hereford. The Usk, rising in the Hatterell, or Black mountains of Brecknockshire, enters Monmouthshire at Llangrunny, and takes its course nearly through the centre of the county to the Severn, in a southerly direction, and through a most beautiful valley, between lofty hills: this river, when swollen by floods, is particularly impetuous: it is navigable for coasting vessels up to Newport, and for barges as high as Tredunnoch bridge. The Rumney rises in the lower part of Brecknockshire, and flowing through Duffin-Rumney, forms the line of division between this county and that of Glamorgan throughout the rest of its course, falling into the Bristol channel below the village of Rumney. The Monnow, rising in the Black mountains, takes a southerly course, and after forming for a considerable distance the north-eastern border of the county, which it separates from Herefordshire, it falls into the Wye at the town of Monmouth. The Ebwy also rises in Brecknockshire, and passing under the Beacon mountain, flows through the wild valley of Ebwy, and, having been joined by a stream similar to its own from the Sorwy valley, falls into the æstuary of the Usk below Newport. This county has some lines of valuable canal navigation. The Monmouthshire canal, which was begun in 1792, and finished in 1798, commences on the western side of the town of Newport, having there a basin connected with the river Usk, and passing between the town and the river, crosses the Chepstow road, and proceeds to Malpas, where it divides into two branches: one of these pursues a route, parallel to the river Avon and by Pontypool, to Pontnewydd, a distance of nearly eleven miles, in which it has a rise of four hundred and forty-seven feet: the other runs parallel to the river Ebwy, in the direction of Crumlin bridge, and forms a line of upwards of eleven miles in length, having a rise of three hundred and fifty-eight feet: the average depth of the water is three feet and a half, the boats which navigate it carrying from twenty-five to twenty-eight tons. By virtue of an act obtained in the year 1797, the proprietors were authorised to extend the line eastward one mile and a half; and by another, passed in 1802, various further powers were obtained, for making collateral tram-roads. In the 33rd of George III., an act was obtained for the formation of the Brecknockshire canal, which was designed to form a communication between Brecknock and Newport, by way of Abergavenny and Pontypool, in this county, forming a junction with the Monmouthshire canal eight miles and a half from Newport, and one from Pontypool: from that canal it proceeds across the river Avon, and, having been carried through a tunnel one hundred and eighty yards in length, it passes by Mamhilad, Llanover, &c. The commodities chiefly conveyed on the Monmouthshire canal, of which the Brecknockshire canal may be considered a branch, are coal, timber, pig-iron, and iron in different stages of manufacture, also various kinds of shop goods, together with furniture, deals, &c., for the supply of the interior. On the banks of the canal, at Pontnewydd, commences an iron rail-road, which runs along the side of the river Avon to the Blaenavon iron-works, a distance of five miles and a quarter, in which it has a rise from the canal of six hundred and ten feet. One of the principal modern roads passes across the southern part of the county, entering it at Chepstow; and, proceeding past Caerleon and through Newport, it leaves at Rumney. Another mail-coach road runs across the northern part of the county, from Monmouth, in a circuitous line through Abergavenny, to a little north-west of that town, where it enters Brecknockshire.

There were five principal Roman stations in that part of the territory of the Silures which is included within the present county of Monmouth: viz., Venta Silurum, fixed by the general consent of antiquaries at Caerwent; Isca Silurum, at Caerleon; and Gobannium, at Abergavenny: Burrium and Blestium, according to the opinion of Horsley, which is the most probable one, were at Usk and Monmouth respectively. Although it is supposed that most of the great roads connecting the southern part of Britannia Secunda with the Roman-British territory east of the Severn, must have passed through Monmouthshire, yet the only one that can be distinctly traced is one which passed south-westward from Abergavenny to Neath, or to some station in Glamorganshire, and which is called by the natives Sarn-hir, signifying the long paved causeway. The miscellaneous Roman antiquities discovered in this county at different times are numerous and various; comprising aqueducts, baths, sudatories, tessellated pavements, columns, statues, bas-reliefs, hypocausts, altars, votive and sepulchral stones, sarcophagi, urns, medals, coins, fibulæ, &c. Remains of numerous ancient encampments are still visible in various parts of the county, the construction of which, as this part of the British territory was never permanently occupied either by the Saxons or the Danes, it seems reasonable to attribute almost exclusively to the Britons and the Romans. The ancient castles, from its contiguity to the border of Wales, were also very numerous, the sites of no fewer than twenty-five being still distinguishable, most of which were of Norman erection, and of several of them considerable portions yet remain, though for the most part ruinous: those of Caerleon, Usk, and Skenfreth, have the most decided claim to antiquity; that of Ragland, though presenting the most magnificent extent of ruins, is the most modern of all the ancient fortresses. Many of the churches have a remarkably picturesque appearance: they generally stand isolated, in the midst of fields, on the banks of rivers or streams, and are often embosomed among trees. Their styles of architecture are very various: many of them, especially in the mountainous parts, are very ancient: a few may be referred to the British period, and several to the early Norman; but the greater number are of a date subsequent to the introduction of the pointed arch. The most ancient of all have somewhat the appearance of barns, being of small dimensions, without lateral aisles, or any distinction in height or breadth between the nave and the chancel, and without a steeple. Those of the second period have the chancel narrower and lower than the nave; and a small belfry, consisting of two arches, is fixed over the roof, at the western end. The third class have a tower, which in some instances is placed in the centre, in some at the side, and in others at the west end: some in the eastern part of the county have spires, and seem to have been erected in the thirteenth century. Few of the Monmouthshire churches having undergone much alteration since the Reformation, they still exhibit many vestiges of the Roman Catholic worship and discipline, such as rood-lofts, niches, auricular recesses, and confessional chairs. The custom of whitewashing the outside of these edifices prevails in this part of the kingdom, its origin being attributed to the churches having been, in many instances, constructed of pebbles and ragstone intermixed, which producing an extremely rough surface, it was thought requisite to cover them both internally and externally with plaster; the external whitewashing, though usually confined to the body of the church, sometimes includes the tower also. The number of religious houses, including two hospitals, was seventeen: the most interesting remains are those of Llanthony priory church, and of the Cistercian abbey of Tintern, both which exhibit large masses of beautiful ruins, in picturesque situations.

The customs of the inhabitants much resemble those which prevail in the adjacent parts of Wales. One, which is peculiarly striking to the eye of the English traveller, is that of whitewashing the outsides of the houses, which is usually done once a year, and gives an appearance of remarkable neatness and cheerfulness even to the humblest dwellings, considerably heightening the picturesque effect of the diversified landscapes with which the county abounds. The custom of not only scattering flowers, but planting them and evergreens upon the graves of deceased friends, a usage of great antiquity, prevails here as in South Wales. Among the poorest classes of the inhabitants, Protestant as well as Roman Catholic, a superstitious custom is observed, of begging bread for the souls of the departed, on All Souls' day, the bread so given being termed bara ran, that is, dole-bread. In the north-eastern and south-eastern parts of the county, the English language is in common use; but in the north-western and south-western districts, the Welch is generally spoken, excepting in the towns. The natives of the midland parts are accustomed to both languages: in several places divine service is performed wholly in Welch, in others in English, and in some alternately in both. The same tenacity shews itself in the lower orders of the inhabitants of this county that distinguishes those of the principality itself, with respect to the original language, customs, and manners; and, though continual attempts have been made to efface them, by establishing English schools, yet the antipathy of the people to the introduction of the language and manners of the English is still inveterately strong. The natives of the western and north-western parts, which are mountainous and sequestered, retain their ancient national prejudices with little abatement, and continue to stigmatize every thing assimilating to what is English with the epithet, opprobrious in their estimation, of Saxon. The provincial language, as in the adjoining county of Glamorgan, is the Gwentian, one of the three dialects of Wales, in which many of the Welch odes were composed, and which was considered the next in purity to that of the Gwynedd.

MONNINGTON upon WYE, a parish in the hundred of GRIMSWORTH, county of HEREFORD, 9 miles (W.N.W.) from Hereford, containing 116 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £7. 12. 10., and in the patronage of Sir G. Cornewall, Bart. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

MONTACUTE, a parish in the hundred of TINTINHULL, county of SOMERSET, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Yeovil, containing 973 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £8. 10., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Henry Phelps, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Catherine. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyan Methodists. This place, in the time of the Saxons, was called Logaresburch, which is said to have been changed for its present name by William, Earl of Moreton, who, soon after the Conquest, built a strong castle here, on the sharp point of a hill. On the same ridge is a double-moated Roman camp, called Hampden Hill, about three miles in circuit, the north-west part of which is further defended by a high rampart, partly of stone, enclosing twenty acres, within which many Roman coins have been found. Several large cisterns have been discovered in a morass below; and in the neighbourhood are extensive quarries of freestone, where materials have been furnished for building many of the churches in this and the adjoining counties. A priory, in honour of St. Peter and St. Paul, founded here by William the Conqueror, was, in the reign of Henry I., amply endowed, and granted to the monks of Cluny, by the Earl of Moreton; its revenue, at the dissolution, was estimated at £524. 11. 8.

MONTFORD, a parish in the hundred of PIMHILL, county of SALOP, 5 miles (W.N.W.) from Shrewsbury, containing 517 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £4. 18. 6., and in the patronage of the Earl of Powis. The church is dedicated to St. Chad. The parish is bounded on the south by the river Severn, across which there is a bridge.

MONYASH, a chapelry in the parish of BAKEWELL, hundred of HIGH PEAK, county of DERBY, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W.S.W.) from Bakewell, containing 381 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Bakewell, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Dean and Chapter of Lichfield and Coventry, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £1200 royal bounty. The chapel, dedicated to St. Leonard, has a low tower and spire. There is a meeting-house for the Society of Friends. A court of miners, for the hundred of High Peak, is held here once in six months, at which all pleas of debt, and disputes as to title, relating to the lead mines within the hundred, are determined by the steward and barmasters, assisted by a jury of twenty-four persons. Monyash is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Chapel en le Frith every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s. A school-house was built by subscription, in 1750, towards the endowment of which, the commissioners for enclosing waste lands subsequently awarded fourteen acres, now producing an annual income of about £17, for which sixteen poor children are educated free. At Rucklow-Dales are extensive rocks of grey marble, much admired for its variegated surface, of which a large quantity is quarried; and near them rises the river Lathkill, noted for the beautiful scenery on its banks.

MOOR, a joint township with Batchcott, in that part of the parish of RICHARD'S CASTLE which is in the hundred of MUNSLOW, county of SALOP. The population is returned with the parish.

MOOR, a joint township with Hill, in the parish of FLADBURY, middle division of the hundred of OSWALDSLOW, county of WORCESTER, 3 miles (E. by N.) from Pershore. The population is returned with Hill.

MOOR-TOWN, a township in the parish of BRANDSBURTON, northern division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESS, East riding of the county of YORK, 10 miles (N. E.) from Beverley, containing 29 inhabitants.

MOORBY, a parish in the soke of HORNCastle, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by S.) from Horncastle, containing 118 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £7. 11. 8., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Carlisle. The church is dedicated to All Saints. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

MOORE, a township in the parish of RUNCORN, hundred of BUCKLOW, county palatine of CHESTER, 4 miles (S. W. by S.) from Warrington, containing 243 inhabitants. The Mersey and Irwell canal and the Duke of Bridgewater's canal pass through the township.

MOORES BARROW, a joint township with Parme, in that part of the parish of MIDDLEWICH which is in the hundred of NORTHWICH, county palatine of CHESTER, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by S.) from Middlewich, containing, with Parme, 25 inhabitants.

MOORHOUSE, a township in the parish of BURGH upon the SANDS, ward and county of CUMBERLAND, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Carlisle, containing 254 inhabitants. There is a meeting-house for the Society of Friends, in which Thomas Stordy, who died in 1684, after suffering many persecutions; and Jonathan Ostell, who died in 1755, distinguished themselves as pious and unyielding preachers.

MOORHOUSE, a township in the parish of HOUGHTON le SPRING, northern division of EASINGTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Durham, containing 29 inhabitants.

MOORHOUSE, a chapelry in the parish of LAXTON, or LEXINGTON, South-clay division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, county of NOTTINGHAM, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Tuxford. The population is returned with the parish.

MOORLINCH, a parish in the hundred of WHITLEY, county of SOMERSET, 7 miles (E.) from Bridgewater, containing, with the chapelries of Catcott, Chilton upon Poldon, Edington, and Stawell, and the hamlet of Sutton-Mallet, 1887 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the chapel of Chilton upon Poldon, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £10. H. Bradridge, Esq. was patron in 1818. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. Here was a cell to the abbey of Glastonbury.

MOORSHAM (GREAT), a township in the parish of SKELTON, eastern division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, North riding of the county of YORK, 6 miles (E. by S.) from Guilsbrough, containing 353 inhabitants.

MOORSLEY, a township in the parish of HOUGHTON le SPRING, northern division of EASINGTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Durham, containing 48 inhabitants.

MOORTHWAITE, a joint township with Northsceugh, in the parish of CUMWHITTON, ESKDALE ward, county of CUMBERLAND, 10 miles (S. E. by S.) from Carlisle, containing, with Northsceugh, 259 inhabitants.

MOORWINSTOW, a parish in the hundred of STRATTON, county of CORNWALL, $7\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Stratton, containing 1091 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £13. 10. 10., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Exeter. The church, dedicated to St. Morvenna, is principally Norman, with an enriched south porch and a large font of the same character; it has some portions in the later English style. The parish, situated at the most northern extremity of Cornwall, extends across that portion of the county, having on the west the Bristol channel, and on the east the river Tamar, which here takes its rise.

MORBORN, a parish in the hundred of NORMAN-CROSS, county of HUNTINGDON, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W.) from Stilton, containing 95 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Huntingdon, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £10. 6. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of R. E. Duncombe, Esq. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

MORCHARD (BISHOP'S), a parish in the hundred of CREDITON, county of DEVON, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Crediton, containing 1935 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Bishop of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £36. R. H. Tuckfield, Esq. was patron in 1827. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. Thomasine Tucker, in 1733, gave a rent-charge of £16 for teaching and clothing eight boys and eight girls. There is a fair for cattle on the Monday after September 8th.

MORCOTT, a parish in the hundred of WRANDIKE, county of RUTLAND, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. by N.) from Uppingham, containing 443 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £10. 19. 7. The Rev. E. Thorold was patron in 1825. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

MORDEN, a parish in the hundred of LOOSEBARROW, Shaston (East) division of the county of DORSET, 6 miles (N.) from Wareham, containing 650 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £8. 4. 7., and in the patronage of Richard Erle Drax, Esq. The church is an ancient building, with an embattled tower crowned with pinnacles. Among other sepulchral memorials of the Erle family, there are in the chancel an altar-tomb, and a monument of freestone, having the figure of a man in complete armour, in the attitude of prayer, with three children behind him. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

MORDEN (GILDEN), a parish in the hundred of ARMINGFORD, county of CAMBRIDGE, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Biggleswade, containing 570 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Ely, rated in the king's books at £7. 3. 6., and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Jesus College, Cambridge. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

MORDEN (STEEPLE), a parish in the hundred of ARMINGFORD, county of CAMBRIDGE, 5 miles (W. by N.) from Royston, containing 614 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Ely, rated in the king's books at £6. 18. 6., endowed with £600 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Warden and Fellows of New College, Oxford. The church is dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul: the steeple fell to the ground about seventy years since.

MORDIFORD, a parish in the hundred of GREY-TREE, county of HEREFORD, 5 miles (E. S. E.) from Hereford, containing 638 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £10. 6. 5½., and in the patronage of E. T. Foley, Esq. The church, dedicated to the Holy Rood, had formerly a wooden spire rising from the centre, (which was taken down in 1814, when a tower was erected at the west end,) whereon had been emblazoned for several previous centuries, a dragon, probably the bearing of Uter Pendragon, anciently of note in this vicinity. A school-house, lately erected on the east side of the churchyard, at an expense of £400, raised by subscription, is endowed with about £5 per annum. The parish, which is situated at the confluence of the rivers Frome, Lug, and Wye, abounds with limestone, in which is found a great variety of fossils; and within its limits is a small portion of St. Ethelbert's camp, on Blackbury hill.

MORDON, a township in the parish of SEDGEFIELD, north-eastern division of STOCKTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, 8½ miles (E. by S.) from Bishop-Auckland, containing 124 inhabitants.

MORDON, a parish in the second division of the hundred of WALLINGTON, county of SURREY, 10 miles (S. W. by S.) from London, containing 638 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Surrey, and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £7. 12. 11., and in the patronage of Mrs. Lowndes Stone, as lady of the manor. The church, dedicated to St. Lawrence, is a small brick edifice, erected about 1636; it has a large window of stained glass. Elizabeth Gardiner, in 1718, gave £300, and Elizabeth Garth, in 1776, £100, which together produce an annual income of about £30, applied to the instruction of twenty poor children. There is also a Sunday school supported by voluntary contributions. The small river Wandle runs through the parish, and the Croydon railway passes near it. Here is a tobacco and snuff manufactory.

MORE, a parish in the hundred of PURSLOW, county of SALOP, 3 miles (N. E. by N.) from Bishop's Castle, containing 277 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £8. 6. 2. R. Moore, Esq. was patron in 1776.

MOREBATH, a parish in the hundred of BAMPTON, county of DEVON, 2¼ miles (N. by W.) from Bampton, containing 415 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £7. 8. 9. Thomas E. Clarke, Esq. was patron in 1813. The church is dedicated to St. George. Here is an almshouse for two poor persons. A charity school was endowed, in 1688, by Mr. John Brook, with £10 a year, for the instruction of poor children of the parish.

MOREBY, a joint township with Stillingfleet, in that part of the parish of STILLINGFLEET which is in the wapentake of OUZE and DERWENT, East riding of the county of YORK, 5¾ miles (S.) from York. The population is returned with Stillingfleet.

MORELEIGH, or MORLEY, a parish in the hundred of STANBOROUGH, county of DEVON, 5½ miles (S. W. by S.) from Totness, containing 202 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Totness, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £9. 8. 1., and in the patronage of the Earl of Morley. The church is dedicated to All Saints. A weekly market and an annual fair were formerly held here. Within the parish is Stanborough, the site of an ancient fort, which gives name to the hundred. Morley gives the title of earl to the family of Parker.

MORESBY, a parish in ALLERDALE ward above Darwent, county of CUMBERLAND, containing, with the townships of Moresby and Parton, 934 inhabitants, of which number, 438 are in the township of Moresby, 2 miles (N. by E.) from Whitehaven. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £6. 2. 3½., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Earl of Lonsdale. The church, dedicated to St. Bridget, has lately received an addition of three hundred and sixty-two sittings, of which two hundred and twelve are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £150 toward defraying the expense. A school was founded and endowed by Joseph Williamson, Esq., of which the Bishops of Chester and Carlisle are the governors. There is an iron-foundry within this parish, which is bounded on the west by the Irish sea. It is evident that this was the site of a Roman station, from the numerous foundations of buildings, caverns, and Roman inscriptions, which have been discovered. Horsley thinks that it was Arbeia, where, according to the Notitia, the Numerus Barcariorum Tigrisensium was in garrison.

MORESTEAD, a parish in the hundred of FAWLEY, Fawley division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 3¼ miles (S. E. by S.) from Winchester, containing 80 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Incumbent, rated in the king's books at £6, endowed with £300 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Winchester. Morestead is within the jurisdiction of the Cheyney Court held at Winchester every Thursday, for the recovery of debts to any amount.

MORETON, a liberty in that part of the parish of DINTON which is in the hundred of DESBOROUGH, county of BUCKINGHAM, 4 miles (S. W. by S.) from Aylesbury, containing 14 inhabitants.

MORETON, a joint township with Alcumlow, in that part of the parish of ASTBURY which is in the hundred of NORTHWICH, county palatine of CHESTER, 3 miles (S. W. by S.) from Congleton, containing, with Alcumlow, 129 inhabitants.

MORETON, a township in the parish of BIDSTONE, lower division of the hundred of WIRRAL, county palatine of CHESTER, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Great Neston, containing 273 inhabitants.

MORETON, a parish in the hundred of WINFRITH, Blandford (South) division of the county of DORSET 8 miles (E. by S.) from Dorchester, containing 256 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £9. 19. 2. James Frampton, Esq. was patron in 1827. The church, dedicated to St. Magnus the Martyr, is a small but very ancient edifice, with a tower rising from the centre: the south aisle, formerly styled the chapel of the Holy Trinity, has been the burial-place of the Framptons, and was rebuilt by James Frampton, Esq., in 1733.

MORETON, a parish in the hundred of ONGAR, county of ESSEX, 3 miles (N. by W.) from Chipping-Ongar, containing 408 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Essex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £20, and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of St. John's College, Cambridge. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

MORETON, a chapelry in the parish of LLANY-BLODWELL, hundred of OSWESTRY, county of SALOP, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.) from Oswestry. The population is returned with the parish. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, endowed with £32 per annum private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty. The chapel is dedicated to St. Michael. Here is a mineral spring.

MORETON, a hamlet in the parish of GNOSALL, western division of the hundred of CUTTLESTONE, county of STAFFORD, 4 miles (E.S.E.) from Newport, containing 754 inhabitants. It is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s.

MORETON (MAIDS'), a parish in the hundred and county of BUCKINGHAM, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (N. E.) from Buckingham, containing 407 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £18. 2. 11., and in the patronage of the Rev. J. L. Long. The church, dedicated to St. Edmund, is a handsome structure in the later English style, containing some stalls highly enriched; the porch and belfry have groined roofs. It was built in 1450, by two maiden sisters, daughters of the last male heir of the family of Pegore. The river Ouse, and a branch of the Grand Junction canal, pass through the parish.

MORETON in the MARSH, a market town and parish in the upper division of the hundred of WESTMINSTER, county of GLOUCESTER, $28\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Gloucester, and 83 (W. N. W.) from London, containing 1015 inhabitants. This town is situated in a pleasant valley, on the high road from London to Worcester, which is here crossed by the Roman Fosse-way: it is an inconsiderable place, and is neither lighted nor paved. A public library is supported by subscription. The only branch of manufacture is that of linen-cloth, which furnishes employment to about fifty persons. A railway passes hence to Stratford upon Avon, being chiefly used for the conveyance of coal. In the reign of Henry III., the abbot of Westminster, lord of the manor, procured a charter for a weekly market, which, though on the decline, is still held on Tuesday. There are fairs on the 25th of March, and the 1st of November, but they are very little resorted to. Constables are appointed at the court held for the manor. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Bourton on the Hill, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester. The church is dedicated to St. David. There is a place of worship for Independents. A National school was endowed in 1813, with £4000, by Lord Redesdale and Dr. Winford; the present income is about £140 per annum, and about one hundred children of both sexes are educated: there is likewise a free school for the children of dissenters, having about thirty boys on the foundation. On the heath is a stone, marking the junction of four counties, near which a memorable battle was fought between the English and the Danes.

MORETON (NORTH), a parish in the hundred of MORETON, county of BERKS, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W.) from Wallingford, containing 348 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Berks, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £7. 17. 8., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Archdeacon of Berks. The church is dedicated to All Saints. In Stapleton's chantry chapel, founded before 1467, are two old tombs of dignified ecclesiastics, with processional crosses, but without dates: there are also two ancient mutilated tombs, with Saxon inscriptions.

MORETON (SOUTH), a parish in the hundred of MORETON, county of BERKS, 3 miles (W. S. W.) from Wallingford, containing 364 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Berks, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £12. 15. 5., and in the patronage of the University of Oxford, in trust for the Principal and Fellows of Magdalene Hall. The church is dedicated to St. John. A small stream runs through the village, and upon it there are three paper-mills.

MORETON-CORBET, a parish in the Whitechurch division of the hundred of BRADFORD (North), county of SALOP, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. E.) from Wem, containing, with the township of Preston-Brockhurst, 235 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £5. 3. 6., and in the patronage of Sir A. Corbett, Bart. The church, dedicated to St. Bartholomew, is a neat structure, containing some fine ancient monuments of the Corbet family, whose magnificent mansion, built in the time of Elizabeth, was burned in the civil war, by a detachment from Cromwell's army, which was stationed at Wem; the remains have been converted into workshops, &c.

MORETON-HAMPSTEAD, a market town and parish in the hundred of TEINGBRIDGE, county of DEVON, 11 miles (W. S. W.) from Exeter, and 184 (W. S. W.) from London, containing 1932 inhabitants. This town is romantically situated on the verge of Dartmoor Forest, and occupies a gentle eminence environed by lofty hills. It consists of several streets, which are indifferently paved: the houses in general are ancient, and built in the cottage style, with thatched roofs: the appearance of the surrounding district is somewhat peculiar, the surface being strewn with fragments of rock, while the barren heights of Dartmoor on the west are strikingly contrasted with the cultivated slopes of land more immediately adjacent to the town. The woollen trade here was formerly extensive, but only a few blankets and stockings are now made: there are some tan-yards, and a rope manufactory, the produce of the former being sent chiefly to Bristol and Exeter: in the vicinity there are quarries of excellent granite. A market is held on Saturday, and there are two great cattle markets, on Whitsun-eve and the first Saturday in October. Fairs are held on the third Thursday in July and the last Thursday in November, principally for cattle. A new market-house and shambles were built, at the expense of Lord Courtenay, in 1827. A portreeve is annually elected at a court leet and baron for the manor, held early in November: four constables are chosen at the same court, by a jury; also a bailiff, to examine weights and measures, and two officers, called jurors, to superintend the internal affairs of the town.

The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Totness, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £49. 19. 7., and in the patronage of the Lord of the Manor. The church, dedicated to St. Andrew, occupies the summit of the elevation on which the town is situated; it is an ancient edifice, with nave, aisles, transeptal porch, and chancel, the last being separated from the body by a carved wooden screen. There are places of worship for Independents, Wesleyan Methodists, and Unitarians. The sum of £10 per annum is paid by the governors of St. John's hospital, in the city of Exeter, agreeably to the directions of Eliza Hele, for the maintenance of a free school in this parish; ten poor children are instructed gratuitously. Some Druidical remains and Roman antiquities have been found in the immediate vicinity of the town.

MORETON-SEA or SAY, a parish in the Drayton division of the hundred of BRADFORD (North), county of SALOP, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W.) from Drayton in Hales, containing 762 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Hodnet, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry. The church is dedicated to St. Margaret.

MORETON-VALENCE, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of WHITSTONE, county of GLOUCESTER, $7\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Stroud, containing 348 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, endowed with £400 private benefaction, £800 royal bounty, and £300 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of—Pitt, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Stephen. The navigable river Severn bounds the parish on the north-west, and the Gloucester and Berkeley canal passes through it. Here are considerable iron-works.

MORLAND, a parish in WEST ward, county of WESTMORLAND, comprising the chapelries of Bolton and Thrimby, and the townships of Kings-Meaburn, Morland, Newby, Sleagill, Great Strickland, and Little Strickland, and containing 1911 inhabitants, of which number, 372 are in the township of Morland, $6\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W.N.W.) from Appleby. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Carlisle, rated in the king's books at £11. 18., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Carlisle. The church, dedicated to St. Lawrence, is a large ancient edifice. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists, also a meeting-house, with a burial-ground attached, belonging to the Society of Friends. The river Lyvennet runs through the parish, the northern and western boundaries of which are formed by the river Leeth, and the eastern by the Eden. An abundance of limestone and some coal are obtained here. A free school, erected and partly supported by subscription, has been endowed, by the Dean and Chapter of Carlisle, with £16 a year and thirty acres of waste land, enclosed before 1800: the master's annual stipend is upwards of £30, for which about forty children are instructed. At Chapelgarth there formerly stood a chapel, dedicated to St. Mary. Bewley castle, of which there are still some vestiges, often afforded security to the Bishops of Carlisle, during the border warfare, when driven from their usual residence, Rose castle, by the Scots. Within the parish are the remains of a monastic building, and several old halls, now converted into farm-houses.

MORLEY, a parish in the hundred of MORLESTON and LITCHURCH, county of DERBY, containing, with the chapelry of Smalley, and the township of Morley, 1000 inhabitants, of which number, 273 are in the township of Morley, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Derby. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Derby, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £13. 6. 8., and in the patronage of E. S. Pole, H. S. Bateman, and T. S. Sitwell, Esqrs., alternately. The church, dedicated to St. Matthew, is a large structure with a lofty spire, in part built by Ralph Statham, Esq., who died in 1380, and completed by his widow Goditha: it contains several monuments of the ancient families of Statham and Sacheverell; and in the north aisle are four windows of stained glass, curiously designed, said to have been brought from Dale abbey at the dissolution. There is an almshouse, founded about 1657, by Jacinth Sacheverell, for six poor men, each receiving £5 per annum. At Smalley is a schoolhouse, built by John and Samuel Richardson, who, in 1721, endowed it for the instruction of twelve poor boys, with lands now let for £88 per annum; the number of scholars has been increased to twenty-eight. The latter also gave £400 to purchase lands, now let for £40 per annum, directing the rental to be applied towards the support of fourteen infirm colliers of Smalley, Heanor, and Horsley-Woodhouse.

MORLEY, a chapelry in that part of the parish of BATLEY which is in the lower division of the wapentake of AGRIGG, West riding of the county of YORK, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.W. by S.) from Leeds, containing 3031 inhabitants, who are principally employed in the manufacture of woollen cloth. A chapel is now being erected by the commissioners appointed under the late act for building additional churches. Morley, previously to the Conquest, had a parochial church, which subsequently became dependent on that of Batley; but in the time of Charles I. it was conveyed by the Earl of Sussex to trustees of the Presbyterian church, and was never afterwards restored to the establishment: it retains much of its ancient appearance, and now belongs to the Independents, who, besides this, have a place of worship recently erected: there is another belonging to the Wesleyan Methodists.

MORLEY (ST. BOTOLPH), a parish in the hundred of FOREHOE, county of NORFOLK, 3 miles (W. S.W.) from Wymondham, containing 269 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with the perpetual curacy of Morley St. Peter annexed, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £14. 11. 5½. B. N. Cooper, Esq. was patron in 1800. The church is an ancient structure, with a large square tower: the chancel was repaired and beautified about 1480, by Thomas Warde, the then rector, of whom it contains several painted representations, particularly in the east window. Elizabeth Brown, in 1732, bequeathed £150, directing the income to be applied in teaching and clothing six children, and providing them with books.

MORLEY (ST. PETER), a parish in the hundred of FOREHOE, county of NORFOLK, 4 miles (S. W. by W.) from Wymondham, containing 201 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Morley St. Botolph,* in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich. Elizabeth Brown, in 1732, left £90 for teaching poor children, and supplying them with books and clothes.

MORNING-THORPE, a parish in the hundred of DEPWAD, county of NORFOLK, 2 miles (E.) from St. Mary Stratton, containing 160 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £7, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. John the Baptist.

Arms.

LAND, and containing 4292 inhabitants, of which number, 3415 are in the town of Morpeth, 15 miles (N.) from Newcastle upon Tyne, and 289 (N.) from London. This town, which is stated to derive its name from "Moor-path," or the road across the moor, was an inconsiderable village prior to the Conquest, when it became the head of a barony, and, in 1358, a castle was erected by William, Lord Greystock. In 1215, the town was set on fire by the barons, in order to obstruct the military operations of King John; and in 1689, it was again nearly destroyed by an accidental conflagration. Morpeth is agreeably situated in a valley on the northern bank of the river Wansbeck, which is crossed by a stone bridge of two arches, and on the great road from London to Edinburgh, in the centre of a richly-cultivated district: an elegant bridge of three arches, from a design by Mr. Telford, is now being erected a little below the old bridge. The town consists chiefly of one long street, which is not lighted, and but indifferently paved with pebbles; the houses are of an inferior description: an abundant supply of water is conveyed into the town, through pipes, from a spring at Stobhill, the works having been constructed in 1820; and there is a large well at the end of Manchester-lane, called St. Thomas' well. Races are held annually in September, on Cottingwood, immediately northward of the town. A

MORPETH, a parish, comprising the townships of Catchburn and Hepscoth in the eastern, and Newminster-Abbey, Shilvington, Tranwell with High Church, and Twizell, in the western, division of CASTLE ward; and Buller's Green, and the borough and market town of Morpeth, in the western division of MORPETH ward, county of NORTHUMBER-subscription library, established in 1817, is well supported; and in 1825 a mechanics' and scientific institution was founded, which at present consists of about two hundred members, and is furnished with a good library and lecture-room. The trade principally arises from a colliery in the neighbourhood, two manufactories for flannel, and one for carpets, and there is considerable business in tanning and brewing. The market cross, built in 1699, and rebuilt in 1783, at the expense of the corporation, stands in the centre of the town, and is a small edifice supported by eight stone pillars and arches. The market, which is on Wednesday, is one of the principal markets in the North of England for live cattle, and is generally well supplied with corn and provisions; fairs are held on Wednesday week before Whitsuntide, and the Wednesday before July 22nd, for sheep and cattle; and there is a statute fair for hiring servants, on the Wednesday before Martinmas-day.

Corporate Seal.

Morpeth is a borough by prescription, and received a charter of confirmation from Charles II. The officers of the corporation are two bailiffs, a serjeant at mace, two ale-tasters and bread-weighers, two fish and flesh lookers, four constables, and an indefinite number of free burgesses, seldom exceeding two hundred and twenty in the whole. The Earl of Carlisle, as lord of the manor, holds two courts leet annually, one on the Monday next after Easter week, and the other on the first Monday after Michaelmas-day, at which latter the officers of the corporation are annually elected. The corporation is composed of, and contains within itself, seven inferior companies, or fraternities, each governed by an alderman, and consisting of freemen who are members of the general body corporate, and of persons who are members only of their respective companies, and called free brothers. The freemen are appointed by the seven companies, who elect, from among their own free brothers, the full number of twenty-four; viz., the Merchant-Tailors four, the Tanners six, the Fullers and Dyers three, the Smiths three, the Cordwainers three, the Weavers three, and the Butchers two: the whole being sworn and admitted freemen at the ensuing court leet, after which the companies may elect twenty-four more: the free brothers become such by servitude, or by being sons of freemen who are brothers of some particular company. The borough is within the jurisdiction of the county magistrates, who hold a petty session on the first Wednesday in every month. Quarter sessions for the county are held here alternately with Alnwick, Newcastle, and Hexham. On the south side of the town are about four hundred acres of common land, on which each of the freemen and free brothers is entitled to turn two head of cattle. The borough first returned representatives to parliament in 1553: the two members are elected by the bailiffs and the free burgesses: the bailiffs are the returning officers, and the parliamentary influence is enjoyed by the Earl of Carlisle and the Ord family. The town hall is a plain structure of hewn stone, with a piazza and turrets, erected in 1714, by the family of Howard: it is generally appropriated to meetings for public business, and the lower part is occasionally used as a theatre. A large and commodious gaol for the county, with a magnificent sessions-house and offices, has been lately erected, at the south entrance to the town: the first stone was laid on the 24th of July, 1822, by his Grace the Duke of Northumberland: the estimated expense of erection was £80,000. The prison wards are arranged in the form of a radiated octagon, with the houses of the governor and turnkeys in the centre, and a chapel on the east side; the sessions-house and a turreted gateway form the grand western entrance: the area consists of about three acres of ground, and the height of the outer wall is twenty-one feet.

The living is a rectory, with Ulgham annexed, in the archdeaconry of Northumberland, and diocese of Durham, rated in the king's books at £32. 16. 8., and in the patronage of the Earl of Carlisle. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is situated upon an eminence called "Kirk Hill," at a considerable distance from the town: it is a plain structure, in the ancient style of English architecture, with a low square western tower: in the chancel is a fine east window, which was formerly of painted glass throughout. An old square tower of hewn freestone, called the 'Clock House,' standing near the market-place, contains a clock and a ring of six bells. On the north of the bridge is a small but handsome chapel of ease, built of freestone. There are places of worship for Independents, Presbyterians, and Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists, also a Roman Catholic chapel. The free grammar school was founded by Edward VI., in 1552, for the sons of freemen, and endowed with the lands of dissolved chantries here and at Nether Witton, the proceeds of which amount to about £240 per annum, of which sum, the master receives two-thirds, and the usher the remainder. An English free school, supported by the corporation, was erected in 1792: the master receives a salary of £70 per annum, and about sixty children of burgesses are educated. A dispensary, established in 1817, is liberally supported by voluntary contributions; and a savings bank has lately been erected. The remains of the ancient baronial castle consist of the old gateway tower, with part of two exploratory turrets, together with the outer wall: near the gateway tower, towards the north, is a large mound of earth on a natural elevation, the height of which appears to have been greatly increased by art: this was probably part of the outworks. William Turner, M.D., the first English writer on botany, who died in 1568, was born here; and Dr. Robert Morrison, the celebrated Chinese linguist and missionary, and author of a Chinese dictionary, is also a native of this place. Morpeth gives the title of viscount to the family of Howard, Earls of Carlisle.

MORRAGE, a joint township with Foxt, in that part of the parish of IPSTONES which is in the southern division of the hundred of TOTMONSLOW, county of STAFFORD, containing, with Foxt, 415 inhabitants.

MORRICK, a township in that part of the parish of WARKWORTH which is in the eastern division of MORPETH ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 9 miles (S.E. by S.) from Alnwick, containing 72 inhabitants.

MORROWE, a hamlet in the parish and hundred of WISBEACH, Isle of ELY, county of CAMBRIDGE, 6 miles (W. S.W.) from Wisbeach, with which the population is returned. Here was anciently a chapel, or oratory, in which, by reason of the distance of the parish church, the inhabitants obtained license from the bishop, in 1388, to attend divine service for one year.

MORSTON, a parish in the hundred of HOLT, county of NORFOLK, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Clay, containing 139 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with that of Stiffkey St. John, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £18. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

MORTHOE, a parish in the hundred of BRAUNTON, county of DEVON, 4 miles (S.W. by W.) from Ilfracombe, containing 280 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Barnstaple, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £9. 19. 3., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Exeter. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, contains an altar-tomb to the memory of Sir William de Tracey, who, in 1308, founded a chantry, and, after the murder of Thomas à Becket, ended his days in a hermitage at this place. A school, conducted on the Madras system, has been established here. Within the parish is a Druidical monument, termed Mortstone.

MORTIMER (WEST), a tything in that part of the parish of STRATFIELD-MORTIMER which is in the hundred of HOLDSHOTT, Basingstoke division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 8 miles (N.) from Basingstoke, containing 340 inhabitants.

MORTLAKE, a parish in the western division of the hundred of BRIXTON, county of SURREY, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.W. by W.) from London, containing, with East Sheen, 2484 inhabitants. In this parish, about the year 1616, a manufactory of tapestry was established, but it was destroyed in the time of the civil war; there is at present one for earthenware. The cultivation of asparagus and lavender was formerly extensive, but not more than thirty acres are now applied to this use. A farm, comprising eighty acres, on the Richmond side of the parish, was formerly the private property of George III. The river Thames flows on the north side of the parish. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Canterbury, being in the exempt deanery of Croydon, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Worcester. The church, which was founded in the fourteenth, and rebuilt in the sixteenth, century, has undergone many modern repairs; the tower, which is very ancient, is of stone and flint, square and embattled: in the interior is an ancient font, ornamented with rich tracery, the gift of Archbishop Bouchier. There is a place of worship for Independents. A free school, for the education of poor children in the principles of the established church, founded in 1700, and endowed by the will of Dorothy, Lady Capel, in 1719, was enlarged by subscription in 1815, when the National system was introduced; about ninety boys and fifty girls are instructed. An ancient house in this parish, said to have belonged to Oliver Cromwell, was subsequently the residence of Edward Colston, Esq., the great benefactor to the city of Bristol, who, during his lifetime, expended more than £70,000 in the support of various charitable institutions. The only remaining vestige of Mortlake House, anciently the residence of the Archbishops of Canterbury, is the foundation of a single wall.

MORTON, a parish in the hundred of SCARSDALE, county of DERBY, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Alfreton, containing, with the chapelry of Brackenfield, 502 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Derby, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £11. 10., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £800 royal bounty, and in the alternate patronage of the Master and Fellows of St. John's College, Cambridge, and the Turbutt family. The church is dedicated to the Holy Cross.

MORTON, a parish in the wapentake of AVELAND, parts of KESTIVEN, county of LINCOLN, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Bourne, containing, with the chapelry of Hanthorpe, or Harmthorpe, 765 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, united, in 1732, to that of Haconby, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £9. 1. $10\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Lincoln. The church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, is a handsome cruciform structure, with a lofty and finely-groined tower rising from the intersection: it has portions in the Norman, and in the early, decorated, and later English styles of architecture. Rebecca Leaband, in 1717, bequeathed land producing a trifling income, for the education of poor children.

MORTON, an extra-parochial liberty, in the higher division of the wapentake of BOOTHBY-GRAFFO, parts of KESTIVEN, county of LINCOLN, 8 miles (S. W. by W.) from Lincoln, containing 9 inhabitants.

MORTON, a hamlet in the parish of GAINSBOROUGH, wapentake of CORRINGHAM, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (N. by W.) from Gainsborough, containing 580 inhabitants. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. A school for twenty poor children was endowed with land, in 1708, by Joshua Teeler.

MORTON, a parish in that part of the liberty of SOUTHWELL and SCROOBY which separates the northern and southern divisions of the wapentake of THURGARTON, county of NOTTINGHAM, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Southwell, containing 150 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Chapter of the Collegiate Church of Southwell, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Prebendary of Dunham in the Collegiate Church of Southwell. The church, dedicated to St. Denis, is a small brick edifice. Here is a trifling endowment in land, bequeathed by John Dabile, for teaching four poor children of Morton, and four of Fisherton.

The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is in the later style of English architecture, with a handsome tower: it stands upon an eminence called War-hill; the vicarage-house, near it, is surrounded by intrenchments similar to those of a Roman station. In the churchyard lie the remains of Lawrence Earnshaw, an eminent self-taught genius in mechanics and the fine arts; he died in 1767. There is a place of worship for Independents, and another, with a school attached, belonging to the Wesleyan Methodists. A free grammar school was founded, in 1612, by Robert Garside, and is endowed with about £53 per annum. There are also a parochial school, in which about four hundred children are taught, and a small subscription library. The river Mersey, rising at the north-eastern extremity of the parish, separates it from Derbyshire on the south; and the Tame, from Lancashire on the north. At the village of Mottram, which consists of one long and spacious street, the Mersey expands into a broad stream, upon which are the extensive mills of Messrs. Marshland, occupying a large space excavated in the rock, and reaching to the middle of the river, which, lower down, is crossed by a stone bridge of one immense arch. Here are extensive manufactories for cotton and woollen goods, paper, and machinery; works for printing calico, and an establishment for smelting iron-ore, which abounds in the south-west part of the parish, and has the advantage of large collieries in the neighbourhood. A court leet is held annually on Michaelmas-day, at which a constable is elected. There are fairs for cattle on April 27th and October 31st. The Car Tor, rising above the village, is a precipitous elevation, eighty feet in perpendicular height, its face exhibiting various strata of rock, coal, slate, and freestone, disposed with great regularity; and the sides being partly clothed with foliage, it has a picturesque effect. Mottram hill rises above this to the height of four hundred and fifty feet, and even this, with the village, lies far beneath the adjacent immense heights of Charleworth Neck, Wernoth-Loe, &c., the summits of which command most extensive prospects of the surrounding country. In this parish are the remains of Bucton castle, supposed to be of British origin.

B. Bramston, Esq. was patron in 1802. The church is dedicated to St. Giles. Richard Beyley, in 1743, bequeathed a house and land in support of a school for teaching poor children. A priory of Augustine canons was founded, in the reign of Stephen, at Thoby in this parish, by Michael Capra, Roise his wife, and William their son: it was dedicated to St. Mary and St. Leonard, and, at the dissolution, had a revenue of £75. 6. 10.

MOUNTON, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of CALDICOTT, county of MONMOUTH, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Chepstow, containing 52 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaff, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of — Lloyd, Esq. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

MOUNTSORREL, a market town and chapelry, partly in the parish of ROTHLEY, but chiefly in that of BARROW upon SOAR, western division of the hundred of GOSCOTE, county of LEICESTER, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Leicester, and $104\frac{1}{2}$ (N. N. W.) from London, containing 1422 inhabitants. The name of this place, prior to the Conquest, appears to have been Soar-hill, which, with its present appellation, is evidently derived from its situation on a mount or hill near the river Soar. On the highest of a range of hills, impending above the town, and called Castle hill, a fortress once stood, which is mentioned in the reign of Stephen, when it was assigned to Robert le Bossu, Earl of Leicester, and his heirs, on condition that Ralph, Earl of Chester, who also laid claim to it, should, with his family, be amicably received within the borough, bailiwick, and castle, whenever they might choose to reside there. In 1167, Robert Blanchmains, Earl of Leicester, on his rebellion against Henry II., was dispossessed of it with his other estates; the latter were subsequently restored to him, but the king retained the castle, and governors were appointed to hold it during this and succeeding reigns. In 1215, it was garrisoned by Saer de Quincey, its governor, for the Dauphin of France, whom the barons had invited to their assistance; and when the royal cause became triumphant, in the beginning of the reign of Henry III., was taken and razed to the ground. This small town is rather romantically situated, amidst rocky and variegated scenery, and consists principally of one street, which extends about three-quarters of a mile along the high road, and is paved with red granite from the adjacent cliffs; the houses in general are constructed of the same material. Worsted-hose and net-lace are manufactured here; and the Soar canal affords facility for the conveyance of stone for the repair of roads throughout the neighbourhood. The market, which is almost discontinued, is on Monday; and there is a fair on the 29th of July, during which a court of pie-powder is held. There is a small stone bridge over the Soar. The market-house, a small building in the centre of the town, was erected in 1793, at the expense of Sir John Danvers, Bart., who at the same time removed a curious and ancient cross, which occupied a portion of the site, into his own ground. In addition to the usual manorial courts, a court of pleas is held every three weeks, for the recovery of small debts within the eastern and western divisions of the hundred of Goscote, having the same jurisdiction over that district as a county court has over the county at large. The chapel, dedicated to St. Peter, is a chapel of ease to the vicarage of Barrow. There are places of worship for Baptists, Presbyterians, Unitarians, and Wesleyan Methodists. A free school, for educating twelve boys, was founded in 1742, by Sir John Danvers; the endowment is about £12 per annum. There are several considerable benefactions for the relief of the poor.

MOUSON, a township in the parish and northern division of BAMBROUGH ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Belford, containing 73 inhabitants. Here are vestiges of a Roman camp.

The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Lord Muncaster. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. This place, anciently written Meol-castre, derives its name from a castle, the ancient residence of the Penningtons, lords of the manor, situated at Esk-meol, near the mouth of the river Esk, the principal tower of which is retained in the modern mansion, which was neatly built by the late Lord Muncaster. Richard Brockbank, in 1696, left £160 towards the establishment of a school for the children of those who should contribute to the building of a school-room, which has been further endowed with £100, by Sir William Pennington, Bart., and some smaller sums by others: the annual income, about £12, is paid to the master, who receives also trifling quarterages from the children, of whom from forty to fifty are instructed. This parish includes the market town of Ravenglass, which See. Muncaster gives the title of baron to the ancient and noble family of Pennington, an Irish peerage, without a seat in the House of Lords.

MUNDEN (GREAT), a parish in the hundred of BROADWATER, county of HERTFORD, 2 miles (W. by N.) from Puckeridge, containing 515 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Huntingdon, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £21. 9. 7., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas. At Rownay are slight remains of a Benedictine nunnery, founded in honour of St. John the Baptist, by Conan, Duke of Britain and Earl of Richmond, in the reign of Henry II., which falling into decay, through mismanagement, was surrendered in the time of Henry VI., and its possessions appropriated to the maintenance of a chantry priest till the dissolution, when they were valued at £13. 10. 9. per annum.

MUNDEN (LITTLE), a parish in the hundred of BROADWATER, county of HERTFORD, 4 miles (W. by S.) from Puckeridge, containing 464 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Huntingdon, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £15, and in the patronage of Robert Thornton Heysham, Esq. The church is dedicated to All Saints. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. A National school is supported by subscription: the school-house was erected in 1822.

MUNDFORD, a parish in the hundred of GRIMSHOE, county of NORFOLK, 5 miles (N. N. E.) from Brandon-Ferry, containing 397 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £7. 17. 6. Mrs. Newcome was patroness in 1815. The church, dedicated to St. Leonard, is built of flint, having an embattled tower at the west end, with freestone coping and coins: the chancel is separated from the body of the building by a wooden screen, which is surmounted by the royal arms sculptured in stone. The parish is bounded on the north by the river Wissey, which is crossed by a bridge at a short distance from the village.

MUNDHAM, a parish in the hundred of LODDON, county of NORFOLK, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Bungay, containing 304 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, and in the patronage of the Mayor and Corporation of Norwich. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

MUNDHAM (NORTH), a parish in the hundred of Box and STOCKBRIDGE, rape of CHICHESTER, county of SUSSEX, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by S.) from Chichester, containing 422 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £9. 0. 10. W. Brereton, Esq. was patron in 1803. The church has lately received an addition of sixty free sittings, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £50 towards defraying the expense. The Arundel and Portsmouth canal passes through the parish.

MUNDON, a parish in the hundred of DENGIE, county of ESSEX, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E. by S.) from Maldon, containing 309 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Essex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £13, and in the patronage of the King, as Duke of Lancaster. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. The parish is bounded on the north by Blackwater river, which is navigable.

The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £8. 9. 9., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the King, as Duke of Lancaster. The church is dedicated to All Saints. The parish lies on the coast of the North sea, in a cliff near which were found, some years ago, large petrified bones of the elephant, also horns of the moose deer, and other bones of an immense size, supposed to be diluvial remains.

MUNGRISDALE, a chapelry in the parish of GREYSTOCK, LEATH ward, county of CUMBERLAND, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Keswick, containing 236 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Carlisle, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Rector of Greystock. The chapel was rebuilt in 1754. There are quarries of blue slate and flag-stone within the chapelry. John Slee, a member of the Society of Friends, and a distinguished mathematician, was born here; he died at Terril in 1828.

MUNSLEY, a parish in the hundred of RADLOW, county of HEREFORD, 4 miles (N. W.) from Ledbury, containing 182 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £8. 7. 6., and in the patronage of Miss Ann Jones. The church is dedicated to St. Bartholomew.

MUNSLOW, a parish in the hundred of MUNSLOW, county of SALOP, 11 miles (N.) from Ludlow, containing 708 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £21. 15. $2\frac{1}{2}$. The Rev. R. Powell was patron in 1806. The church is dedicated to St.

Michael. Munslow gave birth, in 1589, and the title of baron, in 1640, to Edward Littleton, Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and Keeper of the Great Seal; he died in 1645.

MURCOT, a hamlet in the parish of CHARLTON upon OTMORE, hundred of PLOUGHLEY, county of OXFORD, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from Bicester. The population is returned with Fencot.

MURCOTT, a hamlet in the parish of LONG BUCKBY, hundred of GUILSBOROUGH, county of NORTHAMPTON, 5 miles (N. E. by N.) from Daventry, containing 46 inhabitants.

MURRAH, a township in the parish of GREYSTOCK, LEATH ward, county of CUMBERLAND, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Keswick. The population is returned with the township of Berrier.

MURRELL-GREEN, a tything in the parish and hundred of ODIHAM, Basingstoke division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W.) from Hartford Bridge. The population is returned with the parish.

MURSLEY, a parish in the hundred of COTTESLOE, county of BUCKINGHAM, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by N.) from Winslow, containing, with the hamlet of Salden, 473 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £11. Lord Say and Sele was patron in 1790. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. Mursley had formerly the privilege of a market on Thursday; also two fairs on Assumption day, and on the festival of the Nativity of the Blessed Virgin, but they have been long disused.

MURSTON, a parish in the hundred of MILTON, lathe of SCRAY, county of KENT, 1 mile (E. S. E.) from Milton, containing 141 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £10. 14. 2., and in the patronage of the Rev. Dr. Poore. The church, dedicated to All Saints, is a spacious edifice, with a square western tower and wooden turret. The parish is bounded on the north by the Swale, which separates the Isle of Sheppy from the main land. William Houssin, in 1783, bequeathed £200, directing the interest to be applied in teaching poor children of Bapchild, Murston, and Tonge.

MURTON, otherwise MOOR-TOWN, a township in the parish of LAMPLUGH, ALLERDALE ward above Darwent, county of CUMBERLAND, 8 miles (E. by N.) from Whitehaven. The population is returned with the parish. The manufacture of spades, shovels, and edge-tools is carried on here, and there are several lime-works in the township. A charity school is supported by donations amounting to about £8. 8. per annum.

MURTON, otherwise MOOR-TOWN, a township in the parish of TYNEMOUTH, eastern division of CASTLE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W.) from North Shields, containing 556 inhabitants, who are chiefly employed in the coal mines with which the district abounds. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Freestone is obtained here, and in raising it, a stone coffin, containing a perfect skeleton, was found in one of the quarries, in 1790.

MURTON, a township in the parish of BONGATE, or ST. MICHAEL, APPLEBY, EAST ward, county of WESTMORLAND, 3 miles (E. N. E.) from Appleby, containing 204 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. A school is endowed with about £8 per annum. Some veins of lead-ore are now in operation.

MURTON, a township in the parish of OSBALDWICK, liberty of ST. PETER of YORK, East riding, though locally in the wapentake of Bulmer, North riding, of the county of YORK, 3 miles (E. by N.) from York, containing 134 inhabitants: it is within the peculiar jurisdiction of the Prebendary of Strensall in the Cathedral Church of York.

at great expense levelled the ground, constructed quays, erected numerous buildings, and endeavoured, but unsuccessfully, to establish the packets there. This place has of late years been much resorted to by invalids, on account of the mildness of the climate; there is a ferry to Falmouth, at the distance of half a mile. Within the parish is part of Perran wharf, also a large iron-foundry.

MYNYDDMAEN, a hamlet in the parish of MYNYDDYSLWYN, lower division of the hundred of WENTLLOOG, county of MONMOUTH, containing 511 inhabitants.

MYNYDDYSLWYN, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of WENTLLOOG, county of MONMOUTH, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Newport, containing, with the hamlets of Clawrplwyf, Mynyddmaen, and Penmain, 3186 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaff, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £1800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Llandaff. The church is dedicated to St. Tyder.

MYTHE, an extra-parochial liberty, in the hundred of SPARKENHOE, county of LEICESTER, containing 14 inhabitants.

MYTON upon SWALE, a parish in the wapentake of BULMER, North riding of the county of YORK, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E.) from Boroughbridge, containing 185 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cleveland, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £6, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £300 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Archbishop of York. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a ferry over the Swale at this place. A battle was fought here, in 1319, between the Scots and about ten thousand undisciplined Yorkshiremen, headed by Melton, Archbishop of York, amongst whom was a great number of priests, in which the latter were defeated with immense slaughter.

MYTTON (UPPER), a hamlet in that part of the parish of HARTLEBURY which is in the lower division of the hundred of HALFSHIRE, county of WORCESTER, containing 181 inhabitants.

N.

NABURN, a chapelry in that part of the parish of ACASTER-MALBIS which is in the wapentake of OUZE and DERWENT, East riding of the county of YORK, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.) from York, containing 366 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of St. Denis in York, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. A school is endowed with £10 per annum, £5 having been left by Edward Loftus, in 1784, and £5 by Lady Hewley. The river Ouse bounds this chapelry on the west.

NACKINGTON, a parish in the hundred of BRIDGE and PETHAM, lathe of St. AUGUSTINE, county of KENT, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.) from Canterbury, containing 165 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. The ancient Stane-street passes through the parish.

NACTON, a parish in the hundred of COLNEIS, county of SUFFOLK, 4 miles (S. E.) from Ipswich, containing 527 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, united to that of Levington, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £8. 7. 1. The church is dedicated to St. Martin. The navigable river Orwell runs along the southern boundary of the parish.

NAFFERTON, a township in the parish of Ovingham, eastern division of TINDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 9 miles (E.) from Hexham, containing 39 inhabitants. Coal is obtained within the township. There are vestiges of an old monastic building, said to have been occupied by banditti in the times of Henry VI. and his successor.

NAFFERTON, a parish in the wapentake of DICKERING, East riding of the county of YORK, comprising the townships of Nafferton and Wansford, and containing 1261 inhabitants, of which number, 917 are in the township of Nafferton, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Great Driffeld. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of the East riding, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £13. 15. 4., endowed with £400 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Archbishop of York. The church is dedicated to All Saints. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. Rope, twine, and linen-cloth, are manufactured here. John Baron, in 1709, gave a rent-charge of £5, for teaching children.

NAFFORD, formerly a parish, but now in the parish of ECKINGTON, upper division of the hundred of PERSHORE, county of WORCESTER. The church, which was dedicated to St. James, has been demolished, and the living consolidated with that of Eckington.

NAILSEA, a parish in the hundred of PORTBURY, county of SOMERSET, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Bristol, containing 1678 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Bath, and diocese of Bath and Wells, and in the patronage of Adam Gordon, Esq. The church is dedicated to the Holy Trinity. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. In this parish are extensive coal-works, and a manufactory for crown glass upon a very large scale, which together give employment to a great portion of the inhabitants.

NAILSTONE, a parish in the hundred of SPARKENHOE, county of LEICESTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Market Bosworth, containing, with the chapelry of Normanton le Heath, 574 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Leicester, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £24. 9. $9\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to All Saints. Nailstone is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s.

NAILSWORTH, a chapelry partly in the parishes of HORSLEY and MINCHIN-HAMPTON, but chiefly in that of AVENING, hundred of LONGTREE, county of GLOUCESTER, 2 miles (S. W. by W.) from Minchin-Hampton, containing 898 inhabitants. This place is situated in the centre of a district in which the manufacture of woollen cloth is carried on to a considerable extent, and for which the numerous brooks and rivulets that abound are extremely favourable. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists. A small customary market is held on Saturday.

NANTWICH, a parish in the hundred of NANTWICH, county palatine of CHESTER, comprising the market town of Nantwich, and the townships of Alvas-ton, Leighton, and Woolstanwood, and containing 5333 inhabitants, of which number, 4661 are in the town of Nantwich, 20 miles (S. E. by E.) from Chester, and 164 (N. W.) from London, on the road to Chester. The origin of this town, which is of uncertain date, has been attributed to the Britons prior to the Roman invasion, when it is said to have been called Halen Gwyn, the white salt town: its modern appellation is probably a compound of the British term Nant, a brook, or marsh, and the Saxon Vic, by corruption Wich, a vill, or settlement, which latter term appears indefinitely to be appropriated to towns where salt is made. Previously to the Conquest, the importance of this place consisted in its numerous brine springs, which became an ample source of revenue to the King and Earl Edwin, between whom, according to the record of Domesday, the district was at that period unequally divided: it was soon after erected into a barony by Hugh Lupus, the first Norman Earl of Chester, who conferred it, together with the whole hundred, on William Malbedeng, or Malbank, and in consequence thereof the town was for some time denominated Wich Malbank. At the time of the Norman invasion, Nantwich was defended by a line of earth-works constructed along the bank of the river, but the opposition made to the progress of the invaders was terminated by a battle fought here in 1069: the inhabitants then became subject to the incursions of the Welch, who are said to have destroyed the town in 1133. In 1146, a predatory band of that people was routed here, on returning from one of their plundering inroads; and in 1282 Edward I. came hither, to concert measures of protection for the inhabitants from similar annoyance. On the return of James I. from Scotland, in 1617, he was received here with demonstrations of joy; but during the subsequent disastrous reign, the town was remarkable for its firm adherence to the cause of the parliament, and was garrisoned in its behalf: in 1642 it was captured by the royalists, but soon after was retaken by Sir W. Brereton, who fortified and made it his headquarters. Sir Thomas Aston made an effort to dislodge him, but this attempt, as well as a regular investment and vigorous assault of the town by Lord Byron, about the close of the year 1643, proved unsuccessful; and Sir Thomas Fairfax having defeated the royalists in the neighbourhood of Nantwich, the siege was raised, and the parliamentarians held the town during the remainder of the war. The anniversary of this victory, the 25th of January, was for many years afterwards esteemed a kind of festival, and the event was commemorated by the inhabitants wearing sprigs of holly in their hats. On the defeat of the Scottish army in 1646, the Duke of Hamilton, with three thousand and fifty cavalry, found a temporary refuge here. In 1438 and 1583, the town suffered severely from fire; the injury sustained in the latter year was estimated at upwards of £30,000, and a royal license was granted for a general collection for its renovation. Other calamities have at different periods befallen the inhabitants, such as the ague in 1587, the flux in 1596, and the plague in 1604, which severally produced considerable mortality: on the cessation of the last disease, the court of assize was removed hither from Chester, where that infectious malady still prevailed.

The town is situated on the banks of the river Weever, in a level and fertile tract of country: it is irregularly built, and consists of three principal streets, which are very indifferently paved; most of the houses are of timber and brick, covered with plaster, having large bay windows and projecting stories, but some, of modern erection, are of respectable appearance: the inhabitants enjoy a plentiful supply of water. There is a small theatre, also an assembly-room. Throughout a long period, the brine springs were a source of extensive commerce: during the conflicts between Henry III. and the Welch, that sovereign imposed a temporary restraint on the manufacture, in order to harrass his opponents, who carried on an extensive traffic in salt, but on the restoration of peace it was resumed. In the time of Henry VIII. there were three hundred salt-works, but this number, from the destruction of several by fire, and the discovery of springs and mines of superior quality elsewhere, where the facility of communication by water was greater, has been gradually reduced, until only one spring remains. In the time of Elizabeth and James, the tanning business, and the manufacture of bone-lace and stockings, prevailed somewhat extensively, but they have been long superseded by that of shoes, chiefly for the London and Manchester markets, gloves, and cotton goods, which afford employment to about two thousand persons. Cheese is the principal article of agricultural produce. A canal from Chester, terminating about a quarter of a mile from the town, was completed in 1778, at an expense of about £80,000; and the construction of another, to be called the Liverpool and Birmingham junction canal, is in progress. In 1734, an act was obtained for making the Weever navigable, but the design has never been carried into effect: the first stone bridge across the river here, in lieu of the original one of timber, was built in 1663. The market is on Saturday; and fairs, chiefly for cattle, sheep, and pigs, are held on March 26th, the second Tuesday in June, September 4th, and December 4th; a market for cattle also is held once a fortnight, from Candlemas until the fair in March. The civil government of the town was anciently vested in a guild, whose common hall was the present school-house: during its existence, a bailiff and various other officers were regularly appointed: the fraternity was suppressed in the time of Edward VI.; the nomination of the bailiff, however, at the court leet of the lord of the manor, continued to be observed for a few years, but has long since been abandoned. A manorial court, and a court for the hundred, are held by the Marquis of Cholmondeley; at the former constables are chosen. Petty sessions for the hundred are also held here: the general quarter sessions, formerly held at Nantwich, were removed to Knutsford about 1760. Lord Crewe, as proprietor of certain fees of the ancient barony, holds a manorial court, at which a few of the inhabitants render suit and service; and a similar court is annexed to the fee granted by Hugh Malbanck to the abbot of Combermere, and now in the possession of Lord Dysart. A court of requests, for the recovery of debts under 40s., is held under the presidency of an officer appointed by the joint lords of the manor: the inhabitants are exempted from being impannelled on juries beyond the jurisdiction of the town. The town hall was built in 1720, by George, Prince of Wales and Earl of Chester, afterwards George II., at an expense of £600; but, in 1737, a portion of it fell down, and a few persons were killed: it was rebuilt, but not many years afterwards, a similar accident being apprehended from a sudden crash heard during the holding of the sessions, it was taken down, and a modern edifice, used as a market-house and town hall, has been erected on its site.

The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Lord Crewe. The church, dedicated to St. Mary and St. Nicholas, is a spacious and venerable cruciform structure, principally in the decorated and later styles of English architecture, and comprising a nave, with lateral aisles, a chancel, transepts, and an ornamented octagonal tower rising from the intersection: the chancel has a groined roof, and contains stalls with carved subsellia, and enriched with tabernacle work: under the north-eastern angle of the arches which support the tower is a stone pulpit projecting from the piers, neatly carved in the ancient style of English architecture: the church contains several ancient monuments. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists, and Unitarians. The grammar school, an ancient edifice in the churchyard, was vested in the crown at the suppression of the ancient guild to which it belonged, and subsequently purchased for its present purpose: it was endowed, in 1611, with a small sum, the joint benefactions of John and Thomas Thrush, natives of this town, and woolpackers in the city of London, for which a limited number of boys are educated. The Blue-cap school has been endowed with various benefactions, principally by the family of Wilbraham, of Townsend, for the education and clothing of forty boys. An almshouse for six poor men was founded, in 1613, by Sir Roger Wilbraham, and endowed by Lady Wilbraham with £12 per annum; another for the same number, by Sir Edmund Wright, in 1638: an almshouse for four poor men and their wives was founded, in 1722, by Mrs. Ermine Delves; one by Roger Wilbraham, Esq., in 1676; and one for seven poor persons, in 1767, by John Crewe, Esq. (afterwards Lord Crewe), in accordance with the will of Sir Thomas and Sir John Crewe: the inmates of these respective hospitals receive stipends proportioned to the endowments. The ancient castle, erected here by the first Norman baron, was in ruins prior to the reign of Henry VII., and its site alone is now visible. Thomas Harrison, a major-general in the parliamentary army, and one of the judges at the trial of Charles I.; John Gerarde, the herbalist, born in 1545; and Geoffrey Witney, a minor poet in the reign of Elizabeth, were natives of this town. The widow of the poet Milton was born in the vicinity, where she spent the latter period of her life, and died, at an advanced age, in the year 1726. The Marquis of Cholmondeley enjoys the inferior title of Baron Cholmondeley of Namptwich.

NAPPA, a township in the parish of GISBURN, western division of the wapentake of STAINCLIFFE and EWCROSS, West riding of the county of YORK, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.S.E.) from Settle, containing 44 inhabitants.

NAPTON on the HILL, a parish in the Southam division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, county of WARWICK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by S.) from Southam, containing 892 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Coventry, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £9. 14., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to All Saints. There is a place of worship for Baptists. The Oxford canal and the Warwick and Napton canal form a junction in this parish.

NARBOROUGH, a parish in the hundred of SPARKENHOE, county of LEICESTER, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Leicester, containing, with the hamlet of Huncote, 1064 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Leicester, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £26. 14. $4\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of John Pares, Esq. The church is dedicated to All Saints. There is a place of worship for Independents. The river Soar runs through the parish, and is crossed by a bridge on the line of the old Fosse-road.

NARBURGH, a parish in the southern division of the hundred of GREENHOE, county of NORFOLK, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.W. by W.) from Swaffham, containing 294 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, with which that of Narford is united, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £9. 10. The Rev. H. Spelman was patron in 1799. The church, dedicated to All Saints, originally an ancient structure, has at various times received more modern additions and improvements: it contains some ancient monuments to the family of Spelman. Narburgh, so called by the Saxons, from the river Nar, was a British city in the fifth century, and subsequently, when governed by Earl Oke-nard, it endured a long siege by Waldy, a neighbouring chieftain, who took it and razed it to the ground. There are several earth-works and intrenchments denoting its antiquity, particularly a large fosse and rampart running hence, from an artificial eminence called the Burgh, to Eastmore Fen, which completely defended the western boundary of the hundred: human bones, pieces of armour, &c., have been found here.

NARFORD, a parish in the southern division of the hundred of GREENHOE, county of NORFOLK, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W.) from Swaffham, containing 129 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, with that of Narburgh, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 4. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. This seems to have been a Roman station, from the bricks, urns, and other relics that have been discovered.

NASEBY, a parish in the hundred of GUILDSBOROUGH, county of NORTHAMPTON, $11\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Northampton, containing 697 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £8, endowed with £32. 12. per annum private benefaction, £800 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant. The King, by lapse, presented in 1783. The church is dedicated to All Saints. The river Avon has its source in the village, where a market-cross is still standing, this having been formerly a market town. In the vicinity was fought, June 14th, 1645, the decisive battle between the royalists and the army of the parliament, in which the former were irretrievably defeated.

NASH, a hamlet in the parish of WHADDON, hundred of COTTESLOE, county of BUCKINGHAM, 5 miles (S. by W.) from Stony-Stratford, containing 375 inhabitants. Here are two endowed almshouses.

NASH, a joint township with Rod and Little Brampton, in that part of the parish of PRESTEIGNE which is in the hundred of WIGMORE, county of HEREFORD, 2 miles (S. by W.) from Presteigne. The population is returned with Rod.

NASH, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of CALDICOTT, county of MONMOUTH, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by S.) from Newport, containing 233 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, united with that of Goldcliff, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaff, rated in the king's books at £9. 15., and endowed with £1200 royal bounty. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

NASH, a joint township with Tilsop and Weston, in the parish of BURFORD, hundred of OVERS, county of SALOP, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Tenbury, containing, with Tilsop and Weston, 377 inhabitants.

NASSINGTON, a parish in the hundred of WILLYBROOK, county of NORTHAMPTON, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Wandsford, containing 555 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Prebendary of Nassington in the Cathedral Church of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £7. 13. 4. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

NATEBY, a township in the parish of GARSTANG, hundred of AMOUNDERNESS, county palatine of LANCASTER, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N. N. W.) from Garstang, containing 406 inhabitants.

NATEBY, a township in the parish of KIRKBY-STEPHEN, EAST ward, county of WESTMORLAND, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S.) from Kirkby-Stephen, containing 140 inhabitants. — Clayton, in 1786, gave a sum of money, now producing about £6 per annum, which, with some smaller benefactions, is applied in teaching poor children. The township is bounded on the west by the river Eden, which here forms a tremendous cataract, dashing with great violence and noise from rock to rock. There is a lofty fell, about two miles and a half east of the village, called the Nine Standards, from some stones erected there to mark the boundary of the counties of York and Westmorland.

NATELEY (UP), a parish in the hundred of BASINGSTOKE, Basingstoke division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Odiham, containing 143 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Basingstoke, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester. The church is dedicated to St. Stephen.

NATELEY-SCURES, a parish in the hundred of BASINGSTOKE, Basingstoke division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Basingstoke, containing 245 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £5. 10. 10. Lord Dorchester was patron in 1819. The church is dedicated to St. Swithin.

NATLAND, a chapelry in that part of the parish of KENDAL which is in KENDAL ward, county of WESTMORLAND, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.) from Kendal, containing 244 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Kendal. The chapel was rebuilt about 1735, but taken down in 1825, and the present edifice built near its site, at an expense of £550, defrayed by contributions, aided by a grant of £100 from the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels. The river Kent, and the Lancaster canal, run through the parish. Water Crook, a place so called from a bend in the river, was the site of the Roman station Concangium, a square fort, the ramparts of which are still discernible, where foundations of buildings, coins, seals, fragments of altars, statues, and urns, with other relics, have been found. A school is endowed with £40 a year, the income arising from Crow Park estate, given by Charles Shippards, in 1779, for the education of children.

NATTON, a joint tything with Fiddington, in the parish of ASHCURCH, lower division of the hundred of TEWKESBURY, county of GLOUCESTER, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E.) from Tewkesbury. The population is returned with Fiddington.

NAUGHTON, a parish in the hundred of COSFORD, county of SUFFOLK, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E.) from Bildeston, containing 155 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Sudbury, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £10. 15. The Rev. W. Edge was patron in 1810. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

NAUNTON, a hamlet in the parish of WINCHCOMBE, lower division of the hundred of KIFTSGATE, county of GLOUCESTER. The population is returned with the parish.

NAUNTON, a parish partly in the hundred of BRADLEY, but chiefly in the lower division of the hundred of SLAUGHTER, county of GLOUCESTER, 5 miles (W. S. W.) from Stow on the Wold, containing, with the chapelry of Eastington, and the hamlets of Aylworth and Harford, 691 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £16. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Worcester. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

NAUNTON-BEAUCHAMP, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of PERSHORE, county of WORCESTER, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Pershore, containing 149 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, rated in the king's books at £15, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Bartholomew.

NAVENBY, a parish (formerly a market town) in the higher division of the wapentake of BOOTHBY-GRAFFO, parts of KESTIVEN, county of LINCOLN, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Sleaford, and 120 (N. by W.) from London, containing 625 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £17. 10., and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Christ's College, Cambridge. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, is partly in the early English, and partly in the decorated, style of architecture. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The market, which was held on Thursday, has fallen into disuse. There is a trifling endowment for teaching nine poor children.

NAVESTOCK, a parish in the hundred of ONGAR, county of ESSEX, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Chipping-Ongar, containing 840 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's, London, rated in the king's books at £13. 3. 9., and in the patronage of the President and Fellows of Trinity College, Oxford. The church is dedicated to St. Thomas the Apostle.

NAWORTH, a township in the parish of BRAMPTON, ESKDALE ward, county of CUMBERLAND, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Brampton, containing 377 inhabitants. Within this township is Naworth castle, anciently the head of the great barony of Gilsland. It is situated in a fine park, overlooking the river Irthing, which bounds it on the north, and is a spacious quadrangular structure, with two lofty towers. The hall is a noble room, containing paintings of some of the kings of Scotland; in another apartment is a full-length likeness of Mary I.; and in the chapel, a profusion of ancient armour, with portraits of the Patriarchs and some of the Kings of Israel, &c.

NAWTON, a township in that part of the parish of KIRKDALE which is in the wapentake of RYEDALE, North riding of the county of YORK, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E.) from Helmsley, containing 333 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

NAYLAND, a parish (formerly a market town) in the hundred of BABERGH, county of SUFFOLK, 17 miles (S. W. by W.) from Ipswich, and 57 (N. E.) from London, containing 1019 inhabitants. The town is situated on the river Stour, over which is a bridge of brick, in a fertile valley surrounded by hills, on the high road to Hadleigh: it consists of several streets, the principal of which contains some good dwelling-houses, and has three large flour-mills in the centre: the inhabitants are supplied with water from springs: the adjacent eminences command a fine view of the harbour of Harwich and the surrounding country. The woollen manufacture flourished here for many years, but is now extinct, and, at present, the trade of the town is chiefly in flour. The river is navigable from Sudbury to Harwich, by which means a considerable quantity of corn and flour is conveyed to Mistley, for the port of London, and coal is brought back. The market, now discontinued, was on Friday: a fair is held on the first Wednesday in October, for horses, cattle, and toys. A court leet is held twice a year, at which the steward of the manor presides. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Sudbury, and diocese of Norwich, endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Parishioners. The church, dedicated to St. James, is situated in the centre of the town, and is a fine structure in the later style of English architecture: in the interior is a good painting of our Saviour, and several ancient marble monuments inlaid with brass. There is a place of worship for Independents. A small fund, arising from the rent of certain lands, is appropriated to the instruction of about fourteen poor children: it is under the management of feoffees. A National school, for all poor children residing in the parish, is supported by annual subscriptions; as is also a Sunday school in connexion with the established church. There are several houses belonging to the parish, in which poor families live rent-free.

NAZEING, a parish in the hundred of WALTHAM, county of ESSEX, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W.) from Epping, containing 744 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the jurisdiction of the Commissary of London, concurrently with the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of London, rated in the king's books at £14. 5. 5., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to All Saints. At the eastern extremity of the parish are vestiges of an ancient fortification, supposed to be British, called Ambersbank. The learned Dr. Joseph Hall, Bishop of Norwich, was at one time vicar of this parish; as was subsequently Dr. Thomas Fuller, the church historian.

NEASHAM, or NYSAM, a township in the parish of HURWORTH, south-western division of STOCKTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Darlington, containing 313 inhabitants, who are chiefly employed in the linen manufacture. The village consists of one street, extending some distance along the northern bank of the Tees, over which, at this point, there are a ferry and a ford: the latter is noted as the spot selected for the performance of a long-accustomed ceremony, in which, when the river is fordable, the lord of Sockburn, or his agent, meeting the Bishop of Durham, on his first entering the county, and presenting him with a falchion, as an emblem of his temporal power, repeats as follows; "My Lord Bishop, I here present you with the falchion wherewith the champion Conyers slew the worm dragon, or fiery serpent, which destroyed man, woman, and child; in memory of which, the king then reigning gave him the manor of Sockburn, to hold by this tenure, that upon the first entrance of every bishop into the county, this falchion should be presented." The bishop, taking the falchion in his hand, immediately returns it, wishing the lord of Sockburn health and long enjoyment of the manor. A Benedictine nunnery, founded in honour of the Blessed Virgin, formerly existed here, which at the dissolution had a revenue of £26. 9. 9.

NEATESHEAD, a parish in the hundred of TUNSTEAD, county of NORFOLK, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. by S.) from Coltishall, containing 576 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £3. 13. $1\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Norwich. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, has been long without a steeple. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

NEATHAM, an extra-parochial liberty, in the hundred of ALTON, Alton (North) division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 2 miles (E.) from Alton, containing 92 inhabitants.

NECTON, a parish in the southern division of the hundred of GREENHOE, county of NORFOLK, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E.) from Swaffham, containing 867 inhabitants. The living comprises a rectory and a vicarage, which are consolidated, and annexed to the rectory of Holme-Hale, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, the former rated in the king's books at £8. 6. 8., and the latter at £8. 1. 8. The church is dedicated to All Saints. A free chapel formerly stood at Sparham Hall. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

NEDGING, a parish in the hundred of COSFORD, county of SUFFOLK, 1 mile (S. E.) from Bildeston, containing 203 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Sudbury, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £8. 12. 11., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £300 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Rev. William Edge. The river Brent passes through the parish.

NEEDHAM, a parish in the hundred of EARSHAM, county of NORFOLK, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (S. W.) from Harleston, containing 351 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of—Fres-ton, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, was originally a chapel to Mendham.

NEEDHAM-MARKET, a chapelry (formerly a market town) in the parish of BARKING, hundred of BOSMERE and CLAYDON, county of SUFFOLK, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Ipswich, and 74 (N. E.) from London, containing 1300 inhabitants. The town is situated on low ground near the river Stour, and on the high road to Ipswich and Bury St. Edmund's: it is tolerably well built, and the houses are neat, and many of them handsome: the inhabitants are supplied with water from springs: the surrounding country is pleasant, and abounds in agreeable walks. Near the town is a lake, between thirty and forty acres in extent, called Bosmere, which gives name to the hundred. The trade formerly consisted in wool-combing, and weaving calimancoes, which has long since ceased; the manufacture of paper and glue is of considerable extent. The Stow-Market and Ipswich navigation passes along the north-east boundary of the parish, and is crossed by a bridge leading from the town; and the Stour is navigable to Ipswich, being used chiefly for the conveyance of corn and coal. The market, formerly held on Wednesday, was removed to Stow-Market, in consequence of the plague having raged here for three years: a fair for toys is held on the 28th of October. Constables are appointed at the court leet and baron of the lord of the manor, held annually, and oftener as occasion may require. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Rector of Barking: the inhabitants, from time immemorial, have had the right of electing a lecturer. The chapel, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, is an ancient edifice, with a belfry of wood. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends and Independents. The free grammar school was founded pursuant to the will of Francis Theobald, Esq., dated January 10th, 1632, and endowed by him with estates subsequently conveyed to trustees, and now producing a rental of £55 per annum: the master's salary is £50, with a dwelling-house; twenty-one poor children from Needham-Market, Barking, and Darmsden, are instructed. An almshouse, comprising two tenements, was founded, by some person unknown, for the benefit of poor widows and widowers, and endowed with land now producing about £20 per annum: eight poor women reside in it.

NEEDINGWORTH, a chapelry in the parish of HOLYWELL, hundred of HURSTINGSTONE, county of HUNTINGDON, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. by N.) from St. Ives. The population is returned with the parish. The chapel, which was dedicated to St. James, has been demolished. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

NEEDWOOD-FOREST, a district in the northern division of the hundred of OFFLOW, county of STAF-

FORD, formerly extra-parochial, but now included in the several parishes to which it was allotted for enclosure, viz. Hanbury, Tatenhill, Tutbury, and Yoxhall. This forest, in its ancient state, was divided into five districts, called Barton Ward, Marchington Ward, Tutbury Ward, Yoxhall Ward, and Uttoxeter Ward, and included thirteen parks, which were given to the earls of Mercia. It was about twenty three miles and a half in compass, and the nearest part of it was one mile from the castle of Tutbury. The kings of England often enjoyed the diversion of hunting here, down to the time of Charles I., who disafforested a great portion of the district, by selling and granting away various parts of it. In 1797, it consisted of the four first-named wards only, each having its separate lodge and keeper, and then comprised nearly ten thousand acres; but it was subsequently enclosed by act of parliament, the bill for that purpose having received the royal assent in 1801: up to that period, it having been extra-parochial, no less than twenty-two neighbouring townships had right of pasturage upon it, independently of a numerous herd of deer belonging to the king. At the enclosure, an allotment of land was made to each of the above-mentioned parishes, and, from that reserved to the crown, timber valued at £60,000 was sold; and upwards of sixty miles of road were formed in various directions throughout its extent. The crown still possesses a considerable portion of it, chiefly woodland, for the preservation of deer, &c. It is under the superintendence of a lieutenant, chief ranger, and other officers, viz., a surveyor, or axe-bearer, four keepers, &c. The king's steward of the honour of Tutbury holds an annual court for the forest, called the woodmote, at which these officers attend, and a jury of twenty-four men, residing within the jurisdiction, present and amerce for all encroachments and offences committed therein. This fine tract now contains many elegant mansions, with extensive parks, &c., the property of individuals vying with each other in efforts to render their possessions at once beautiful and of public utility. A church, called Christchurch in Needwood, was erected from funds left by Isaac Hawkins, Esq., and consecrated in 1809: it is a handsome structure, situated at an equal distance from each of the parish churches, of which the living is independent, being a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Stafford, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, endowed, by his late Majesty, George III., with one hundred and sixty acres of the forest land, and in the patronage of the Crown.

NEEN-SAVAGE, a parish in the hundred of STOTTESDEN, county of SALOP, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (N. by E.) from Cleobury Mortimer, containing 485 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £6, and in the patronage of the Crown. A school is endowed with upwards of £39. 4. per annum, arising from a bequest by Richard Edwards.

NEEN-SOLLARS, a parish in the hundred of OVERS, county of SALOP, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. by W.) from Cleobury-Mortimer, containing 231 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with the curacy of Milson, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £13. 9. $9\frac{1}{2}$, and in the patronage of the Provost and Fellows of Worcester College, Oxford. The church, dedicated to All Saints, contains a monument to the memory of Humphrey Conyngsby, Esq., who was born about 1567, an accomplished scholar, and great traveller. The small river Rea, and the Kington canal, run through the parish.

NEENTON, a parish in the hundred of STOTTESDEN, county of SALOP, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Bridgenorth, containing 119 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £5. 3. $6\frac{1}{2}$, and in the patronage of the Inhabitants. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

NEITHROP, a hamlet in the parish and hundred of BANBURY, county of OXFORD, $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile (W. N. W.) from Banbury, containing 1851 inhabitants: it is within the jurisdiction of the peculiar court of Banbury, belonging to the Dean and Chapter of Lincoln.

NEMPNETT-THRUBWELL, a parish in the hundred of KEYNSHAM, county of SOMERSET, 9 miles (N. E. by E.) from Axbridge, containing 264 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Compton-Martin, in the archdeaconry of Bath, and diocese of Bath and Wells. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. Within the parish is a large tumulus, of an oval form, the finest in the kingdom, on opening which in 1789, it was found to contain two rows of cells, running from south to north, formed by immense stones set edgeways, and covered with others of still larger dimensions. Skulls, a vast heap of bones, and other relics, having been discovered, it is conjectured to have been a work of the Druids, and to be the cemetery belonging to their great temple at Stanton-Drew, three miles off. An old mansion, in this parish, called Reghillbury, where Sir William Wyndham spent the period of his retirement from public life, is supposed to have been once a royal palace.

NEOT (ST.), a parish in WEST hundred, county of CORNWALL, 5 miles (N. W. by W.) from Liskeard, containing 1255 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £9. 1. $0\frac{1}{2}$. The Rev. R. G. Grylls was patron in 1793. The church is an elegant structure, and the windows exhibit some remains of the legend of St. Neot and other saints, in ancient stained glass. Here are the ruins of a chapel, dedicated to St. Luke; also the site of a monastery, or college, founded in honour of St. Neotus, brother to King Alfred, who was buried here. John Austis, Esq., a distinguished herald and antiquary, was born in this parish, in 1699.

NEOTS (ST.), a market town and parish in the hundred of TOSELAND, county of HUNTINGDON, 9 miles (S. S. W.) from Huntingdon, and 56 (N. N. W.) from London, containing 2272 inhabitants. The name of this place is derived from St. Neot, a learned Christian missionary, whose body was transferred hither from Neot stock in Cornwall, and in honour of whom a monastery was founded here, which was subsequently endowed, by Earl Leofric, as a priory of monks subordinate to Ely: about 1113, it became a cell to the abbey of Bec in Normandy, but, being afterwards made independent, it existed till the time of Henry VIII., when its revenue was £256. 1. $3\frac{1}{4}$. After the death of Charles I., the Earl of Holland took up arms here in favour of the royal cause, but was eventually defeated, in July 1648, and, being subsequently taken prisoner at St. Ives, he suffered on the scaffold. The town is situated on the east bank of the river Ouse, over which is a stone bridge of one central arch, with two smaller ones over the stream, and six others forming a causeway over the low lands adjoining: it consists of three principal streets, and, from its low situation, is exposed to occasional inundations, which have sometimes rendered it necessary to navigate the streets; the back streets are usually flooded every year to the depth of from one to two feet. The manufacture of paper is carried on to a considerable extent, by means of patent machinery introduced by Mons. Fourdrinier, in a mill upon the river Ouse, which is navigable from Bedford to Lynn, and furnishes the means of conveyance for corn, coal, wine, iron, timber, and grocery: the market, held under a grant from Henry I., is on Thursday, for corn; and there are fairs on Holy Thursday, that day three weeks, and December 17th, and a statute fair for hiring servants on the 1st of August: the market-place is very spacious and convenient. A manorial court is held annually. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Huntingdon, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £10, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a remarkably fine specimen of the later style of English architecture, with an elegant tower; in the interior is a fine timber roof, also some ancient screen-work. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyan Methodists. A free school was founded and endowed with the interest of £100, bequeathed by Loftus Hatley, in 1736, which was augmented by Alderman Newton, of Leicester, and others, for the clothing and educating of thirty-five poor boys.

NEPICAR, a township in the parish and hundred of WROTHAM, lathe of AYLESFORD, county of KENT, 1 mile (E. by S.) from Wrotham, with which the population is returned.

NESBIT, a township in the parish of MONK-HESLETON, southern division of EASINGTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, 12 miles (N.) from Stockton upon Tees, containing 9 inhabitants.

NESBIT, a township in the parish of STAMFORDHAM, north-eastern division of TINDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 11 miles (W.N.W.) from Newcastle upon Tyne, containing 38 inhabitants.

NESBITT, a township in the parish of DODDINGTON, eastern division of GLENDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 3½ miles (N.) from Wooler, containing 52 inhabitants.

NESFIELD, a joint township with Langbar, in that part of the parish of ILKLEY which is in the upper division of the wapentake of CLARO, West riding of the county of YORK, 7¼ miles (W.N.W.) from Otley, containing, with Langbar, 210 inhabitants.

NESS, a township in the parish of GREAT NESTON, higher division of the hundred of WIRRAL, county palatine of CHESTER, 1¼ mile (S. S. E.) from Great Neston, containing 394 inhabitants.

NESS (EAST), a township in the parish of STONEGRAVE, wapentake of RYEDALE, North riding of the county of YORK, 6¼ miles (S. E. by E.) from Helmsley, containing 59 inhabitants.

NESS (GREAT), a parish in the hundred of PIMHILL, county of SALOP, 7½ miles (N.W. by W.) from Shrewsbury, containing, with the chapelry of Little Ness, 833 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £9, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew. At Nesscliff there was formerly a chapel, dedicated to St. Mary, the site of which is now occupied by the parish school, which was founded by William Parry, in 1767, and is supported by several small bequests subsequently made. Near it is a remarkable cave, the ascent to which is by a very steep flight of steps. The interior is divided into two apartments by a massive pillar of the rock, upon which is carved the date 1564, and H. K., the initials of the name of the celebrated outlaw, Humphrey Kynaston, son of Sir Roger Kynaston, of Hordley, who, having contracted enormous debts, and suffered his mansion, Middle castle, to fall into decay, is stated to have sheltered himself in this cave, leading an eccentric life, and committing various depredations in the neighbourhood. The parish contains fine red freestone, of which it is said the castle, abbey, walls, and other buildings, in Shrewsbury were composed.

NESS (LITTLE), a chapelry in the parish of GREAT NESTON, hundred of PIMHILL, county of SALOP, 8 miles (N. W.) from Shrewsbury, containing 253 inhabitants.

NESS (WEST), a township in the parish of STONEGRAVE, wapentake of RYEDALE, North riding of the county of YORK, 6 miles (S. E. by E.) from Helmsley, containing 65 inhabitants.

NESTON (GREAT), a parish in the higher division of the hundred of WIRRAL, county palatine of CHESTER, comprising the market town of Great Neston, and the townships of Ledsham, Leighton, Ness, Little Neston, Raby, Thornton-Mayow, and Willaston, and containing 3216 inhabitants, of which number, 1418 are in the market town of Great Neston, 11 miles (N. W.) from Chester, and 191¼ (N.W.) from London. The town is pleasantly situated on the south-west side of a peninsula, formed by the æstuaries of the rivers Dee and Mersey, and derives its chief support from visitors, during the summer months, for the benefit of bathing: races are held on Whit-Monday and the two following days. The canal between the Mersey and the Dee passes near this town. The market is on Friday; and fairs are held, February 2nd, May 29th, and September 29th, for cattle. A court leet and baron is held annually; a court for the recovery of debts throughout the hundred of Wirral, every month; and petty sessions. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £11. 5., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Chester. The church is dedicated to St. Mary and St. Helen. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. A National school is supported by voluntary contributions; and there is a savings bank.

NESTON (LITTLE), a township in the parish of GREAT NESTON, higher division of the hundred of WIRRAL, county palatine of CHESTER, 1 mile (S. E.) from Great Neston, containing 316 inhabitants.

NESWICK, a township in the parish of NORTH DALTON, Bainton-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, East riding of the county of YORK, 5½ miles (S.W.) from Great Driffield, containing 55 inhabitants.

NETHERAVON, a parish in the hundred of ELSTUB and EVERLEY, county of WILTS, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Amesbury, containing, with the tything of Chisenbury, 464 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Prebendary of Netheravon in the Cathedral Church of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £13. 6. 8. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

NETHERBURY, a parish in the hundred of BEAMINSTER-FORUM and REDHONE, Bridport division of the county of DORSET, 2 miles (S.S.W.) from Beaminster, comprising the tythings of Aish, Bowood, Melplash, and Netherbury, and containing 1954 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage with Beaminster, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Prebendary of Netherbury in the Cathedral Church of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £41. 15. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is in the later style of English architecture. There was formerly a chapel of ease at Mangerton, in this parish, which has long been desecrated and in ruins. A great quantity of cider is made in the parish. There is an endowment for a free grammar school, left by an unknown benefactor.

NETHERBY, a township in the parish of ARTHUR-RET, ESKDALE ward, county of CUMBERLAND, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.N.E.) from Longtown, containing 490 inhabitants. There are some trifling donations for the support of a charity school. Here was a Roman station of considerable importance, connected with the Picts' wall by a direct road, but its name has not been clearly ascertained: foundations of streets extending to the river Esk denote its site, and a large collection of Roman coins, altars, fragments of domestic utensils, &c., there discovered, is deposited in Netherby Hall.

NETHERBY, a joint township with Kirkby, in the parish of KIRKBY-OVERBLOWS, upper division of the wapentake of CLARO, West riding of the county of YORK, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Wetherby. The population is returned with Kirkby.

NETHERCOTE, a hamlet in the parish of WARKWORTH, hundred of KING'S SUTTON, county of NORTHAMPTON, 2 miles (E.) from Banbury. The population is returned with the parish.

NETHER-EXE, a parish in the hundred of HAYRIDGE, county of DEVON, 5 miles (N. by E.) from Exeter, containing 103 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Exeter, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £500 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Earl of Ilchester and the Hon. Percy Wyndham. The river Exe bounds the parish on the west.

NETHERMORE, a joint tything with Tytherton-Stanley, in the parish and hundred of CHIPPENHAM, county of WILTS, 2 miles (E. by S.) from Chippenham. The population is returned with Tytherton-Stanley.

NETHERTON, a township in the parish of BEDLINGTON, eastern division of CHESTER ward, county palatine of DURHAM, though locally on the east side of the county of Northumberland, 4 miles (S.E.) from Morpeth. The population is returned with the parish. Coal is obtained here.

NETHERTON, a township in the parish of SEPH-TON, hundred of WEST DERBY, county palatine of LANCASTER, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Liverpool, containing 186 inhabitants.

VOL. III.

NETHERTON, a chapelry in the parish of CROPTHORN, middle division of the hundred of OSWALDSLOW, county of WORCESTER, 4 miles (W.S.W.) from Evesham, containing 106 inhabitants. A chapel is now being erected, the former one having gone to ruin. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

NETHERTON-NORTH-SIDE, a township in the parish of ALLENTON, western division of COQUETDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N.W.) from Rothbury, containing 54 inhabitants.

NETHERTON-SOUTH-SIDE, a township in the parish of ALLENTON, western division of COQUETDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, containing 71 inhabitants.

NETHER-WASDALE, county of CUMBERLAND.—See WASDALE (NETHER).

NETSWELL, or NETTESWELL, a parish in the hundred of HARLOW, county of ESSEX, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.W.) from Harlow, containing 306 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the jurisdiction of the Commissary of Essex and Herts, concurrently with the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of London, rated in the king's books at £13. 6. 8. The King, by reason of lunacy, presented in 1821. William Martin, in 1710, left certain bank stock, producing about £40 per annum, for erecting and endowing a school for ten boys and ten girls.

NETTLEBED, a parish in the hundred of EWELME, county of OXFORD, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.W. by W.) from Henley upon Thames, containing 545 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, with that of Pishill, in the jurisdiction of the peculiar court of Dorchester, and in the patronage of — Stoner, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Bartholomew.

NETTLECOMBE, a tything in the parish and liberty of POORSTOCK, though locally in the hundred of Egerton, Bridport division of the county of DORSET, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N.E. by E.) from Bridport. The population is returned with the parish.

NETTLECOMBE, a parish in the hundred of WIL-LITON and FREEMANNERS, county of SOMERSET, 7 miles (N. by W.) from Wiveliscombe, containing 372 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Taunton, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £16. 16. 3., and in the patronage of Sir J. Trevelyan, Bart. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a small but handsome edifice. A school-house was erected at the expense of the late Sir John Trevelyan, in which the poor children of the parish are taught.

NETTLEDEN, a chapelry in the parish of FIGLESTHORNE, hundred of COTTESLOE, county of BUCKINGHAM, 3 miles (N.N.E.) from Berkhamstead, containing, with the hamlet of Friesden, 108 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, endowed with £8 per annum private benefaction, £1000 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Trustees of the late Earl of Bridgewater. The chapel, which is dedicated to St. Lawrence, was consecrated in the year 1470.

NETTLEHAM, a parish in the wapentake of LAWRESS, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 3 miles (N.E. by N.) from Lincoln, containing 572 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Stow, and diocese of Lincoln, and in the patronage of the Chancellor of the Cathedral Church of Lincoln. The church is dedicated to All Saints. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. A school for poor children is supported by subscription. A court leet and a court baron are held here annually, about Lady-day. The bishops of Lincoln had formerly a palace here, the foundations of which are still discernible.

NETTLESTEAD, a parish in the hundred of TWYFORD, lathe of AYLESFORD, county of KENT, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W.S.W.) from Maidstone, containing 255 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, united to that of West Barming, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Rochester, rated in the king's books at £12. 10. 10. Mrs. Bouverie was patroness in 1820. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is in the later style of English architecture, and the windows exhibit some fine specimens of stained glass of the time of Edward I. The navigable river Medway is crossed by Brand bridge on the south of the parish.

NETTLESTEAD, a parish in the hundred of BOSMERE and CLAYDON, county of SUFFOLK, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S.) from Needham, containing 85 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £8. 11. $10\frac{1}{2}$, endowed with £200 royal bounty. L. H. Moore, Esq. was patron in 1815. The church, which is dedicated to St. Mary, contains several handsome mural monuments. There are some remains of the splendid mansion of the Wentworths, who were Barons of Nettlestead.

NETTLETON, a parish in the southern division of the wapentake of YARBOROUGH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 1 mile (S. by W.) from Caistor, containing 353 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £19. 10. 10. The Rev. William Jackson was patron in 1823. The church is dedicated to St. John the Baptist. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

NETTLETON, a parish in the northern division of the hundred of DAMERHAM, county of WILTS, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.W. by W.) from Chippenham, containing 423 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Wilts, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £18. 12. 1., and in the patronage of Dr. Carrick. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyan Methodists. The old Roman Fosse-road passes through the parish.

NEVENDON, a parish in the hundred of BARSTABLE, county of ESSEX, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S.E. by E.) from Bilericay, containing 186 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Essex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £10. 13. 4. The Rev. V. Edwards was patron in 1814. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

NEWARK, a chapelry in that part of the parish of ST. JOHN the BAPTIST, PETERBOROUGH, which is in the liberty of PETERBOROUGH, county of NORTHAMPTON, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (N.E. by N.) from Peterborough. The population is returned with Eastfield. The chapel, which was dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene, has fallen to ruins.

NEWARK upon TRENT, a borough, market town, and parish, having exclusive jurisdiction, though locally in the southern division of the wapentake of Newark, county of NOTTINGHAM, 20 miles (N. E.) from Nottingham, and 124 (N. N. W.) from London, containing 8084 inhabitants. The origin of this town has been ascribed to the Ceritani, a tribe of ancient Britons; and it is supposed to have been subsequently a station of the Romans: it was the Sidnacester of the Saxons, and the old town having been destroyed by the Danes, the name of New wark was given to that erected on its site. Here was a castle, probably erected by Egbert, the first King of England, which has been emphatically designated "the Key of the North:" it was repaired by Leofric, Earl of Mercia, who was governor and lord of this district in the reign of Edward the Confessor: Leofric and Godiva his wife gave the town to the monastery of Stow, near Lincoln. In 1125 the castle was almost entirely rebuilt and enlarged by Alexander, Bishop of Lincoln, who obtained a royal charter for establishing a mint here. In 1139, that prelate having engaged in an insurrection against Stephen, was taken prisoner, and sent captive to his own castle at Newark, and was compelled to purchase his liberty by the surrender of this and other fortresses to the crown. During the baronial wars in the reign of John, it was a royal garrison; and, in order to put an end to the depredations of the troops, the Dauphin of France, whose interposition had been sought by the barons, ordered Gilbert de Gaunt, Earl of Lincoln, to proceed against the garrison with considerable force, but on intimation of the approach of John at the head of a large body of troops, the earl returned to London; and that sovereign, having in his march sustained great loss in men, carriages, and baggage, owing to a rapid flood-tide in crossing the Washes, and harrassed by disease of body and distress of mind, was seized with a fever; and having been carried on a litter to Sleaford, and thence to Newark castle, he there expired, on the 19th of October, 1216. The fortress was then given up to the barons, who retained possession till it was besieged by the Earl of Pembroke, and after eight days resistance, having surrendered, it was restored to the Bishop of Lincoln. In the last year of the reign of Edward III. it was used as a state prison. In 1530, Cardinal Wolsey and his splendid retinue were accommodated here, on their way to Southwell. In April, 1603, on the arrival of James I. at Newark, in his journey to London after his accession, he was addressed, by Alderman John Twentymen, in a Latin speech, and being much pleased therewith, he conferred upon him the office of purveyor of wax to the royal household in the counties of York, Nottingham, Lincoln, and Derby: it was in this town that James is said to have ordered a cut-purse to be hanged without legal process. In the reign of Charles I., Newark was garrisoned for the king, and held in subjection the whole of this county, excepting the town of Nottingham; and a great part of Lincolnshire was laid under contribution: here that unfortunate sovereign established a mint, and issued various pieces of money, consisting of half-crowns, shillings, ninepences, and sixpences, some of which were of diagonal shape, bearing the impress of a castle, and others the royal arms and crown, with the dates 1645 and 1646. During this contest, the town sustained three sieges: in the first, all Northgate was burnt by order of the governor, Sir John Henderson; in the second, when under the government of Sir John, afterwards Lord Byron, the town was relieved by the arrival from Chester of Prince Rupert, who, according to Clarendon, in an action between his forces and the parliamentarians under Sir John Meldrum, on Beacon hill, half a mile eastward of the town, took four thousand prisoners and thirteen pieces of artillery; in the third siege, after the display of much prowess and several vigorous sallies, the fortress remained unimpaired; afterwards Lord Bellasis, then governor, surrendered the town to the Scottish army, by the king's order, on the 8th of May, 1646. At the close of this siege, the works and circumvallations were demolished by the country people, with the exception of two considerable earth-works, which are now nearly perfect, and are called the King's sconce and the Queen's sconce: about this time the castle also was destroyed.

The town is neatly built, and consists of several streets, which are well paved and lighted: the inhabitants are well supplied with water. The town is situated in a level tract on the eastern branch of the Trent, which joins the main river about a mile below it; a lateral stream, uniting the two rivers above the town, forms rather an extensive island on the north-west, which is remarkably fertile; over this the London road passes, the river being crossed by a handsome bridge. About three hundred and fifty yards from the site of the old castle is the ancient bed of the Trent, the current of which was diverted, partly by a cut formerly made from it to the brook at Kelham, and partly by obstructions occasioned by the Newark mills. The town is approached from the north by an excellent turnpike-road, constructed about the year 1770, over the Trent vale, from Newark bridge to Muskham bridge, and no longer inconvenienced, as formerly, by inundations of the river, owing to the erection of fourteen bridges of different sizes, and ninety-six arches, at irregular distances: this road is carried on a level over the Trent vale from Newark bridge to Muskham bridge, a distance of one mile and a half: the execution of this useful project was completed by Mr. Smeaton, at an expense of £12,000. The bridge, which crosses the river in the vicinity of the castle, was originally of wood, but, in 1775, it was rebuilt of brick, faced with stone, by Henry, Duke of Newcastle. Under the sanction of an act of parliament, obtained in 1793, great improvement has taken place in the town, the expense of which has been defrayed from funds vested in the corporation for its general benefit. One side of a narrow and dangerous street, called Dry bridge, has recently been taken down, and new houses erected, thereby rendering the approach to the market-place wide and commodious. The "Newark Stock Library" was established in 1825, and a new building has been recently erected in the market-place by Lord Middleton, and presented by him, as a library and news-room, to the shareholders, of whom there are two hundred and fifty, at £4.4. each; the annual subscription is £1. 1.

Concerts and assemblies are held in the town hall; and there is a theatre occasionally opened for dramatic performances. The prominent commercial feature of this town is its very extensive trade in malt and flour: of the former fifty thousand quarters are annually sent to Manchester, Liverpool, and London, exclusively of supplies to the midland counties, and upwards of eighty thousand sacks of the latter commodity are disposed of annually, by two mercantile houses alone, and the revenue received from this town is about £92,000: upwards of three hundred persons are employed in an extensive weaving and bleaching establishment at the southern extremity of the town. In consequence of the Trent navigation, there is a flourishing trade in corn, coal, cattle, wool, and other commodities, and the corn market here is one of the largest in this part of the kingdom. An extensive iron and brass foundry affords employment to several persons, in the various departments of fancy castings, architectural ornaments, fac-similes of medallions, coins, seals, &c., which are so exquisitely finished as to surprise the most experienced virtuoso. Among the different branches of business is the preparation of terra alba, for paper-mills; and in the town is a dépôt for sheet copper, brass, iron, and tin plates. Large quantities of gypsum and limestone are obtained in the neighbourhood: the former is calcined and pulverised for the use of sculptors and plasterers, and sent by sea to London. During the summer season many persons are employed in making bricks and tiles: the manufacture of tambour lace and stockings employs a few females. The market is on Wednesday; and fairs, principally for cattle, are held on the Friday after Mid-Lent Sunday, May 14th, Whit-Tuesday, August 2d, November 1st, and on the Monday before December 11th. In the year 1800, an annual cheese market was established, to be held on the Wednesday before October 2nd. The market-place, formerly much more spacious than at present, still forms a handsome square.

The first charter of incorporation was granted by Edward VI., and it was renewed, with extended privileges, by Charles II., in consideration of the loyalty of the inhabitants during the preceding reign. The corporation consists of a mayor and twelve aldermen, with a recorder, town clerk, chamberlain, and other officers: the members of the corporation are self-elected. The mayor and his predecessor, with the recorder and four senior aldermen, exercise exclusive magisterial authority within the borough, which comprises the whole parish of Newark, together with the castle precincts and water-mills, which lie in the adjoining parish of East Stoke. A court of record is held weekly, on Thursday, for the cognizance of pleas to the amount of £300; its jurisdiction is co-extensive with the borough: sessions are held quarterly. The sessions for the hundreds of Newark and Thurgarton are held quarterly at the county hall in Cartergate. The county magistrates also hold a petty session every alternate Wednesday. The town hall, which stands in the market-place, is an elegant stone building, erected by the corporation, under the superintendence of Mr. Carr, out of the produce of testamentary estates for the improvement of the town, which they were empowered to sell under an act of parliament passed in the 13th year of George III.; the total expense of its erection was £1790: two wings have since been added, and the building is considered equal to any in this part of the county: the front is light and airy; it is three stories high, having seven windows in each story: the room used for assemblies is elegantly finished with Corinthian columns and pilasters, and a richly-carved ceiling: at one end of this edifice the sessions are held, and at the other the corporation transact public business; in the rear are very extensive shambles. It is uncertain when the borough was first represented in parliament, but there was a contested election in 1592, when only one member appears to have been returned; and two members were first sent in the 29th of Charles II. The right of election is vested in the corporation, and all the inhabitants who have paid scot and lot for at least six months previously to the election: the mayor is the returning officer. The Duke of Newcastle, in consequence of the extensive property which he possesses in the borough, has very considerable political influence, together with Lord Middleton and others.

The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Nottingham, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £21. 5. 2½, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene, is one of the largest and most elegant parochial churches in the kingdom: it exhibits portions in all the styles of English architecture, and is a cruciform structure, consisting of a nave, aisles, transepts, choir, and sepulchral chapels, with a lofty western tower, surmounted by a fine octagonal spire; the base of the tower is Norman, and in the nave are two Norman piers: the choir is of exquisite workmanship, with ancient stone and oak stalls elaborately carved: it is separated from the nave by a richly-carved oak screen, some parts of which becoming decayed, have been successfully imitated by iron castings, the work of a resident artist; in this part of the edifice is one of the largest engraved brasses in the kingdom, elaborately ornamented, to the memory of Allan Flemmyng, who died in 1361; a portion of this has also been restored by the same artist. The large east window is in the later style of English architecture, and the corresponding piers and arches of the nave and choir are unusually rich: there are some excellent specimens of stained glass in the windows. The altar-piece, an admirable painting of the "Resurrection of Lazarus," by Hilton, was presented by the artist, whose father was a native of the town. There are places of worship for General and Particular Baptists; Independents, Calvinistic, Primitive, and Wesleyan Methodists, and Roman Catholics. The free grammar school was founded, in 1530, by Dr. Thomas Magnus, Archdeacon of the East riding of Yorkshire, and a native of Newark, who, by will in 1550, bequeathed certain lands in the counties of Lincoln, Nottingham, and York, for the support of a "school of grammar and a school of song." The vicar, mayor, senior alderman, and three churchwardens are the trustees of the charity, and the present annual income, amounting to nearly £2,400, is thus appropriated: namely, to the master of the grammar school £220 per annum; to the usher, £50; to the master of the song school, £105; to ten singing boys, £37. 16; to the National schools for boys and girls, £150; to the dispensary, £150; to the commissioners for lighting, paving, and improving the town, £290; to the churchwardens for the repair of the church, clerk's and sexton's salaries, &c., £750; besides incidental disbursements.

The school is open to all boys of the town and neighbourhood: the present number of scholars on the foundation is sixty-five; the master, who is allowed to receive a limited number of boarders, resides on the premises, which are admirably adapted to the purpose: the house was erected by the master, at an expense of £2500, in consequence of which the corporation agreed to pay him £30 per annum towards the insurance of his life for fifteen years: there are at present no exhibitions connected with this school, but the trustees contemplate this desirable addition to the institution. The National school was erected in 1829, which affords instruction to about one hundred and ten boys and eighty girls. Henry Stone, in 1688, bequeathed to the corporation £700, directing the produce to be appropriated to the foundation and support of a Jersey, or working school, the master of which has a salary of £28 per annum. Almshouses, for fourteen decayed tradesmen and ten widows, were respectively founded and endowed under the wills of William Phillippott, merchant, dated March 18th, 1556, and George Lawrence, dated December 1st, 1797; the present amount of income is £789. 13. St. Leonard's hospital was founded by Alexander, Bishop of Lincoln, about 1125, and endowed with lands now producing a rental of more than £1000: the present building contains three small rooms, occupied by as many poor men, who receive five shillings each per week; the master, who is appointed by the Bishop of Lincoln, receives the surplus income: various other charitable benefactions, amounting to about £500 per annum, are applied under the direction and management of the corporation. The ruins of the ancient castle consist of the outer walls, which enclose a spacious area, now used as a bowling-green; and the elegant crypt, with its light groined arches nearly perfect, is used as a coal wharf and stables: at the north-east angle of the western front is a square tower, and another in the centre of the elevation; the remains of an ancient portal are visible in the north front. Of the conventual buildings there are no vestiges, except the walls of the Augustine friary, which has been converted into a dwelling-house: the site of the house of the chantry priests is now occupied by a small but elegant mansion, finished throughout in the most splendid style, principally in imitation of the antique, and containing many rare and valuable cabinets, vases, busts, armour, fossils, and coins. Amongst other curious Roman relics are six entire urns of baked earth, found in digging for the foundation of a house in 1826, filled with calcined bones and ashes. The great Roman road from London to Lincoln passed through Newark: in a straight line near the church are the remains of ancient military works. Amongst the eminent natives of this town may be enumerated, in addition to Dr. Magnus, its munificent benefactor, John Ardern, a learned writer on medicine and surgery in the fifteenth century; Dr. Thomas White, Bishop of Peterborough; Dr. Lightfoot, the celebrated Hebraist; and Dr. William Warburton, Bishop of Gloucester, born in 1698. Newark confers the inferior title of viscount upon Earl Manvers.

NEWBALD, a parish within the liberty of St. PETER of YORK, though locally in the Hunsley-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, East riding of the county of YORK, containing 722 inhabitants, of which number, 543 are in the township of North New-bald, 4 miles (S. E.), and 179 in that of South Newbald, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by S.), from Market-Weighton. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Prebendary of North Newbald in the Cathedral Church of York, rated in the king's books at £4, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant. The church, dedicated to St. Nicholas, is a cruciform structure, principally in the Norman style, with a tower rising from the intersection, and several enriched doors and arches; the font is early English, curiously formed and ornamented. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Six poor children are educated for a small sum paid from the poor's estate.

NEWBALL, a hamlet in the parish of STANTON by LANGWORTH, western division of the wapentake of WRAGGOE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Wragby. The population is returned with the parish.

NEWBIGGIN, a township in the parish of DACRE, LEATH ward, county of CUMBERLAND, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by S. from Penrith. The population is returned with the parish.

NEWBIGGIN, a township in the parish of MIDDLETON in TEASDALE, south-western division of DARLINGTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, $12\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W.) from Barnard-Castle, containing 416 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. A charity school is supported by annual donations. There is a smelting-mill for refining lead-ore found in the neighbourhood.

NEWBIGGIN, a chapelry in that part of the parish of NEWBURN which is in the western division of CASTLE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 4 miles (N. W.) from Newcastle, containing 47 inhabitants. There are twenty-four acres of land within the chapelry, extra-parochial.

NEWBIGGIN, a chapelry in the parish of WOODHORN, eastern division of MORPETH ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from Morpeth, containing 434 inhabitants, who are principally fishermen for the Carlisle, Hexham, and Newcastle markets. The chapel, dedicated to St. Bartholomew, is an ancient edifice with a spire steeple, situated near the sea-shore, a fine smooth beach about a mile in length, which is much resorted to for bathing. There is a suite of warm, cold, and shower baths at the chief inn, which contains excellent accommodations for visitors, who may also provide themselves with private lodgings at several well-built houses in the village. The bay affording tolerable security and anchorage for small vessels, much corn is shipped from the granaries erected for its reception from the interior. Five boats and nineteen men were lost in a violent tempest which happened here, in January 1805, upon which upwards of £1700 was subscribed at Newcastle and the neighbourhood, for the relief of the families of the sufferers. A branch Bible Society was established at this place in 1826.

NEWBIGGIN, a township in the parish of SHOTLEY, eastern division of TINDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $9\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.) from Hexham, containing 69 inhabitants.

NEWBIGGIN, a parish in EAST ward, county of WESTMORLAND, $7\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Appleby, containing 152 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Carlisle, rated in the king's books at £4. 14. 2., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of W. Crackenthorpe, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Edmund, is an ancient building, repewed in 1804. Newbiggin Hall is a fine old castellated mansion, erected in 1533, upon the site of the previous manor-house. Some rocks near it are represented to have formerly borne various Roman inscriptions.

NEWBIGGIN, a hamlet in the parish of KIRKBY-LONSDALE, LONSDALE ward, county of WESTMORLAND, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S. W. by W.) from Kirkby-Lonsdale. The population is returned with Hutton-Roof.

NEWBIGGIN, a township in the parish of AYGARTH, western division of the wapentake of HANG, North riding of the county of YORK, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Middleham, containing 128 inhabitants.

NEWBIGGIN (EAST and WEST), a township in the parish of BISHOPTON, south-western division of STOCKTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W.) from Stockton upon Tees, containing 26 inhabitants.

NEWBOLD, a hamlet in the parish of CHESTERFIELD, hundred of SCARSDALE, county of DERBY, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (N. W.) from Chesterfield, containing, with Dunstan, 962 inhabitants. A school-house was erected by the Executors of George Milnes, Esq., who endowed it with land producing an annual income of £23. 8., for which about fifteen children are instructed. An almshouse was founded, in 1781, by Mrs. Elizabeth Tomlinson, who endowed it with £400 four per cents., for the maintenance of three poor women.

NEWBOLD, a hamlet in the parish of OUSTON, hundred of GARTREE, county of LEICESTER, 7 miles (S. by E.) from Melton-Mowbray. The population is returned with the parish.

NEWBOLD, a liberty in the parish of BREEDON, western division of the hundred of GOSCOTE, county of LEICESTER, 4 miles (N. E. by E.) from Ashby de la Zouch. The population is returned with the chapelry of Worthington.

NEWBOLD, a hamlet in the parish of TREDINGTON, upper division of the hundred of OSWALDSLOW, county of WORCESTER, though locally in the Kington division of the hundred of Kington, county of Warwick, 4 miles (N. by W.) from Shipston upon Stour, containing 258 inhabitants.

NEWBOLD upon AVON, a parish in the Rugby division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, county of WARWICK, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Rugby, containing, with the hamlets of Cosford, Little Harborough, Little Lawford, and Long Lawford, 968 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Coventry, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £14. 12. 1., and in the patronage of the Rev. Mr. Parker. The church is dedicated to St. Botolph. The rivers Avon and Swift, and the Oxford canal, run through the parish, in which are very extensive lime-works.

NEWBOLD (LEA), county palatine of CHESTER.—See LEA-NEWBOLD.

NEWBOLD-GROUNDS, a hamlet in the parish of CATESBY-ABBAY, hundred of FAWSLEY, county of NORTHAMPTON, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Daventry. The population is returned with the parish.

NEWBOLD-PACEY, a parish in the Warwick division of the hundred of KINGTON, county of WAR-WICK, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Kington, containing, with Ashorn, 331 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, rated in the king's books at £8. 3. 9., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Provost and Fellows of Queen's College, Oxford. The church is dedicated to St. George.

NEWBOLD-REVEL, a hamlet in the parish of MONKS-KIRBY, Kirby division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, county of WARWICK, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Rugby. The population is returned with Stretton under Foss.

NEWBOLD-VERDON, a parish in the hundred of SPARKENHOE, county of LEICESTER, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by N.) from Market-Bosworth, containing 576 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Leicester, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £6. 8. $11\frac{1}{2}$. G. Greenaway, Esq. was patron in 1823. The church is dedicated to St. James. Nathaniel, Lord Crewe, in 1720, bequeathed a rent-charge of £20, for teaching poor children.

NEWBOROUGH, a parish in the liberty of PETERBOROUGH, county of NORTHAMPTON, 5 miles (N. E. by N.) from Peterborough, containing 129 inhabitants. This place, formerly a common, called Borough-Fen, has lately been elevated into a parish. A church, of which the Bishop of Peterborough is the patron, has been erected, but it has not yet been consecrated or endowed.

NEWBOROUGH, a chapelry in the parish of HANBURY, northern division of the hundred of OFFLOW, county of STAFFORD, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Abbot's Bromley, containing 744 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Stafford, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Hanbury. The chapel is dedicated to All Saints. There are several small bequests, producing about £8 a year, for the instruction of children. Newborough is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under forty shillings.

NEWBOROUGH, a township in the parish of COXWOLD, wapentake of BIRDFORTH, North riding of the county of YORK, 8 miles (S. W.) from Helmsley, containing, with the extra-parochial district of Morton, 162 inhabitants. A priory of Black canons, in honour of St. Mary, was founded here, in 1145, by Roger de Mowbray, which, at the dissolution, had a revenue of £457. 13. 5. William de Newburgh, the celebrated monkish historian, was a member of this establishment.

NEWBOTTLE, a township in the parish of HOUGHTON le SPRING, northern division of EASINGTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, 8 miles (N. E. by N.) from Durham, containing 2306 inhabitants, who are principally employed in the various collieries and potteries in the vicinity. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Fifty-seven individuals lost their lives by an explosion in one of the coal mines in 1815.

NEWBOTTLE, a parish in the hundred of KING'S SUTTON, county of NORTHAMPTON, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Brackley, containing, with Charleton, 352 inhabitants.

The living is a discharged vicarage with Charleton, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £10. 0. 10. W. R. Cartwright, Esq. was patron in 1809. The church is dedicated to St. James. At Charleton in this parish is an ancient fortification, called Ruinsborough Hill.

NEWBOURN, a parish in the hundred of CARLFORD, county of SUFFOLK, 4 miles (S. by E.) from Woodbridge, containing 181 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £7. 4. 2., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Sir W. Rowley, Bart. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. The navigable river Deben runs on the east of this parish.

NEWBROUGH, a parochial chapelry in the north-western division of TINDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Hexham, containing 451 inhabitants. The chapel is dedicated to St. Peter. A school-room has been erected by subscription, in which twelve children are instructed for £10 per annum, the gift of the Rev. H. Wastell, who also built a house for the master.

NEWBURN, a parish comprising the chapelry of Newbiggin, and the townships of Black Callerton, Butterlaw, East Denton, West Denton, North Dissington, South Dissington, Newburn, Newburn-Hall, Sugley, Throckley, Wallbottle, East and West Whorlton, and Woosington, in the western division of CASTLE ward, and the township of Dalton in the eastern division of TINDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, and containing 4202 inhabitants, of which number, 918 are in the township of Newburn, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Newcastle upon Tyne. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Northumberland, and diocese of Durham, rated in the king's books at £16, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Carlisle. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, was partly rebuilt and considerably enlarged in 1827, at an expense of about £1200: it is a neat cruciform structure of stone, containing some ancient monuments to the Delavals, and the east window exhibits, in stained glass, the figure of St. James, and the arms of those who contributed to the renovation of the building. The parish, which abounds with coal, stretches along the northern bank of the Tyne, where are some coal-staiths, iron-foundries, crown glass, and brick and tile manufactories, chemical works, and a paper-mill. A school-room was erected, in 1822, by the Duke of Northumberland, who endowed it with £15. 15. per annum, for teaching fifteen children: the number has been lately increased to thirty, in consequence of the members of the Glass Company and the lessees of Walbottle colliery having subscribed £10. 10. a year, in augmentation of the master's salary. In the reign of John, Newburn was styled a borough town. Severus' Wall passed through the parish, but its course is no longer traceable. Here Lord Conway, in 1640, at the head of the royalists, disputed the passage of the Tyne with the Scots under General Leslie, but the latter, after a violent conflict, at length succeeded.

NEWBURN-HALL, a township in that part of the parish of NEWBURN which is in the western division of CASTLE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, containing 629 inhabitants.

tion, the site of which is occupied by the village of Speen, was, in contradistinction to the old town, called Newbyrig, of which its present name is only a slight modification. It is a town of considerable antiquity, having been of some importance at the time of the Conquest, and bestowed by the Conqueror on Ernulph de Hesdin, whose grandson was killed in the battle of Lincoln, in the reign of Stephen. In the reign of Edward I. Newbury returned two members to parliament, and in the 11th of Edward III. it sent three deputies to a grand council of trade held at Westminster. In the reign of Henry VIII. it was one of the most flourishing towns in the kingdom, and was particularly distinguished for its extensive manufacture of woollen clothes. At this period lived the celebrated John Winchcombe, commonly called Jack of Newbury, said to have been the most eminent clothier in England, and to have sumptuously entertained Henry VIII. and his queen Catherine, on their visit to the town. When the Earl of Surrey marched against James IV., King of Scotland, who was ravaging the borders of the kingdom, this spirited individual, at his own expense, armed and clothed one hundred of his workmen; and, at the head of this little band, accompanied the earl to Flodden Field, where he greatly signalled himself by his intrepid conduct. On the termination of the war, he returned to his native place, and at his own charge built the greater part of the parish church, in which he was interred in 1519. His descendants possessed large estates for many years, and the last of them was united in marriage to Lord Bolingbroke. Part of the house in which he lived, was, about a century since, converted into an inn, bearing the sign of Jack of Newbury. During the parliamentary war, two battles took place in the vicinity, in both which the king commanded in person: the first was fought on the 18th of September, 1643, on the common called the Wash; the second on the 27th of October, 1644, in the fields between Newbury, Speen, and Shaw. In this battle, the king, though he kept possession of the field, suffered the Earl of Essex to march with his army to London, and the royal cause sustained an irreparable loss in the deaths of many distinguished officers, among whom were the Earls of Sunderland and Caernarvon, and the celebrated Lord Falkland. The parliamentarians in the following year obtained possession of the town, which they fortified, and retained till the close of the war.

The town is pleasantly situated on a fertile plain, on the banks of the river Kennet, over which was an ancient wooden bridge of one arch, rebuilt of stone, at the expense of the corporation, in 1770: it is one of the largest towns in the county: the houses are mostly of brick, generally well built and of modern appearance; the streets, diverging obliquely from the market-place, are spacious, well paved under the powers of an act recently obtained, and lighted with gas by a company, whose works being neatly and scientifically constructed, are much admired: the inhabitants are amply supplied with water from springs in the neighbourhood. In the hamlet of Speenhamland, adjoining the borough, is a small theatre, which is open for about two months during the season. The environs are pleasant, and afford many agreeable walks on the banks of the Kennet, and in the vicinity of the village of Speen. The trade is principally in malt and flour, for the latter of which are many large mills on the banks of the river: there are also a small paper-mill, and a mill for throwing silk; and in the parish of Speen, about a mile from the town, is a manufactory for ribands and galloons. The river Kennet, which in 1723 was made navigable to Reading; and the Kennet and Avon canal, which passing through the town, in a line parallel with the river, joins the Thames at Reading, afford great facilities to the trade. The market is on Thursday, and is one of the largest in the country for corn, which is pitched in the market-place for sale: for nearly a century the corporation took toll of all grain brought into the town for consumption, or merely passing through it, and that whether bought and tolled in any other market, or not; they also took toll of corn exposed in the market-place for sale, which practice continued until the year 1818, when proceedings at law were commenced, and a verdict given against the corporation, as regarded "toll-thorough and toll-traverse," leaving the question of market-toll undecided: the corporation, however, discontinued the taking of toll altogether, with the exception of some members of their own body allowing their corn to be tolled for about two years after the decision, and since then no toll has been demanded, although the corporation have recently issued notice of their intention to resume the practice. The fairs are on Holy Thursday, for horses and cattle; July 5th for horses, cows, and hogs; September 4th and November 8th, for horses and cheese; and on the first Thursday after October 11th is a statute fair for hiring servants.

The inhabitants were first incorporated by Queen Elizabeth, in 1596, in whose charter Newbury is styled "an ancient and populous borough, which had enjoyed divers liberties, franchises and privileges by the charters of many of her ancestors and predecessors, kings of England." Under this charter the government is vested in a mayor, high steward, recorder, six aldermen, and twenty-four burgesses, assisted by a town clerk and other officers: the mayor is chosen annually on St. Matthew's day, and, with one of the aldermen appointed for that purpose, is justice of the peace within the borough; the other officers and the burgesses, as vacancies occur, are chosen by the corporation: the freedom of the borough has become obsolete, persons being admitted indiscriminately to the privilege of carrying on trade. The corporation hold quarterly courts of session for the trial of misdemeanants within the borough, and have power to hold a court of record, under the charter of Elizabeth, every week, for the recovery of debts not exceeding twenty marks, now fallen into disuse. The Easter quarter session for the county is held here, and the petty sessions for the division every Thursday. The town hall, called the mansion house, is a substantial modern brick building, erected in 1740, and supported on piers and arches: the lower part affords an area for the market, and the upper part consists of a handsome suite of rooms, in the largest of which the courts are held, and assemblies during the season: it is a spacious and very handsome room, ornamented with two beautiful copies, by Cosino Fioravante, from Rubens' Choice of Hercules, and the Dire Effects of War; adjoining it are refreshment and card rooms. Part of the workhouse has recently been converted into a borough gaol, containing nine wards for the classification of prisoners, and used also as a bridewell, or house of correction; but the inhabitants having been deemed liable to the payment of the county rate, all prisoners committed by the magistrates for the borough are sent to the county gaol at Reading.

The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Berks, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £38. 16. 10½., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Nicholas, is a spacious edifice in the later style of English architecture, with a lofty square embattled tower crowned with pinnacles: the tower and the western part of the nave were the portions built by John Winchcombe, whose effigy, on a brass plate removed from over his tomb, is placed against the east wall of the north aisle, and above the altar is some beautiful screen-work. A handsome chapel of ease, in the later style of English architecture, is now in process of erection in Speenhamland. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, Wesleyan Methodists, and Unitarians. A Blue-coat school was founded, in 1706, by the corporation, to whom, in 1624, John Kendrick gave the sum of £4000, for the purchase of a house and garden for the employment of the poor, and for other charitable uses, of which £350 was laid out in the purchase of an estate, called the Hospital Estate, let on lease, at £106 per annum, to the Kennet Navigation Company, at the expiration of which it is expected to produce £400 per annum, the rental being appropriated to the clothing and instruction of twenty poor boys. To this several augmentations were made for the clothing and instruction of additional scholars, by Mr. Richard Cowslade, in 1715; Mr. Nicholas Clement, in 1722; Mr. Thomas Stockwell, in 1736; and by Mr. John Kimber, who in 1790 gave funds for the instruction of ten more scholars, to be clothed in green, and on their leaving school to be apprenticed, with premiums of £10 each. There are forty boys on the foundation, who are now instructed by the master of a National school, established by subscription in 1811, in which are educated about one hundred and fifty boys, and one hundred and sixty girls, in addition to the charity boys. There are also Lancasterian schools for boys and girls, supported by voluntary contributions. The parish has, under the will of Mr. John West and Frances his wife, the privilege of sending several children to Christ's Hospital, London, who are elected by the vestry. St. Bartholomew's hospital, supposed to have been founded by King John, and comprising fourteen houses for the reception of men and women, was, by charter of Elizabeth, vested in the corporation; the inmates receive a weekly allowance of five shillings each, with an annual supply of fuel and clothes; ten other houses have been added to the original establishment, the endowment of which exceeds £700 per annum. Opposite to St. Bartholomew's are twelve almshouses, erected and endowed in 1670, by Jemmit Raymond, Esq., for six aged men and six aged women, who have a weekly allowance of five shillings each, with coats and gowns annually; the number of houses has been augmented for the reception of ten aged persons of each sex. Thomas Pearce, in 1690, and Mr. Francis Coxhead, each built two almshouses, which have been consolidated for the maintenance and support of aged persons, who have each three shillings and sixpence per week, with an allowance of clothes and fuel; after defraying these charges, the residue of the endowment, which is about £112 per annum, is appropriated to the instruction of poor children in reading and writing. In 1727, Mr. Thomas Hunt bequeathed lands at Greenham, which have been exchanged for an estate at Ashmoor Green, producing a rental of £70; and £270 in money, for the support of three aged widows, who have four shillings each per week, with an annual allowance of clothes and fuel: the residue of the income is appropriated to the instruction of fourteen poor children in the Lancasterian school. In Cheap-street are twelve more almshouses, erected in 1793, and endowed by Mr. John Kimber, in the centre of which is a neat brick building, with a stone recording the date of their erection and the name of the founder. Twelve almshouses, which formerly stood near the church, have been rebuilt near St. Bartholomew's hospital; they are endowed by Mr. Henshaw, for six aged men and six aged women of the parish, who are nominated by the corporation: there are also two for poor weavers, founded by Mr. Robinson, and six for aged women, at St. Mary's Hill.

Extending sixteen miles in length, on both sides of the Kennet, are strata of peat half a mile in breadth, and varying in depth from one foot to eight feet, which being dug sells for ten shillings per load: in digging for it have been found oaks, alders, willows, and firs, indiscriminately mixed, which appear to have been torn up by the roots; the horns, skulls, and bones of several kinds of deer; the horns of the antelope, the heads and tusks of boars, and the heads of beavers. In rebuilding the bridge, in 1770, a leaden seal of Pope Boniface IX., a pix, some knives of singular construction, and several coins from the time of Henry I. to William III., were discovered. Some years since, an urn of a light brown colour, of the size of a gallon, was found in the peat-moss, at the distance of from eight to ten feet from the river, but being broken by the workmen, the contents were lost. The present rector of Newbury, the Rev. James Roe, possesses a private collection of specimens in natural history, unequalled in the county for the rarity of the subjects and their suitable arrangement. Within a mile and a quarter of the town is Sandleford, a hamlet in the parish, where a small Augustine priory was founded, about the year 1200, by Geoffrey, Earl of Perche, and dedicated to St. John the Baptist, which was given by Edward IV. to the Collegiate Church of Windsor, and the revenue of which, in the reign of Henry VIII., was valued at £10. Newbury gives the inferior title of baron to the Marquis of Cholmondeley.

NEWBY, a township in the parish of IRTINGTON, ESKDALE ward, county of CUMBERLAND, 6 miles (E. N.E.) from Carlisle, containing 97 inhabitants.

NEWBY, a township in the parish of MORLAND, WEST ward, county of WESTMORLAND, 7 miles (W. by N.) from Appleby, containing 338 inhabitants. Coal and limestone are obtained here, and there are lime-kilns at Towcett, within the township.

NEWBY, a joint township with Rainton, in that part of the parish of TOPCLIFFE which is in the wapentake of HALLIKELD, North riding of the county of YORK, 6 miles (N. by W.) from Boroughbridge. The population is returned with Rainton. Christopher Coulson, in 1640, bequeathed certain land, directing the income to be applied in teaching and clothing poor children.

NEWBY, a township in the parish of STOKESLEY, western division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, North riding of the county of YORK, 3 miles (N.N.W.) from Stokesley, containing 152 inhabitants. A small free school was founded here in 1640.

NEWBY, a township in the parish of SCALBY, PICKERING lythe, North riding of the county of YORK, 3 miles (N.W. by W.) from Scarborough, containing 40 inhabitants.

NEWBY, a joint township with Clapham, in the parish of CLAPHAM, western division of the wapentake of STAINCLIFFE and EWCROSS, West riding of the county of YORK, $7\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N.W.) from Settle. The population is returned with Clapham.

NEWBY, a joint township with Mulwith, in that part of the parish of RIPON which is in the liberty of RIPON, West riding of the county of YORK, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.E.) from Ripon, containing, with Mulwith, 52 inhabitants. It is situated on the river Ure, which occasionally inundates and enriches the adjacent lands. Newby Hall was built by Sir Edward Blacket, from a design by Sir Christopher Wren.

NEWBY-WISK, a township in that part of the parish of KIRBY-WISK which is in the eastern division of the wapentake of GILLING, North riding of the county of YORK, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from North Allerton, containing 265 inhabitants. There is a stone bridge of five arches over the river Wiske. The Wesleyan Methodists have a place of worship here. A Sunday school has been established, and is supported by the Rev. Christopher Bethel, D.D. There is a trifling bequest by William Crank, for teaching and apprenticing poor children.

NEWCASTLE, a township in the parish of CLUN, hundred of PURSLOW, county of SALOP, containing 315 inhabitants.

Seal and Arms.

NEWCASTLE under LYNE, a borough, market town, and parish, having separate jurisdiction, though locally in the northern division of the hundred of Pirehill, county of STAFFORD, 16 miles (N.N.W.) from Stafford, and 149 (N.W. by N.) from London, containing 7031 inhabitants. This was a place of some note before the Conquest, though known by a different name; its present appellation being derived from a castle built here by Edmund, Earl of Lancaster, in the reign of Henry III., a former edifice, called Chesterton castle, having fallen into decay; and the descriptive affix, "under Lyne, or

VOL. III.

Lyne," denotes its proximity to a forest of that name, serving also to distinguish it from Newcastle in Northumberland. The town is situated on a small branch of the river Trent, on the great road from Birmingham and London to Liverpool and Manchester, and consists of two principal and several smaller streets, which are paved (the foot-paths with brick), and lighted with gas, under the provisions of an act passed in 1819: the inhabitants are supplied with water by means of pipes leading from water-works in the town, which is raised by an engine; the houses are mostly ancient. There is a small theatre, also a concert and assembly room; and the races, held annually in the first week in August, on a course near the town, are well attended. The manufacture of hats is very extensive, and is conducted under an incorporated company of Felt-makers; and silk-throwing, cotton-spinning, tanning, malting, the manufacture of copperas, white lead, and paper, are also carried on: considerable business is done in the corn trade, and in the vicinity are some iron-works. Its commercial prosperity is much promoted by the neighbouring potteries, which occupy a district nearly eight miles in extent. A branch canal from this town, about four miles in length, joins the Trent and Mersey canal at Stoke; and another to Apedale is used chiefly for the conveyance of coal hither. The markets are on Monday and Saturday, and on every alternate Monday is a great cattle market: fairs are held on Shrove-Monday, for cattle; Easter-Monday, Whit-Monday, and July 14th, for wool; Monday after September 13th, and the first Monday in November.

The first charter of incorporation was granted in the 19th of Henry III., and was confirmed by subsequent monarchs: that now in force is dated in the 32nd of Elizabeth, and is a confirmation of all former grants, with several additions. Under it the corporation consists of a mayor, two bailiffs, and twenty-four capital burgesses, who form a common council, by which body the mayor and bailiffs are annually elected on the Tuesday next after Michaelmas-day; assisted by a recorder, town clerk, and two serjeants at mace; the two former enjoy the office for life. By a confirmation of this charter, in the fifteenth of Charles II., the members of the common council are empowered to elect annually from among themselves two justices of the peace, who, with the mayor, hold general sessions for the borough quarterly, but have no power to try capital offenders. A court of record is held every three weeks, for the recovery of debts not exceeding £50; the mayor and bailiffs are the presiding officers. Courts leet and baron are likewise held every three weeks. This borough has returned members to parliament from the 27th of Edward III.: the right of election is in the resident freemen, in number about eight hundred: the mayor is the returning officer. The freedom is obtained by birth (being extended to all the sons of resident sworn burgesses), by apprenticeship within the borough, by gift of the common council, and by purchase.

Newcastle was formerly a chapelry in the parish of Stoke upon Trent. The living is a rectory not in charge, in the archdeaconry of Stafford, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, and in the patronage of the Society for purchasing livings. The church, dedicated to St. Giles, was rebuilt in 1720: it is a modern edifice of brick, with a very ancient tower of red sandstone. A new church, or chapel, containing six hundred and seventy-one free sittings, was completed in 1828, the parliamentary commissioners having granted £4400 towards defraying the expense, the remainder being raised by subscription: it is intended as a chapel of ease during the incumbency of the present rector, after which the right of presentation will belong to the Society for purchasing livings. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, Methodists of the New Connexion, and Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists. The free grammar school originated in a benefaction from Richard Cleyton, Esq., in 1602, augmented by a bequest from John Cotton, and various other charitable contributions; the entire annual income is about £90: it is free for all the sons of burgesses, and poor inhabitants of the borough: the school-house has been rebuilt. An English school was founded, in 1704, by means of a bequest from the Rev. Edward Orme, for the instruction of the children of the poor in reading, writing, and arithmetic; the income is about £160 per annum, and there is a residence for the master, who instructs fifty children. About fifteen or twenty children are taught by a schoolmistress, for a salary of £8 per annum, paid by the corporation: there is likewise a National school. Almshouses for twenty poor aged widows were erected and endowed under the will of Christopher Monk, Duke of Albemarle, dated July 4th, 1687. John Goodwin, an eminent Nonconformist divine and controversialist, was born here about 1593; and Elijah Fenton, the coadjutor of Pope in his translation of Homer's Odyssey, was also a native of the town. Newcastle confers the title of duke on the family of Clinton.

NEWCASTLE upon TYNE, an ancient borough, port, and market town, and a county of itself, locally in Castle ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 276 miles (N.N.W.) from London, and 117 (S.E.) from Edinburgh, containing, exclusively of the townships of Byker, Cramlington, Heaton, and Jesmond, in the eastern division, and of Benwell, Elswick, Fenham, and Westgate, in the western division, of CASTLE ward, 35,181 inhabitants, and, including the environs, about 60,000. This place was anciently called Pons Ælii, from a bridge erected by the Emperor Adrian, on his return from an expedition against the Picts and Scots, to whose incursions this part of the island was particularly exposed, and as a barrier against which, the Emperor Severus afterwards constructed the wall called after his name, which, reaching from the mouth of the Tyne to Solway Frith, passed through this town, and was defended by numerous forts and exploratory towers, of which one at Pandon gate was remaining till the year 1796, when it was removed for the purpose of widening the passage. During the Octarchy the kings of Northumbria held their court here; and, in 653, Peada, King of Mercia, on a visit to Osweo, whose daughter he obtained in marriage, was converted, with all his retinue, to the Christian faith, and baptized by Finan, Bishop of Lindisfarn. From being a fortified place, and from having afforded protection to numerous ecclesiastics from the neighbouring convents of Tyne-mouth, Jarrow, Lindisfarn, and Wearmouth, which had been ravaged by the Danes, it obtained the name of Monkchester; but, in turn, it experienced the devastations of those barbarians, who destroyed its sacred edifices, and massacred the monks and nuns who had found an asylum within their walls. From the union of the several kingdoms of the Octarchy under Egbert till the Conquest, it was the residence of the Earls of Westmorland and Northumberland; and on the partition of the kingdom between Edmund Ironside and Canute, it fell, together with the rest of Northumbria, East Anglia, and Mercia, into the possession of the latter. In 1068, Edgar Atheling, and Malcolm, King of Scotland, with a numerous retinue of native insurgents and foreign auxiliaries, marched from this town to oppose the sovereignty of William the Conqueror, who, hastening to crush the conspiracy formed against him, met the insurgents at Gateshead Fell, and, entering the town after the defeat of his opponents, levelled it nearly with the ground. Robert Curthose, eldest son of the Conqueror, built a fortress here in 1080, which, in contradistinction to the old Roman castrum of Pons Ælii, was called the New castle, and hence the present name of the town. The barons, who under the conduct of Earl Mowbray had conspired to dethrone William Rufus, took possession of this castle, which was besieged by that monarch and taken by storm, in 1095. After the death of Henry I., the town was seized by David, King of Scotland, in support of the claims of Matilda, and continued in the possession of the Scots till 1157, when it was restored by treaty to Henry II.; against whom, in 1173, William of Scotland, surnamed the Lion, marched into England, with an army of eighty thousand men, but was made prisoner by a small number of troops under the command of Ralph de Glanville, sheriff of Yorkshire, and brought into this place.

Newcastle, from its situation as a frontier station, has participated largely in all the border feuds, and has been frequently selected as the place of rendezvous for troops destined for the invasion of Scotland, and of interview between the contending monarchs. Balliol, King of Scotland, in 1292, did homage for that crown to Edward I. in the hall of the castle, before a numerous assembly of the nobles of both countries. To arrest the progress of the Scots under Wallace, who had pillaged the neighbourhood, the parliament assembled at York, in 1298, summoned the military force of the country, and collected here in eight days an army of one hundred thousand men, which, marching into Scotland, defeated the enemy at Falkirk. During this reign the town was erected into a borough, and fortified with strong walls, which were begun by an inhabitant who had been carried off by an incursion of the Scots, and completed by his fellow townsmen, who, stimulated by his efforts, joined with him in the work. Edward II., in 1311, retired hither with his favourite Gavestone, from the pursuit of the exasperated barons, where they remained till the arrival of the baronial troops headed by the Earl of Lancaster. In 1322, the town was besieged by the Scots, who, renewing their attempts a few years afterwards, were vanquished by Edward III., who, marching hence, obtained a signal victory over them in their own territory. It was again attempted by David II., King of Scotland, during the absence of Edward in France; but his queen Philippa, assembling at Newcastle a body of sixteen thousand forces, marched against the assailants, and defeated them at Neville's Cross, with the loss of fifteen thousand of their men, and the capture of their king. In the reign of Richard II., a grand rendezvous of the military was appointed here, in 1388; and in the same year, the Scots having advanced to Durham, encamped on their return before this town, from which, after several skirmishes, they were compelled to retreat. In the reign of Henry IV., an army of thirty-seven thousand men was assembled at this place, in 1405, to oppose an insurrection under the Earl of Northumberland; and, in that of Henry VI., commissioners met in the vestry-room of St. Nicholas' church, to arrange the terms of a treaty of cessation from hostilities between the English and the Scots, which was signed in August 1451. Margaret, eldest daughter of Henry VII., was sumptuously entertained here, in 1503, on her way to Scotland, to celebrate her nuptials with James IV., to whom she had been affianced; and, in 1513, the Earl of Surrey passed through the town, with an army of twenty-six thousand men, on his way to Flodden Field, where a sanguinary contest took place, in which the Scottish king and the chief of his nobility were slain; the royal corpse having been embalmed at Berwick, was brought through Newcastle on its way for interment at Richmond, in Surrey.

The town continued to maintain its importance as a frontier, till the union of the two kingdoms in 1603, by the accession of James of Scotland to the English throne. In the insurrection of the Covenanters, during the reign of Charles I., it was surprised and taken possession of by the Scottish army, under Leslie, Montrose, and other disaffected leaders, who are said to have destroyed most of the public documents. When the war broke out between the king and the parliament, the inhabitants declared for the former; and the town, having been put into a state of defence, was besieged by the Earl of Leven, and after a gallant resistance was taken, in October 1644, and continued in the possession of the parliamentarians till the conclusion of hostilities. In the beginning of 1646, King Charles having surrendered himself to the Scots at Newark, was conveyed to Newcastle, where he continued till the arrival of the parliamentary commissioners, to whose custody he was transferred in 1647, on the departure of the Scots, and by whose directions he was conducted to London. Tedcastle, which occupied a lofty eminence, was a building of great strength, and, with its several wards, comprised an area of more than three acres: the walls were of a thickness varying from fourteen and a half to seventeen feet. After being dismantled it was used as a prison, and for holding the assizes for the county and, though the town had been made a county of itself, the castle and its precincts still formed part of the county of Northumberland: the site and remains of this ancient building were purchased by the corporation in 1812, since which time considerable alterations and additions have been made, but not in harmony with its original character, which was in the early Norman style of architecture. In the rebellion of 1745, Newcastle was the head-quarters of the king's forces under General Wade, prior to their advance into Scotland, where the insurgents were defeated at Culloden, in April 1746.

The town is situated on the summit and declivities of three lofty eminences, rising abruptly from the northern bank of the river Tyne, over which is an elegant stone bridge, finished in 1781, of nine elliptic arches, built at an expense, with subsequent alterations, of £60,000, and connecting Newcastle with the suburb of Gateshead: it extends nearly two miles along the banks of the river, from east to west. The streets in the more ancient part are inconveniently narrow, and the houses irregularly built in the Elizabethan style; in the modern parts are spacious streets and squares, containing handsome and uniform ranges of elegant building, among which, Eldon and Charlotte squares, and Mosley-street, Dean-street, Blackett-street, the Leazes Terrace, and others, have been recently erected, and other plans are now in progress for the enlargement and improvement of the town: it is well paved, and lighted with gas. The inhabitants are amply supplied with water, by aqueducts from Spring gardens, Coxlodge, the town moor, and other places in the vicinity. A Literary and Philosophical Society was instituted in 1793; a part of the funds is appropriated to the maintenance of a lectureship, commenced in 1802, under the title of the New Institution, and a course of lectures is periodically delivered on subjects of natural and experimental philosophy: the buildings, erected in 1825, at an expense of £13,885, and forming a handsome structure of the Doric order, comprise a museum, a library, and a room for an extensive philosophical apparatus, with other apartments and offices: the library contains nine thousand volumes, and is ornamented with a marble bust of the late Dr. Charles Hutton, by Chantrey; a bust of Mr. Thomas Bewick, by Bailey; and a cast from the bust of the late Mr. James Watt, presented by his son. The Antiquarian Society was established in 1813, and the members hold their meetings in a part of the buildings of the Philosophical Society; they have a museum of coins, Roman altars, funereal inscriptions, &c., and a library of works on philosophical and antiquarian subjects; and a volume of Transactions is annually published, under the title "Archæologia Æliana." An institution for the promotion of the fine arts, formed in 1822, is under the direction of a president and a committee, and exhibition rooms, of elegant proportions, have lately been erected. A Botanic and Horticultural Society was established in 1824, a Law Society in 1826, and a Natural History Society in 1829. In addition to the New library, already noticed, are various others containing valuable collections, among which are those of St. Nicholas, the Trinity House, Hanover-square chapel, besides numerous congregational libraries, and a medical library: there are several subscription news-rooms, billiard-rooms, a racquet-court, and similar sources of amusement. The theatre royal, a handsome building, erected at an expense of £6281, was opened in 1788, and is generally open four months in the year, there being performances during the assizes and races: the interior is well arranged and appropriately decorated, and is capable of accommodating one thousand three hundred and fifty persons. A circus also, for equestrian exercises and the performance of pantomimes, was opened in 1789. The assembly-rooms, an elegant edifice in the Grecian style of architecture, with a lofty Ionic portico rising in the centre of the front to a considerable height above the wings, and supporting a triangular pediment, form a handsome suite of apartments, of which, the principal is ninety-four feet long, thirty-six feet in width, and thirty-two feet high: it is lighted by brilliant chandeliers of cut glass; the card and refreshment rooms are of corresponding character, and are ornamented with a good painting, by Downman, of Sir John Falstaff and the Merry Wives of Windsor: the building, with its furniture, cost about £6700, of which sum, the corporation subscribed £200. A Philharmonic and Choral Society hold occasional meetings. Races take place annually in July: the course is well adapted to the purpose, and the grand stand, a handsome building of stone, erected by subscription in 1800, affords good accommodation to the numerous visitors. Public baths of every kind were erected in 1781, near the West gate, and are provided with every requisite accommodation. The artillery barracks and dépôt form an extensive range of building, enclosed within a stone wall: they were erected in 1807, at an expense of £40,000, and are chiefly occupied by cavalry. The environs are pleasant, and contain much diversified and romantic scenery, particularly the vales called Pandon, Jesmond, and Heaton deans. Bridges have been constructed across the deep dells in several parts, which have a picturesque appearance: the bridge over Pandon dean was erected in 1812, at an expense of £7448. 12. 10.

Newcastle has been one of the principal seats of trade from a very early period: the extensive mineral districts abounding with coal, of which prodigious quantities are exported, not only to London and every part of Great Britain, but also to France, Holland, and Germany, and the numerous foundries and manufactories, for the establishment of which the abundance of that mineral has afforded the greatest facility, have contributed materially to the increase of the trade. The harbour, which is deep, and affords secure shelter, is accessible to ships of four hundred tons' burden: the quay, which is commodious and well adapted to the loading and unloading of merchandise, is five hundred and forty yards in length, and is, with the exception of that of Yarmouth, the largest in the kingdom. The principal exports are coal and the produce of the various manufactories in the town and neighbourhood, namely, tin, brass, and other metals, lead, cast and wrought iron, glass, pottery, chemical productions, copperas, soap, colours, grindstones, salt, and salmon from the fisheries: the annual produce of the lead mines is estimated at twenty thousand tons, at the least; the value of glass manufactured, in its different varieties, is about £500,000 annually, and the quantity of coal sent from the port in 1826, was eight hundred and sixty-three thousand and fifty-seven Newcastle chaldrons, containing each sixty-eight Winchester bushels; of which, eight hundred thousand four hundred and thirty-seven chaldrons were sent coastwise, and sixty-two thousand six hundred and twenty were exported. This branch of trade affords employment to about seventy-five thousand persons; its weekly produce has been estimated at £60,000, and the annual duty at £600,000. The chief imports are wine, spirituous liquors, and fruit from the southern parts of Europe; corn, timber, flax, tallow, and hides from the Baltic, and various other commodities from the opposite coasts: there is also a considerable trade with North America. A few vessels sail annually to Davis' Straits, on account of the whale fishery. The number of vessels which cleared out, in 1819, was, coastwise, eight thousand eight hundred and twenty-eight; and to foreign ports, nine hundred and ninety-five: the number which entered inwards from foreign ports, in 1826, was three hundred British, and two hundred and twenty-six foreign; and of those which cleared outwards, eight hundred and eighty-five British, and four hundred and forty-five foreign. The number of vessels belonging to the port, in 1830, was nine hundred and eighty-seven ships, and fifty-nine steam-boats; and the amount of tonnage was two hundred and two thousand three hundred and seventy-nine. The jurisdiction of the port extends over the river Tyne, from Sparhawk in the sea to Hedwin streams, and its extent is navigated annually by the corporation, who are conservators of the river, and in whom the jurisdiction was vested on the abolition of the admiralty court, by Lord Howard of Effingham, Lord High Admiral of England, and admiral of the port. A plan for the improvement of the navigation of the Tyne has been produced by Mr. Rennie, the engineer, the probable expense of which is estimated at £519,320, but it has not yet been carried into execution. The Newcastle Association, in connexion with the "Royal National Institution for the Preservation of Life from Shipwreck," have ten stations along the coast, extending from South Shields to Berwick upon Tweed, at each of which life boats and apparatus are placed, in constant readiness to render assistance to vessels in distress. Ship-building is carried on to a considerable extent: there are large manufactories for ropes and sail-cloth: fire-bricks, coal-tar, and brown paper, are made in large quantities; and there are numerous tanneries, breweries, iron-foundries, and various other works. The salmon fishery, for which the town was distinguished, has materially declined, which is attributed to the construction of locks at Bywell and Winlaton mills, whereby the fish are prevented ascending the smaller streams during the spawning season; to the pollution of the Tyne, by the discharge of foetid mineral and other deleterious water from the great number of manufactories upon its banks; and to the agitation of the river, by the steam-boats which daily ply between this town and Shields. On the banks of the river are numerous mills for grinding corn. The custom-house, built in 1765, having become insufficient for the increased trade of the port, it is now being enlarged, and improved in its external appearance: it is situated nearly in the centre of the quay. The duties paid in 1772 were £56,000, and in 1824 they had increased to nearly half a million sterling per annum. A chamber of commerce was established in 1815. The inland trade is also very considerable, and is likely to be greatly extended by the construction of a rail-road from Newcastle to Carlisle, which is now in progress. The market days are Tuesday and Saturday: the market for wheat and rye is held in St. Nicholas' square, for oats in the Bigg market; the grain is pitched in sacks: the fish-market is held in a handsome and commodious building, supported on a circular range of Doric columns, at the east end of the exchange, and general markets for provisions of every kind are held daily. The fairs commence on August 1st and October 29th, for woollen cloth, hardware, and toys, and continue nine days, on the first of which horses and cattle are sold; August 13th and October 30th, for leather; and

November 22nd, which is called the Stone's fair, and is chiefly for fat cattle. Among the numerous improvements in contemplation is the formation of a spacious corn-exchange, this being one of the greatest corn markets in the kingdom.

Newcastle, which is a borough by prescription, was first incorporated by Henry II., separated from the county of Northumberland and made a county of itself by Henry IV., under the designation of "The Town and County of the Town of Newcastle upon Tyne," and was exempted by Henry VI. from the jurisdiction of the high constable, marshal, and admiral of England: these several privileges were confirmed and extended by Queen Elizabeth, who granted them, in 1589, a new charter, ratified by succeeding sovereigns, under which the government is vested in a mayor, recorder, ten aldermen, a sheriff, twenty-four common councilmen, assisted by a town clerk, under-sheriff, sword bearer, eight chamberlains, two coroners, water-bailiff, quay-master, eight serjeants at mace, and other officers. The mayor and other officers are chosen annually, by a body of twenty-four electors, who are themselves appointed annually, under the regulations of the charter. The mayor, recorder, and aldermen, are justices of the peace within the town and county of the town. The borough is divided into twenty-four wards, for each of which two constables are appointed. The incorporated fraternities, several of which have separate halls, exercise important privileges; of these the twelve principal send two deputies, and the fifteen by-trades one each, to the election of the officers of the corporation. The freedom of the borough is inherited by all the sons of freemen, and is obtained by servitude to a resident freeman, or by gift of the corporation, but the power of conferring the franchise by gift is rarely exercised: among the privileges are exemption from toll and quay-dues, and the liberty of depasturing cattle on the town moor is secured by act of parliament to resident burgesses, and resident widows of deceased burgesses. Courts of assize and quarter session for the town and county of the town are held, for the trial of all offenders; two courts of record, for the recovery of debts and the determination of pleas to any amount; one held every Monday, at which the mayor presides, in causes relating to free burgesses or their widows; and the other on the Wednesday and Friday in every week, at which the sheriff presides, in causes relating to such inhabitants of the town or county of the town as are not free burgesses: in both these courts the recorder sits as judge, or assessor. A court of requests is held, on the first Wednesday in every month, by commissioners, under an act passed in the 1st of William and Mary, for the recovery of debts under 40s., the jurisdiction of which extends over the town and liberties. A guild is held thrice a year, for the purpose of proclaiming the names and titles of persons seeking admission to the freedom of the borough. The court of pie-powder has fallen into disuse. The borough first exercised the elective franchise in the 23rd of Edward I., since which time it has returned two members to parliament: the right of election is vested in the free burgesses, whether resident or not, the number of whom is about three thousand five hundred: the sheriff is the returning officer.

The guildhall, in which the assizes, sessions, and other courts for the town and county of the town are held, forms part of an extensive range of buildings, which include also an exchange, merchants' court, and various other offices: they were erected in 1658, at an expense of £10,700; and, in 1809, underwent considerable alteration and enlargement. The hall is a spacious room ninety-two feet long and thirty feet wide; the ceiling is ornamented with paintings, and the floor laid with chequered marble; at the foot of the grand staircase is a statue of Charles II., in Roman costume; above the bench are full-length portraits of Charles II. and James II., between which is that of George III.; on one side of the hall is the portrait of Lord Chancellor Eldon, and on the other that of Lord Stowell, Judge of the Admiralty court; and at the east end, above the entrance to the merchants' hall, is a portrait of Admiral Lord Collingwood. The grand staircase leading to the merchants' court is in a handsome style, and lighted by a dome; the court is thirty feet square, with a richly groined roof, twenty-two feet high; above these are offices for the town clerk and other officers of the corporation, and an apartment fire-proof, in which the town records are deposited. The mansion-house, erected in 1691, at an expense of £6000, is a handsome edifice of brick, with quoins and cornices of stone, and has a pleasant terrace overlooking the river on the south: the grand saloon is ornamented with various kinds of armour tastefully displayed; the principal staircase, of black oak, leads into a room forty-two feet in length, handsomely decorated, and used as a ball-room on public occasions; the banqueting-room is fifty feet long, and ornamented with two views of the town, painted by Richardson, and with engraved portraits of several distinguished characters; the mayor's parlour contains the regalia; the drawing-room is splendidly furnished, and the other apartments are of corresponding style. The mayor resides in the mansion-house during his mayoralty, and has an allowance of £2100 per annum, a state coach and barge, and an elegant service of plate. The common gaol and house of correction for the town and county of the town is a spacious building of stone, commenced in 1823, and completed in 1828: the exterior has a characteristic appearance of massive strength; the entrance in the centre is through a square gateway tower leading to the keeper's house and other offices, from which diverge six radiating wards, with day-rooms and airing-yards, for the classification of prisoners: the expense of the building, which is in every respect well adapted to its purpose, was £35,000. The new courts for the county of Northumberland, erected on that part of the precincts of the castle which is included within that county, were commenced in 1810, and form a handsome range of building, one hundred and forty-four feet in length and seventy-two in breadth, having on the south front a noble portico of six lofty fluted columns of the Doric order, supporting a handsome frieze, cornice, and architrave, and on the north, a similar portico of four columns, leading into the grand entrance hall, on the right of which is the Crown court, and on the left the Nisi Prius court, commodiously arranged, and having large galleries for the admission of the public: beyond these are the grand jury room, with which both the courts have communication; in the wings are rooms for the judge, petty juries, and witnesses, above which are apartments for the gaoler and other officers connected with the courts; under the courts are ranges of cells for prisoners, from which is a communication with the Crown bar. These buildings, which are in the purest style of architecture, were erected at an expense of £52,000, of which the Duke of Northumberland, whose portrait is in the grand jury room, contributed £3000. In digging for the foundation, two Roman altars, some coins, and other relics of antiquity were found.

The town, originally comprising but one parish, is now divided into four parochial districts, St. Nicholas', the original parish, All Saints', St. Andrew's, and St. John's, in the archdeaconry of Northumberland, and diocese of Durham. The living of St. Nicholas' is a vicarage, rated in the king's books at £50, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Carlisle. The church, originally built in 1091, was burnt down in 1216, and the present structure was rebuilt in 1359. It is a spacious cruciform structure, two hundred and forty feet long, and seventy-three broad, principally in the decorated style of English architecture, with a steeple one hundred and ninety-five feet high, of singular beauty, in the later style: from the battlements of the tower rise octagonal turrets, crowned with crocketed pinnacles, of which the central are lower than those at the angles; from these spring four flying buttresses of graceful curve, meeting in a point, and supporting an elegant lantern turret, unequalled in beauty, and surmounted by a small crocketed spire, terminating in a vane: the interior retains many vestiges of its former antiquity, among which are the carved oak roofs, the font, and other relics; in the east window is a painting of our Saviour bearing his cross, presented, at the cost of £50, by the corporation: over the communion table is a fine painting of the Last Supper, by J. Tintoretto, presented by Sir M. W. Ridley, Bart. During the occupation of the town by the Scottish army, many of the ancient monuments were destroyed, and others were removed in the repairs and modernizations which have taken place; of those that remain, the principal are to the memory of Sir Matthew White Ridley, M.P., Vice-Admiral Collingwood, the Rev. Hugh Moises, A.M., Calverley Bewicke, Esq., and several others. On the southern side of the church is a building erected by the late Sir Walter Blackett, Bart., who bequeathed a salary for a librarian, for the preservation of a very ancient collection of books, the ancient library of works on Divinity, bequeathed by Dr. Thomlinson: the lower part is used as a vestry-room, and the upper for Thomlinson's library. The church, dedicated to All Saints, situated on the summit of an eminence rising abruptly from the river, was founded prior to 1286, and rebuilt in 1786: it is a handsome edifice in the Grecian style of architecture, with a lofty tower, surmounted by a light and elegant spire; the south entrance is through a noble portico of four Doric columns, on one side of which is a chapel for the performance of the funeral service, and on the other a large vestry-room, forming two handsome wings; the body of the church is of an elliptic form, with a circular portico at the west end, corresponding with the projection of the chancel at the east; the interior is beautifully arranged, and derives peculiar advantage from its elliptic form; the galleries and pews are of mahogany: the living is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £1600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar. St. Andrew's is a very ancient structure, with a low square embattled tower of large dimensions, the date of which is not known; it displays portions in various styles of architecture, from the early Norman to the later English; it suffered much in the siege of the town, in 1644, and has undergone repeated alterations and repairs; the interior contains numerous ancient monuments: the living is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £2200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar. The church of St. John the Baptist is a spacious and ancient cruciform structure, founded prior to 1286, in the early style of English architecture, with a square embattled tower; the windows, which are of large dimensions, were formerly ornamented with painted glass, of which there is scarcely any vestige: there are several ancient monuments, and an ancient font, in this church: the churchyard contains the remains of John Cunningham, the pastoral poet, who died here in 1773: the living is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £1800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar. The pious Robert Rhodes, who died about 1490, was a liberal benefactor to this, as well as to most of the other churches in the town. St. Anne's chapel was built in 1768, by the corporation, who endowed a lectureship in it, and also make an annual voluntary payment to the minister, who is appointed by the vicar, but the payment being at the will of the corporation, their nomination of a candidate is always attended to. The ancient chapel near the bridge, dedicated to St. Thomas à Becket, and annexed to the hospital of St. Mary Magdalene, after being repeatedly curtailed in its dimensions, was taken down, and a handsome edifice, in the decorated style of English architecture, erected in the Magdalene meadows: it is a beautiful structure, with a lofty tower of elegant design and proportion, having slender octagonal buttresses at the angles, carried above the battlements, terminating in canopies, and surmounted by pinnacles: the belfry windows are lofty, and ornamented with tracery; over the western entrance, which is through a stately arch, with deeply receding mouldings, is an elegant triple shrine, finely sculptured; the sides of the church are strengthened with panelled buttresses of two stages, ornamented with canopies, of which those at the angles rise considerably above the roof: the interior is lighted on each side by a noble and lofty range of windows of two lights, enriched with tracery, and corresponds in every respect with the general beauty of style for which the exterior is distinguished: the master of the hospital, who is appointed by the corporation, is the incumbent. There are two places of worship for Baptists, one for the Society of Friends, three for Independents, two for Wesleyan and one each for Independent and Primitive Methodists, and those of the New Connexion, five for members of the Scottish Kirk, and one each for the Scots relief congregation, the Seceders, and Separatists from them, one each for Burghers, Antiburghers, Sandemanians, Swedenborgians, and Unitarians, and a Roman Catholic chapel.

The free grammar school was founded by Thomas Horsley, who was mayor in 1525 and 1533, and made a royal foundation in the 42nd of Elizabeth; and a part of the buildings of St. Mary's hospital was appropriated to its use by the corporation, who added four marks per annum to the original endowment; they have the appointment of the master, who has a salary of £120 per annum: it is open for the gratuitous instruction of all boys of the town, and has, in common with other schools in the diocese, an interest in twelve exhibitions, of £20 per annum each, to Lincoln College, Oxford, founded by Lord Crewe; two exhibitions to either of the Universities, of £10 per annum each, founded by Dr. Hartwell, for boys from this town and Durham; and a scholarship in Emanuel College, Cambridge, founded for boys from the same schools by Dr. Michael Smith. Bishop Ridley, the Protestant martyr, is stated to have received the rudiments of his education in this school, though more probably in some similar establishment in the town, prior to its foundation; since which period Lords Eldon and Stowell, Vice-Admiral Lord Collingwood, Sir Robert Chambers, William Elstob, an antiquary and divine; the poet Akenside; the Rev. George Hall, Bishop of Dromore; and the Rev. John Brand, author of a history of Newcastle, and Secretary to the Antiquarian Society of London, received the early part of their education in this school. The Trinity House school was established in 1712, and rebuilt in 1753, for the instruction of the children of members of that fraternity, in writing, arithmetic, and the mathematics: the master has a salary of £80 per annum, with a house, and the privilege of taking twenty boarders, or of instructing twenty scholars in addition to those on the foundation. A charity school was founded in the parish of St. Nicholas, in 1705, by Mrs. Eleanor Allen, who endowed it with a certain sum, which, being augmented by subsequent benefactions, is appropriated to the clothing and instruction of forty boys and forty girls: this school was incorporated with the Clergy Jubilee school, founded in 1819, in commemoration of the attainment of the fiftieth year of his prelacy by the late Bishop of Durham, for an indefinite number of children, who are instructed on Dr. Bell's system. There are about four hundred and eighty-five boys and one hundred and fifty girls in the school; the boys on the foundation, at fourteen years of age, are put to some trade or sent to sea: the revenue, including a penny a week paid by scholars not on the foundation, is about £425 per annum: the building is substantial, handsome, and commodious. St. Andrew's school was founded, in 1705, by Sir William Blackett, Bart., for the education of thirty boys, clothed from a fund appropriated by his son in 1728; the number has been augmented to thirty-four by subsequent endowment. A similar establishment, for fifteen girls, was instituted in this part of the parish, in 1772. St. John's charity school was founded, in 1705, by Mr. John Ord, who endowed it with property producing about £54 per annum, for the clothing and instruction of twenty boys, each of whom receives an apprentice-fee of forty shillings on leaving the school. All Saints' charity school, established in 1709, and supported by subscription, affords clothing and instruction to forty boys and forty girls; the boys receive an apprentice-fee of forty shillings, and the girls a donation of twenty shillings, on leaving the school. St. Ann's chapel school was built, in 1682, by the corporation, by whom it is supported. Hanover-square school, in which fifteen boys are educated and clothed, is chiefly supported by subscriptions. The Royal Jubilee school was established in 1810, to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of the accession of George III., and a handsome building erected for the purpose, at an expense of £2195; a good library was annexed to it in 1822: the master's salary is £120 per annum; the scholars are instructed on the Lancasterian plan, and the school is supported by subscription. The Improved school for girls was established in 1812, and is supported by subscription; the building, erected in 1814, is neat and commodious. The Carpenter's Tower school, instituted in 1822, is chiefly supported by the Wesleyan Methodists: the Union day school affords instruction to one hundred girls; and there are numerous similar establishments and Sunday schools (the latter under the superintendence of a Sunday-school Union, formed in 1815), supported by the members of the established church, and the various congregations of dissenters. Infant schools have been established in various parts of the town since the year 1825, and are liberally supported and numerous attended.

The infirmary was instituted in 1751, and a commodious and handsome building was erected (on a piece of ground presented by the corporation, who also subscribe £100 a year), in 1752, at an expense of £3700, and a chapel, dedicated to St. Luke, was consecrated in 1754: in 1801, a plan for enlarging the buildings was adopted by the governors, and £5329 was subscribed for the purpose. The building, which is situated at a short distance from the town, is a plain but neat edifice of stone, four stories in height, with a wing of brick two stories high: it contains warm baths on an improved principle, and every accommodation requisite for the patients and the recovery of their health: in the governors' room are portraits of Sir Walter Blackett, Bart., by Reynolds; Matthew Ridley, Esq.; Dr. Joseph Butler, Bishop of Durham; Dr. Benson, Bishop of Gloucester, and other benefactors to the institution: it is principally supported by subscription, and a fund arising from benefactions, among which is a sum bequeathed by Mrs. E. Davison, of Durham, for the relief of patients dismissed as incurable: the average number of in-patients is about one hundred and twenty, and the annual expenditure about £3000. The dispensary was established in 1777, and an appropriate building was purchased and adapted to its use in 1790; a department for the recovery of persons apparently drowned was, in 1789, added to the original institution; it is supported by subscription, and gratuitously visited by members of the medical profession resident in the town and neighbourhood. The lying-in hospital was founded in 1760, and the present building erected, at an expense of £1550, in 1826: it is supported by subscription, and, under good regulations, is open to the poor married women of the town and neighbourhood. The society for the relief of pregnant women at their own houses was instituted in 1760, and is liberally supported. The house of recovery from fever, and other contagious diseases not admissible into the infirmary, was erected in 1804, at an expense of £1800, on a site of land granted for that purpose by the corporation: it is well regulated and amply supported by subscription, and is open to persons not objects of charity, on payment of a moderate remuneration. The Lock hospital, instituted in 1814, and the infirmary for diseases of the eye, established in 1822, are supported by subscription. The lunatic asylum was erected, by subscription, upon a part of the Warden Close, granted by the corporation, in 1767, and was greatly enlarged and improved by that body in 1824: it contains a complete suite of wards for the classification of the patients, who are provided with every accommodation requisite for their health and consistent with their condition; the establishment comprises warm, cold, and shower baths, and is conducted on a system combining humanity and skill in the treatment of that malady.

Jesus' hospital was founded by the corporation, in 1681, for the maintenance of freemen, their widows, and children: the premises are neatly built of brick, three stories high; in front is a piazza, forming a pleasant walk ninety-one feet in length, and in front of the upper stories are galleries extending the whole length of the building: it contains forty-two apartments, for the reception of as many inmates, who receive each £13 per annum from the corporation, with an allowance of coal and other necessaries. Mrs. Davison's hospital was founded in 1719, and endowed by her with £940, in consideration of which an annuity of £55 per annum is paid by the corporation, who erected the present buildings, in 1754, for the accommodation of a governess and five sisters, widows of Protestant clergymen, merchants, or freemen of the town, who are appointed by the corporation, and have an annual income of £13, with a supply of coal. An hospital was also founded, in 1754, by Thomas Davison and his sisters, who gave £1200 in trust for that purpose to the corporation, who erected apartments, adjoining the two former hospitals, for six unmarried women, daughters or widows of burgesses, who have an allowance of £13 per annum, with a supply of coal and other necessaries. Sir Walter Blackett's hospital was founded in 1754, for six unmarried burgesses, and endowed by him with £1200, given in trust to the corporation, by whom the building was erected, and by whom the inmates are appointed; they have the same allowance as the inmates of Jesus' hospital. The Westgate hospital, containing twenty apartments, arranged in a quadrangular building of stone, in the ancient style of English architecture, was founded by the corporation, to celebrate the peace with France, in 1814, and in 1817 it was augmented by twenty additional rooms, for a governor and twenty brethren and sisters, who receive each five shillings per week, paid monthly, and a supply of coal, the governor having £2 per annum extra. The Trinity almshouses were founded by the guild, or fraternity, of the Blessed Trinity, originally incorporated in 1492, and refounded in the reign of Elizabeth, in 1584, for the regulation of the pilotage of the harbour, and the erection of lighthouses on the coast: the buildings comprise a hall for the transaction of business, a chapel, and two ranges of dwellings for thirteen aged men and thirteen widows, who receive each £1. 8. per month, with other necessary supplies: connected with this institution are two classes of out-pensioners, the first of which receives £7, and the second £5, per annum each, with an extra allowance of £1 per annum for every child under fourteen years of age: the total number of brethren is about three hundred and forty. The association for the preservation of life from shipwreck was instituted, under the patronage of this society, in 1825.

The Keelmen's hospital was founded in 1788, and is under the management of twenty-one guardians, who are empowered to levy one penny per chaldron on the freight of all keels laden with coal at the port; these funds are augmented by the payment of one farthing per chaldron on all coal exported from the Tyne, by the owners or lessees of the mines, according to agreement, confirmed by act of parliament in 1820: the buildings, which were erected in 1701, on ground granted by the corporation, at an expense of £2000, comprise an office, a club-room, and sixty dwellings for the reception of poor keelmen, whose weekly allowance varies, according to circumstances, from one to five shillings. The Society of the Sons of the Clergy of the diocese of Durham and Hexhamshire was instituted in 1709, and, in 1725, united with a similar institution for the deaneries of Alnwick and Bambrough; the anniversary meetings are held alternately at Durham and at Newcastle. A fund for the widows of Protestant dissenting ministers was established in 1764; the society hold their meetings in this town, at Alnwick, and at Morpeth, in rotation. There are numerous societies for the relief of the poor and indigent of every class, among which are the Friendless Poor Society, formed in 1797; the Benevolent Society, in 1811; the Society for clothing distressed females, in 1815; the Strangers' Friend Society, in 1821; the Repository for the sale of the work of industrious females, opened in 1825; the Society for the relief of the indigent sick, instituted in 1827, and various others. Among the provident societies are, the Association of Protestant schoolmasters of the North of England, established in 1774; the Liberal Society of Tradesmen, in 1791; the Clerks' Society, in 1807; the Roman Catholics' Friendly Society, in 1823; and numerous benefit societies, consisting in the aggregate of about sixteen thousand members.

Of the various monastic establishments existing here at a very remote period of antiquity there are scarcely any vestiges; and of several the memorial is preserved only in the names which they have given to different parts of the town: among these was a small Benedictine nunnery, founded in the reign of William the Conqueror, and dedicated to St. Bartholomew, the revenue of which, at the dissolution, was £37. 4. 2.; a convent of Dominican friars, founded in 1260, by Sir Peter Scot and his son, of which there are some remains; a convent of Franciscans, founded in the reign of Henry III.; a priory of brethren of the order De Pœnitentiâ Jesu Christi, of which the first notice occurs in the year 1268; a priory of Carmelites, supposed to have been founded here in the reign of Henry III.; an establishment of Augustine friars, said to have been founded, in 1290, by Lord Ros, Baron of Wark upon Tweed; and the priory of St. Michael, founded in 1360, for brethren of the order of the Holy Trinity, associated for the redemption of captives. There still exist two hospitals, one founded by Henry I., and dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene, for a master and three brethren, to which was annexed the hospital of St. Thomas, near the bridge; and the other, called the hospital of St. Mary the Virgin, in Westgate, for a master and six brethren, the remains of which are still apparent, and the ancient chapel is now appropriated to the use of the free grammar school.

Newcastle has been distinguished as the birthplace of many eminent characters, among whom are the celebrated Dr. John Scot, usually called "Duns Scotus," who received his education in the Franciscan convent in this town; and his disciple and panegyrist, Hugh of Newcastle, a native of the town, and a friar of the same convent; Dr. Nicholas Durham, a resident in the convent of the White friars, in 1360, and a zealous opponent of Wickliff; William Elstob, a learned antiquary and divine, who was born in 1673; and his sister Elizabeth Elstob, born in 1683, and eminent for her knowledge of Saxon literature; Dr. Richard Grey, author of the Memoria Technica, who was born in 1694; Mark Akenside, poet and physician, born in 1721; the Rev. Henry Bourne, historian of the town, who died in 1733; the Rev. John Brand, a subsequent historian, born in 1743; Sir Robert Chambers, Judge of the Supreme Court of Judicature at Calcutta, born in 1737; Dr. Charles Hutton, born in the same year, an eminent mathematician, author of the Mathematical and Philosophical Dictionary, Tables of Logarithms, a Course of Mathematics, and numerous other works, and one of the compilers employed in the abridgment of the philosophical transactions of the Royal Society; John Scott, Earl of Eldon, and late Lord High Chancellor of England, born in 1751; and his brother, William Scott, Baron Stowell, born in 1745; and Cuthbert, late Baron Collingwood, Vice-Admiral of the Red, born in 1748; Mr. Thomas Bewick, the celebrated engraver on wood, a native of Cherryburn, fourteen miles from Newcastle, resided in this town from 1767 till his decease.

NEWCHURCH, or WHITEGATE, county palatine of CHESTER.—See WHITEGATE.

NEWCHURCH, a township in that part of the parish of KINNERLEY which is in the hundred of WOLPHY, county of HEREFORD. The population is returned with the parish.

NEWCHURCH, a parish in the liberty of ROMNEY-MARSH, though locally in the hundred of Newchurch, lathe of SHEPWAY, county of KENT, 5 miles (N.) from New Romney, containing 281 inhabitants. The living comprises a rectory and a vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury; the rectory is rated in the king's books at £8. 4. 2., and the vicarage at £19. 16. 0½. The church is dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul.

NEWCHURCH, a chapelry in the parish of WINWICK, hundred of WEST DERBY, county palatine of LANCASTER, 6 miles (E. by S.) from Newton in Mackerfield. The population is returned with the parish. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Winwick, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester.

NEWCHURCH, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of CALDICOTT, county of MONMOUTH, 6 miles (N. W. by W.) from Chepstow, containing 562 inhabitants, of which number, 422 are in the East, and 140 in the West, division. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaff, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £1400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Duke of Beaufort.

NEWCHURCH, a parish in the liberty of EAST MEDINA, Isle of Wight division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 4½ miles (S. E. by E.) from Newport, containing, with the north and south divisions and the town of Ryde, 3945 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £12. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bristol. The church is dedicated to All Saints. Maurice Bockland, in 1755, gave land whereon to build a school-house, and William Bowles bequeathed £500 for its erection and endowment: the annual income, including other bequests, is £7.

NEWCHURCH in PENDLE-FOREST, a chapelry in that part of the parish of WHALLEY which is in the higher division of the hundred of BLACKBURN, county palatine of LANCASTER, 4½ miles (W.) from Colne. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, endowed with £10 per annum private benefaction, and £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Earl Howe. The chapel is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists, also an endowed free school.

NEWCHURCH in ROSSENDALE-FOREST, a chapelry in that part of the parish of WHALLEY which is in the higher division of the hundred of BLACKBURN, county palatine of LANCASTER, 3½ miles (E. S. E.) from Haslingden, containing, with Bacup, Deadwin-Clough, Tunstead, and Wolfenden, 8557 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Whalley. The church is dedicated to the Holy Trinity. The Wesleyan Methodists and Unitarians have each a place of worship here, and the former a Sunday school. A free grammar school was founded, in 1701, by Edward Ashworth and John Hoyle, who surrendered an estate, now producing an annual income of £60, in support of the master, for teaching about thirty-five children. The river Irwell passes through the parish, in which cotton and woollen goods are manufactured to a considerable extent, in their various branches. Coal mines and quarries of freestone, slate, &c., abound here. A fair for cattle is held on April 29th, and one for cattle, clothing, and pedlary, on June 29th.

NEWDIGATE, a parish comprising the hamlet of Newdigate, in the first division of the hundred of REIGATE, but chiefly in the second division of the hundred of COPTHORNE, county of SURREY, 5¾ miles (S. S. E.) from Dorking, containing 579 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Surrey, and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £8. 18. 4., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, is principally in the early style of English architecture. George Steer, in 1661, gave a school-house, and endowed it with a rent-charge of £6. 13. 4. a year, to which George Booth, in 1681, added £100; the present annual income amounts to upwards of £20, and is applied to the education of about eighteen poor children.

NEWENDEN-LIBERTY, a parish in the hundred of SELBRITTENDEN, lathe of SCRAY, county of KENT, 5½ miles (S. W. by S.) from Tenterden, containing 151 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £7. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. This place, now an inconsiderable village, but still governed by a bailiff and under-bailiff, independent of the hundred, was formerly a large city and sea-port, and is said to have contained fifty-two taverns. The Roman station Anderidæ has by some been fixed near this spot, where large remains of earthworks, many Roman coins, foundations, and other antiquities have been from time to time discovered. The river Rother, which is crossed by a modern brick bridge of three arches, on the high road from Kent to Sussex, runs through the parish. A fair, principally for pedlary, is held on July 1st. At Losenden are the remains of a Carmelite friary, founded in 1241, by Sir Thomas Fitz-Aucher, Knt., in honour of the Blessed Virgin. Here is a powerful chalybeate spring.

NEWENT, a parish in the hundred of BOTLOE, county of GLOUCESTER, comprising the liberty and market town of Newent, and the tythings of Bouldon with Killcot, Compton, Cugley, and Malswick, and containing 2660 inhabitants, of which number, 1287 are in the town of Newent, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W.) from Gloucester, and 112 (W. N. W.) from London. The name of this place is supposed to have been derived from a new inn erected for the accommodation of travellers, on the site of a dilapidated mansion, now called the Boothall. A Benedictine priory, a cell to the abbey of Cormeille in Normandy, was founded here soon after the Conquest; and on the suppression of Alien priories it was given to the college of Fotheringhay. The town, which is situated westward of the river Severn, in the Forest of Dean, is small and irregularly built, and owes its present importance to some springs near it, which possess the same qualities as the Cheltenham water. Some coal mines were opened in the parish, but the working of them has been discontinued: the Hereford and Gloucester canal passes through the parish, and communicates by a short branch with the town. The market is on Friday; and fairs are held on the Wednesday before Easter, the Wednesday before Whitsuntide, and August 12th, and a statute fair on the 19th of September. The town, which was formerly more extensive than it is at present, was governed by a bailiff, whose office became obsolete about the end of the seventeenth century. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £23, and in the patronage of the Rev. William Andrew Foley. The church, which is dedicated to the Virgin Mary, is a spacious fabric, the work of different periods; over the porch is a tower with a lofty spire, built in 1679, as was also the roof of the nave, which is supported without pillars. There are two places of worship for Dissenters. Here are two free schools, and an unendowed almshouse for twenty poor persons of either sex; and other purposes.

NEWFIELD, a township in that part of the parish of ST. ANDREW AUCKLAND which is in the north-western division of DARLINGTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Bishop Auckland, containing 11 inhabitants.

NEW-FOREST, a township in the parish of KIRKBY-RAVENSWORTH, western division of the wapentake of GILLING, North riding of the county of YORK, 11 miles (W. N. W.) from Richmond, containing 73 inhabitants. An individual, whose name is unknown, left a rent-charge of £12 for teaching poor children.

NEWHALL, a township in the parish of ACTON, hundred of NANTWICH, county palatine of CHESTER, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Nantwich, containing 854 inhabitants. The site of the ancient castle, which suffered greatly from the incursions of the Welch, can no longer be traced.

NEWHALL, a township in the parish of DAVENHAM, hundred of NORTHWICH, county palatine of CHESTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Northwich, containing 17 inhabitants.

NEWHALL, a joint township with Stanton, in the parish of STAPENHILL, hundred of REPTON and GRESLEY, county of DERBY, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Burton upon Trent. The population is returned with Stanton. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Newhall is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s.

NEWHALL, a joint township with Clifton, in that part of the parish of OTLEY which is in the upper division of the wapentake of CLARO, West riding of the county of YORK, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile (N. N. W.) from Otley, containing, with Clifton, 208 inhabitants. This was the residence of Edward Fairfax, Esq., a celebrated poet in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I.

NEWHAM, a township in the parish of BAMBROUGH, northern division of BAMBROUGH ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 7 miles (S. E.) from Belford, containing 298 inhabitants.

NEWHAM, a township in the parish of WHALTON, western division of CASTLE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $11\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W.) from Newcastle upon Tyne, containing 76 inhabitants.

NEWHAVEN, otherwise MEECHING, a parish and sea-port, in the hundred of HOLMSTROW, rape of LEWES, county of SUSSEX, 7 miles (S.) from Lewes, 9 (E. S. E.) from Brighton, and 58 (S.) from London, containing 927 inhabitants. The ancient name of this place was Meeching, and its present appellation was probably given about 1713, on the formation of the harbour, on which its importance chiefly depends. In 1731, an act of parliament was obtained to empower commissioners to repair the piers, and to cleanse and enlarge the harbour, which during the last thirty years has been progressively improving, the frequent dredging of boulders, or large stones driven upon the beach by the tide, having essentially contributed to that effect. It is one of the best tide harbours in the channel between the Downs and the Isle of Wight, and the bay forms one of the finest roadsteads on the southern coast: with the wind from north-north-west to east by south, facility of entrance to it is afforded, when a similar attempt at other places would be perilous. The piers are one hundred and twenty feet distant from each other; the west pier is seven hundred feet in length, and the east six hundred: at low water of spring tides the depth is five feet; at high water, during the neap tides, it stands at fourteen feet; and during spring tides, from twenty to twenty-two feet. Skilful pilots are constantly stationed on the piers; and in the day-time a flag is hoisted, as soon as the depth of water in the harbour reaches ten feet, and whilst it continues so long on the ebb as it is safe for vessels to enter. Ships of three hundred and three hundred and fifty tons' burden have found shelter here during tempestuous weather. At the mouth of the harbour is a small fort, and here also is moored H. M. frigate Hyperion, with three attendant cutters, to prevent smuggling along the coast: two steam-packets sail hence to Dieppe twice a week. It is worthy of observation, that Newhaven is the nearest sea-port to the metropolis of England, and the nearest English port to that of France.

The town, which is about half a mile distant from the sea, is situated near the mouth of the Ouse, over which, about thirty-five years since, a drawbridge was erected, leading towards Sleaford, in lieu of the ferry: the streets are of neat and clean appearance, and are lighted by subscription; the houses are respectable, many of them being of modern erection: the inhabitants are supplied with water by means of wells. A new and more commodious turnpike-road to Brighton has been formed, which has proved highly advantageous to the interests of the town. In the early part of the last century the inhabitants were extensively engaged in trade, which afterwards declined, owing to the decay of the old wooden piers that protected the harbour; but from the improvement in it, and its having been constituted, under a license from the Lords of the Treasury, a bonding port for all kinds of timber, as it was previously for wine and spirits, the commercial interests of the inhabitants have considerably improved; commodious bonding warehouses have been constructed on the quay, on a principle similar to those at the West India docks. The importation of coal has been extensive and progressive for several years: it is conveyed by the navigable river Ouse to Lewes and other parts, the navigation extending twenty miles inland. There is likewise a considerable trade in the importation of foreign timber, and the exportation of English oak for the dock-yards: the coasting trade in flour, butter, and corn, is also considerable. Many of the poor are employed in collecting boulders, which are shipped for the potteries in Staffordshire, and otherwise used in building walls. Ship-building formerly constituted a considerable source of employment, and at one period several were built for the West India trade; but this branch of occupation has greatly declined, only two vessels having been built and registered here in 1825. There are two extensive breweries, and the town is noted for the excellence of its beer. The number of vessels which entered from foreign parts in 1826 was forty-three British, and five foreign; and the number of those which cleared outwards, four British, and four foreign. The number of vessels belonging to Newhaven, in March 1828, was sixteen, averaging sixty-four tons each. Here is a custom-house; and a collector, comptroller, and harbour-master, are stationed at the port. A fair for pedlary is held on the 10th of October. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Lewes, and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £8. 3. 4., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, which is dedicated to St. Michael, and originally consisted of but one aisle and a tower, in the Norman style, has undergone enlargement; one hundred and seventy-five new sittings have been added, of which one hundred and twenty are free, and towards defraying the expense of which, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels contributed £50: some windows, in the early style of English architecture, have been inserted on the south side. Near to and on the northern side of the churchyard is an obelisk, erected to commemorate the wreck of the Brazen sloop of war on the Ave rocks, near this town, during a violent storm on the morning of January 26th, 1800, when Captain Hancock and one hundred and three men were drowned, and only one was saved. A charity school, for children of both sexes, is supported by voluntary contributions. On Castle hill, about a mile from the town, westward of the mouth of the Ouse, are the remains of a military encampment; and the strata of the sub-soil of this eminence contains some curious minerals and fossils.

NEWHOLM, a joint township with Dunsley, in the parish of WHITBY, liberty of WHITBY-STRAND, North riding of the county of YORK, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W.) from Whitby, containing, with Dunsley, 259 inhabitants.

NEWICK, a parish in the hundred of BARCOMB, rape of LEWES, county of SUSSEX, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W.) from Uckfield, containing 540 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Lewes, and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £7. 17. 8½., and in the patronage of the Rev. T. B. Powell. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is principally in the early English and decorated styles of architecture. George Venables Vernon and Louisa Barbara his wife, in 1771, founded and endowed, with a rent-charge of £50, a school for the education and clothing of twelve poor girls.

NEWINGTON, a parish in the hundred of MILTON, lathe of SCRAY, county of KENT, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Milton, containing 629 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £14, and in the patronage of the Provost and Fellows of Eton College. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a handsome structure, principally in the early English style, with some windows in the decorated. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The village, which had formerly a market, is supposed to occupy the site of a town inhabited by the Britons, and after them by the Romans: the ancient Watling-street crosses the parish. In a field, called Crockfield, an abundance of Roman urns and other vessels has been found, lying in various positions, and frequently empty, which has induced an opinion that this was only the site of a Roman pottery, though eminent antiquaries have here fixed the station Durolevum, and suppose this field to have been a burial-place for the Romans stationed at the adjacent military works, numerous vestiges of which may still be traced, such as Julius Caesar's-hill, Standard-hill, Key-street, anciently Caii Stratum, &c. There is a traditionary account of a nunnery, and afterwards of a college of Secular canons, having existed here.

NEWINGTON, a parish in the hundred of EWELME, county of OXFORD, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by E.) from Wallingford, containing, with the chapelry of Brightwell-Prior, the tythings of Brockhampton and Holcomb, and the liberty of Berrick-Prior, 445 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, with Brightwell-Prior, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £18. 13. 4. A small rent-charge was bequeathed by Mary White, in 1729, for teaching three children of the hamlet of Berwick.

NEWINGTON next HYTHE, a parish in the hundred of FOLKESTONE, lathe of SHEPWAY, county of KENT, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Hythe, containing 498 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, united to the rectory of Cheriton, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £7. 12. 6. The church, dedicated to St. Nicholas, is an embattled structure, partly in the decorated style of architecture. The ancient chapel of St. Nicholas, every vestige of which has disappeared, was once famous for the resort of fishermen to make offerings at the shrine of their patron saint, on escaping imminent dangers at sea. The Grand Military canal passes through a detached portion of the parish. From an eminence near the fine mansion of Beachborough is a noble prospect over the country, and across the channel to the coast of France. Roman coins have been dug up in the village, and in 1760, three human skeletons, with beads of agate, pebbles, glass, coral, and red earth, were discovered in levelling a fence.

NEWINGTON (ST. MARY), or NEWINGTON-BUTTS, a parish in the eastern division of the hundred of BRIXTON, county of SURREY, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (S.) from London, containing, with the hamlet of Walworth, 33,047 inhabitants. This parish obtained the adjunct by which it is distinguished from other parishes of the same name from the shooting butts anciently erected in it. It has, by the recent addition of numerous ranges of building in various parts, become one of the most populous parishes in the suburbs of the metropolis, and is inhabited by numerous families, whose residences are in general respectable, and in some instances distinguished by the pleasantness of their situation, and the style of their architecture. Among the more ancient of the buildings are a few which still preserve considerable vestiges of their original character; but by far the greater part of the parish consists of wide and extended ranges, of modern erection and appearance: the principal roads leading through the village, from the metropolis to Camberwell and Clapham, and the streets which generally diverge from them at right angles, are partially paved, and well lighted with gas, and the inhabitants are amply supplied with water by the New Lambeth water-works. Among the more recent improvements which have contributed to extend the parish, are the handsome ranges of houses on the north and east sides of Kennington-common, Doddington-grove, Surrey-square, and several lines of houses on the Kent road, together with those which have been erected in the vicinity of Trinity-square, in the centre of which a new district church has been built. The Dovor and the Brighton roads diverge from a point in this parish, at the Elephant and Castle, where the number of coaches stopping and passing is estimated at about five hundred daily. The village is not distinguished by any particular branch of manufacture, or by any other trade than what it derives from its situation as a great thoroughfare, and its proximity to London. There is a manufactory for oil of vitriol on the east side of Kennington-common, which occupies three acres of ground, and between that and the Kent road are a smelting-house for lead and antimony, a tannery, a manufactory for glue, another for tobacco pipes, with manufactories for floor-cloth and carriages, and several nursery grounds. The parish is within the jurisdiction of the court of requests for the borough of Southwark, the authority of which was extended, by an act passed in the 46th of George III., to the recovery of debts under £5: it is also within the limits of the new police establishment. The sessions-house, in which the quarter sessions for the county of Surrey are held regularly, is situated in that part of the parish which adjoins the borough of Southwark: it is a neat building of brick, containing a convenient court-room for the trial of prisoners, to which is a private communication from the adjoining prison, and rooms for the accommodation of the grand jury, the clerk of the peace, and other officers. The common gaol in Horsemonger-lane is a spacious building of brick ornamented with stone, containing nine wards for the classification of prisoners, with airing-yards, &c., and affording room for the reception of one hundred and fifty-six prisoners in separate cells. The Surrey asylum, for the reception, clothing, maintenance, and instruction of discharged prisoners, was instituted in 1824, under the patronage of His Royal Highness the Duke of Gloucester, and His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, and is supported by subscription: the building is handsomely constructed of brick, and is capable of receiving sixty inmates; there are at present twenty males and seven females in this institution; the former, after a due time, are apprenticed to different trades, with a small premium, and the latter placed out as servants.

The living is a rectory, in the exempt deanery of Croydon, which is within the peculiar jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £16, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Worcester. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a neat modern edifice of brick, with a small cupola and campanile turret surmounted by a dome; the interior is well arranged, and there are several handsome mural tablets: the churchyard, which is spacious, contains some ancient tombs and several good monuments. Two district churches were erected in this parish, in 1824 and 1825, by aid of the parliamentary commissioners, who granted one moiety of the expense, and lent the other moiety for eight years without interest, to be repaid by a rate on the inhabitants. The church dedicated to the Holy Trinity, in Trinity-square, is a handsome edifice in the Grecian style of architecture, with a portico of six fluted Corinthian columns, supporting a triangular pediment, and having a square tower ornamented with pillars of the Doric order, and surmounted by a campanile turret surrounded with pillars of the Corinthian order; the interior is appropriately ornamented, and contains two thousand and forty-eight sittings, of which seven hundred and seventy-one are free: the expense of its erection was £13,316. 4. The church dedicated to St. Peter, in the hamlet of Walworth, containing two thousand sittings, of which five hundred are free, was erected at an expense of £19,126. 13.: it is a spacious and handsome edifice of brick, ornamented with stone, having at the western entrance a receding portico of four Ionic columns, supporting a cornice and central balustrade, with a slender square tower, ornamented at the quoins with pilasters of the Corinthian order, and surmounted by an open campanile turret of graceful elevation, surrounded with Corinthian pillars, and crowned with a conical dome. The livings are perpetual curacies, in the patronage of the Vicar of Newington. There are two places of worship for Baptists, two for Independents, one for Wesleyan Methodists, and one for the followers of Johanna Southcote. The parochial charity, National, and Sunday schools, supported partly by endowment and partly by subscription, were united in 1820, and a handsome and commodious building erected for their use, containing, on the basement story, a school-room seventy-five feet in length and forty-five feet wide for boys, and on the upper story a room of similar dimensions for girls: in this establishment, which is calculated for the admission of one thousand children, there are at present four hundred boys and two hundred girls; of the former sixty-five, and of the latter fifty-five, are annually clothed. The female charity school, established in 1793, and a school of industry, opened in 1796, previously separate institutions, were united in 1818, and a neat and commodious school-house erected in Mount-street, by subscription; there are one hundred girls, who are clothed, and instructed in reading, writing, arithmetic, and in household work; and, when qualified to become useful servants, are placed in respectable families, and encouraged to good conduct by annual presents: this institution, which is under the direction of a president and a committee of ladies, is supported by subscription among the different dissenting congregations. The female school in South-street, established in 1810, is supported by subscription, and conducted by a committee of ladies: there are one hundred girls in this establishment, who are instructed on the plan of the British and Foreign Society. The school for boys, in Flint-street, conducted on the same system, was established in 1816, and a spacious school-room, capable of receiving four hundred boys, with a dwelling-house for the master, was erected by subscription: there are at present three hundred and twenty boys in this institution. The York-street female charity school, founded in 1810, chiefly by the congregation of Independents, is conducted under the superintendence of a committee of ladies, with a view to qualify the scholars for service in respectable families: there are fifty girls, who are instructed in reading, writing, arithmetic, and needlework, and of whom thirty are annually clothed. In the parish work-house forty-three boys and twenty-five girls are clothed, maintained, and instructed in reading, writing, and arithmetic, and, at a suitable age, placed out apprentices with a premium of £7 each: in connexion with the work-house, and within the walls, is a manufactory for ropes, twine, and door-mats. The southern quadrangle of the Fishmongers' almshouses, consisting of twenty additional tenements, founded in 1721, by James Hulbert, whose statue is placed on a pedestal in the centre of the area, is within the parish; the older portion of the almshouses, erected by that company about a century before, is in the parish of St. George the Martyr: the more ancient part consists of an outer and an inner quadrangle, comprising twenty-three tenements, of two rooms each, for the residence of decayed members of the company, who receive twelve shillings per week, if married, and eight shillings, if single: the buildings, of brick ornamented with stone, are of the Elizabethan style: at the entrance of the outer quadrangle is a chapel, with a window over the archway, in the early English style, and a small belfry turret, and on one side of the inner quadrangle is a hall, with some painted glass, in which the wardens of the company hold their meetings for the business of the charity; behind are extensive gardens pleasantly laid out, and communicating with those of the additional buildings, which are of somewhat more modern appearance. There are also some almshouses in

Cross-street, under the superintendence of the Drapers' Company. Of the hospital of our Lady and St. Katherine, which existed here till the middle of the sixteenth century, there are no vestiges.

NEWINGTON (NORTH), a hamlet in the parish of BROUGHTON, hundred of BLOXHAM, county of OXFORD, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Banbury, containing 291 inhabitants.

NEWINGTON (SOUTH), a parish in the hundred of WOORTON, county of OXFORD, 5 miles (W. N. W.) from Deddington, containing 428 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Oxford, rated in the king's books at £8, endowed with £600 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £900 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Rector and Fellows of Exeter College, Oxford. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, has lately received an addition of two hundred and twenty-four sittings, of which one hundred and forty-six are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £100 towards the expense. The small river Sweve separates this parish from those of Milcombe and Wigginton.

NEWINGTON (STOKE), a parish in the Finsbury division of the hundred of OSSULSTONE, county of MIDDLESEX, 3 miles (N. by E.) from London, containing 2670 inhabitants. The village consists principally of a long street, extending from Kingsland road to Stamford-hill, and on the high road from the metropolis to Cambridge. The eastern side of this street is within the parish of Hackney; and from the western side, near the centre, branches off a street leading to the parish church. These streets are paved and lighted with gas, and the inhabitants are supplied with water from the New River, which pursues a serpentine course through the parish, in which are a continuous line of respectable private houses, and several detached handsome residences, among the latter the ancient manor-house is particularly worthy of notice, as also a modern mansion near the church; the grounds around which are laid out with much taste, and the New River winding through them gives to the whole an agreeable and pleasing effect. Here are several extensive nursery gardens, but no distinguishing manufacture, the trade of the place depending on the resident population, and on its situation as a thoroughfare on a great public road. The New River Company are constructing a large reservoir, and erecting a steam engine in the parish. Courts leet and baron for the manor are held annually. The living is a rectory, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's, rated in the king's books at £10, and in the patronage of the Prebendary of Newington in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a low building, re-erected by William Patten, Esq., lessee of the manor, in 1563, and since repeatedly enlarged. Considerable alterations have recently been made, and a new gallery erected, a steeple has also been added to the tower: it contains several handsome monuments. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends, Independents, and Unitarians. A charity school, with an endowment arising from the benefactions of Thomas Stock and others, was founded in the early part of the last century, which, having fallen into decay, was revived in 1790, with the aid of subscriptions and charity sermons; and since that time an additional fund has been formed of £1100 three per cent. consols., from legacies, donations, and savings of income. Thirty boys and twenty-five girls are educated and clothed, and some of them apprenticed with a premium of £8. The joint salaries of the master and mistress amount to £100 per annum. A school for the education and clothing of fourteen poor girls is supported by dissenters. There is also an infant school. A brick gateway, with a pointed arch, on the north side of Church-street, is the only part now standing of the buildings belonging to the old manor-house. Near the church is a walk between trees, called Queen Elizabeth's walk: and at Newington resided her favourite, Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester, and his contemporary, Edward Vere, Earl of Oxford. Dr. Isaac Watts, an eminent dissenting divine and poet, after having passed the last thirty years of his life at the mansion of Sir Thomas Abney, died here November 25th, 1748. Among the other distinguished residents in this parish, were the republican general, Fleetwood; Daniel Defoe, author of Robinson Crusoe; Adam Anderson, who wrote a valuable "History of Commerce;" Thomas Day, the author of the History of Sandford and Merton, and other popular productions; Howard, the philanthropist; Dr. John Aikin, compiler of the "General Biography;" and his sister, the celebrated Mrs. Barbauld.

NEWINGTON-BAGPATH, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of BERKELEY, county of GLOUCESTER, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Tetbury, containing 247 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with the perpetual curacy of Owlpen, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £14, and in the patronage of Robert Kingscote, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Bartholomew.

NEWLAND, a liberty in that part of the parish of HURST which is in the hundred of SONNING, county of BERKS, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Wokingham, containing 264 inhabitants.

NEWLAND, a parish in the hundred of ST. BRIAVELLS, county of GLOUCESTER, comprising the chapelries of Breem and Coleford, and the tythings of Clearwell, Lee-Bailey, and Newland, and containing 3383 inhabitants, of which number, 486 are in the tything of Newland, 4 miles (S. E. by S.) from Monmouth. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £18. 6. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Llandaff. The church, dedicated to All Saints, is a large structure, with a handsome western tower ornamented with pinnacles and open-worked battlements: adjoining the churchyard is a free school, also an almshouse for four poor persons of each sex, both founded by Edward Bell, who, in 1651, endowed them with an annuity of £20: the annual income, with subsequent donations, has been raised to upwards of £180, of which £40 is paid for teaching fifteen children, the schoolmaster having also apartments in the school-house: £104 a year is received by the eight alms-people, 5s. per week being paid to each, and the residue expended in fuel and clothing for them, and in repairing the premises of both establishments. There are also two charity schools, conducted on the National system. The navigable river Wye forms the western boundary of the parish, through which run several rapid rivulets, and the rail-road from Colford to Monmouth. Iron and coal mines abound, and limestone may be obtained, in the neighbourhood. Redbrook, where there is now a considerable manufactory for tin plates, was formerly the site of the earliest copper-smelting furnaces in England. The remains of High Meadow House, which was garrisoned by the troops of Charles I., when the parliament had possession of Gloucester, are still visible. There is a spring of water in Birchamp, which in purity is not inferior to St. Ann's well at Malvern.

NEWLAND, a township in the parish of ULVERSTONE, hundred of LONSDALE, north of the sands, county palatine of LANCASTER, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Ulverstone, containing 440 inhabitants.

NEWLAND, a chapelry in the parish of GREAT MALVERN, lower division of the hundred of PERSHORE, county of WORCESTER, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W.) from Worcester, containing 125 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, endowed with £10 per annum private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Malvern. The chapel is dedicated to St. Michael. Courts leet and baron are occasionally held here.

NEWLAND, an extra-parochial liberty, in the lower division of the wapentake of AGRIGG, West riding of the county of YORK, 3 miles (N. E.) from Wakefield, containing 46 inhabitants. There was formerly an old chapel near the mansion house, but it was taken down about fifty years ago. Courts leet and baron are annually held here, under the styles of "the Court Leet of our Sovereign Lord the King," and "the Great Court Baron of the Manor of Newland cum Woodhouse Moor," which was parcel of the possessions of the Knights Hospitallers, who, in the reign of John, established here a preceptory of their order, valued at the dissolution at £202. 3. 8. per annum.

NEWLAND, a township in the parish of DRAX, lower division of the wapentake of BARKSTONE-ASH, West riding of the county of YORK, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Snaith, containing 269 inhabitants. Charles Read, in 1669, bequeathed land and £2000, directing the income to be applied for teaching all the poor children of the parish, and for the clothing and maintenance of six poor people and six boys of the parish of Drax.

NEWLANDS, a chapelry in that part of the parish of CROSTHWAITE which is in ALLERDALE ward above Darwent, county of CUMBERLAND, 5 miles (S. W. by W.) from Keswick, containing 115 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Carlisle, endowed with £1200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Crosthwaite. The chapel is situated near the small village of Little Town, which, lying under a mountain knot, does not receive the rays of the sun from Martinmas to Candlemas. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. A fair for sheep is held at Little Town on the first Friday in September. Rich copper-mines were formerly in operation here, from which so much gold and silver was extracted as to entitle them to be considered royal property; upon which a law suit was instituted, in the reign of Elizabeth, against the Earl of Northumberland, in whose lordship the mines were discovered, which terminated in favour of the crown, but since the parliamentary war, in which the original works were destroyed, and most of the miners slain, they have been worked on a much smaller scale. The ruins of smelting-houses and other buildings may still be traced on the banks of the Bure. Immense quantities of lead-ore have also been raised in the neighbourhood, but the mines are now comparatively unproductive. A quarry of fine slate for roofing has lately been opened, and at Stairs there is a mill for carding wool.

NEWLANDS, a township in the parish of BYWELL ST. PETER, eastern division of TINDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $12\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Hexham, containing 154 inhabitants.

NEWLAND-SIDE, a township in the parish of STANHOPE, north-western division of DARLINGTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S. W.) from Stanhope, containing 763 inhabitants. There is a smelting mill for lead-ore at Bollihope.

NEWLYN, a parish in the hundred of PYDER, county of CORNWALL, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from St. Michael, containing, with part of the borough of St. Michael, or Midshall, 1045 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £16. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Exeter. The Independents and Wesleyan Methodists have each a place of worship here, and there is a small endowed school. Several rapid streams run through the parish, in which are some chalybeate springs, and a valuable lead mine. The petty sessions for the division are held here, on the last Monday in every month. At Cargol there was formerly a palace belonging to the bishops of Exeter, to one of whom a market and a fair were granted in 1312: fairs are held on the first Tuesday in October and November 8th. In this parish is the fine old mansion of Tre-ricce, built in 1572, and once the seat of a branch of the Arundel family.

NEWMARKET, a market town, comprising the parish of St. Mary, in the hundred of LACKFORD, county of SUFFOLK, and the parish of All Saints, in the hundred of CHEVELEY, county of CAMBRIDGE, 13 miles (N. E. by E.) from Cambridge, and 61 (N. N. E.) from London, on the road to Norwich, containing 2514 inhabitants. The earliest account of this town has reference to the year 1227, when it is supposed to have derived its name from a market then recently established, which is said to have been removed hither, on account of the plague raging at Exning, a village about two miles distant, where was, probably, the parochial church: and in the time of Edward III. it gave name to Thomas Merks, or de Novo Mercatu, Bishop of Carlisle, who was probably a native of the place. A house, called the King's house, was originally built here by James I., for the purpose of enjoying the diversion of hunting, and the subsequent reputation of this town for horse-racing seems to have arisen from the spirit and swiftness of some Spanish horses, which having been wrecked with the vessels of the Armada, were thrown ashore on the coast of Galloway and brought hither. Its celebrity greatly increased in the reign of Charles II., the grand patron of the turf, who rebuilt the King's house, which had fallen into decay during the civil war, and frequently honoured the races with his presence. On the 22nd of March, 1683, being the time of the races, the King, Queen, and Duke of York were present, but a sudden conflagration compelled them to return hastily to London, to which event some writers have attributed the defeat of the Rye-house plot: by this disaster a great part of the town was destroyed, and the damage was estimated at £20,000. A second conflagration happened about the beginning of the last century. At the close of the civil war, Charles I. was removed from the house of Lady Cutts, of Childerley, to Newmarket, on the 9th of June, 1647, and remained here about ten days.

The town consists principally of one street, the north side of which is in the county of Suffolk, and the south in that of Cambridge: it is neither lighted nor paved; the houses are modern and well built, and some, erected for the occasional residence of visitors, are handsome: the inhabitants are supplied with water from springs. Coffee-houses, billiard-rooms, and others, furnish appropriate accommodation for all meetings, preliminary to the races. The race-course and training-grounds are the finest in the kingdom; the former is on a grassy heath near the town, and in the county of Cambridge, extending in length four miles: the training-ground is more than a mile and a half long, on a very gentle acclivity, admirably adapted to keep the horses in wind. The races are held seven times in the year, and are distinguished as the Craven meeting, commencing on the Monday in Easter week; the first and second spring meetings, the former on the Monday fortnight following, and the latter a fortnight afterwards; the July meeting; the first and second October meetings, and the third October, or Houghton meeting, the first of these commencing on the Monday preceding the first Thursday in that month: the king gives two plates annually. The palace erected by King James has been sold, and converted into shops: the one added to the original structure by King Charles is standing, and was the residence of the late Duke of York during the meetings; belonging to it are extensive stables for the king's horses. The training of race-horses is a source of extensive profit, several of them, among which are some of the finest horses in the world, being constantly exported, at exceedingly high prices: about four hundred are here during the greater part of the year; and it is computed, that the weekly consumption of oats in the town alone, amounts to the amazing quantity of five hundred quarters. The market, which was granted or confirmed in 1227, is held on Tuesday; and there are fairs on Whit-Tuesday and November 8th, the latter being extensively supplied with cattle, horses, corn, butter, cheese, hops, &c. The county magistrates hold petty sessions here every Tuesday; and a court leet is held occasionally.

The parishes of St. Mary and All Saints are in the archdeaconry of Sudbury, and diocese of Norwich; the former is a discharged rectory, consolidated with the vicarage of Wood-Ditton, rated in the king's books at £4. 15. 2½., and in the patronage of the Duke of Rutland: the church is a handsome structure with a fine tower and spire. The latter is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Norwich. There is a place of worship for Independents. Free schools are supported by a donation of £50 per annum from Queen Anne, which is equally divided, after the deduction of fees of the Exchequer, between the master and the mistress, for which they are required to teach twenty-one boys and twenty-one girls: a National school having been recently established, the twenty-one boys on Queen Anne's foundation are instructed there as free scholars; the remainder, being about one hundred and ten, are paid for by the subscribers; the girls, instructed by the schoolmistress, are provided with cloaks and bonnets. About a mile and a half from the town is a remarkable excavation, called the "Devil's Dyke," extending nearly in a straight line for seven miles, and being in some places above one hundred feet in width: this work, unquestionably of very remote antiquity, has been attributed to the Britons anterior to the time of Caesar, and by some to Uffa, the first king of the East Angles; but, notwithstanding that much pains have been taken in the research, no authentic account has ever yet appeared of this remarkable monument of human industry and perseverance: it serves for the boundary between the dioceses of Norwich and Ely. Several Roman coins were found near Newmarket heath, in the year 1750.

NEW-MILLS, a manufacturing district in the parish of GLOSSOP, hundred of HIGH PEAK, county of DERBY, 21 miles (N. W.) from Derby, and 170 (N. W. by N.) from London, containing about 5000 inhabitants. Its original name was Bowden-Middle-Cale. Situated along the north bank of the Guyt, and reaching from Kinder-Scout to Mellor, it formerly comprised seven hamlets; but about a century ago it was subdivided, three of the hamlets remaining attached to Hayfield, and the other four, Beard, Ollerset, Whitle, and Thornset, being formed into a township: formerly the whole of the inhabitants of the hamlets included in Bowden-Middle-Cale were accustomed to grind their corn at a common mill in Hayfield, but upon their subdivision, a new mill was erected upon the river Kinder, in the hamlet of Ollerset, and the name of New Mills was, in consequence, conferred on the four above-mentioned hamlets, the inhabitants of which ground their corn here. The Kinder derives its source from the mountain of Kinder-Scout, and, separating the county of Derby from that of Chester, falls into the river Guyt at a place called the Tor. The appellation of New Mills is yet more definitely applied to a cluster of factories and houses, which rise one above another from the brink of the river to the summit of the Craggs, a height of several hundred feet, and also extend along the turnpike-road, as far as London Place. The original branches of manufacture in this district were those of paper and cloth, which have been superseded by cotton, calico-printing, and bleaching works, &c.: coal mines abound in the neighbourhood, and contain some veins of lead-ore. In the year 1821, Mr. John Potts conceived the idea of adapting the method used by engravers in the potteries to the purposes of calico-printing, with the view of producing a more durable and brilliant effect than had hitherto been obtained in that branch of the art; his experiment was crowned with complete success, and proved the origin of a style of engraving which has been adopted by every calico engraver in that branch, not only in Great Britain and Ireland, but throughout the whole of Europe and the United States: the engraving establishment, belonging to the firm of Potts, Oliver, and Potts, is a neat and spacious fabric of red brick, tastefully decorated with various statues and vases, and affords employment to about one hundred artists; in the grounds at the back of the works is an extensive picture gallery, containing specimens of painting in oil and water colours, by Mr. John Potts: this repository promises, at no very distant period, to become an object of considerable interest to the scientific traveller. A local subscription, amounting to £1000, has been raised towards the erection of a new church; the sum of £2500 has been granted by the parliamentary commissioners, in aid of the work; and a piece of ground has been given by Lord George Cavendish, for the site of the edifice, which will contain five hundred free sittings. The living will be a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Derby, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Glossop. There are places of worship for Independents, and Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists. A charity school in the hamlet of Whitle, erected by subscription, affords gratuitous instruction to nine poor children, and the master receives about £10. 10. per annum, arising from bequests by Mary Trickett, in 1712, and Ralph Bowden, in 1730; besides which, on a division of the common lands of Whitle, an extensive allotment was assigned towards the support of the school.

NEWMINSTER-ABBEY, a township in that part of the parish of MORPETH which is in the western division of CASTLE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, containing 79 inhabitants. An abbey of Cistercian monks from Fountains, in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary, was founded here, in 1198, by Ranulph de Merlay, and Julian his wife, which at the dissolution had a revenue valued at £140. 10. 4.: of this once magnificent structure only a part of the gateway remains.

NEWNHAM, a market town and parish in the hundred of WESTBURY, county of GLOUCESTER, 11½ miles (W. S. W.) from Gloucester, and 116 (W. by N.) from London, containing 1012 inhabitants. This town appears to have originated in a ford over the river Severn, formed by a ridge of rocks and a sand-bank, the shifting of which latter, in 1802, rendered the river no longer fordable. Here was anciently a castle, which constituted one of the fortresses on the Welch frontier, in the times of our Norman kings, but there are no traces of it. The town is situated on the western bank of the river, which is navigable, and across which there is a ferry to Arlingham. A harbour for vessels of one hundred and fifty tons' burden was constructed about eighty years ago, and some coasting trade is carried on, though the difficult navigation of the river near the town has contributed to lessen its commerce, much of which has been transferred to a port, a few miles to the south, called Gatcombe. A verdegris manufactory, and ship-building, afford employment to some of the inhabitants; and at Aylesford, in this parish, are large forges for working iron and making iron-wire. There being in the neighbourhood extensive iron and coal mines, and the carriage of their produce is facilitated by the Bullo Pill railway, which passes from the marble works on the Severn southward of the town, into the Forest of Dean, through a tunnel one thousand and sixty yards in extent, and also by the Berkeley canal. The market, now very inconsiderable, is on Friday; and fairs are held on the 11th of June and 18th of October. The government was vested in a mayor and burgesses in the reign of Edward I., but there are now few relics of its former importance, except a sword of state, said to have been the gift of King John: two constables, locally termed Beams, are appointed; but, until the beginning of the present century, the inhabitants annually celebrated the election of a mayor and six aldermen. The lord of the manor holds a court leet yearly; and petty sessions for the Forest of Dean are held here and at Woolaston alternately. Newnham was returned as one of the five boroughs in Gloucestershire, on a mandate from the Crown, in the ninth of Edward I., and is said formerly to have sent two members to parliament. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, and in the patronage of the Mayor and Corporation of that city. The church, which is dedicated to St. Peter, and stands on a cliff near the river, contains some portions of Norman architecture, especially the arched entrance into the chancel, ornamented with zig-zag mouldings, and supposed to have belonged to a more ancient edifice. There is a place of worship for Independents. Fifteen poor boys are annually clothed from the funds of a charity, called "Jocham's charity;" James Jocham having, by will, dated December 21st, 1764, given the interest of £1000 for ever, for this and other benevolent purposes. There is also a savings bank.

NEWNHAM, a parish in the hundred of CASHIO, or liberty of St. ALBAN'S, county of HERTFORD, 3 miles (N.) from Baldock, containing 112 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of St. Alban's, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £5, endowed with £400 royal bounty. P. Yorke, Esq. was patron in 1796. The church is dedicated to St. Vincent.

NEWNHAM, a parish in the hundred of FAVERSHAM, lathe of SCRAY, county of KENT, 4½ miles (S. W. by W.) from Faversham, containing 356 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £5. 12. 6., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Miss Thorncroft and Mrs. Hill. The church, dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul, is principally in the early English style of architecture. A fair is held on the festival of St. Peter. There is a small charity school in the parish.

NEWNHAM, a parish in the hundred of FAWSLEY, county of NORTHAMPTON, 2½ miles (S. S. E.) from Daventry, containing 574 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, with the vicarage of Badby, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, exhibits portions in the various styles of English architecture. The business of lace-making has been introduced into this parish. Thomas Randolph, the poet and dramatist, was born here, in 1605.

NEWNHAM, a parish in the hundred of BASINGSTOKE, Basingstoke division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 4½ miles (E. by N.) from Basingstoke, containing 266 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with the perpetual curacy of Maplederwell, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £17. 17. 1., and in the patronage of the Provost and Fellows of Queen's College, Oxford. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas.

NEWNHAM, a hamlet in the parish of LINDRIDGE, lower division of the hundred of OSWALDSLOW, though locally in the upper division of the hundred of DODDINGTREE, county of WORCESTER, 4 miles (E.) from Tenbury. The population is returned with the chapelry of Knighton upon Teame.

NEWNHAM (KING'S), a parish in the Rugby division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, county of WARWICK, 4¼ miles (N. W. by W.) from Rugby, containing 134 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, united to the rectory of Church-Lawford, in the archdeaconry of Coventry, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £5. The Oxford canal crosses the north-eastern angle of the parish; and on the bank of the river Avon is a once celebrated bath, to which the water is conveyed from a chalybeate spring, about a mile distant; it is impregnated with alum, and said to be efficacious in scorbutic complaints, and in healing fresh wounds.

NEWNHAM-MURREN, a parish in the hundred of LANGTREE, county of OXFORD, 1 mile (S.) from Wallingford, containing 260 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of North Stoke, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Oxford. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

NEWNTON (LONG), a parish in the hundred of MALMESBURY, county of WILTS, 3¼ miles (N. N. W.) from Malmesbury, containing 306 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Wilts, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £8. 5. Thomas Estcourt, Esq. was patron in 1808. The church is dedicated to the Holy Trinity. Elizabeth Hodges, in 1723, and Amy Haddon, subsequently, bequeathed each a trifling rent-charge towards the support of a school.

NEWPARKS, a liberty in the parish of THURLASTON, hundred of SPARKENHOE, county of LEICESTER, 6½ miles (S. W. by W.) from Leicester, containing 17 inhabitants.

NEWPORT, a borough in the parish of ST. STEPHENS, northern division of EAST hundred, county of CORNWALL, adjoining to the town of Launceston, and 214 miles (W. S. W.) from London. The population is returned with the parish. This place is separated from Launceston only by a small rivulet, and it appears to have been joined with it in the parliamentary representation, under the name of Dunheved. Two representatives have been separately returned from it since the time of Edward VI: the right of election is in the burgageholders, and inhabitants paying scot and lot: the number of voters is about sixty; and two vianders, appointed at the court leet held for the manor, are the returning officers: the influence of the Duke of Northumberland is predominant.

NEWPORT, a parish (formerly a market town) in the hundred of UTTLESFORD, county of ESSEX, 3½ miles (S. S. W.) from Saffron-Walden, containing 852 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the jurisdiction of the Commissary of Essex and Herts, concurrently with the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of London, rated in the king's books at £9. 10., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a fine structure in the later English style, having a lofty western tower, crowned with embattled turrets. There is a place of worship for Independents. A free grammar school was founded in 1586, by Joyce Frankland and William Saxie, her son, who endowed it with a rent-charge and other property, now producing together an annual income of about £200. At the northern end of the village are slight remains of an hospital, founded, in the reign of John, by Richard de Newport, the revenue of which, at the dissolution, was £23. 10. 8. Two fairs are held, on Easter-Tuesday and November 17th, but the market has been long disused.

NEWPORT, a sea-port and incorporated market town, in the parish of St. Woollos, upper division of the hundred of WENTLLOOG, county of MONMOUTH, 25 miles (S.W.) from Monmouth, and 146 (W.) from London. The population is returned with the parish. This place, called by Giraldus Novus Burgus, or New Town, in contradistinction to the ancient city of Caerleon, arose out of the declining greatness of that celebrated station. Here Robert, Earl of Gloucester, natural son of Henry I., erected a castle for the defence of his possessions, whence it was denominated Castell Newydd, or New Castle: from him it descended through several noble families, till, on the execution of Edward, Duke of Buckingham, it was, together with the lordship, seized by Henry VIII. The town is pleasantly situated on the river Usk, which is navigable for vessels of large size, and crossed by an elegant stone bridge, about four miles from its junction with the Severn: it consists principally of a long narrow street, which extends from an eminence, on which is the parish church, to the river, and forms part of the mail road from Bristol to Milford-Haven; the streets are paved, and brilliantly lighted with gas; and the inhabitants are supplied with water under an act of parliament obtained in the 7th of George IV. Several new and handsome buildings in progress evince the rapid improvement of the town. Book-clubs and a reading-room have been established; and races are held in the first week in July. Newport possesses a good haven, and, by means of its river and a canal which communicates with it, has become a place of great trade. The chief articles of export are, iron and coal from the counties of Monmouth and Brecknock, and tin-plate from the neighbouring districts, which, with other commodities, are shipped here for Bristol and the adjacent counties, also for Ireland, France, the Mediterranean, and America: the exports for 1829 were, of iron, one hundred and eight thousand seven hundred and twenty-six tons; of coal, four hundred and seventy-one thousand six hundred and seventy-five tons: the imports consist of provisions and other articles of general consumption. The number of vessels which entered inwards from foreign ports in 1826, was fifteen British and twelve foreign; and the number which cleared outwards, fifty-two British and twenty-two foreign; and the number of vessels belonging to the port in 1828, was twelve of one hundred tons, and thirty-nine below that burden. Ship-building is extensively carried on; nine ships were built and registered here in 1825, and ten in 1826. Two branches diverge from the main canal, which passes through the town, one of which unites with the Brecon and Abergavenny canal: a rail-road, consisting of three lines, leads hence to the iron-works, which are about twenty-four miles distant. Here is a custom-house, and a collector and a comptroller of the customs are stationed at the port. The markets are on Wednesday and Saturday; and fairs are held on Ascension-day, April 30th, September 19th, and November 6th, for cattle of all kinds; during their continuance courts of pie-powder are held. The first charter appears to have been granted by Edward II., but that under which the town is now governed is dated in the 21st of James I. The corporation consists of a mayor and twelve aldermen, with a recorder and steward: the mayor is elected by the steward of the manor, and on his election nominates two water-bailiffs for the port, two for the town, constables, clerk of the market, and other officers: vacancies in the court of aldermen, and the offices of recorder and town clerk, are filled up by the corporation. The mayor, two senior aldermen, and the steward of the manor, are justices of the peace, with power to hold courts of session for offences committed within the borough, which has not been exercised for the last twenty years, all offenders being committed for trial to the house of correction for the county. A court of requests, for the recovery of debts to any amount, formerly held by the mayor, is also disused. The sheriffs' county court is held here, alternately with Monmouth, every month. Newport returns one member to parliament, conjointly with Monmouth and Usk: the right of election is in the resident burghage inhabitants: the number of voters is about one hundred, and the mayor is the returning officer. The freedom is obtained by birth, marriage, apprenticeship within the borough, gift, and purchase.

The parish church of St. Woollos is situated at the outskirts of this town; the tower is said to have been built by Henry III., as a reward for the successful resistance of the inhabitants to Simon Montfort, Earl of Leicester, and was formerly ornamented with the statue of that monarch, part of which is still preserved: the church exhibits specimens of various styles of architecture; the nave is Norman, and is entered by a fine arch of that style; the aisles are Anglo-Norman. A mariners' church, for the accommodation of seamen entering this port, has been recently constructed between Newport and Pillgwenlly, on the Caerdiff road. There are two places of worship for Baptists, four for Independents, two for Wesleyan Methodists, and a Roman Catholic chapel. A Lancasterian school for boys, and a National school for girls, together capable of accommodating about three hundred children, are supported by voluntary contributions: in 1824, another school for boys, on the National system, was erected by Rowley Lascelles, Esq., for the instruction of the children of Pillgwenlly; it is under the superintendence and management of the directors of the Tredegar Iron Company and is supported by means of subscription. The only vestiges of an ancient castle, now converted into a large brewery, are the external walls and three strong towers: this fortress was evidently intended as a protection to the inhabitants of the surrounding country, from the incursions of the Normans and the English, when Monmouthshire formed a part of the principality of Wales.

NEWPORT, an incorporated market town and parish, in the Newport division of the hundred of BRADFORD (South), county of SALOP, 19 miles (E. N. E.) from Shrewsbury, and 139 (N. W. by N.) from London, containing 2343 inhabitants. This town is situated near the line of the Roman Watling-street, on the north-east border of the county, and contains some respectable dwelling-houses: it sustained a loss, estimated at £30,000, from a fire in the year 1665. The inhabitants are supplied with water from large cisterns, which are filled from a neighbouring spring, by means of a watercourse and pipes, kept in repair from the proceeds of some property vested in the corporation: in the vicinity are mines of coal and iron, and quarries of limestone. A branch canal, which connects the Birmingham and Liverpool with the Shrewsbury canal, passes a little to the north of this town. The market is on Saturday; and fairs are held on the first Tuesday in February, the Saturday before Palm-Sunday, May 28th, July 27th, Sept. 25th and December 10th, principally for live stock. The earliest municipal privileges were granted by Henry I., and confirmed by charters of succeeding sovereigns, until the time of Edward VI.: the corporation consists of a high steward, deputy steward, two bailiffs, and about twenty-five burgesses. Courts leet are held by the joint lords of the manor, as are also petty sessions for the Newport division of the hundred. Under the provisions of an act passed in the 4th of George III., a trust was formed, for the purpose of enclosing a tract of waste land, one hundred and twelve acres in extent, on which each householder had the right of pasturage for one milch cow, directing the rental to be appropriated to the repairs of the streets, market-hall (which was erected at the expense of William Adams, Esq.), and the market cross. A bridge trust was formed in 1750, having the control of funds arising from enclosures, which are applied to general improvements.

The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, which is dedicated to St. Nicholas, anciently belonged to the abbey of St. Peter and St. Paul, in Shrewsbury, and was alienated, by permission of Henry VI., to Thomas Draper and his heirs, by whom it was made collegiate, for a warden and four lay chaplains: the structure is principally in the ancient style of English architecture, with a square tower, but the aisles have been rebuilt with brick. There is a place of worship for Independents. The free grammar school was built at the expense of William Adams, Esq., a native of this place, who, by indenture, dated November 27th, 1656, assigned certain lands for the support of a master and an usher, for the endowment of four exhibitions at any of the colleges in Oxford or Cambridge, for the erection and endowment of four almshouses for as many poor persons, for annually apprenticing three poor children, and for other purposes: this grant was confirmed by two acts of parliament, obtained in 1660 and 1661, by which the master and four wardens of the Company of Haberdashers were incorporated governors; and the property thus appropriated was exempted from the payment of all taxes and assessments, parochial and parliamentary. The land belonging to the charity, in 1820, comprised about eight hundred and eighty-three acres, yielding an annual income of £957. 3. 6., which, by the dividends on stock, was increased to £1330 per annum. In consequence of applications made to the court of Chancery, in 1797 and 1808, for an extension of the plan of this charity, a decree was issued, pursuant to which the master receives an increased salary of £150 per annum, the usher one of £75, each of the four exhibitioners £22. 10., the resident minister £60, each of the four alms-people £19. 10., each of the three apprentices £18, twenty poor persons free of the Company of Haberdashers £3. 15. each, a writing-master £45, the receiver £21, various incidental charges increasing the expenditure to about £815 per annum. By the statutes of the founder, the number of boys was limited to eighty, to be chosen from the boys in the town and its vicinity; these being inadequate to supply the number, boys are admitted indiscriminately from other parts, and are instructed in the usual course of classical and English literature, preparatory to entering the University. The master and usher are respectively appointed by the governors, each possessing a rent-free residence. This school also enjoys the benefit of four exhibitions founded by Mr. Careswell for an account of which, see BRIDGENORTH. An English school, originating in a free grammar school founded prior to the time of Edward VI., was endowed by subsequent benefactions, producing an annual income of £49. 1.; from fifty to sixty children are educated. Almshouses for the residence of four poor aged persons, who receive weekly allowances, were also founded by Mr. Adams, who gave a sum for annually apprenticing three poor children. The Town's almshouses, for four poor females, were built in 1446, at the expense of William Glover of this town, and are endowed with £70 per annum. Various other charitable benefactions, amounting to nearly £200 per annum, are distributed amongst the poor. Tom Brown, a witty, but licentious, poet of the seventeenth century, was educated at the free school, and born here, or at Shiffnall.

NEWPORT, a borough, market town, and parish, having separate jurisdiction, though locally in the parish of Carisbrooke, liberty of WEST MEDINA, Isle of Wight division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 18 miles (S. S. E.) from Southampton, and 84 (S. W.) from London, containing 4059 inhabitants. The situation of Newport on the principal branch of the Medina river being considered more advantageous for commercial purposes than that of Carisbrooke, which was formerly a market town, has caused it to supersede the latter as the capital of the island. The town is situated on a gentle ascent, and is bounded on the east by the chief branch of the river, and on the west by a small stream which unites with the latter at the quay, where it becomes navigable hence to the Isle of Wight channel at West Cowes: it consists of five parallel streets, crossed by three others at right angles, which are well paved, lighted with gas under an act of parliament, and kept in excellent order; the inhabitants are abundantly supplied with water, by means of pumps which have been recently erected. Here is a small theatre; and assemblies are held occasionally: a public library and news-room, called the "Isle of Wight Institution," was established in 1810: monthly meetings are held, during the winter, by a Philosophical Society, in a room adjoining the library, which also contains a museum of natural and artificial curiosities: a mechanics' institution also has been recently established, to which is annexed a library. The town has been much improved of late years, and some new sewers are now in progress. The manufacture of thread-lace occupies a considerable number of persons, chiefly children, and furnishes an article for exportation: some commerce is carried on in timber, iron, and malt, and large quantities of wheat and flour are exported. The market for corn and provisions is on Saturday; there is likewise a cattle market every alternate Wednesday: fairs are held on Whit-Monday and the two following days; and there is a statute fair at Michaelmas.

The first charter was granted, about 1193, by Richard de Redvers, second Earl of Devon; and a more important grant was made by the Countess Isabella de Fortibus, in which the town is styled "The New Borough of Medina," and its burgesses invested with all the market tolls and other privileges: Henry VII. granted the petty customs within all ports and creeks of the island, which charter was confirmed and extended by Edward VI. and Elizabeth. The borough was first incorporated by James I., and is at present governed by the confirmatory charter of the 13th of Charles II.: the corporation consists of a mayor, eleven aldermen, and twelve burgesses, assisted by a recorder, deputy recorder, town clerk, two serjeants at mace, eight water-bailiffs, and other officers, all of them chosen by the corporation, the burgesses from among the principal inhabitants, and the aldermen from the burgesses: the mayor, the preceding mayor, the recorder, and his deputy, and the two aldermen, are all justices of the peace, with exclusive jurisdiction. A court of record is held before the mayor, recorder, and aldermen, every Tuesday and Friday, for the trial of actions to any amount. A court of requests for the Isle of Wight, for the recovery of debts not exceeding £5, is held before the commissioners appointed by act of parliament passed in the 46th of George III. A Knighton court (Curia Militum), of unknown origin, the jurisdiction of which extends over the whole island, excepting the borough of Newport, is seldom used, except on occasion of the annual appointment of constables; it is held under the presidency of the governor's steward, or his deputy. A court of piepowder is held annually. Sessions for the borough are held quarterly, and a petty session of magistrates weekly. The guildhall, a very handsome edifice of the Ionic order, with corresponding pillars on the west front, was erected, about fourteen years ago, from a design by Mr. Nash, at an expense to the corporation of more than £10,000: the upper part comprises the town hall, council-chamber, and other offices, and the base forms an excellent market-place; in the interior is a fine portrait of the late Sir L. T. W. Holmes, Bart., by Owen, presented to the corporation by the inhabitants. There is a common gaol and house of correction for the borough, under the jurisdiction of its magistrates, which is also used as a bridewell for the whole island: it is divided into four departments, and will contain thirty prisoners. This borough first returned members to parliament in the 23rd of Edward I.; its privileges then ceased until the 27th of Elizabeth: the right of election is vested in the corporation, the number of voters being twenty-four: the mayor is the returning officer; and the influence of the trustees of the late Sir L. T. W. Holmes, Bart., is predominant.

The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Carisbrooke, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester. The church, dedicated to St. Thomas à Becket, is a spacious building, of different styles of architecture, with an embattled tower at the west end: in the interior were interred the remains of the Princess Elizabeth, second daughter of Charles I., who died a prisoner in Carisbrooke castle, at the early age of fifteen. The burial-ground was first appropriated to this church in the reign of Elizabeth, in consequence of a plague, the ravages of which were so great, that the churchyard at Carisbrooke was too small to receive the dead. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, Wesleyan Methodists, and Unitarians, and a Roman Catholic chapel. The free grammar school was founded originally by subscription, in 1619, and endowed with a grant of land to the extent of thirty-four acres, by the bailiffs and burgesses; also with land given by Sir Thomas Fleming, and augmented by several subsequent benefactors: the income is about £78 per annum; the schoolmaster is appointed by the corporation, and there are fifteen boys on the foundation, some of whom are instructed in classical literature: in the school-room the negotiations between Charles I. and the parliamentary commissioners were conducted, in 1648. A girls' charity school was founded by subscription, in 1761, for the clothing and instruction of a number of poor girls, to which, in 1764, Benjamin Cooke devised land; it is otherwise supported by voluntary contributions: the annual income is £84. 8. 2., and twenty girls are educated and clothed, some of them being also boarded. National and Lancasterian schools, for children of both sexes, and an infant school, are supported by voluntary contributions: the children educated in these institutions amount to nearly six hundred. An almshouse was founded, pursuant to the will of Giles Kent, by Sir Richard Worsley, Bart., in 1618, for five or more poor aged persons; and another, of unknown foundation, is inhabited by four poor families, each of which receives a small sum annually. About a mile southward of the town is the house of industry, erected under an act of parliament obtained about the year 1770, the management of which is vested in a corporation, styled "The Guardians of the Poor in the Isle of Wight:" the requisite officers for the internal government of the house include a governor, treasurer, chaplain, steward, schoolmaster, matron, two surgeons, and a secretary, all of whom, excepting the treasurer, have regular salaries. The house consists of several ranges of building, of sufficient magnitude for the reception and employment of about seven hundred and fifty persons: attached to the edifice are extensive workshops, a chapel, and a pest-house for persons affected with contagious disorders: the sum borrowed for the erection was £20,000. The principal articles manufactured in it are, sacks, clothing, dowlas-sheeting, mops, shoes, &c.; and the number of inmates varies from seven hundred to seven hundred and fifty. A little towards the south-west are the Parkhurst barracks and military hospital, erected in the year 1798, and capable of receiving upwards of three thousand soldiers: they consist of parallel ranges of building, the principal of which is one hundred and sixty-three feet and a half in length: the hospital comprises a centre and two wings, with fumigating rooms, baths, &c.: the whole enclosure occupies an extent of twenty acres: water for domestic purposes is procured from four wells of different depths, from two hundred and sixty-two to two hundred and eighty-six feet.

NEWPORT-PAGNELL, a market-town and parish in the hundred of NEWPORT, county of BUCKINGHAM, 15 miles (N.E. by E.) from Buckingham, and 51 (N.W.) from London, containing 3103 inhabitants. The distinguishing addition to its name is derivable from the family of Paganell, or Pagnell, to whom the manor descended from William Fitzanscuf, a powerful baron, who held it at the time of the Conquest. Their castle had fallen to decay previously to the time when Camden wrote: it was a place of great strength, but probably suffered in the great civil war, in the early part of which Newport was garrisoned by Prince Rupert: this garrison was withdrawn after the first battle of Newbury, in 1643, when the parliamentary troops, under the Earl of Essex, entered the town. Sir Samuel Luke, supposed to have been the Hudibras of Butler, was the governor in 1645. The town, one of the largest in the county, is pleasantly situated on a gentle eminence; it is well built, particularly the principal street, but badly paved, and not lighted. Water is supplied from wells, and, by means of an hydraulic machine, from the small river Levet, which runs through the town, and falls into the Ouse. Coal is brought from Staffordshire by a branch of the Grand Junction canal. Over the Levet, at its junction with the Ouse, in 1810, an elegant bridge of cast-iron, having one arch fifty-eight feet in the span, was constructed; and, about the same time, a very handsome stone bridge was erected over the Ouse; the expense of both was about £12,000. The races, which had been discontinued for forty years, were revived in 1827, and are held regularly in the month of August. The assizes for the county were occasionally held here, from the reign of Henry III. to that of Henry VI.: the petty sessions for the three hundreds of Newport are still held here; and a manorial court is held once in two years, at which constables are appointed. The manufacture of bone-lace here and in the neighbourhood was formerly carried on to a very considerable extent, the market for its sale being on Wednesday; but of late years the trade has very much declined. There are a few wool-sorters; and a paper manufactory affords employment to a considerable number of individuals. A grant of a market and a fair was made, or confirmed, to Roger de Somery, in 1270, and a renewal of the charter for the market, which is held on Saturday, was obtained by John de Botetort, in 1333. Six fairs are now held, viz., February 22nd, April 22nd, June 22nd, August 29th, October 22nd, and December 22nd.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £10, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul, is an ancient and spacious edifice, with a square tower, standing on an eminence which affords a fine view of the surrounding country. The sum of £6000 has been recently expended in repairing it; and two hundred new sittings have been added, one hundred of which are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having contributed £40 towards defraying the expense. In 1619, in the north aisle of this church, the body of a man was disinterred, whose scull and other hollow bones had been filled with lead: that taken from the scull is preserved in the library of St. John's College, Cambridge. In the churchyard is a fine epitaph, written by Cowper, on Thomas Abbott Hamilton, who died in 1788. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists. Here is a school for twenty girls, founded and endowed with £10 per annum, from a bequest by Dr. Lewis Atterbury, brother of the celebrated Bishop of Rochester. A Lancasterian school, supported by voluntary contributions, was built in 1824; and a National school, supported in a similar manner, was erected two years afterwards. In 1280, John de Somery founded an hospital, dedicated to St. John the Baptist and St. John the Evangelist, which was refounded by Anne of Denmark, queen of James I., and, in consequence, called Queen's hospital; the vicar of the parish is always the master: its revenue is about £70 a year, which is divided amongst three poor men and three poor women, for whose maintenance it was endowed. Two other hospitals, called St. Margaret's and the New hospital, were founded so early as 1240, but they have fallen to decay. Dr. Lewis Atterbury, brother of the Bishop of Rochester, gave £10 a year for a schoolmistress to instruct twenty girls. Mr. John Revis, citizen and draper of London, founded and endowed an almshouse, in 1763, for four poor men and three women, each of whom now receives six shillings a week. A close in North Crawley was given, by a person unknown, to the widow of any vicar of this parish; when there is no widow, the rental is applied to the apprenticing of poor children. Fulk Paganell, in the reign of William Rufus, founded a convent of Cluniac monks at Teckford, adjoining this town, which was a cell to the abbey of Marmontier in Normandy, and the monastery and lands, valued at £126. 17., were given, in the 17th of Henry VIII., to Cardinal Wolsey.

NEWPORT-WALLINGFEN, a township in the parish of EASTRINGTON, wapentake of HOWDENSHERE, East riding of the county of YORK, 6 miles (W. by S.) from South Cave, containing 339 inhabitants. There is a place of worship, erected in 1814, for Wesleyan Methodists, in connexion with which is a large Sunday school. About half a century ago, this was an uncultivated morass, called Walling Fen; but a bed of clay, of very superior quality, having been discovered, which is dug to the depth of thirty-feet from the surface, it became noted for the manufacture of bricks, tiles, and coarse earthenware, to a very great extent, whereby the value of the land was amazingly increased, and a thriving village sprang up. The Market-Weighton canal is in the vicinity.

NEWSHAM, a township in the parish of EAGLES-CLIFFE, south-western division of STOCKTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, 3 miles (W.) from Yarm, containing 44 inhabitants. Here was ^{an}anciently a chapel, dedicated to St. James.

NEWSHAM, a township in the parish of KIRKHAM, hundred of AMOUNDERNESS, county palatine of LANCASTER, 5 miles (N.N.W.) from Preston. The population is returned with the chapelry of Goosnargh.

NEWSHAM, a joint township with Brind, in the parish of WRESSEL, Holme-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, East riding of the county of YORK, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W.N.W.) from Howden, containing, with Brind, 177 inhabitants.

NEWSHAM, a joint township with Breckenbrough, in that part of the parish of KIRBY-WISK which is in the wapentake of BIRDFORTH, North riding of the county of YORK, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W.N.W.) from Thirsk, containing, with Breckenbrough, 173 inhabitants. Dr. George Hicks, a learned divine, was born here in 1642; he died in 1715.

NEWSHAM, a township in the parish of KIRKBY-RAVENSWORTH, western division of the wapentake of GILLING, North riding of the county of YORK, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S.E.) from Greta-Bridge, containing 511 inhabitants.

name occurs in a charter granted by Oymer, Bishop of Winchester, who bestowed such liberties and franchises on the burgesses of Newton as were enjoyed by those of Taunton, Alresford, and Farnham. This charter was confirmed by Edward II., by Edward IV., and by Queen Elizabeth. The town, which is situated at the mouth of the river Newton, was anciently of much greater extent than it is at present: it was burned by the Danes in 1001, and by the French in the reign of Richard II., and is now reduced to a very few cottages. The town hall contains some oaken chairs curiously carved, and supposed to be of the time of Elizabeth: it stands on an eminence overlooking one of the creeks of Newton harbour, which is formed by the junction of the river with the sea; at high water it will admit vessels of five hundred tons' burden. It is one of the stations of the preventive service. This borough has a titular mayor, chosen by the burgageholders: courts leet are held, at which constables are appointed. It first sent representatives to parliament in the 27th year of the reign of Elizabeth. The right of election is vested in the titular mayor and the burgesses, or proprietors of burgage tenements: the number of voters is thirty-three: the titular mayor is the returning officer. The parliamentary influence is enjoyed by Sir Fitzwilliam Barrington, Lord Yarborough, and the trustees of Sir Leonard T. W. Holmes. Twelve poor children are instructed by a schoolmistress for £10 per annum, the gift of Lady Constance Lucy, in 1771.

NEWTON in MACKERFIELD, a borough (formerly a market town) and chapelry, in the parish of WINWICK, hundred of WEST DERBY, county palatine of LANCASTER, 47 miles (S. by E.) from Lancaster, and $192\frac{1}{2}$ (N. W. by N.) from London, containing 1643 inhabitants. During the parliamentary war, and about the month of August, 1648, some Highlanders having been defeated and made prisoners by the parliamentary forces, at Red Bank, near this place, were hanged in an adjacent field, which still retains the appellation of Gallows Cross. The town consists chiefly of one broad street; and there are an ancient court-house, and a handsome assembly-room. The manufacture of fustians is the principal branch of business, and spinning and dyeing cotton is also carried on. The market has long been discontinued, but the cross is standing. Fairs are held on May 17th and August 11th, for horned cattle; and on May 18th and August 12th, for horses. Newton, anciently the head of a barony, is a borough by prescription, and has returned two members to parliament ever since the first year of the reign of Elizabeth: the right of election is in the freeholders to the value of forty shillings and upwards: the number of voters is about sixty: the steward of the borough, and the bailiff of the manor, are the returning officers; and the influence of Thomas Legh, Esq., is predominant. Courts leet and baron are held three times a year, at which small debts are recoverable. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Thomas Legh, Esq. The chapel, which is parochial, and dedicated to St. Peter, was built in 1682, by Richard Legh, Esq.: the burial-ground has been recently enlarged, and enclosed with a stone wall and palisades, by the patron. A free school is kept in the court-house for the instruction of poor children; the average number is from seventy to one hundred: the master receives about £55 per annum, arising from the proceeds of certain enclosures of Leyland common, and the rental of a messuage called Dean school. Upwards of four hundred children are instructed in the Sunday

The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £4. 10., endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of W. H. Jenkins, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

NEWTON (WEST), a township in that part of the parish of BROOMFIELD which is in ALLERDALE ward below Darwent, county of CUMBERLAND, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Cockermouth, containing 309 inhabitants. Here are the remains of a tower, which formed part of an ancient castle or hall. In the neighbourhood is a quarry of red freestone.

NEWTON (WEST), a parish in the Lynn division of the hundred of FREEBRIDGE, county of NORFOLK, 3 miles (N. E. by E.) from Castle-Rising, containing 211 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £5. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

NEWTON (WEST), a township in the parish of KIRK-NEWTON, western division of GLENDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Wooler, containing 95 inhabitants.

NEWTON (WEST), a township in the parish of ALDBROUGH, middle division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESSE, East riding of the county of YORK, $9\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Kingston upon Hull, containing 158 inhabitants.

NEWTON le WILLOWS, a township in that part of the parish of BROMPTON PATRICK which is in the eastern division of the wapentake of HANG, North riding of the county of YORK, 4 miles (W. N. W.) from Bedale, containing 250 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Two children are educated for a trifling sum, the bequest of Samuel Atkinson, in 1707.

NEWTON (WOLD), or NEWTON upon the WOLDS, a parish in the wapentake of BRADLEY-HAVERSTOE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $9\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. by W.) from Great Grimsby, containing 125 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £7. 10. 10., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Durham. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

NEWTON (WOLD), a parish in the wapentake of DICKERING, East riding of the county of YORK, $11\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Great Driffeld, containing, with the chapelry of Fordon, 225 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of the East riding, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £6. 19. $9\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Hon. D. Langley. This was anciently a chapelry within the parish of Hunmanby, and is remarkable for one of those clear and copious springs, called the Gipseys springs, which issues out of the ground with great force, and is thought to be one of the Wold streams emerging from its subterraneous channel.

NEWTON (WOOD), a parish in the hundred of WILLYBROOK, county of NORTHAMPTON, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Oundle, containing 362 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Prebendary of Nassington in the Cathedral Church of Lincoln, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

NEWTON-ABBOTS, a market town and chapelry, in the parish of WOOLBOROUGH, hundred of HAYTOR, county of DEVON, $14\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.S.W.) from Exeter, and 187 (S.W. by W.) from London. The population is returned with the parish. It is probable that Newton-Abbots and Newton-Bushell were formerly included under the name of Nuietone, and retained this common appellation till their separate manors became the property of different possessors. Newton-Abbots was so denominated from its being held by the abbot of Tor, to whom it was given by William, Lord Brewer, founder of that monastery. The town appears to have possessed a market and a fair in the time of Edward I. In 1625, Charles I. and his suite, when on their way to and from Plymouth, were entertained at Ford House, near this town, on which occasion the king attended divine service in the parish church. In 1688, the same mansion was occupied by William, Prince of Orange, after his landing at Torbay; and from the pedestal of the market cross, on which is an inscription commemorative of the fact, his declaration to the people of England was first read. The town is situated on the river Teign, on the high road between Exeter and Plymouth, and consists of two large, and several minor, streets, which are roughly paved: the inhabitants are supplied with water from pumps and adjacent springs. Here was formerly an extensive woollen manufactory, but the principal business now is that connected with the tan-yards: small quantities of shoes are exported to Newfoundland, with which island the inhabitants formerly carried on a very extensive trade, which having declined during the war in the beginning of the present century, has not since been revived. The river Teign is navigable to its junction with the Teigngrace canal, about three quarters of a mile from the town: lighters and boats come up by the Stover canal from Teignmouth with coal, and return with granite and potters' clay. The markets are on Wednesday and Saturday, and on the last Wednesday in February is a great annual market for cattle: the market-place is new, spacious, and commodiously arranged. Fairs are held on June 24th, September 11th, and November 6th, unless these fall on Wednesday, in which case the fairs take place on that day week. A portreeve, reeve, and inferior officers, are annually elected by a jury, at the borough court; the office of portreeve being always filled by the reeve for the preceding year. A court leet is held annually, and a petty session monthly. The chapel, dedicated to St. Leonard, is used only for baptisms and occasional service. There are places of worship for Baptists and Independents: the latter, with a free school, was founded and liberally endowed, pursuant to the will of Mr. Bearne, in 1787. A National school for children of both sexes is supported by subscription. The Widows' hospital, founded by Lucy, Lady Reynell, in 1638, and situated beyond the precincts of the town, was originally intended for four, but is now occupied by two, clergymen's widows, who receive £10 per annum, and have a pew allotted to them in the parish church; there are likewise some smaller almshouses. At Milberdown, near this place, are the vestiges of an ancient elliptical encampment, with a triple intrenchment, where the Prince of Orange stationed his artillery, when on his way from Brixham to Exeter. Hacknield ford, in this neighbourhood, is supposed to have derived its name from its situation on the line of the ancient Roman road, called the Ikniel-way.

NEWTON-ARLOSH, a hamlet in the parish of HOLME-CULTRAM, ALLERDALE ward below Darwent, county of CUMBERLAND, $6\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.W.) from Wigton. In consequence of the destruction of Skinburness by an irruption of the sea, in 1404, the abbot of Holme-Cultram was licensed to build a small church at this place, and hold here the market and fair, now disused, which had previously been granted him at Skinburness. The church, which has long been desecrated, was constructed so as to serve the purpose of a fortress, and its thick rugged walls remain in the cemetery, which is still used by the parishioners.

NEWTON-BEWLEY, a township in the parish of BILLINGHAM, north-eastern division of STOCKTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.N.E.) from Stockton upon Tees, containing 86 inhabitants. It anciently belonged to the prior of Durham, who resided and had his court-house here.

NEWTON-BLOSSOMVILLE, a parish in the hundred of NEWPORT, county of BUCKINGHAM, 3 miles (E.) from Olney, containing 243 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £8. 8. $1\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of F. G. S. Farrer, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas.

NEWTON-BROMSHOLD, a parish in the hundred of HIGHAM-FERRERS, county of NORTHAMPTON, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.E.) from Higham-Ferrers, containing 115 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £8. 3. 4. The Rev. E. Tanqueray was patron in 1788. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

NEWTON-BUSHELL, a chapelry (formerly a market town) in the parish of HIGHWEEK, hundred of TEINGBRIDGE, county of DEVON, $14\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.S.W.) from Exeter, and 187 (W.S.W.) from London. The population is returned with the parish. This town received its distinguishing appellation from Robert Bussell, or Bushell, the foster-child and kinsman of Theobald de English Ville, made lord of the manor by Henry III., in 1246, and who granted to the inhabitants a charter for a market. This town is separated from Newton-Abbots by the river Lemon. A portreeve and two constables are annually chosen at the court held by the lord of the manor. The chapel is a large edifice, in the ancient style of English architecture, and has received an addition of two hundred and seventy sittings, of which one hundred and seventy are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having contributed £250 towards defraying the expense. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Limestone, with argillaceous slate, and organic remains, are found in the vicinity of the town.

NEWTON-CAPP, a township in that part of the parish of ST. ANDREW AUCKLAND which is in the north-western division of DARLINGTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile (N.W.) from Bishop-Auckland, containing 145 inhabitants. It is situated on the Wear, which is here crossed by a bridge. On the north bank of the river are the ruins of an unfinished mansion, erected by the Bacon family, who were long proprietors of this place.

NEWTON-FERRERS, a parish in the hundred of ERMINGTON, county of DEVON, 6 miles (S. by E.) from Earl's Plympton, containing 719 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Totness, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £41. 12. 1. The Rev. John Yonge was patron in 1821. The church, dedicated to the Holy Cross, contains three stone stalls. Here is an almshouse. The parish is bounded on the west by the æstuary of the Yealm, and the vicinity is remarkable for scenery of great beauty.

NEWTON-FLOTMAN, a parish in the hundred of HUMBLEYARD, county of NORFOLK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from St. Mary Stratton, containing 390 inhabitants. The living is a rectory in mediæties, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £10. Miss Long was patroness in 1790. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, contains memorials of several of the Blundeville family, and an arched monument with a representation of Noah's Ark. This place received the adjunct to its name from the ancient flote, or ferry, over the river Taus, which is now passed by a bridge of brick.

NEWTON-GRANGE, a liberty in that part of the parish of ASHBOURN which is in the hundred of WIRKSWORTH, county of DERBY, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Ashbourn, containing 38 inhabitants.

NEWTON-HALL, a township in the parish of BYWELL ST. PETER, eastern division of TINDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $7\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by N.) from Hexham, containing 89 inhabitants.

NEWTON-HARCOURT, a chapelry in the parish of WISTOW, hundred of GARTREE, county of LEICESTER, $6\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S.E. by S.) from Leicester, containing 298 inhabitants. The Union canal passes through the chapelry.

NEWTON-KYME, a parish in the upper division of the wapentake of BARKSTONE-ASH, West riding of the county of YORK, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Tadcaster, containing, with Toulston, 184 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £14, and in the patronage of T. L. Fairfax, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew.

NEWTON-LONGVILLE, a parish in the hundred of NEWPORT, county of BUCKINGHAM, 3 miles (S. W. by W.) from Fenny-Stratford, containing 486 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £20. 9. 7., and in the patronage of the Warden and Fellows of New College, Oxford, by whose predecessors the church, dedicated to St. Faith, was erected about 1415. In the chancel are two piscinæ, one of them bearing the arms of William of Wykeham, and of others. An Alien priory of Cluniac monks, subordinate to the abbey of St. Faith, at Longueville in Normandy, was founded here in the reign of Henry I., and suppressed in 1415, when it was granted to New College, Oxford. The learned Grocyn, tutor to Erasmus, and one of the revivers of classical literature in the sixteenth century, was rector of this parish.

NEWTON-MORRELL, a township in the parish of BARTON, eastern division of the wapentake of GILLING, North riding of the county of YORK, $6\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W.) from Darlington, containing 31 inhabitants.

NOOK (THE), a township in the parish of BELLINGHAM, north-western division of TINDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile (E.) from Bellingham, containing 113 inhabitants. It is bounded on the south by the North Tyne river.

NORBRECK, a joint township with Bispham, in the parish of BISPHAM, hundred of AMOUNDERNESS, county palatine of LANCASTER, 3 miles (W. N. W.) from Poulton. The population is returned with Bispham.

NORBURY, a chapelry in the parish of STOCKPORT, hundred of MACCLESFIELD, county palatine of CHESTER, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Stockport, containing 680 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, endowed with £600 royal bounty. Thomas Leigh, Esq. was patron in 1795. A school-house was erected about 1760, by Peter Leigh, Esq.

NORBURY, a township in the parish of MARBURY, hundred of NANTWICH, county palatine of CHESTER, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. by E.) from Whitchurch, containing 438 inhabitants. A branch of the Chester canal passes through the township.

NORBURY, a parish in the hundred of APPLETREE, county of DERBY, 4 miles (S. W.) from Ashbourn, containing, with the township of Roston, 498 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with the perpetual curacy of Snelstone, in the archdeaconry of Derby, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £15. 16. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of Thomas Fitzherbert, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Mary: the chancel is a fine specimen of the decorated style, with large windows exhibiting the original stained glass, which is strikingly beautiful. Here, amongst many ancient monuments of the Fitzherberts, is one to the memory of Sir Anthony, a celebrated writer on the law, who was born at this place, and died in 1538. A free school was founded in 1678, by a bequest from Mr. Thomas Williams, and endowed with land now let for £18 per annum, for which about twenty poor children are instructed.

NORBURY, a parish in the hundred of PURSLOW, county of SALOP, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Bishop's Castle, containing 377 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, with the vicarage of North Lydbury, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford, and in the patronage of the Rev. John Bright Bright. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

NORBURY, a parish in the western division of the hundred of CUTTLESTONE, county of STAFFORD, 4 miles (N. E.) from Newport, containing, with the township of Weston-Jones, 309 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Stafford, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £10. 2. 6., and in the patronage of Lord Anson. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

NORCOTT, a township in that part of the parish of ST. HELEN, ABINGDON, which is in the hundred of HORMER, county of BERKS, 1 mile (N.) from Abingdon, containing 85 inhabitants.

NORDLEY (KING'S), a township in that part of the parish of ALVELEY which is in the hundred of STOTTESDEN, county of SALOP, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E.) from Bridgenorth. The population is returned with the parish.

NORFOLK, a maritime county, bounded on the north and east by the German Ocean, or North sea; on the south by the county of Suffolk, from which it is separated by the river Waveney, and the Lesser Ouse; and on the west by Cambridgeshire and a small part of Lincolnshire, from which it is separated by the Greater Ouse and Nene rivers. It extends from 52° 22' to 52° 58' (N. Lat.), and from 10' to 1° 43' (E. Lon.); and includes an area of two thousand and ninety-two square miles, or one million three hundred and thirty-eight thousand eight hundred and eighty statute acres. The population, in 1821, was 344,368. The name is but slightly altered in orthography and pronunciation from the Saxon compound, North-folc, signifying "the northern people," which term was used in the early Saxon kingdom of East Anglia, to distinguish the inhabitants of the northern part of it from those of the southern, who were called Suth-folc, for the like reason. At the period of the Roman Conquest this county was inhabited by the Cenomanni, or Cenimagni, a tribe of the Iceni, who, according to Whitaker, were descended from the Cenomanni of Gaul, and had their chief city at Caistor, near Norwich. Within the limits of the county, or contiguous to it, were established five principal, besides several subordinate, Roman stations. These and other fortifications were placed under the command of an officer, whose title, according to some authors, was Comes tractus maritimi, Count of the maritime district; and, according to others, Comes litoris Saxonici, Count of the Saxon shore; the Saxons at that period greatly harassing the Roman possessors of Britain by their piratical attacks on this part of the coast. After the disastrous events which succeeded the retirement of the Roman forces from Britain, in the year 575, Uffa, the first Saxon leader that established himself in this part of the island, assumed dominion over the territory now comprised in the counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, and Cambridge, which then took the name of East Anglia, of which Norfolk continued to form a very important part until all the kingdoms of the octarchy were united under the dominion of Egbert, about four hundred years after the first landing of the Saxons. Norfolk shared largely in the general calamity produced by the hostile and piratical incursions of the Danes, who at first chiefly directed their attacks upon East Anglia, landing, in 870, within the mouth of the river Yare. Prior to the death of Egbert they obtained possession of the whole of East Anglia; and although, during the reigns of several of his successors, they were masters of almost every part of the kingdom, yet, having been totally defeated by the Saxon forces under Alfred, that prince limited their residence to the province of East Anglia, and Norwich became their chief city. In revenge for the general massacre of the Danes by King Ethelred II., Sweyn, King of Denmark, invaded England with a numerous army and a powerful fleet, and landing on the coast of Norfolk, burned the cities of Norwich and Thetford; but in this desolating career his army was opposed by the Saxons under Earl Ulfketel, who defeated the Danes in successive battles, and at last compelled them to re-embark. In the year 1010 they returned, and having landed at Ipswich, and defeated Ulfketel, once more possessed themselves of East Anglia; and this province was afterwards included in that portion of the country allotted to Canute, the son of Sweyn, when the kingdom was divided between him and Edmund Ironside, and which was in consequence called Denelege, or the Danish jurisdiction.

After the Norman Conquest, and in the reign of William Rufus, Roger Bigod, Earl of Norfolk, taking part with Robert, Duke of Normandy, against William, Norfolk sustained considerable devastation in the conflicts that ensued. It also greatly participated in the disasters caused by the attempt of Prince Henry to deprive his father, King Henry II., of the crown, his cause having been espoused by the Earl of Norfolk. In the reign of John, Roger Bigod, Earl of Norfolk, took part with the refractory barons, and that monarch, laying waste the baronial possessions in this part of his dominions, came to Lynn, and thence crossed the washes into Lincolnshire, but, in consequence of the advance of the tide, lost his baggage in the passage. This county was afterwards over-run by the forces of Louis the Dauphin, who exacted heavy contributions from the inhabitants. In the reign of Richard II., during the rebellion headed by Jack Straw and Wat Tyler, the standards of those leaders were joined by several of the lower orders in this county; and Norwich was invested by the insurgents, led on by an individual named Lefester: these, however, were so dispirited by the seizure and condemnation of their captain, that they forthwith dispersed. Henry VII., when Lambert Simnel was counterfeiting the person of Edward Plantagenet, and as such had been crowned in Dublin, doubtful of the loyalty of the eastern counties, or apprehensive that the Pretender would attempt a landing on this coast, went in person through the counties of Suffolk and Norfolk, and kept his Christmas at Norwich, whence he proceeded on a pilgrimage to the chapel of Our Lady at Walsingham, to offer his devotions at the holy shrine; and when all fear of danger had been dissipated, he sent his banner to the chapel in acknowledgment of his deliverance, and returned to the capital. In the reign of Edward VI., owing to a system of enclosing adopted by the nobility and gentry who had become possessed of the abbey lands, a rebellion broke out in this county; and the insurgents, being actuated by the same spirit as the levellers in the reign of Richard II., proceeded to abolish all distinctions of rank or title, and to execute their designs under the direction of two ringleaders named Ket. Their chief place of rendezvous was Mousehold heath, near Norwich, where the elder of the leaders, Robert Ket, with assistant deputies from every hundred, held his councils under a large tree, hence called "The Oak of Reformation." After the county had long been harassed by exactions and other outrages, committed by these rebels, and all previous attempts to quell the insurrection had failed, a large army, which had been raised for the king's service in Scotland, was despatched against them, under the command of the Earl of Warwick, by which Robert Ket was taken, and the rebels dispersed, though, it appears, with considerable loss to the king's troops. At the commencement of the dissensions between Charles I. and his subjects, the county of Norfolk took an active part; and when the parliament had voted the necessity of taking up arms, the inhabitants generally approved of the determination. This was one of the associated eastern counties placed under the command of the Earl of Manchester, and at an early period of the contest, Norwich was fortified against the royalists. At no period of the struggle do the king's forces appear to have gained much advantage in this county; Lynn was at first in their possession, but was quickly besieged and taken by the Earl of Manchester's troops.

Norfolk is in the diocese of Norwich, and province of Canterbury, and comprises the two archdeaconries of Norfolk and Norwich, in the former of which are included the deaneries of Brooke, Burnham, Cranwick, Depwade, Fincham, Hingham, Hitcham, Humbleyard, Reddenhall, Repps, Rockland, and Wacton, and in the latter those of Blofield, Breckles, Brisley, Flegg, Holt, Ingworth, Lynn, Norwich, Sparham, Taverham, Toft-Trees, and Walsingham, and part of that of Thetford, which together contain seven hundred and fifty-six parishes, of which four hundred and forty-one are rectories, one hundred and seventy-one vicarages, and seventy-eight perpetual curacies. For the purposes of civil government it is divided into the thirty-three hundreds of Blofield, Brothecross, Clackclose, Clavering, Depwade, Diss, Earsham, Erpingham (North and South), Eynsford, Flegg (East and West), Forehoe, Freebridge (Lynn and Marshland divisions), Gallow, Greenhoe (North and South), Grimshoe, Guilt-Cross, Happing, Henstead, Holt, Humbleyard, Launditch, Loddon, Mitford, Shropham, Smithdon, Taverham, Tunstead, Walsingham, and Wayland. It contains the city of Norwich, the borough, market, and sea-port towns of Lynn-Regis and Yarmouth; the small sea-port and market town of Cley; the borough and market town of Thetford; the borough of Castle-Rising; the market towns of Aylsham, East Dereham, Diss, Downham-Market, Fakenham, Foulsham, Harleston, East Harling, Holt, Loddon, Reepham, Swaffham, North Walsham, Watton, and Wymondham; and the little sea-port towns of Blakeney and Wells, which have no market. Two knights are returned to parliament for the shire, two representatives for the city of Norwich, and two for each of the boroughs. This county is included in the Norfolk circuit: the assizes and quarter-sessions are held at Norwich, where is the county gaol. There are one hundred and fifty-four acting magistrates. The rates raised in the county for the year ending March 25th, 1827, amounted to £343,970. 17., and the expenditure to £344,950. 1., of which £297,156. 3. was applied to the relief of the poor.

The marine department of the civil government is vested in the Vice-Admiral of Norfolk, an officer appointed under a commission from the Board of Admiralty. He has power to hold a court of admiralty for the county, with judges, marshals, and other proper officers, subordinate to him, for the purpose of exercising jurisdiction in all maritime affairs. From the sentence of this court an appeal lies to the High Court of Admiralty, from the Lords Commissioners of which he regularly receives his instructions. This county, besides containing several places having separate jurisdiction, has various courts possessing peculiar privileges; of which the principal are the Court of the Liberty of the Duchy of Lancaster, held at Aylsham, and the Court of the Liberty of the Duchy of Norfolk, which is held at Lopham, or elsewhere within the liberty, at the discretion of the Duke of Norfolk. This latter liberty is of great extent within the county, comprising the whole hundred of Earsham, and the half-hundred of Guilt-Cross, besides the manors of Forncett, Framlingham Parva, Ditchingham, Ditchingham Parva, Loddon, Sisland, Halvergate, South Walsham, Cantley, Strumpshaw, Caistor, Winterton, Dickleburgh, Beighton, and Byfield; it also includes some small portions of the counties of Essex, Suffolk, Surrey, and Sussex. It was granted by Edward IV., by patent dated at Westminster, December 7th, 1468, to John, Duke of Norfolk, and Elizabeth, his wife, and their heirs for ever; the duke to have within the said manors, lordships, and jurisdictions, the return of all writs, bills, summonses, precepts, and mandates of the king, so that no sheriff, or any other officer, shall enter the said liberty: to this privilege were added all fines, amercements, profits, penalties, and other royalties; and with these was conveyed to the duke full power to have his own coroners, clerks of the markets, and other officers, and to appoint a steward of the liberty, who should have power to determine all actions under the value of 40s., and that persons residing within the said liberty should not be liable to answer for debts of such amount in any other court. The present Duke of Norfolk is lord of this liberty, and appoints a steward, coroner, &c., having also a prison for debtors. Formerly one sheriff served for the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, but they were placed under distinct shrievalties in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, in the year 1576, and have continued so ever since.

The shape of the county is nearly elliptical; and it is so surrounded by the sea and by rivers that it may almost be considered an island, being actually connected with the main land only by a narrow causeway, raised across the marshes near Lopham. The surface is less varied in feature than perhaps that of any tract in the kingdom of equal extent, being for the most part flat; yet this uniformity of appearance is sometimes interrupted, particularly in the northern parts, where the ground is broken by gentle elevations, the hills and valleys being diversified by woods, coppices, hedge-rows, and plantations. On the south side of the county is a fine rich tract, extending towards the north and north-east; and these parts being enclosed, well cultivated, and abounding in timber more than most maritime districts, exhibit a variety of pleasing and cheerful prospects. In some parts the hedge-rows abound with trees, which at a distance have the appearance of extensive woods; but in others the great expanse of heath and bare unenclosed land has a dreary aspect: some of the most uninteresting parts lie on the south-western side of it. The most extensive prospects are those from Ashill, near Swaffham; Holkham; Docking, near Burnham; Melton, near Holt; Poringland; and Thorpe, near Norwich. The road from Warham is picturesque, overlooking Stiffkey vale, across which the hills rise in a bold manner, though bare of wood; near Blakeney also is another pleasing valley. Most of the rivers rise in marshy lands, and running through a comparatively level country, the fall is consequently small, and their current slow; so that they contribute to keep the adjacent grounds in a swampy state, and to fill the atmosphere with dense and noxious vapours. When swelled by land-floods, their æstuaries being for the most part choked with silt driven up by the violence of the tide, they often overflow the low lands, and in their course form numerous small shallow lakes, or pools, provincially termed broads, or meres, which are plentifully stocked with fish, and much frequented by aquatic birds. The principal of these are in the districts through which the Bure, the Wensum, and the Waveney pursue their courses. Breedon, or Breydon broad, at the mouth of the Waveney, and immediately to the west of Yarmouth, is three miles in length and one and a half in breadth; Hickling-broad is nearly three miles in length, and one in breadth; and that at Rockland is a mile and a half long, and half a mile wide. There are a few in other parts of the county, as at Quiddenham, Diss, and Hingham; and in the fenny districts many temporary ones are formed during the winter season, in the vicinity of which are numerous decoys for wild fowl.

The coast has no indentations of magnitude, and although it terminates that great bed of chalk which, commencing in the high cliffs of Dorsetshire, passes across the kingdom to this county, yet it is for the most part flat, and, exclusively of some bold headlands in the vicinity of Cromer, and some wooded hills in the neighbourhood of Sherringham, the only remarkable promontory throughout its whole extent is Hunstanton cliff, commonly called St. Edmund's Point. The other eminences on the east consist of clay, and are continually being undermined by the violence of the waves. Much of the coast consists of a low sandy beach, covered with gravel and loose pebbles, called shingles, which, by the force of the waves, are frequently thrown up in vast heaps: these, by the constant accumulation of sand, are formed into banks, and are held together by the matted roots of what is called "sea-reed grass." Numerous banks of the same kind have been raised off the coast, far out at sea, and, being only discoverable at ebb or quarter tides, are frequently fatal to coasting vessels: the most remarkable is the large bank running parallel with the coast near Yarmouth, between which and the shore is a deep channel, known by the name of Yarmouth Roads, where ships ride safely in all states of the weather. The ranges of sand-hills on this, as on the opposite coast of Holland, tend to preserve a valuable portion of the county from inundation: a line of them, called the Meals, or Marum Hills, commences at Caistor, two miles north of Yarmouth, and extends, with occasional interruptions, to Happisburgh point, and thence to Cromer bay, where what are called "Mud Cliffs" begin, and line the northern shore to Lynn-Regis: these sand-banks are not all permanent, sometimes shifting their station suddenly by a submarine movement. Large portions of the county being exposed to the winds from the ocean, and other tracts to winds that blow over an immense extent of marsh land, the air is there extremely cold in winter and during the early part of the spring. Winds from the north and north-east are more prevalent here than in any other part of the kingdom, and are severely felt, so as considerably to retard the growth of vegetation.

With regard to soil, Norfolk may be divided into five districts. The first, lying to the north and east of Norwich, and comprising the eastern and western divisions of the hundred of Flegg, the hundreds of Walsham, Blofield, Happening, Tunstead, and the greater part of the northern and southern divisions of the hundred of Erpingham, consists of a deep, mellow, putrid sandy loam, similar to that of the most fertile part of the Austrian Netherlands; but unfortunately much of this tract is occupied by meres and marshes. The second, lying to the south and south-east of Norwich, includes the hundreds of Loddon, Clavering, Henstead, Earsham, Diss, Depwade, and Humbleyard, and some portions of those of Forehoe and Mitford, and consists of stiff wet land, composed of a mixture of sand and clay abounding in springs. The third includes the northern division of the hundred of Greenhoe, the hundreds of Taverham, Eynsford, Gallow, Launditch, Brothercross, Smithdon, Freebridge, and Clackclose: this is generally called "West Norfolk," and consists principally of light sandy land. Part of it in the north-western angle of the county, contains large tracts of excellent land, with a good deal of inferior quality; and here is practised the system of agriculture to which the general epithet of "Norfolk husbandry" is applied. Along the Ouse is a line of rich marshes. All the more central portion of the county has considerable natural fertility: marl is found in almost every part of it, and extensively employed as manure. The fourth tract, lying in the south-western part of the county, comprises the southern division of the hundred of Greenhoe, the hundreds of Shropham, Guilt-Cross, Wayland, and Grimshoe, and is composed of a light sand, so light indeed, in the last-mentioned hundred, that it frequently drifts with the wind, and is bare of vegetation. The whole of the westernmost part of the county, which is cut off from the rest of it by the Ouse, consists of the rich tract of Marshland, forming a fifth district, consisting of ooze, or silt, as it is provincially called, a marine deposit resting on clay at various depths: in some parts the clay mixes with the silt to the surface, and forms the richer grazing lands. Of this kind also is a narrow tract of land on the easternmost part of the coast, near the mouth of the united rivers Yare and Waveney, which extends a considerable distance inland towards Norwich; the whole in winter being commonly under water, so that in the spring it is necessary to drain it in order to convert it into pasture. There are also large tracts of swampy ground in the vicinity of Lodham, frequently inundated by land-floods, and producing little, except sedge and reeds. In the south-westernmost part of the county is an extensive tract of level land, forming part of the great fenny district, which also includes large portions of the counties of Suffolk, Cambridge, Huntingdon, Northampton, and Lincoln. The district called Marshland is one of the richest in the kingdom; it extends also into Lincolnshire, and forms an immense salt-marsh. The soil is strongly impregnated with salt, and is of so argillaceous a quality as to be generally regarded as a strong clay. It is intersected by ranges of banks, raised at different periods, to secure the fresh tracts which had been abandoned by the ocean: one of these is called the Roman bank. Other tracts have at various later times been regained from the sea: at Titchwell, three hundred acres were embanked in the year 1786; and in 1790, eight hundred and sixty-eight acres were embanked and enclosed in the parishes of Terrington St. Clement and Terrington St. John. A still greater improvement was also accomplished by the family of Bentinck, in Marshland, where one thousand acres were reclaimed by an embankment about four miles in length; and in 1797, an act passed for the drainage and allotment of the immense tract of land situated in Marshland, Smeeth, and Fenn, besides much private property. According to the table of the soils furnished by the late secretary to the Board of Agriculture, Mr. Arthur Young, there are, of light sand, two hundred and twenty square miles; of more valuable sand, four hundred and twenty; of marshland clay, sixty; of various loams, nine hundred; of rich loam, one hundred and forty-eight; and of peat-earth, eighty-two. The substrata of the county, as far as research has discovered, consist of clunch, or indurated chalk; chalk in which flints are imbedded; gault, gravel, sand, silt, and peat-earth. On Mousehold heath, and in some other places, are extensive beds of clunch, which is used in building, and burned for lime: the chalk-pits in the vicinity of Norwich abound with those large black flints which compose the walls of many buildings in that city. In the gault, or argillaceous strata, has been found a sort of clay which is manufactured into an excellent species of earthenware: good brick-clay abounds in various places. The silt, or sea-sand, finely pulverised, is found at various depths, and is used in repairing the roads; and throughout the fen lands the peat-earth furnishes the poor with an abundant supply of fuel. On the shore near Thornham, at low water, is the appearance of a large forest having been, at some period, swallowed up by the waves, the stools of many large timber trees and many trunks being distinguishable, but in a state of great decay; these lie in a black mass of vegetable fibres, consisting of decayed branches, leaves, rushes, flags, &c.: a great extent of this matter is discoverable at low water.

Although by nature sterile, superior cultivation has rendered Norfolk one of the most productive counties in the kingdom. The arable lands form about two-thirds of the county; and the usual course of crops is, first year, turnips; second, barley; third, seeds for hay; fourth, seeds; fifth, wheat or rye; and sixth, barley: the next most frequently practised is the old four-shift system of turnips, barley, seeds, and wheat, in succession. Wheat is a general crop, but thrives best on the stiff loamy soils: the produce varies, according to the soil, from two to six quarters per acre; the general average is computed at three quarters. A vast quantity of barley is raised on the lighter soils, made into malt, and then shipped off; malt, indeed, may be considered the staple commodity of the county: the general average produce of barley is stated at four quarters per acre. Oats are sown only as a shifting crop, more than is consumed in the county being seldom grown: the rich lands in Flegg and Marshland usually produce ten quarters per acre. Rye is a common crop upon the light arenaceous lands of the south-western district. Other crops frequently cultivated are, buck-wheat, peas, beans, potatoes, vetches, or tares, cole-seed, clover, and other artificial grasses; and, but less frequently, cabbages. A considerable quantity of mustard is cultivated between March and Wisbeach, and around the latter place. Saffron is grown in the south-western district, and in the parts adjacent to Cambridgeshire. Flax is cultivated in the vicinities of Wisbeach, Downham, and Outwell; and hemp near Downham, Old Buckenham, Diss, Harleston, &c. Some of the marshes are peculiarly favourable to the growth of corn; but their liability to inundations has induced the inhabitants to prefer the dairy system, and in these parts large quantities of butter are made and exported, under the name of "Cambridge butter." On the whole, the grass lands of Norfolk, from the prevailing system being arable, have been too generally neglected, though some have been greatly improved by the practise of marling and by under-draining. The quantity of upland meadow and pasture has been estimated at nearly one hundred and twenty-seven thousand acres; and that of the marsh lands at upwards of sixty-three thousand. From Norwich to Yarmouth is an extensive range of meadow and marsh land; at Dawling and Guestwick is a considerable extent of pasture; and at Tasburgh, between Wymondham and Stratton, are many excellent meadows. One of the richest tracts of grazing land in Norfolk is the marshy district lying to the south of Lynn, and on the eastern side of the Ouse: these marshes, like all others in the county, are in general hired by the upland farmers, and not stocked regularly, but only when convenience requires it. Besides the marl, there are several peculiar kinds of manure employed, one of which is the little fish called stickleback, which is sometimes taken in immense quantities in the Lynn rivers. In East Winch and West Bilney, and scattered for ten miles thence to Wallington, is a remarkable bed of oyster shells lying in sea mud, from which the farmers obtain a great quantity to apply to their lands. Lime, sea-ooze, pond-weed, oil-cake, and river mud, are also used for the same purpose.

Of the cattle, the native cow is of small size, with middle-sized horns turned up, resembling those of the Alderney breed, generally of a red colour, and not profitable for the dairy, but hardy, and well calculated for barren pastures. Few of this kind are now kept by the large farmers, the Suffolk, polled, dun-coloured cow, having been generally substituted, and being deemed more profitable, though less hardy. The greater part of the cattle fed for the market are brought from Scotland, and purchased by the graziers, at a large fair held at St. Faith's, a small village near Norwich: several are also imported from Ireland. The average number of fat cattle annually sent from this county to the markets at Smithfield, Islington, St. Ives, and other places, is estimated at not less than twenty-thousand. The open sheep-walks were formerly very extensive: the native breed, and that which prevails in the county, carries a fleece of about two pounds in weight, and, when fattened, weighs about eighteen pounds per quarter. The wool was formerly classed for fineness as a third-rate among the native breeds; but it has been discovered that the neck wool of the Norfolk sheep is equal to the fleece of the Spanish breed. Although this was considered the breed best adapted to the soil, situation, and system of management of the county, yet the South Down is now to be found in almost entire possession of all the district from Swaffham to Holkham, and also in some other parts, together with a few of the Leicester breed. The number of sheep annually fattened for distant markets, in the same manner as the cattle, is supposed to be not less than thirty thousand. Some persons keep flocks of ewes solely for breeding; and at weaning time sell off the wether lambs to other counties. The hog is comparatively small, and of a thin bristly breed, very prolific, and the flesh is esteemed of good flavour: the number has been diminished by the decline of dairy farms, and the enclosure of waste lands. The horses, whether native or a cross with the Suffolk breed, are a hardy, and active race, from fourteen to fifteen hands high, and well adapted for the purposes of husbandry and the road. Poultry of all kinds is very plentiful; and in the sandy and loamy districts, owing to the dryness of the soil, and the range afforded by the unenclosed parts, the turkeys are extremely numerous, and esteemed of excellent quality and flavour; besides affording a supply to several of the neighbouring counties, numerous large flocks are annually driven out of the county to London, and other distant places. Large supplies of geese are also bred in the fenny parts, and annually driven on foot to London, from the neighbourhoods of Downham, Wisbeach, and Lynn: turkey-poults, goslings, chickens, &c., are sent hence to the same market by light caravans, or stage-coaches. Rabbits are extremely numerous on the light sandy soils, being a considerable object of trade: numbers are bred about Castle-Rising, Thetford, Winterton, and Sherringham; but Methwold heath is the most celebrated, as producing the finest and best flavoured: this spot was noticed as a rabbit-warren so early as the reign of Canute. Woodcocks, snipes, widgeons, ducks, and other aquatic fowl, in consequence of the numerous marshes and meres, are very abundant: the heath-lands are frequented by the great bustard, the largest of British land-fowl.

A great part of this county was, within a century and a half, comparatively wild, bleak, and unproductive, more than half of it being rabbit-warrens and sheep-walks; and notwithstanding that so much has been effected towards bringing the whole of the land into a state of cultivation, and although the commons have been very much diminished during the latter part of the last century, and the early part of the present, yet the open and waste lands are still of great extent. Of the former, a great quantity lies in the northern division of the hundred of Greenhoe, the Lynn division of the hundred of Freebridge, and the hundreds of Brothercross, Smithdon, Grimshoe, Loddon, &c.; and large wastes and commons still exist at Attleborough, Turnmoor, Westear, Broad Moor, Fen and Row, Lyng, Beacontorpe, Decoy, Borough, South Creak, Holt, and Flegg. From either Brandon or Thetford to Swaffham, the road lies for eighteen miles across a tract consisting of warrens or sheep-walks, with but few cultivated patches. Eccles common comprises four hundred acres of thick fern. A peculiar custom exists in Norfolk respecting the grazing of sheep on commonable lands; which is, that the lord, as he is called, of every township, orders how many and what sort of sheep the people shall have, where the walks shall be fixed both in summer and winter, on what spots they shall be folded, and how they shall be driven from place to place. Norfolk contains numerous woods, though they are partially scattered through the county: the principal are those of Foxley, in the hundred of Eynsford; some to the westward of Wymondham, in that of Forehoe; Shottesham, in Henstead; Ashwellthorpe, Hempnall, and Bunwell, in Depwade; and Hethel, Hethersett, and Ketteringham, in Humbleyard; besides smaller woods in Erpingham, Clavering, Earsham, &c. There are also some large woods at Billingford and Thorpe-Abbots, where hurdles and hoops are the principal articles of profit; and in several parts of the county, particularly in those to the north-west, are extensive woods of timber: these woods and plantations have been computed to occupy not less than ten thousand acres.

The manufactures, excepting for home consumption, consist chiefly of woven goods, which, in a variety of branches, still constitute the staple trade. The small village of Worsted, in this county, is remarkable as having given name to a kind of cloths made of wool differently dressed from that of which woollen goods are made; the yarn of the former being spun from combed, and that of the latter from carded, wool. Dormics, cambrics, calicoes, &c., which in like manner took their names from the places where they were first made, formerly constituted the principal articles of manufacture; and these were followed by druggets, serges, shalloons, duffields, &c.; which, in their turn, have been superseded by bombazines, worsted damasks, flowered satins, camblets, crapes, stuffs, tabinets, poplins, shawls, and a great variety of fancy articles, most of which are formed of wool, mohair, and silk, by different intermixtures and curious combinations. In this trade Norwich takes the lead; but the articles which have usually been considered as having been made in that city only, have been produced by the joint labour of several towns and villages of the county. Since the introduction of machinery, however, the trade has been more concentrated, and is now almost exclusively confined to Norwich, in which city are several silk-mills; the silk after being prepared, passes through other hands for the purpose of being manufactured into crape: there are establishments at North Walsham and Yarmouth, connected with the manufacturers at Norwich in this branch of trade: the Lincolnshire and Leicestershire wools are chiefly used, while that of Norfolk is for the most part exported for the use of the Yorkshire clothiers. At Norwich the making of cotton thread-lace has been introduced of late years.

Possessing a great extent of sea-coast, and abounding in rivers and streams, accompanied by numerous broads, or meres, Norfolk is well supplied both with fresh and salt-water fish: the latter are of all species, and in great plenty. The two chief fisheries are those of the herring and the mackarel. The herring fishery is by far the most important, and Yarmouth is the grand place of rendezvous for the boats engaged in it. The large shoal of herrings, which appears from the north off the Shetland Islands, is there separated into two divisions, one of which takes its course along the western shores of Britain, while the other, proceeding southward in the German Ocean, appears off the eastern coast of England in the month of September, when the grand fishing season commences. The merchants fit out large decked boats, of from forty to fifty tons' burden, each of which is manned with a master, mate, hawseman, waleman, net-rope man, and net-stower man, besides five or six labourers, called capstan-men: these all engage to serve for the season at stipulated wages besides which the master, mate, hawseman, and waleman, have an allowance of a certain sum per last. The vessels, being victualled, and having some tons of salt on board, proceed four, six, or even twelve leagues from shore. Numerous boats from other parts of the eastern coast of England, and many from Holland, also fish on this coast, selling their cargoes at the free Michaelmas mart at Yarmouth. In prosperous years, as many as seventy thousand barrels have been exported, exclusively of the home consumption, which may be estimated at fifteen thousand more. A summer fishing for herrings was formerly practised, and numerous French and Dutch vessels repaired to the coast for that purpose; but the herrings have ceased to frequent it during the warm season. In the course of the summer months, therefore, the boats are employed in the mackarel fishery, which is very considerable, and, though of minor importance in a commercial point of view, yet, during the spring and summer season, when this fish, which is gregarious and migratory, appears off the coast in vast shoals, it furnishes an abundant supply of food, at a very moderate expense, to the inhabitants of Norfolk and the neighbouring counties. This county also participates in the Greenland fishery.

Norfolk, by means of its rivers, &c., has a most extensive internal communication with the northern and midland counties; but, having only two grand outlets to the sea, its foreign and coasting trade are almost wholly engrossed by the ports of Lynn and Yarmouth; Wells, Blakeney, Burnham-Market, and Cley, although they share in the corn trade, being chiefly fishing towns. By means of the Greater Ouse, and the rivers and canals with which it is connected, Norfolk supplies the central parts of the kingdom with coal, wine, timber, grocery, and other articles, previously imported into the ports above mentioned; and in return receives large quantities of cheese, corn, and malt. Its foreign trade, though now comparatively small, was formerly very considerable, especially to the Baltic, Norway, Holland, Portugal, and Spain. The agricultural produce of Norfolk amounting to twice as much as is consumed by its inhabitants, the exports are consequently great; and in a good corn year, when the exportation is free, it has been stated that the ports of this county, including that brought down the rivers, which forms about one-tenth of the whole, export as much corn as all the other ports of England collectively.

The principal rivers are the Greater Ouse, the Lesser Ouse, the Waveney, the Bure, the Wensum, the Yare, and the Nar. The Greater Ouse, rising in Northamptonshire, and having previously received the waters of the Lark, the Cam, and the Lesser Ouse, enters this county on its western border, to the south-west of Downham-Market, and having passed under Stow, Magdalen, and German bridges, is then joined by the Nar from the eastward, and empties its waters, after a course of nearly sixty miles, into the large arm of the German Ocean called the Wash, two miles below the harbour of Lynn-Regis, which is formed by it, the large æstuary at its mouth being called Lynn Deep. The tide flows up this river to the vicinity of Denver, where it is checked by sluices erected for the purposes of drainage and navigation: at the period of the equinoxes this tide rushes up with great fury, and is called by the inhabitants "the Eagre." Besides admitting merchant-vessels of considerable burden as high as Lynn, it is navigable for barges above that port for the whole of its course through this county. The Lesser Ouse, or Brandon river, rises in a swampy meadow near the village of Lopham, in the southern part of the county, and almost immediately becomes its boundary, which it thenceforward continues to be; it takes a course, at first westward, but afterwards gradually inclines towards the north: at Thetford, where it becomes navigable, it is joined by the little river Thet, and thence, meandering through a sandy soil, it passes under Brandon bridge, and afterwards flows sluggishly through the fens until it joins the Greater Ouse at Littleport, on the borders of Cambridgeshire. The Waveney has its source in the same tract as the Lesser Ouse, but it pursues an opposite direction, immediately becoming the boundary of the county, which it continues to be throughout the rest of its course, and running eastward by Diss, Billingford, and Harleston to Bungay in Suffolk, it there makes an extensive curvature, in the form of a horse-shoe, and then proceeds to Beccles, in the same county, where it continues nearly north to Burgh, being there joined by the Yare, or Wensum, at the head of Breedon water, an expansion formed by these united rivers, which, contracting again, joins the sea below Yarmouth: the Waveney is navigable for barges as high as Bungay bridge. The Bure rises near Hindolveston, on the northern side of the county, and, running by Blickling, becomes navigable at Aylsham, whence its general course is in a south-easterly direction: after receiving several tributary streams, among which is the Thone, which flows from a lake near North Walsingham, it passes under Acle bridge, and after being increased by the superfluous waters of the marshes, it joins the Yare on the northern side of Yarmouth. The Bure and its attendant broads abound with various kinds of fish, such as pike, tench, trout, and perch, the last being particularly plentiful. The Wensum rises near West Rudham, in this county, and being joined by numerous smaller streams in its course, which is in a south-easterly direction, it passes the city of Norwich, where it begins to be navigable; at Trowse it receives the Tass, or Tase, and near Burgh it is joined by the Waveney, and proceeds towards Yarmouth. The Yare is considered to rise near Attleborough, and taking a north-easterly course, it joins the Wensum to the east of Norwich, and in this latter river its name is lost until the Wensum has been joined by the Waveney at the head of Breedon water, between which place and Yarmouth the united waters again assume the name of Yare, flowing past that town to the sea, to which it opens in a south-easterly direction. In the Yare, or Wensum, is found a singular species of perch, called a ruffe, which is smaller and of a more slender form than the common perch. The Nar, called also Sechy and Seechy river, has its source at Litcham, whence it flows westward by Castle-Acre to Narburgh, and thence under Sechy bridge, shortly below which it assumes a northerly course, and finally falls into the Greater Ouse, near Lynn-Regis, whence it is navigable up to Narburgh, a distance of about fifteen miles. The navigable river Nene forms part of the western boundary of the county, which it separates from Lincolnshire. This county has little artificial navigation in the form of canals; the principal exertions of that kind having been directed towards extending and improving the navigation of the rivers. There is a canal from Wisbeach in Cambridgeshire to Outwell creek and Salter's Load in Norfolk, an extent of about six miles, for the purpose of improving the navigation of the river Nene. With a view to the more effectual drainage of the fens, as well as to facilitate the carriage of heavy goods, an act was obtained in the year 1795, for making a navigable canal, called the Eau-brink cut, to Lynn-Regis: in the year 1805, another act was passed to amend the former; but the work was not begun till 1818, and completed in 1820. Different private estates have small cuts to the navigable rivers for the conveyance of corn, &c. A navigable communication with the sea at Lowestoft, in the county of Suffolk, is now in progress, under the superintendence of an incorporated body of shareholders. All the principal modern roads crossing the county concentrate at Norwich: the mail-coach road from London, through Newmarket, enters the county near Thetford, and that from Ipswich, near Scole, or Osmondston, both passing on to Norwich. The road from London, through Cambridge, enters near Outwell, and passes through Downham-Market, Swaffham, and East Dereham, to Norwich: parallel with this, more northerly, a line of road from Lynn-Regis leads through Fakenham, Foulsham, and Reepham, to the same city. From Norwich, northward, a road leads through Aylsham, and terminates at Cromer, on the coast of the North sea; another extends north-eastward to the coast; and a third eastward, through Castle-Thorpe, Acle, &c., to Caistor, with a bend southerly to Yarmouth.

Five principal Roman stations were established in, and contiguous to, this county, viz.: Branodonum, Garianonum, Venta-Icenorum, Sitomagus, and Ad-Tuam, besides various encampments, where different remains of that people, such as coins, urns, &c., have been discovered, particularly at Brompton, Buckenham, and Thetford. Of the Roman roads that traversed this county there are few distinct vestiges. The great road which crossed the island from east to west, from the Norfolk coast to St. David's Head in Pembrokeshire, is supposed to have commenced at Burgh, near Yarmouth, whence it passed by Caistor, and is now conspicuous near Downham-Market, whence, crossing the river Ouse, it passes through the fens into Cambridgeshire. Some traces of vicinal ways are also still discernible. What is called Pedder's way, running from Thetford, by Ickborough, Swaffham, Castle-Acre, and Tring, to the sea near Brancaster, appears to be one of these. The road leading by Long Stratton to Tasburgh was probably another, whilst a third branched off from this to the north-west, passing through Marshland, Upwell, and Elm, to Wisbeach. What is called the Milky Way has been considered Roman; but is more likely of later date, and was probably made for the convenience of the pilgrims to the chapel of our Lady of Walsingham: it is traceable in several places, and is tolerably perfect in the vicinity of the tumuli called Grimes Graves. Other tumuli may be seen in different parts of the county, but they are not very numerous. On Mousehold heath, near Norwich, are many excavations in the earth, which King and other antiquaries have considered hiding-pits, or British caves. The number of parishes in this county being greater than that in any other county in England, the ecclesiastical edifices are numerous in a corresponding degree, though few of them possess grandeur of architecture. Many of them are in great part of Saxon, or Danish construction, and several have circular towers. There are also a few fine specimens of the Norman period, the principal of which is Norwich cathedral. Other examples of nearly the same style and age may be found in the ruinous churches of Wymondham, Attleborough, Binham, Castle-Acre, and St. Margaret's, in the town of Lynn. Many of the parishes have also been united, and, either as a cause or consequence thereof, several churches have fallen into ruins. Of ancient fonts, particularly fine specimens are contained in the churches of Binham, Norwich, Walsingham, and Wymondham. This county producing scarcely any stone, the greater number of the churches, as well as many of the other public buildings, are constructed almost wholly with flints, which are found in great abundance, and in many edifices are faced and squared, and laid in regular courses. The religious houses were extremely numerous, amounting, at the time of the general dissolution, to no fewer than one hundred and twenty-three, of all orders. The principal remains of monastic buildings are those of the abbey of Creak, Dereham, and St. Bene't at Holme; and of the priories of Binham, Bromeholme, Old Buckenham, Castle-Acre, Flitcham, Thetford, and Walsingham. Of ancient castles, chiefly Norman, there are considerable remains at Norwich, Castle-Acre, and Castle-Rising. The most remarkable ancient mansions are Caistor Hall, near Yarmouth; Oxborough Hall, near Stoke; Winwal House, near Stoke; Stiffkey Hall, near Walsingham; and Beaconsthorpe Hall.

NORHAM, otherwise NORHAMSHIRE, a parish forming a detached portion of the county palatine of DURHAM, comprising the chapelry of Cornhill, and the townships of Duddo, Felkington, Grindon, Horncliffe, Loan-End, Longridge, Norham, Norham-Mains, Shoreswood, Thornton, and Twizel, and containing 3906 inhabitants, of which number, 901 are in the township of Norham, 7 miles (S. W. by W.) from Berwick upon Tweed. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Northumberland, and diocese of Durham, rated in the king's books at £15. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Durham. The church, dedicated to St. Cuthbert, and built about 840, is principally in the Norman style of architecture, but it comprises only a part of the original edifice, the chancel and the east end having been demolished. It had anciently three chantries, in honour of St. Cuthbert, the Blessed Virgin Mary, and St. Nicholas, and had the privilege of sanctuary for thirty-seven days. The remains of Ceolwulph, a lineal descendant of Ida, and King of Northumberland, were brought from Lindisfarne and buried here, where also Gospatric, Earl of Northumberland, was interred. There is a place of worship for Independents. A free school, with a house for the master, was erected by subscription in 1809, and is endowed with about twenty acres of land allotted on enclosing the common, and producing an annual income of £36. The doctrine of Christianity is stated to have been first preached to the Northumbrians, by the Scottish missionaries, at Norham. On the establishment of a see for Northumbria, this place was given to Aidan, the first bishop, and continued in the possession of his successors until the time of Bishop Barnes, who alienated his rights to the crown: the bishops exercised a special jurisdiction throughout the district, having their sheriff, coroner, justices, and other civil officers, their court of exchequer, gallows, &c. By charter of Bishop Pudsey, the inhabitants enjoyed very extensive privileges.

Being situated on a pass, or ford, on the river Tweed, called Ubbanford, on the borders of England and Scotland, Norham was frequently the scene of rapine and bloodshed, and the place of meeting between the nobility and principal individuals of the two kingdoms for settling the affairs relative to the border. Bishop Flambard, in 1121, probably erected the first regular fortress, which, having been enlarged and strengthened by succeeding prelates, was, when well garrisoned, deemed almost impregnable. David I., King of Scotland, however, in 1138, took and destroyed the town and castle, after a spirited resistance; but they were restored, in 1154, by Bishop Pudsey, who built the present great tower of the castle. Various treaties between the Scots and King John were arranged here, and, in 1215, that monarch, in consequence of the defection of the Northumbrian barons, and their having sworn homage to the Scottish king, Alexander II., laid siege to the castle, which held out successfully for forty days, when he was obliged to withdraw his forces. In 1318, it was unsuccessfully besieged by the Scots, who, however, were more fortunate in an attack in 1322, when they obtained possession of it, but were soon afterwards obliged to abandon it, having for ten days resisted an assault of Edward II. Soon after the accession of Edward III., they stormed the castle with success, but did not long retain it. The town was plundered and burnt, in 1355, by a party of Scottish troops, under the command of Sir William Ramsay; and the castle, in 1498, was besieged by the Scottish monarch, but the Earl of Surrey advancing to the relief of the garrison, the assailants were compelled to retire. A short time prior to the battle of Flodden Field they again invested the fortress, which fell into their possession through information given by a deserter from the garrison. The remains of this strong edifice occupy the summit of a steep rocky eminence impending over the bed of the river, and so near that portions have been washed away by the stream: the keep, or main tower, with its vaults and prisons entire, is the principal part, and is constructed of a soft red freestone. About two miles below Norham, on the banks of the river, two urns, containing human bones, were found in a gravel pit, called the Crooks, near which are the pedestals of two ancient crosses, also an artificial eminence, probably a barrow, surrounded by stone steps. At New Waterford the Tweed is crossed by a chain bridge, the first of the kind erected in England: it was commenced in August 1819, and opened July 26th, 1820, having been completed at an expense of not more than £5000, to which the trustees added £1050 above the estimate of the engineer: the extreme length of the suspension chains, from the point of junction on each side of the river, is five hundred and ninety feet, and from the abutments four hundred and thirty-two; the height of the bridge from the surface of the river, twenty-seven feet; and its width sufficient to allow two carriages to pass between the foot-paths: the weight of the chains, platform, &c., is about one hundred and sixty tons. Here is a considerable salmon fishery; and two annual fairs are held on the second Thursday in May, and the third Thursday in October: a market was formerly held at Norham, but it has been long discontinued. The learned Dr. George Carlton, successively Bishop of Llandaff and Chichester, was born here.

NORHAM-MAINS, a township in the parish of NORHAM, otherwise Norhamshire, county palatine of DURHAM, though locally to the northward of Northumberland, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Berwick upon Tweed, containing 122 inhabitants.

NORLAND, a township in the parish of HALIFAX, wapentake of MORLEY, West riding of the county of YORK, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W.) from Halifax, containing 1665 inhabitants. On Norland moor is an immense rock, called the Lad Stone, a name supposed to be derived from the British word Llad, to slay, and to have been in some way connected with the sacrifices of the Druids.

NORLEY, a township in the parish of FRODSHAM, second division of the hundred of EDDISBURY, county palatine of CHESTER, 5 miles (S. E.) from Frodsham, containing 434 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

NORMANBY, a parish in the eastern division of the wapentake of ASLACOE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 7 miles (W. by S.) from Market-Rasen, containing 328 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Stow, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £5, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Lincoln. The church is dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Mrs. Dunn, in 1767, gave a small endowment for the instruction of children. The parish is bounded on the east by the river Ancholme.

NORMANBY, a township in the parish of STOW, wapentake of WELL, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $7\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E.) from Gainsborough, containing 21 inhabitants.

NORMANBY, a tything in that part of the parish of ASH which is in the first division of the hundred of WOKING, county of SURREY, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Guildford. The population is returned with the parish.

NORMANBY, a township in that part of the parish of ORMSBY which is in the eastern division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, North riding of the county of YORK, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Guisbrough, containing 122 inhabitants.

NORMANBY, a parish in the wapentake of RYE-DALE, North riding of the county of YORK, comprising the townships of Normanby and Thornton-Risebrough, and containing 223 inhabitants, of which number, 191 are in the township of Normanby, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Pickering. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cleveland, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £9. 12. 6., and in the patronage of Arthur Cayley, Esq. Five poor children are educated for £6 a year, arising from a rent-charge left by Judith Boynton, in 1700. Here is a sulphureous mineral spring, the water of which contains carbonic acid and a small portion of neutral salt, and is taken as an alterative and purgative. Normanby gives the title of viscount to the family of Phipps, Earls of Mulgrave.

NORMANBY on the WOLD, a parish in the northern division of the wapentake of WALSHCROFT, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 4 miles (N. by E.) from Market-Rasen, containing 96 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, united to that of Claxby in 1740, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £9. 10. 10. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

NORMANTON, a parish in the hundred of REPTON and GRESLEY, county of DERBY, 2 miles (S.) from Derby, containing 294 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of St. Peter in Derby, in the archdeaconry of Derby, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry. Normanton is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s. The Derby canal crosses the north-east part of the parish.

NORMANTON, a hamlet (formerly a chapelry) in the parish of BOTTESFORD, hundred of FRAMLAND, county of LEICESTER, 8 miles (N. W. by W.) from Grantham. The population is returned with the parish. The chapel is demolished.

NORMANTON, a parish in the wapentake of LOVEDEN, parts of KESTEVEN, county of LINCOLN, $7\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Grantham, containing 189 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £10. 2. 6., and in the patronage of the Marquis of Bristol. The church, dedicated to St. Nicholas, is partly Norman, and partly in the early style of English architecture, with a curious tower, and a large stone font.

NORMANTON, a hamlet in the parish of SOUTHWELL, liberty of SOUTHWELL and SCROOBY, county of NOTTINGHAM, 1 mile (N. E. by N.) from Southwell. Here was formerly a chapel, which, after its desecration, was converted into a barn.

NORMANTON, a parish in the hundred of MARTINSLEY, county of RUTLAND, 5 miles (E. S. E.) from Oakham, containing 26 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £5. 4. 7., and in the patronage of Sir Gilbert Heathcote, Bart. The church is dedicated to St. Matthew. The river Gwash runs through the parish, in which there is a chalybeate spring strongly impregnated with steel.

NORMANTON, a parish in the lower division of the wapentake of AGBRIGG, West riding of the county of YORK, comprising the townships of Altofts, Normanton, and Snydale, and containing 773 inhabitants, of which number, 250 are in the township of Normanton, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Wakefield. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £7, and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Trinity College, Cambridge. The church is dedicated to All Saints. A free school was founded here about 1592, by John Freeston, who endowed it with £10 a year, besides two hundred marks for the building of a house for the master and usher: twenty children are taught upon this foundation, and eight poor girls are instructed for about £5 per annum, the bequest of Elizabeth Levitt.

NORMANTON le HEATH, a chapelry in the parish of NAILSTONE, hundred of SPARKENHOE, county of LEICESTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Ashby de la Zouch, containing 215 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

NORMANTON upon SOAR, a parish in the southern division of the wapentake of RUSHCLIFFE, county of NOTTINGHAM, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Loughborough, containing 326 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Nottingham, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £7. 11. 0½., and in the alternate patronage of — Richards, and — Buckley, Esqrs. The church is dedicated to St. John. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

NORMANTON (SOUTH), a parish in the hundred of SCARSDALE, county of DERBY, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Alfreton, containing 1056 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Derby, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £9. 15. 5., and in the patronage of Sir E. Wilmot, Bart. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. A charity school is supported by voluntary contributions. Some collieries are in operation in the neighbourhood, but the inhabitants are principally employed in frame-knitting. Jedediah Strutt, Esq., the ingenious inventor of the machine for manufacturing ribbed stockings, was born here.

NORMANTON (TEMPLE), a chapelry in the parish of CHESTERFIELD, hundred of SCARSDALE, county of DERBY, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. E.) from Chesterfield, containing 141 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Derby, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, endowed with £1400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Miss Lord. A school is supported by small annual donations.

NORMANTON upon TRENT, a parish in the northern division of the wapentake of THURGARTON, county of NOTTINGHAM, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Tuxford, containing 297 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Nottingham, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £4. 5., endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Duke of Devonshire. The church is dedicated to St. Matthew. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Peter Moreau, in 1725, left a trifling sum for teaching poor children and providing each a bible: ten are instructed in a school-house erected by Henry Jackson, whose daughter, Elizabeth Hall, in 1781, conveyed certain land, producing about £10 per annum, in further support of the master.

NORMANTON on the WOLDS, a township in that part of the parish of PLUMTREE which is in the northern division of the wapentake of RUSHCLIFFE, county of NOTTINGHAM, 6 miles (S. E. by S.) from Nottingham, containing 194 inhabitants. It is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s.

NORMANTON-TURVILLE, a hamlet in the parish of THURLASTON, hundred of SPARKENHOE, county of LEICESTER, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Hinckley, containing 19 inhabitants.

NORMICOTT, a liberty in the parish of STONE, southern division of the hundred of PIREHILL, county of STAFFORD, containing 878 inhabitants.

NORTHALL, a hamlet in the parish of EDDLESBOROUGH, hundred of COTTESLOE, county of BUCKINGHAM, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Ivinghoe, containing 482 inhabitants.

NORTHALLERTON, North riding of the county of YORK.—See ALLERTON (NORTH).

NORTHAM, a parish in the hundred of SHEBBEAR, county of DEVON, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N. by W.) from Bideford, containing 2550 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Barnstaple, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £10. 10., endowed with £200 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Dean and Canons of Windsor. The church is dedicated to St. Margaret. A place of worship for Independents was erected in 1829. Here are almshouses for four widows, and several small endowments for teaching poor children, of which some are applied in support of a school conducted on the Madras system. The parish is bounded by the Bristol channel on the west, and by the navigable river Torridge on the east.

NORTHAMPTON, a borough and market town, having separate jurisdiction, locally in the hundred of Spelhoe, county of NORTHAMPTON, of which it is the chief town, 66 miles (N. W. by N.) from London, on the road to Leicester, containing 10,793 inhabitants. This place, from its situation to the north of the river Nine, or Nene, (called by Camden the Avon) formerly the Aufona, is by some antiquaries supposed to have been called North Aufonten, of which its present name is probably a contraction; by others it is said to have been called, by the Saxons, Hamtone, and to have had the word North prefixed by way of distinguishing it from other towns of the same name. It is unquestionably a place of antiquity, and must have attained a considerable degree of importance prior to the division of the kingdom into shires, from its having given name to that in which it is situated. In the reign of Edward the Elder it was in the possession of the Danes, who, in 921, made it the principal station of their forces, who marched thence to the siege of Towcester. In 1010, it was again attacked by the Danes, who burnt the town and laid waste the adjacent country. During the insurrection of the Northumbrians, in 1064, against Tosti, son of Earl Godwin, the insurgents, under Earl Morcar, whom they had chosen for their leader, marched to this place, where they committed excessive outrages, burning the houses of the inhabitants, whom they massacred, and carrying off great quantities of cattle, and several hundred prisoners. Harold, afterwards king, being sent against the insurgents, encountered them near the town, but listening to their just representations of the tyranny and oppression of Tosti, he entered into an accommodation with them, and procured for Morcar a confirmation of his assumed authority. The town, which had scarcely recovered from the depredation it suffered upon this occasion, was, at the time of the Conquest, given to Earl Waltheof, who had married the Countess Judith, niece of the Conqueror; but the earl having entered into a conspiracy against the king, was executed as a traitor, and his confiscated possessions were bestowed on Simon de St. Liz, Earl of Huntingdon and Northampton, who repaired and beautified the town, erected a strong castle for its defence, and surrounded it with massive walls, in which were four gates. From this period it rapidly improved, and from its central situation and the security of its fortifications, became the occasional residence of several of the kings, of whom Henry I., in the twenty-third year of his reign, celebrated the festival of Easter here with great pomp, and, in 1131, assembled a parliament, in which the English barons swore homage to his daughter, the Empress Matilda, whom he appointed his successor. In the 11th of Henry II., a council was convened here, at which Archbishop Becket was summoned to appear for his refusal to submit to the constitutions of Clarendon; and on the rebellion of Prince Henry, Anketil Mallore, one of his partizans, advancing to Northampton with a body of forces, defeated the king's troops, aided by a party of the inhabitants, and took two hundred of the latter prisoners. William, King of Scotland, being taken prisoner at the battle of Alnwick, was brought to Northampton, where Henry was then residing, and the Bishop of Durham, Roger de Mowbray, Earl Ferrers, with Anketil Mallore, and William de Dive, constables of the Earl of Leicester, waited upon him, to surrender the several castles which they had held against him. In 1180 a convention of barons and prelates was held here, to take into consideration the laws of the realm, and to amend and enforce the constitutions of Clarendon, by which the kingdom was first divided into six circuits, and three itinerant justices were assigned to each, for the administration of the laws and the punishment of offenders; and in the following year the king held a council previously to his visiting his dominions on the continent.

Richard I., soon after his return from captivity, kept the festival of Easter in this town, where he entertained William of Scotland, who came to solicit a grant of the county of Northumberland. During this reign a mint existed here, and on the death of Richard, the barons assembled in council at this place, and took the oath of allegiance to his brother John, at that time in Normandy. John, in the tenth year of his reign, being displeased with the citizens of London, removed his court of Exchequer to Northampton, and three years afterwards assembled a council of temporal lords, at which Pandulph and Durand, legates from the pope, attended on behalf of the exiled clergy, whom the king allowed to return to their country; but refusing to restore their confiscated property, he was excommunicated by the legates. Previous to the commencement of the war between the king and the barons, the latter transmitted to him their memorial of grievances, which the king having indignantly refused to redress, they laid siege to the castle of Northampton, but, being unable to reduce it, they withdrew their forces, after remaining before it fourteen days: it was, however, on the signing of Magna Charta, among other castles, placed in their custody, as security for the fulfilment of the conditions; but, on the renewal of the war, it was entrusted to Fulke de Brete, a determined loyalist. In 1216, the townsmen attacked and killed many of the garrison under the command of that officer, in retaliation for which the soldiers burnt a considerable portion of the town. Henry III., attended by his court, celebrated the festival of Christmas at the castle, where he was splendidly entertained by the governor; and in the thirtieth year of his reign, the king gave the inhabitants ten marks to purchase books for a public library, a sacramental chalice for the church of All Saints, and smaller vessels of silver for the other churches. The castle was, in 1264, occupied by the insurgent barons under the Earl of Leicester, from whose son, Simon de Montfort, it was taken by stratagem, after many fruitless attempts to reduce it; but the following year it was retaken by the Montforts, who celebrated a tournament there, which was numerous and brilliantly attended; soon after which the elder Montfort was defeated and slain at the battle of Evesham. In 1268, a parliament was held here, in which the rebellious barons were deprived of their estates, and Simon de Montfort was banished the realm; and a council of prelates was assembled at the same time, at which the pope's legate excommunicated those bishops who had joined their party. During this reign, repeated attempts were made to establish a university in the town, in consequence of dissensions between the students and the citizens of Oxford; in 1258, a large party of students removed to this place, and a royal license was obtained for erecting public schools for teaching the arts and sciences: subsequent disputes between the students and the townsmen, both of Oxford and Cambridge, occasioned fresh accessions to Northampton, but, in 1265, the establishments were dissolved by order of the king, and the professors returned with their pupils to their ancient seats. In the reign of Edward II., John Poydras, the son of a tanner of Exeter, who pretended to be the son and heir of Edward I., was convicted and executed as an impostor in the town; and in the second year of the reign of Edward III., a treaty was concluded with the Scots, by which the king resigned his pretensions to the sovereignty of Scotland, in consideration of thirty thousand marks paid by Robert Bruce, whose infant son David was affianced to Jane, the king's sister, also an infant: in the same parliament was enacted the statute of Northampton, specifying in what cases pardon should be granted for felony, and regulating the appointment of judges of assize. The last parliament held here, was summoned in the fourth year of the reign of Richard II., to grant supplies for the troops destined to serve in a war against France, when a poll-tax was ordered, the levying of which excited the rebellion headed by Wat Tyler: this parliament, together with the convocation of Canterbury, sat in the chancel of All Hallows' church, now All Saints', the castle having fallen into a ruinous state.

During the war between the houses of York and Lancaster, a sanguinary and decisive battle took place on the 9th of July, 1460, in which Henry VI. was defeated and taken prisoner. The treacherous desertion of Lord Grey of Ruthin, who commanded the vanguard of the king's army, contributed to the defeat of the royal forces, on whose side fell the Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Shrewsbury, Viscount Beaumont, Lord Egremont, and other nobles, who were buried in the town; the duke was interred in the church of the Grey friars, and several of the others in St. John's hospital, where their bones have been recently discovered. In the 9th of Edward IV., Earl Rivers and his son, who had been taken by the rebels under Sir Henry Nevil and Sir John Coniers, who headed the insurrection in Yorkshire, were beheaded in this town. Queen Elizabeth, in her progress through the country, visited Northampton, where she was hospitably received, and presented by the magistrates with a valuable purse containing £20 : a similar mark of respect was also paid to Charles I. and his consort, who, on passing through the town, were presented by the mayor and corporation with two bowls of silver gilt, containing one hundred marks. In 1637, the court of Eyre for the forests was held here, under the Earl of Holland, Chief Justice, as head of the commission, assisted by five of the judges and many of the nobility and gentry. During the parliamentary war, Lord Brooke took possession of the town, which he fortified for the parliament; and in 1675 it was nearly destroyed by a fire, which consumed six hundred houses, chiefly built of wood and roofed with thatch. From this severe calamity, of which the damage was estimated at £150,000, it recovered, under the auspices of the Earl of Northampton, who procured an act of parliament for its restoration.

The town is pleasantly situated on the acclivity of an eminence rising gradually from the north bank of the river Nene, over which are two bridges of stone, of which that to the south is a handsome structure of three elliptic arches : it consists principally of two spacious and regular streets, nearly a mile in length, which, intersecting each other at right angles, divide it into four nearly equal parts ; the houses are handsomely built of stone, and the town, which is well paved, and lighted with gas, under an act of parliament recently obtained, has a clean, respectable, and cheerful appearance : the central part is supplied with water from a reservoir near the market-place, into which it is conveyed by pipes from a spring, called the Conduit Head, in a field to the east of the town. The theatre, a handsome modern building, conveniently arranged and well fitted up, was opened in 1806, and the performances are well conducted by a provincial company : races take place annually in September, and are in general well attended ; and within these few years a spring meeting has been held, about the last week in March ; the race-course comprises about one hundred and seventeen acres, at a short distance from the town. At the end of Derngate-street is a fine promenade, made at the expense of the corporation : it is shaded by a range of lofty trees, and commands a pleasing view of the adjoining meadows. The environs are pleasant, and abound with handsome villas and thriving plantations : at the northern extremity of the town are the barracks, erected in 1796, forming a handsome range of building, consisting of a centre and two wings. The principal articles of manufacture are, boots and shoes, of which great quantities are made for the supply of the army ; and stockings and lace, the latter of which, since the introduction of machinery, has materially declined : a considerable trade is carried on in the currying of leather. A branch canal was constructed, in 1815, from the river Nene to the Grand Junction canal, by means of which a facility of communication is obtained with almost every part of the kingdom. The market days are Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday ; the last, a very large cattle market : the fairs are on the second Tuesday in January, February 20th, the third Monday in March, April 5th, May 4th, June 19th, August 5th and 26th, September 19th (for cheese), the first Thursday in November, the 28th of the same month, and December 19th, principally for horses, cattle, sheep, and pigs : the fairs for horses and cattle are numerous attended by dealers. The market-place is a spacious and commodious area, in the centre of which is a column with a powerful gas-light, and on the south side the conduit from which the town is supplied with water.

The borough received a charter of incorporation in the 31st of Henry II., which was confirmed in several succeeding reigns, and modified and enlarged in the 36th of George III., by which the government is vested in a mayor, an indefinite number of bailiffs who have served that office, a recorder, deputy recorder, an indefinite number of aldermen, and forty-eight common councilmen, assisted by a town clerk, chamberlain, two coroners, four serjeants at mace, and subordinate officers. The mayor, who is annually chosen, becomes an alderman on the expiration of his office ; the bailiffs are chosen from the common council, in which vacancies are filled up by the mayor and aldermen from the general body of freemen. The mayor, the late mayor, the recorder, deputy recorder, and three aldermen annually appointed, are justices of the peace within the borough. The freedom of the borough is inherited by birth, acquired by servitude, or obtained by marriage with a freeman's widow or daughter, or by purchase. The corporation hold quarterly courts of session, and have power to try for capital offences, which, however, they transfer to the assizes for the county : they also hold a court of record, at which the mayor and bailiffs preside, every third week, for the recovery of debts and determining pleas to any amount. The town hall is an ancient edifice commodiously arranged, and decorated with portraits of Sir Thomas White, the founder of St. John's College, Oxford, and a munificent benefactor to Northampton and other towns, and of the late Rt. Hon. Spencer Perceval, Chancellor of the Exchequer, and first lord of the Treasury. The borough gaol and house of correction is a small modern building adapted to the classification of prisoners. The borough has returned two members to parliament from the early part of the reign of Edward I. : the right of election is vested in the inhabitant householders not receiving alms, of whom the number is about two thousand : the mayor and bailiffs are the returning officers. The assizes for the county and the election of knights of the shire are held here. The county hall is a spacious and elegant structure, in the Grecian style of architecture, and contains courts for the assizes and quarter sessions, and a suite of rooms well adapted to the transaction of the general business of the county ; in the hall, the ceiling of which is splendidly decorated, are portraits of King William III. and Queen Mary, Queen Anne, George I., and George II. : this edifice is deservedly admired as a handsome specimen of the Corinthian order. Adjoining the shire-hall is the common gaol and house of correction for the county, erected in 1794, at an expense of £16,000 : it is a spacious building, and contains eleven wards, four work-rooms, twelve day-rooms, and eleven airing-yards, for the classification of prisoners; an additional piece of ground has been enclosed within the area of the prison, for the erection of a tread-mill; the prisoners are employed in grinding and dressing corn, splitting beans, and drawing wire, and receive one-half of their earnings: the old county gaol has been converted into a lodge for the turnkey, and a prison for debtors.

The town comprises the parishes of All Saints, St. Giles, St. Peter, and St. Sepulchre, all in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, and formerly had seven parochial churches within the walls, and two without, of which only four are remaining. The living of All Saints' is a vicarage, rated in the king's books at £22, and in the patronage of such members of the Corporation as are Parishioners: the church, rebuilt soon after the fire in 1675, is a spacious edifice, in the Grecian style of architecture, having in the centre a cupola supported on columns of the Ionic order, and at the west end the original square embattled tower, which escaped the conflagration, and in which is a dial illuminated with gas, and a portico of twelve lofty Ionic columns supporting a cornice and balustrade, in the centre of which is a statue of Charles II.; on the pedestal is recorded his donation of one thousand tons of timber for the rebuilding of the church; the interior is appropriately ornamented; the altar-piece is decorated with paintings of Moses and Aaron, by Sir Godfrey Kneller; the chancel is separated by a richly-carved oak screen, and among the monuments are, one to the memory of the learned Dr. Conant, Prebendary of Worcester, and vicar of this parish, and a handsome marble monument, by Chantrey, to the Rt. Hon. Spencer Perceval, many years member for the borough, who was assassinated in the lobby of the House of Commons; his statue, elevated on a pedestal, is admirably sculptured, and exhibits gracefulness of form and dignity of expression: the old stone wall which enclosed the churchyard has been taken down, and a handsome iron palisade substituted in its place. The living of St. Giles' is a discharged vicarage, rated in the king's books at £7. 19., endowed with £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Rev. Edward Watkins: the church is a large cruciform structure, with a lofty square embattled tower rising from the intersection; it displays good portions in various styles of English architecture, with a fine western Norman entrance; the chancel is in the early English, with an east window of the decorated, style, and in the nave and transepts the windows and other portions are of the later English; in a chapel in the south aisle is a beautiful altartomb of alabaster, with a recumbent figure of a female, supposed to represent some individual of the family of Gobion, and an octagonal font, richly panelled in the later English style. The living of St. Peter's is a rectory, with the perpetual curacies of Kingsthorpe and Upton, rated in the king's books at £34. 2. 11., and in the patronage of the Governors of St. Katherine's hospital, London: the church, supposed to have been erected about the same time as the castle, is a beautiful and perfect specimen of the enriched Norman style of architecture, with a highly-ornamented tower, communicating with the church by a richly-moulded arch; the details are exquisitely wrought, and, having been cleared from the plaster and whitewash which concealed their beauty, exhibit some of the finest models in that style of architecture; to the east of the chancel is a vaulted crypt; the roof of the church is supported on circular arches, and a series of alternately clustered and single-shafted columns; the font is richly ornamented in the later English style: there are various ancient and some modern monuments, among which latter is one to the memory of John Smith, an eminent mezzotinto engraver, who died in 1742. The living of St. Sepulchre's is a discharged vicarage, rated in the king's books at £6. 1., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and £1000 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Thomas Butcher, Esq: the church is supposed to have been built by the Knights Templars, after the model of the church of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem, and is one of four buildings of that kind remaining in the kingdom; it is of a circular form, and has a cupola in the centre of the roof, which is supported on eight round Norman columns, and plain pointed arches, with a western tower surmounted by a spire, and a chancel, in which are many curious figures and ancient inscriptions. There are two places of worship for Baptists, one for the Society of Friends, one for Huntingtonians, three for Independents, one for Wesleyan Methodists, and a Roman Catholic chapel.

The free grammar school was founded, in 1542, by Mr. Thomas Chipsey, who endowed it with lands, which, together with subsequent benefactions, produce an income of about £120 per annum; in 1557, Cardinal Pole granted for its use the remains of the dilapidated church of St. Gregory: the master is appointed by the mayor and corporation, and the usher by the master, the mayor, deputy recorder, the vicar of all Saints, and the lord of the manor of Lillingston-Lovell. The corporation charity school was founded by the corporation, who appropriated to that purpose an unrestricted gift of £1000 by the Earl of Northampton, with which sum and other benefactions an estate was purchased, producing an income of £310 per annum, of which a part is appropriated to the clothing of twenty aged freemen, to each of whom ten shillings per annum is also paid. The Blue-coat school was founded, in 1710, by Mr. John Dryden of Chesterton, who endowed it with a house, to which Mr. Zachariah Herbert added a farm, the rents of which are applied to clothing, instructing, and apprenticing twenty boys, who, on the expiration of their indentures, receive each a gratuity of £10. The Green school was founded, in 1761, by Mr. Gabriel Newton of Leicester, who endowed it with a rent-charge of £26 per annum. In 1738, Mrs. Dorothy Becket, and her sister, Mrs. Ann Sargeant, established a school for the clothing and education of thirty poor girls; the number has been increased, and a more convenient school-room and house for the mistress were erected in 1813. A National and a British and Foreign school are supported by subscription. St. John's hospital, said to have been founded, in 1090, by William, Archdeacon of Northampton, for the reception of aged and infirm persons, is governed by a master, appointed by the Bishop of Lincoln, and two brothers, nominated by the master, who must be in holy orders, and officiate as chaplains: there are also eight aged women, who receive a small weekly allowance in money, and a supply of coal. To the south of St. John's is the hospital of St. Thomas à Becket, founded by the burgesses, about the year 1450, and endowed for the support of twelve aged widows:

the endowment was augmented, in 1654, by Sir John Langham, for six additional widows, and has been increased by subsequent benefactions: the present income is about £780 per annum; the inmates receive each 4s. per week, besides clothes, fuel, &c., and fifty out-pensioners £8 per annum each: the establishment is governed by a warden, who is one of the aldermen; the vicar of All Saints' is chaplain. The general infirmary, to the east of the town, erected and fitted up by subscription in 1793, at an expense of near £25,000, is a handsome building of white stone, three stories high, and well adapted to its various uses: it is under the management of a committee, and is gratuitously attended by the physicians and surgeons resident in the town: it is supported by the income arising from benefactions, and by annual subscription: there are numerous and extensive bequests for benevolent purposes, among which may be noticed Sir Thomas White's fund, amounting to upwards of £13,000, for loans, in sums of £100 each, for nine years without interest, to young tradesmen on their commencing business, and various charitable donations for distribution among the indigent and necessitous poor.

Among the monastic institutions formerly established here, were the priory of St. Andrew, founded about 1076, for Cluniac monks, the revenue of which, at the dissolution, was £344. 13. 7.; an abbey of Black canons, founded about 1112, by William Peverill, natural son of William the Conqueror, and dedicated to St. James, the revenue of which was £213. 17. 2.; the abbey de la Pré, or de Pratis, for nuns of the Cluniac order, founded in the reign of Stephen, by Simon de St. Liz, second Earl of Northampton, and dedicated to St. Mary, the revenue of which was £119. 9. 7½.; a house of Friars minors, built about the year 1217, on ground to the north of the market-place, given to them by the inhabitants, who were consequently regarded as the founders, of which the revenue was £6. 13. 4.; an hospital, on the south side of the town, for a master and leprous brethren, founded in 1240, by Henry III., and dedicated to St. Leonard, of which the revenue was £12. 4. 8., now consolidated with the hospital of St. Thomas à Becket; a Carmelite priory, founded in 1271, by Simon de Montfort, the revenue of which was £10. 10.; a priory and chapel for Augustine friars, founded in 1322, by John Longville, near the South gate; and the college of All Saints, founded in 1459, for a master and two fellows, of which the revenue was £2. 13. 4. Of the ancient castle only a few vestiges, consisting of mounds of earth, are to be traced; and of the embattled walls and the four gates, which were demolished by order of the king, in 1662, there are no remains. Robert Brown, founder of the religious sect called Brownists, was a native of this town; and Dr. Samuel Parker, Bishop of Oxford under James II., and author of some curious historical memoirs, was born here in 1640. Dr. Philip Doddridge, author of the "Family Expositor," was tutor in a dissenting academy at Northampton, until a short time previous to his death in 1749. Northampton gives the titles of earl and marquis to the family of Compton.

NORTHAMPTONSHIRE, an inland county, bounded on the north by the counties of Leicester, Rutland, and Lincoln; on the east by those of Cambridge, Huntingdon, and Bedford; on the south by Buckinghamshire and Oxfordshire; and on the west by Oxfordshire and Warwickshire: it extends obliquely from 52° to 52° 42' (N. Lat.), and from 8' to 1° 19' (W. Lon.), and includes an area of one thousand and seventeen square miles, or six hundred and fifty thousand eight hundred and eighty statute acres. The population, in 1821, was 162,483. This county, which in the ancient British times was the most southern part of the territory of the Coritani, was included by the Romans in the division of Flavia Cæsariensis, and by the Saxons in the kingdom of Mercia. It suffered repeatedly and severely from the ravages of the Danes, to which its situation particularly exposed it. Hamtune, now Northampton, was in the possession of those invaders for nearly forty years: Towcester appears to have been burned by them, and King Edward the Elder ordered it to be rebuilt. In the year 921, the same sovereign marched with his army to Passenham, in order to expel the Danes from this part of the country. The central situation of the county, and that of its capital, the ancient town of Northampton, have occasioned the former, in the earlier periods of English history, to become a scene of action in almost every civil war that has agitated the nation; and the latter, where the royal court was often held, to be frequently chosen as a military rallying-point, or for holding important national councils. Any details of these transactions, anterior to the reign of Charles I., belong more properly to the histories of particular places within the county, and some mention of the most important of them will be found in the preceding article on the town of Northampton. In February 1642, a petition of the knights, gentlemen, and freeholders of the county was presented to the parliament, commending its exertions, and entreating a continuance of them. On the commencement of hostilities, several skirmishes took place in Northamptonshire, and on the 6th of May, 1643, the parliamentarians were defeated by the Earl of Northampton, at Middleton-Cheney. In this county also, on the 14th of June, 1645, was fought the memorable battle of Naseby, between Sir Thomas Fairfax and the king in person, which gave the final blow to the power of the latter. When the king had been placed in the hands of the parliamentary commissioners, he was brought to Holdenby, or Holmby House, on the 16th of February, 1647, and remained there until the 4th of June, when he was seized by Cornet Joyce. General Monk, in his march to the south, reached Northampton about the 24th of January, 1660, on which day an address was presented to him by the gentlemen, ministers, and freeholders of this county, requesting him to use his power to restore the freedom of parliament, and procure the adoption of other salutary measures; and on the 15th of March following, a letter, subscribed by above fifty of the most considerable Northamptonshire gentlemen, was presented to the same general at Whitehall, thanking him for having procured the restoration of the excluded members to their seats in the house.

Northamptonshire is contained in the diocese of Peterborough, and province of Canterbury, excepting the parishes of Grettton and Nassington, which are in the diocese of Lincoln, and that of King's Sutton, which is a peculiar belonging to the Dean and Chapter of Lincoln, in the diocese of Peterborough. It forms an archdeaconry, comprising the ten deaneries of Brackley, Daventry, Haddon, Higham-Ferrers, Northampton Oundle, Peterborough, Preston, Rothwell, and Weldon, containing two hundred and ninety-three parishes, of which one hundred and seventy-two are rectories, ninety-three vicarages, and twenty-nine perpetual curacies. For purposes of civil government it is divided into the nineteen hundreds of Chipping-Warden, Cleley, Corby, Fawsley, Greens-Norton, Guilsborough, Hamfordshoe, Higham-Ferrers, Huxloe, Navisford, Nobottle-Grove, Orlingbury, Polebrooke, Rothwell, Spelhoe, King's Sutton, Towcester, Willybrook, and Wymersley, and the liberty of Nassaburgh, or Peterborough. Of these, the hundreds of Corby, Hamfordshoe, Higham-Ferrers, Huxloe, Navisford, Orlingbury, Polebrooke, Rothwell, and Willybrooke, and the liberty of Nassaburgh, or Peterborough, are in the eastern division of the county, and the rest in the western. It contains the city of Peterborough, the borough of Higham-Ferrers, the borough and market towns of Brackley and Northampton, and the market towns of Daventry, Kettering, Oundle, Thrapston, Towcester, and Wellingborough. Two knights are returned to parliament for the shire; two representatives for the city of Peterborough; two for each of the boroughs of Brackley and Northampton; and one for that of Higham-Ferrers. Northamptonshire is included in the Midland circuit: the assizes are held at Northampton, where is the county gaol: the quarter sessions are held at Northampton on January 14th, April 22d, July 15th, and October 21st; and at Peterborough on January 13th, April 21st, July 14th, and October 20th. There are seventy-nine acting magistrates. The rates raised in the county for the year ending March 25th, 1827, amounted to £168,068. 1., the expenditure to £167,352, of which, £148,175. 13. was applied to the relief of the poor.

The general aspect of the county exhibits great beauty and variety; extensive flats being of rare occurrence. The greater part of it is agreeably diversified by gentle undulations, the valleys being watered by numerous rivulets, and the whole forming an interesting scene of vale and upland. The entire surface is available for agricultural purposes; the trees and hedge-rows flourish luxuriantly, and the county is in numerous places adorned with woods and ornamented grounds. The higher and middle parts are more particularly ornamented with extensive woods, which are intersected by numerous vistas and beautiful lawns. The summits of the hills around Daventry, which are supposed to be the highest land in the county, are only about eight hundred feet above the level of the tide in the Thames, at the mouth of the Grand Junction canal at Brentford. The county contains no land that can properly be called bog: the lowest is Peterborough fen. The climate is favourable both to health and vegetation; the county being seldom visited by deep falls of snow, or long-continued rains. These advantages it derives from its inland situation and moderate degree of elevation; the aqueous vapours from the distant ocean being in some measure exhausted before their arrival here, and even when they reach the county, overcharged with snow, there are no mountains to precipitate an immediate and heavy fall.

The fertility of the soil renders it equally well adapted either for corn or pasturage; and although numerous instances of light soils occur, yet by much the greater portion is of a strong heavy staple, which is applied to the culture of beans and wheat, while in a state of open common; but when enclosed is generally laid down to permanent grass: the lighter enclosed lands are kept more in tillage. The land varies considerably in nature and quality, but seldom changes abruptly: the general excellency of the Northamptonshire soils seems owing partly to their sufficient depth, and partly to the looseness and porous nature of the stony substratum. They may be classed as follows: first, the black, or dark-coloured soils, being generally a deep strong loam, on a strong gravelly or clay-loam substratum: of these the county has a greater proportion than of any other; as they extend over the whole of the western part of it, from Market-Harborough, on the Leicestershire border, to its most southern extremity, and include the whole of its rich upland feeding-pastures, and a part of its cultivated common fields and enclosures. Daventry field and its neighbourhood consist, however, generally of brownish or greyish loam, on a rubble stone bottom: a considerable tract north and east of this has also a similar soil, resting on a clay, marl, or sandy bottom, but sometimes on a stony substratum. Second, the red land, as it is called, which includes the brown and snuff-coloured loams, is tolerably extensive, comprising a portion of the common fields, as well as enclosures, and extends over a large tract of country, to the north-west of Northampton, and through various other parts of the county, in divers shades of colour and consistence. Third, the white or grey loams, which are inferior in fertility to the above; they are found to the south of the Nen, from which river, in an extensive district lying south of Northampton, they extend to the borders of Buckinghamshire. Fourth, the miscellaneous upland district, including the light thin soils near Stamford, and those dispersed in other parts of the county, not classing with the above descriptions, such as the sands of Harlestone, &c.: this, with some exceptions, includes the whole north-eastern portion of the county, beyond Rothwell, Kettering, and Wellingborough. Fifth, the soil of the natural meadows and pasture-lands of the vales, and of the fen land north of Peterborough, consisting of the decomposed matter of decayed grasses and aquatic vegetables, combined with the sediment of the streams, which, being drained and consolidated, forms the basis of meadow soil. The red soils are of the lightest quality, the grey or black soils more tenacious; the latter having less of sand, and more of calcareous earth in their composition, with a loose substratum of a kind of stone, generally either half or wholly calcareous.

Of the superficies of the county about one hundred and fifty thousand acres are in common fields, by much the greater part being under tillage; and there are one hundred and fifty thousand acres of modern enclosures, in alternate grass and tillage, besides occasional, though rare, instances of tillage in the ancient enclosures. On the arable land of the open fields the following course of crops is practised: first year, fallow or turnips; second, wheat and some barley; and third, beans, with a few acres of oats, and occasionally a few peas, vetches, or a little barley. The newly-enclosed lands are cropped thus: first year, fallow or turnips; second, wheat, or barley after the turnips; third, beans or peas; fourth, barley, with red clover; fifth and sixth, clover; seventh, part beans, and part oats. Wheat is cultivated in large quantities in both the open fields and the enclosures, on the red friable soils, and is supposed annually to occupy sixty thousand acres, the general average produce being estimated at twenty-five and one-third bushels per acre. About thirty-three thousand acres are annually sown with barley, the average produce being thirty-one bushels per acre: this is the favourite crop on the red and light sand soils. Oats are grown on twenty-four thousand acres annually, the average produce per acre being forty-two bushels, and the quantity thus raised is not only sufficient to supply the consumption of this county, but also contributes to meet the demands of the neighbouring counties of Leicester, Warwick, Buckingham, Hertford, and Bedford. Rye is cultivated to a considerable extent, particularly in the vicinity of Northampton, and upon the light lands in other quarters: it occupies about three thousand acres, which produce, on an average, thirty-two bushels each: this grain is also frequently sown immediately after harvest, to form spring food for sheep. The quantity of beans cultivated is very considerable, as they annually occupy an extent of thirty thousand acres: the average is twenty-one and two-thirds bushels per acre, and notwithstanding the great consumption within the county, by horses employed on the thoroughfares to London, a considerable surplus remains to be exported to other districts. Peas are grown in a much less quantity than beans: vetches are extensively cultivated in most parts of the county, and considerable quantities are kept for seed: these two crops annually occupy about fifteen thousand acres, and green crops thirty thousand acres, while thirty thousand more remain in fallow. Turnips are cultivated, in considerable quantities, upon all the red light soils; the Swedish turnip is grown in most parts of the county. Rape or cole-seed is cultivated, but not generally: cabbages are grown in the field in several parts of the county; clover is not only sown for hay and pasture, but much is also kept for seed. Sainfoin is cultivated on the soils that have a stony substratum. Hemp is grown to a considerable extent in the fenny district on the borders of Lincolnshire and Cambridge-shire; of flax there is but very little. Lentils are produced on the poor common fields of Easton and Colly-weston, near Stamford. Woad is cultivated and prepared for the dyers by persons whose sole occupation it is; the crop is gathered three times during each season. Onions are grown about Northampton, to a great extent and in high perfection: the same neighbourhood is also famous for carrots.

The grass land, including not only all pleasure grounds, but also clover and other artificial and temporary grasses, is computed to amount to three hundred and seventy-five thousand acres. The extent of meadow land is not less than forty thousand acres; the most considerable tract being that on both sides of the river Nen, which, commencing in different branches many miles above Northampton, extends down to Peterborough, and, in consequence of its sinuousness, is upwards of sixty miles in length. The meadow land is generally rich, owing to the frequent inundations; but it frequently sustains great damage from floods, particularly upon mowing-grass. The upland pasture occupies a much greater extent, the strong deep loams having been found naturally disposed to turf, and affording herbage on which cattle and sheep fatten with great rapidity. About one-half of the enclosed land has long been laid down, and principally occupied as grazing or dairy farms. From Northampton, westward, a great quantity of cheese is made, and in that part of the county south of the Coventry and London road are numerous dairies, the produce of which is chiefly butter: some of the fresh butter from this county is sold in London as "Epping butter." In the parishes of Grafton-Regis, Yardley-Gobion, Potters-Pury, and a large district in that neighbourhood, there are considerable dairies, the chief produce of which is butter for the London market, as also about Charwelton and between Daventry and Banbury, from which much butter and pork is sent to London: dairies are also kept in several other districts. As manure, lime is extensively used; marl, but little; woollen rags are employed to a considerable extent; and, besides what are procured in the county, considerable quantities are purchased in Leicestershire and other neighbouring counties.

Numerous sheep and cattle are fattened on the pastures: of the sheep many are bred within the county, and the rest brought from other districts. Most of the cattle are brought from other parts of the island: those bred in the county are almost wholly an improved variety of the long-horned breed: of the sorts brought in from distant places, the short-horned Holderness cows, which are supplied from Yorkshire, are generally preferred for the dairy, particularly in the south-western part of the county, in consequence of the greater quantity of milk which they afford: there are, however, numerous dairies of the long-horned breed. The calves are seldom reared, being sold when a few days old to dealers, who carry them to the markets of Buckinghamshire and other counties, where they are purchased by dairy-farmers from Essex, to be fattened for the London market. The oxen fattened, by far the greater part of which are brought from distant parts of the kingdom, include almost all sorts; they are principally fattened at grass, and great numbers are sold from the pastures, but some are kept through the winter: those chiefly in the graziers' hands are of the long-horned Hereford, and of the Devon, Scotch, and Welch breeds, with a few of a mixed kind bred in the county, and others of a particularly small kind from Monmouthshire, called Pontypools, from the fair at which they are generally purchased: cattle from Staffordshire, Shropshire, and Ireland are also introduced: a great many half-fed cattle are brought from Staffordshire and other counties, early in the spring, to be fattened in the early feeding-pastures of this county. A few black cattle are grazed in the open field lordships: very few oxen are worked. It is computed that, besides what are consumed in the county, or sold in the neighbouring districts, fifteen thousand head of fat cattle are annually sent to London from Northamptonshire. The sheep of the common fields are considered the original breed of the county, but are much inferior to those of the ancient pastures, having longer legs, smaller and less compact bodies, and sometimes horns, and well adapted for folding, which is constantly practised with them: their wool is of a combing quality. A great portion of the county, particularly the middle and northern tracts, has an improved breed, which is a cross between the old stock and the new Leicester sheep, being extremely handsome, well-made, and much disposed to fatten; they will also thrive on comparatively bare pastures: the wool is less in quantity, but of better quality than that of the old breed; their pelts are lighter; and they are considered altogether much more profitable, and are ready for the butcher at an earlier age: the weight of the full-grown wether varies from twenty-five to forty pounds per quarter. London is annually supplied with about one hundred thousand sheep and lambs from this county. The beef and mutton produced annually are supposed to be nearly equal in weight, amounting each to about twenty-seven millions of pounds: the number of sheep is estimated at two hundred and fifty thousand, that of cattle at about thirty-three thousand seven hundred and fifty. The most approved hogs are a cross between the Berkshire and Tonquin breeds; they have fine bones, thin hides, thick bodies, short legs, and a disposition to fatten rapidly. The horses bred in the county are chiefly for draught or other purposes of husbandry; they are mostly of the strong black breed; but the number being insufficient for its supply, many are brought from the counties of Derby, Lincoln, and York, generally when about two or three years old: the number kept is estimated at twenty thousand.

Northamptonshire does not abound in fruit trees, though there are a few productive orchards in different parts of it. There is much excellent garden-ground around Northampton, besides some very good orchards of different kinds of fruit for domestic use. A considerable portion of the county, supposed to be about one-fourth, remains unenclosed; yet the waste lands are of comparatively trifling extent. Some of the hilly land near Daventry is confined to sheep-walks, and of the same description are, the common of Stoke-Bruerne, and a few others; the whole amount of unproductive land, with the exception of Peterborough fen, being less than one thousand acres. The great Peterborough fen is a perfectly level tract, originally formed, like the adjoining fen-lands of the counties of Cambridge and Lincoln, by the deposits of the neighbouring rivers Ouse, Nen, and Welland, containing between six and seven thousand acres, and having a fine soil susceptible of the highest cultivation. It is situated between Peterborough and Crowland, forming the north-eastern extremity of the county, and is subject to the depasturing of the cattle, horses, and sheep of the thirty-two parishes and townships which are comprised in the soke of Peterborough: the right of common, however, is considered by its possessors to be of very little value, the drainage of this extensive tract being in a very imperfect state. The woodlands are very extensive; so much so, when the excellence of their soil is considered, as to form objects of considerable national importance: they may be arranged into the four distinct classes of forests, chases, purlieu woods, and woods and plantations on freehold property. The forests are held by the same tenure as the other crown lands: the most considerable is that of Rockingham, situated towards the north-west side of the county. This was anciently one of the largest forests in the kingdom, extending for about thirty miles in length, from Northampton to Stamford, and about eight in breadth, from the river Nen to the Welland and the Maidwell: it now reaches from the vicinity of Wansford, on the great north road, towards Weldon and Rockingham, and still further to the south-west, forming an almost continued chain of woodland for a distance of nearly twenty miles: its boundaries are not very exactly defined, but it is supposed to contain from eight to ten thousand acres. It consists of three divisions, called the bailiwicks of Rockingham, Brigstock, and Clive or Cliffe, each of which is divided into several walks: the three bailiwicks were formerly under the superintendence of one warden, or master-forester; but that office was abolished by Charles I., who appointed a master-forester to each, since which period the bailiwicks have been wholly distinct, with respect to their government and management. The election of verderers is still continued, although, since the abolition of the office of warden, and the discontinuance of the forest courts, their office has been little more than nominal. The next in extent is Whittlebury, or Whittlewood Forest, which reaches along the southern border of the county to the south of Towcester, for a distance of upwards of eleven miles, and contains about seven thousand acres. This forest, which is part of the honour of Grafton, is under the superintendence of a lord-warden, a lieutenant or deputy warden, two verderers, a woodward, a purlieu-ranger, five keepers, and six page-keepers: the Duke of Grafton is hereditary lord-warden: the number of deer kept in the forest is about eighteen hundred, of all sorts. If to these two be added the remaining one, Salcey Forest, between Northampton and Newport-Pagnell, to the south of the road, the whole will amount to about twenty thousand acres. The forest of Salcey was likewise made part of the honour of Grafton, by act of parliament, in the 33d of Henry VIII., and, by a grant in reversion made in the 25th of Charles II., the Duke of Grafton has now the property of the underwood in the several coppices. This forest is under the government of a warden, a lieutenant, or deputy-warden, two verderers, a woodward, three yeomen-keepers of the three walks into which it is divided, and one page-keeper: no courts are now held for the forest. The chases of Geddington and Yardley are of considerable extent; the former having been anciently a part of the forest of Rockingham, and the latter of that of Salcey: the purlieu woods are numerous, and cover large breadths of land; and these, together with the extensive woods and plantations that abound on freehold property, amount to twenty thousand acres more.

The whole of what are now considered forest woods are subject to the depasturing of deer, and, at a stated time of the year, to that also of the cattle belonging to the inhabitants of the neighbouring townships, who claim commonage. The underwood in the forests and chases chiefly consists of black and white thorn, ash, willow, maple, and a small proportion of hazel: it is generally cut at from twelve to eighteen years' growth; and the different woods are divided into as many parts, or sales, as the number of years' growth of the underwood may amount to, so that a regular rotation in cutting takes place every year: those parts which had been last cut, the proprietors of the underwood are empowered, by the ancient laws and customs of the forests, to fence in for four years against the deer, and for seven years against the cattle. A considerable portion is made into hurdles for folding sheep; the remainder is chiefly used as fuel. The principal trees are oak, ash, elm, and poplar: besides which are considerable quantities of other white wood, as beech, chesnut, lime, &c. A fall of oak timber is generally made in that part, or sale, in which the underwood has been last cut. In some parts of Whittlebury Forest the timber is not very thick upon the ground, but in most parts the spaces which are thus left are occupied by thick masses of underwood: this part of the produce belongs, by a grant of the crown in the time of Charles II., to the Duke of Grafton and his heirs male for ever, with the right of fencing out the deer and all commonable cattle during nine years after cutting: the timber is reserved for the crown: the number of parishes having right of common for such cattle and horses as they can support through the winter is fourteen. Salcey Forest contains some large oaks, but they are thin upon the ground. Geddington Chase is supposed to contain about fourteen thousand acres, of which about twelve thousand are woodland, the remainder consisting of lawns, ridings, and vistas: it once formed part of Rockingham Forest, but permission was given by the crown to the ancestors of the Montagu family to disafforest it, and convert it to its present state: deer are kept in it, and it is subject to a commonage, from May-day to about Martinmas, for the adjoining townships: it is in every respect managed like the forest-woods in fencing out the deer and cattle from the recently felled portions: it also contains a valuable stock of large oak timber. Yardley Chase once formed part of Salcey Forest, but has likewise been disafforested. Purlien woods are those which are situated immediately in the vicinity of the forests, and which have at some time formed part of it: but the respective owners having obtained grants and permissions from the crown to disafforest them, and appropriate them to their own use, they are not now subject to any of the laws and regulations that regard the forest-woods. From the extensive woods above enumerated a considerable supply is procured for the navy. The common fuel is wood and coal: of the former the county itself produces abundance; and though of coal it used to have but a scanty supply, which was obtained at a very dear rate, yet great quantities are now brought into it from the Staffordshire collieries, by means of the Grand Junction canal: some are also brought up the river Nen from the north. Several societies have been formed for the promotion of improvements in agriculture, one of which holds its meetings at Wellingborough, another at Lamport, and a third at Peterborough.

The mineral productions include neither coal nor any of the metals; but limestone in great plenty is found in almost every part of the county, and is used in some instances to form enclosures, but is more extensively burned into lime, or used in the making and repairing of roads. Freestone for building is raised at Brackley, at Kingsthorpe, near Northampton, and at various other places: it is often of a calcareous nature. A whitish kind of slate, used for roofing, is dug in considerable quantities at Collyweston, near Stamford; the laminæ are generally of a good size, but rather thick and heavy; most of the buildings in that and the neighbouring townships are covered with it: it is customary to raise large blocks of it in the autumn, which being placed in a position different from what they had in the quarry, the rain insinuates itself between the layers, and, in frosty weather, the water expanding, splits the block into plates of a proper thickness. Good clay for making bricks and tiles is found in different parts of the county.

The principal articles of manufacture are shoes, bone-lace, and woollen stuffs, the latter confined chiefly to moreens, tammies, and calimancoes. In Northampton, Wellingborough, and some other towns, many persons are employed in making shoes for the supply of the army and navy, and the shops in London, and some for exportation to different foreign countries, about seven or eight thousand pair being manufactured weekly: the leather is purchased partly in this and the neighbouring counties, but is obtained chiefly from the London market. In Wellingborough and its neighbourhood, and towards the south-western corner of the county, lace-making affords employment to a great proportion of the population, chiefly young women and boys. The manufacture of silk stockings is carried on at Towcester and at Kettering, and at Towcester wool-stapling constitutes the principal branch of trade: the material is, in the first instance, purchased of the growers, or farmers, in the neighbourhood, and, after having undergone a very minute assortment, the finest is sent into Yorkshire, for the clothiers, or into Leicestershire for the hosiers, and the other qualities disposed of to other markets, while some of the longest staple only is reserved to be worked at home. At Daventry there is a considerable manufactory for whips. The produce of the soil exported from the county consists of wheat, wheat-flour, oats, beans, timber, oak-bark, fat cattle and sheep, wool, butter, and cheese: the manufactured exports are chiefly shoes, lace, and woollen stuffs, which are sent to London, and various other parts of Great Britain; also to Ireland, America, and the West Indies; the stuffs are sold to the London and Yorkshire markets, to persons who dress and dye them. The imports are chiefly lean cattle, store sheep, coal, iron, deals, and leather.

All the principal rivers of the county rise within its limits: they are the Nene, the Welland, the Ouse, the Charwell, the Avon, and the Leam. The Nene is the most considerable: it takes its rise near Catesby and Hellidon, in the hundred of Fawsley, near the borders of Warwickshire, and being quickly joined by a number of other small streams in the vicinity of Daventry, it runs directly eastward to Northampton, where it becomes navigable: from that town its course is for the most part in a north-easterly direction, which it pursues through the county for nearly the whole length of its south-eastern side, and at a short distance from its borders, passing the towns of Wellingborough, Thrapstone, Oundle, and Peterborough: at the distance of a few miles above Wansford bridge, however, it begins to form the southern boundary of the county, which it separates from Huntingdonshire, and so continues as far as the last-mentioned town, where it wholly quits it. The Welland rises near Hothorpe, in the hundred of Rothwell, and immediately becoming the northern boundary of the county, winds by Rockingham and Stamford, at which latter place it becomes navigable, and finally quits it at its north-eastern extremity. The Ouse has its rise in a spring, called Ousewell, near Brackley, in the hundred of King's Sutton, in the southernmost part of the county, which it soon quits; but, after taking a circuitous course through a part of Buckinghamshire, it touches upon it again at Stony-Stratford, soon however diverging from it towards Newport-Pagnell. The Charwell, rising near the source of the Nene, and running southwards through a small portion of Oxfordshire, afterwards forms the boundary between that county and Northamptonshire for a few miles, finally quitting it at its south-western extremity, in its course to the Thames. The Avon, rising on the borders of this county and Leicestershire, and taking a westerly course, forms the boundary line between them for the distance of a few miles, and then enters the county of Warwick. The Leam, rising near the sources of the Nene and the Charwell, almost immediately enters Warwickshire. The county abounds, almost in every part of it, with fine springs and numerous smaller streams; and derives considerable benefit from its canal navigation, more especially in the conveyance of coal. The Oxford canal runs for a considerable distance along its western confines, through a small projecting portion of which it passes, in the vicinity of Barby and Braunston, and through another at its south-western extremity, near the river Charwell. The Grand Junction canal commences at the Oxford canal, at Braunston, and is continued, after having passed through a tunnel about a mile in length, in a devious south-easterly course, to Weedon, where, having crossed the great London road, it is carried over a valley, by means of an embankment of earth nearly half a mile in length and about thirty feet high, under which pass one small river and two carriage roads: it soon after again crosses the London road, and is continued in a south-easterly direction by Lower Heyford, Bugbrooke, Gayton, Blisworth (where it passes under another tunnel), Stoke-Bruerne, Grafton-Regis, and Cosgrove, at which latter place it quits the county for Buckinghamshire: it is navigable for barges of sixty tons' burden. It was intended to make a collateral cut from this canal at Gayton to the river Nene, at Northampton; but this communication has been effected by means of a railway. The only other artificial navigation is that of the Union canal, so called because it was designed to unite the navigation of the Trent and Soar with that of the Grand Junction canal and the Nene: commencing from the navigable channel of the river Soar above Leicester, it was intended to enter this county near Market-Harborough, and be continued to Northampton, where it was to communicate with the Nene, and the Grand Junction canal.

The road from London to Holyhead, through Buckingham and Shrewsbury, or through Birmingham, enters this county from Mixbury in Oxfordshire, and passing through Barley-Mow, Croughton, and Aynho, re-enters the latter county. The road from London to Holyhead, through Chester, enters from Stony-Stratford in Buckinghamshire, passes through Towcester, Daventry, and Braunston, and quits for Willoughby in Warwickshire: this is also the road from London to Warrington, Lancaster, and Carlisle. The road from London to Manchester and Preston, through Derby, enters from Stoke-Goldington in Buckinghamshire, and passing through Horton, Northampton, Kingsthorpe, Brixworth, and Kelmarsh, quits the county for Market-Harborough in Leicestershire: this is also the road from London to Sheffield, Settle, Kirkby-Lonsdale, and Whitehaven, through Derby. The road from London to Halifax and Clitheroe, through Bedford, Nottingham, and Rotherham, enters the county from Bletsoe in Bedfordshire, and passing through Higham-Ferrers, Kettering, and Rockingham, quits it for Uppingham in Rutlandshire. The road from London to Manchester and Clitheroe, through Leek, branches from the former Manchester road at Northampton, and passing through Welford, quits the county for Kegworth in Leicestershire. The road from London to Scarborough, through Huntingdon and Lincoln, enters from Yaxley in Huntingdonshire, and passes through Peterborough and Glinton to Market-Deeping in Lincolnshire. The great mail-roads are for the most part level, wide, and good: some of the collateral turnpike-roads are likewise kept in good repair; but the cross roads are much neglected. Few counties, however, possess a greater number of handsome, well-built stone bridges; not only the larger streams, but every brook and rivulet being crossed by a stone arch.

Of the four consular or military ways made by the Romans in Britain, two are still visible in different parts of this county. The Watling-street, having crossed the Ouse, enters Northamptonshire at Old Stratford, and running towards its western border, passes the Lesser Avon at Dow bridge, and proceeds into Leicestershire: its course may very easily be traced. The Ermin-street enters the county from Cambridgeshire at Castor, on the eastern side, and subsequently divides into two branches, which direct their courses into Lincolnshire by two different points on the Welland. Most of the Roman fortresses and garrisons were erected either upon these ways or in their vicinity. Stations and forts are also thought to have been erected on the southern banks of the Nene, to guard the passages and fords, and prevent the inroads of the Britons inhabiting the woods on the other side, which extended from the Nene to the Welland. On the course of the Watling-street there are supposed to have been three principal stations within the limits of this county, viz. Lactodorum, which is placed at Towcester; Benaventa, or Bennavennum, which has been variously placed, at Weedon-Beck, at Castle-Dykes, and near Daventry; which latter supposition seems to be the most probable; and Tripontium, usually placed at Lilbourn, though Horsley supposes it to have been at Rugby in Warwickshire. Parts of the Ermin-street are still lofty and conspicuous between Castor and Upton, and again in the parish of Barnack: the only station in the county on this line was Durobrivæ, at or near Castor. Remains of tessellated pavements, coins, &c., have been found in various places, especially at Weldon, and at Cotterstock near Oundle. Besides the intrenchments already mentioned as either decidedly Roman, or supposed to be such, there are several other ancient encampments of considerable magnitude, such as Arbury Banks, Raynsbury Camp, and "the Boroughs," at Guilsborough.

Of ancient church architecture this county affords numerous interesting specimens. Peterborough cathedral and the contiguous buildings display some fine and varied examples, from the early Norman down to the latest English. St. Sepulchre's church, at Northampton, is one of the remaining few built by the Templars on the model of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem: St. Peter's, in the same town, and the churches of Castor, Barnack, Earls-Barton, Barnwell, Twywell, and Spratton, also furnish specimens of the Anglo-Saxon or the early Norman style. Among large churches displaying fine examples of enriched and florid architecture may be enumerated those of Fotheringhay, Oundle, Lowick, Kettering, Higham-Ferrers, Wellingborough, and Finedon. The elegant crosses at Geddington and near Northampton are two of the only three now remaining of the monuments erected by Edward I. to the memory of his queen, Eleanor. In sepulchral monuments of marble, brass, &c., Northamptonshire is considered to be richer than any part of the kingdom, of equal or smaller extent, Middlesex alone excepted; which circumstance seems to be in some degree accounted for by the number of noble families that have been settled here from an early period. The number of religious houses of all denominations, including colleges, hospitals, &c., was about fifty-five: the remains of monastic buildings are inconsiderable, excepting Peterborough cathedral, which was the conventual church of the ancient abbey of Medeshamsted, or Peterborough; to which may be added the anciently collegiate churches of Fotheringhay, Higham-Ferrers, and Irthlingborough. Of ancient mansion-houses the county affords a few interesting specimens, particularly in those of Burleigh, Kirby, Castle-Ashby, Fawsley, Rushton, and Drayton. Burleigh House, the seat of the Marquis of Exeter, is the finest among the great number of modern seats which adorn this highly ornamented county; amongst which Althorp, the property and residence of Earl Spencer, is also one of the most distinguished. There are mineral springs at Astrop, Northampton, and Wellingborough; and at Rothwell, a petrifying well and a bone well.

NORTHAW, a parish in the hundred of CASHIO, or liberty of ST. ALBAN'S, county of HERTFORD, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Chipping-Barnet, containing 566 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of St. Alban's, and diocese of London, and in the patronage of the Rev. A. Trenchard, D.D. The church, dedicated to St. Thomas à Becket, was rebuilt in 1810, at an expense of £1600, defrayed by W. Strode, Esq., the late patron. There is a free school for eight boys, endowed with £20 per annum. Within the parish is a fine saline spring, formerly much resorted to, but now almost neglected.

NORTHBOROUGH, a parish in the liberty of PETERBOROUGH, county of NORTHAMPTON, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (S. E. by S.) from Market-Deeping, containing 232 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £10. 19. 7., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Peterborough. The church, dedicated to St. Andrew, has a fine admixture of the Norman and the various later styles of English architecture, and contains a monument, with other memorials, to the family of Claypole, of whom John married Elizabeth, daughter of Oliver Cromwell, who created him a baronet in 1657, and made him Master of the Horse, and a Lord of the Bedchamber. Their ancient mansion, a beautiful specimen of the decorated style, has been converted into a farm-house.

NORTHBOURNE, a parish in the hundred of CORNILO, lathe of ST. AUGUSTINE, county of KENT, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W.) from Deal, containing 757 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Sholden, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £12. 11. 8., and in the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The church is dedicated to St. Augustine. Here are the remains of an ancient chapel.

NORTHBROOK, a tything in the parish and hundred of MITCHELDEVER, Basingstoke division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 5 miles (S. E.) from Whitchurch. The population is returned with the parish.

NORTHCHAPEL, a parish in the hundred of ROTHERBRIDGE, rape of ARUNDEL, county of SUSSEX, 5 miles (N. by W.) from Petworth, containing 749 inhabitants. The living is a rectory not in charge, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chichester, and in the patronage of the Earl of Egremont. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. This was formerly part of the parish of Petworth.

NORTHCHURCH, county of HERTFORD. — See BERKHAMSTEAD (ST. MARY).

NORTHCOTT, a hamlet in that part of the parish of BOYTON which is in the hundred of BLACK TORRINGTON, county of DEVON, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. by E.) from Launceston, containing 83 inhabitants.

NORTHEN, or NORTHENDEN, a parish in the hundred of MACCLESFIELD, county palatine of CHESHIRE, containing, with the township of Northen, and part of that of Etchells, 1406 inhabitants, of which number, 630 are in the township of Northen, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Stockport. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £10. 7. 6., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Chester. The church, dedicated to St. Wilfrid, is principally in the later style of English architecture, with an enriched wooden screen. A part of the hall, the seat of the Tattons, is very ancient; it was garrisoned by Charles I., and besieged and taken by the parliamentarians.

NORTHFIELD, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of HALFSHIRE, county of WORCESTER, 6 miles (S. W. by S.) from Birmingham, containing 1567 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with the curacy of Coston-Hacket, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, rated in the king's books at £14. 15. $2\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Rev. John Thomas Fenwick. The church, dedicated to St. Lawrence, is partly in the early English, and partly in the decorated, style, with a Norman door. The small river Rea, also the Birmingham and Worcester, and the Netherton canals, run through the parish, in which there are quarries of freestone. Here are some remains of Weoley castle, formerly belonging to the Jervoise family. A charity school is supported with the income arising from a bequest of £150 by William Worth, and another of £100, in 1779, by the Rev. Mr. Soley.

NORTHFLEET, a parish in the hundred of TOLTINGTROUGH, lathe of AYLESFORD, county of KENT, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (W.) from Gravesend, and 20 miles (E.) from London, containing 1964 inhabitants. This place is mentioned in Domesday-book, and is supposed to have been more anciently a Roman and a Danish station. The river Thames bounds the parish on the north. At a distance from the river the face of the country is diversified with gently rising hills and small vallies; but to the north-west the land lies so low as to be overflowed at high tides, and the flood would extend even beyond the London road, if not prevented by a raised causeway and bridge, to which flood-gates are affixed as a barrier against the tides, and an outlet for the fresh water. The bridge was erected at an early period, and rebuilt of brick in 1634, which being found inconvenient, another has been constructed in a line with the direction of the road. Large chalk and lime works extend from the north side of the village to the Thames. Lime is sent in very considerable quantities for the use of the builders in London, and is also exported to Holland and Flanders, the refuse being used for manuring the land in Essex, Suffolk, and Norfolk. The chalk pits are very extensive, and strata of flint stones abound, which are frequently wrought into flints for guns. Embedded in the chalk are found many curious fossils, chiefly echinites and glossopetræ (or sharks' teeth); and some of the flints enclose cockle-shells filled with chalk, forming singular natural curiosities. Here is a large yard for ship-building, near which is a spacious dock excavated in the solid chalk, and capable of containing six or seven large ships: the first vessel built here was the Royal Charlotte, East Indiaman, in 1789. At this place is an establishment for the manufacture of Parker's Roman cement. Fairs are held on Easter and Whit Tuesdays, and on the 24th of March. The living is a vicarage, within the exempt deanery of Shoreham, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £21, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, which is dedicated to St. Botolph, is one of the largest in the diocese: it displays various styles of English architecture, with some good decorated windows: in the chancel are the remains of some ancient oak stalls; in the south wall are three stone seats, and on a slab in the pavement a full-length brass figure of a priest standing beneath a richly-ornamented canopy, with an imperfect Latin inscription around the verge of the slab; the grave beneath being opened about forty years ago, the body of Peter de Lucy was found enveloped in leather. Among the monuments of more modern date is a fine alabaster tomb to the memory of Dr. Edward Browne, physician to Charles II., and author of Travels in Hungary. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

NORTH-FORTY-FOOT-BANK, or FEN-CORNER, an extra-parochial liberty, in the wapentake of KIRTON, parts of HOLLAND, county of LINCOLN, 9 miles (N.W. by W.) from Boston, containing 136 inhabitants.

NORTH-FORTY-FOOT-BANK near FOSDYKE, an extra-parochial liberty, in the wapentake of KIRTON, parts of HOLLAND, county of LINCOLN, containing 179 inhabitants.

NORTH-FORTY-FOOT-BANK near PELHAM'S LANDS, an extra-parochial liberty, in the wapentake of KIRTON, parts of HOLLAND, county of LINCOLN, containing 27 inhabitants.

NORTH-HALES, otherwise COVEHITHE, a parish in the hundred of BLYTHING, county of SUFFOLK, 4¼ miles (N. by E.) from Southwold, containing 169 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the rectory of Binacre, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £5. 6. 8., and endowed with £200 royal bounty. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew.

NORTH-HILL, a parish in the northern division of EAST hundred, county of CORNWALL, 6¾ miles (S.W. by S.) from Launceston, containing 1089 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £36. 6. 8., and in the patronage of Mrs. Darley. The church is dedicated to St. Torney. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

NORTH-HOLME, a parish in the Marsh division of the wapentake of CANDLESHOE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 8 miles (S. E. by E.) from Spilsby, containing 155 inhabitants. The living is a rectory with Wainfleet, not rated in the king's books, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln. The church has long since been destroyed: the cemetery is also used by the inhabitants of Wainfleet.

NORTHIAM, a parish in the hundred of STAPLE, rape of HASTINGS, county of SUSSEX, 7¾ miles (N. W. by W.) from Rye, containing 1358 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Lewes, and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £15. 10. 2½., and in the patronage of Miss Lord. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is partly in the early English and partly in the decorated style. The river Rother bounds the parish on the north, and separates it from the county of Kent. Robert Iden, in 1614, conveyed a house and certain land upon which a school-house was subsequently erected, at an expense of £700, defrayed by Frewin Turner: the annual income, including the proceeds of £500 left, in 1723, by George Bainsley, is applied to the education of poor children.

NORTHILL, a parish in the hundred of WIXAM-TREE, county of BEDFORD, 3 miles (W. N. W.) from Biggleswade, containing, with the hamlets of Brookend, Budnor, Upper and Lower Caldicotts, Hatch, Ickwell, Thorcote, and part of Beeston, 1001 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Bedford, and diocese of Lincoln, and in the patronage of the Master and Wardens of the Grocers' Company, London. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a handsome structure, in the ancient English style, the east window exhibiting beautiful specimens of stained glass, by Oliver: it was endowed by Sir John Traylly, Knt., and made collegiate in the reign of Henry IV., for a master, warden, and fellows, whose revenue at the dissolution was estimated at £61. 5. 5. Elizabeth Hutchinson, in 1728, gave £200 for the education of poor fatherless girls; the annual income is now about £16, for which four are taught. The navigable river Ivel bounds the parish on the east.

NORTHINGTON, a parish in the hundred of MITCHELDEVER, Basingstoke division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 3¾ miles (N. N. W.) from New Alresford, containing 277 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Mitcheldever, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester. The church is dedicated to St. John. Northington is within the jurisdiction of the Cheyney Court held at Winchester every Thursday, for the recovery of debts to any amount.

NORTHLEACH, a market town and parish, in the hundred of BRADLEY, county of GLOUCESTER, 20 miles (E. by S.) from Gloucester, and 82 (W. N. W.) from London, containing 773 inhabitants. This is a small town, consisting principally of a long irregular street, situated in a vale at the base of the Cotswold hills, near the source of the little river Leche, from which it derives its name, and on the road from Cheltenham to Oxford. The ancient British road, called the Lower Salt-way, leading from Droitwich to the eastern parts of the island, is here crossed by the Roman Fosse-way, which forms the north-western boundary of the parish. About the beginning of the sixteenth century it was one of the most considerable clothing towns in the county, and a principal mart for the sale of wool; but the deficiency of water occasioned a gradual decay of the manufacture, and the trade is no longer carried on. The market is held on Wednesday; and there are fairs on the Wednesdays before May 4th and June 1st, August 3rd, the first Wednesday in September, and the Wednesdays before and after October 10th. A bailiff and two constables are chosen annually at the manorial court leet; and petty sessions for the district are held here. Near the town is a house of correction for the county, capable of containing thirty-eight prisoners. The living is a vicarage, with Eastington, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £11, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Gloucester. The church, dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul, is a handsome and extensive edifice, in the decorated style of English architecture, with a lofty tower at the west end: the south porch is ornamented with elegant tracery; the lateral buttresses have sculptured niches; and two niches with statues are placed over the arch, the cornice bordering which is decorated with various figures, in oval compartments: the tower has open-worked battlements; and the whole building is adorned with an embattled parapet and pinnacles: there are several sepulchral brasses, one of which is to the memory of John Fortey, a rich clothier of the town, who rebuilt the nave, in 1458. Hugh Westwood, Esq. founded a free grammar school, in the first year of the reign of Elizabeth, and endowed it with the impropriate tithes of Chedworth, and a messuage and tenement, now producing about £600 per annum, vested, by an act of incorporation passed in the fourth of James I., in the patronage of the Provost and Scholars of Queen's College, Oxford, who appoint a master, and pay him two-thirds of the annual income, and an usher the remainder. The scholars on the foundation are usually very few; but they are entitled to share with the schools of Gloucester, Cheltenham, and Chipping-Campden, in the exhibitions at Pembroke College, Oxford, instituted by George Townsend, Esq., who also gave property producing £10 per annum, for the instruction of twelve poor boys, a similar sum for poor girls, and an annual sum for apprenticing a poor boy. An hospital, or almshouse, for six poor women was founded by Thomas Dutton, Esq., in 1615, and endowed with about £30 per annum. In 1816, Mrs. Mary Harritts Allen bequeathed £2649. 17. 6. for charitable purposes, including £93. 12. per annum, for the endowment of an almshouse for six poor men; and a small sum in augmentation of the stipends of the women in Mr. Dutton's almshouse. Adjoining the Fosse-way is an intrenched camp, with a double vallum, called Norbury, and supposed to be of Roman origin.

NORTHMOOR, a parish in the hundred of CHADLINGTON, county of OXFORD, $6\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Oxford, containing 366 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Oxford, endowed with £1100 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £900 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the President and Fellows of St. John's College, Oxford. The church is dedicated to St. Denis.

NORTHOLT, a parish in the hundred of ELTHORNE, county of MIDDLESEX, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Harrow on the Hill, containing 455 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Middlesex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £15, and in the patronage of the Bishop of London. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

NORTHORPE, a hamlet in the parish of THURLBY, wapentake of NESS, parts of KESTIVEN, county of LINCOLN, containing 136 inhabitants.

NORTHORPE, a parish in the wapentake of CORRINGHAM, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 8 miles (N. E.) from Gainsborough, containing 127 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Stow, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £4, endowed with £400 Bank annuities and £119 private benefaction, and £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Lincoln. The church is dedicated to St. John the Baptist. The river Eau runs through the parish and falls into the Trent.

NORTHOVER, a parish in the hundred of TINTINHULL, county of SOMERSET, $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile (N.) from Ilchester, containing 121 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £6. 12. 11., and in the patronage of J. H. Chichester, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew. The navigable river Yeo, and the old Fosse-way, pass through the parish.

NORTHSCEUGH, a joint township with Moor-thwaite, in the parish of CUMWHITTON, ESKDALE ward, county of CUMBERLAND, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Kirk-Oswald. The population is returned with Moor-thwaite.

NORTHUMBERLAND, a maritime county, and, excepting a detached part of the county of Durham, the most northern of England; bounded on the east by the North sea, or German Ocean, and by a small detached portion of the county of Durham, called Bedlingtonshire, which is situated on the coast, between the mouths of the rivers Blyth and Wansbeck; on the south, by the county of Durham; on the west, by Cumberland, and by Roxburghshire in Scotland; and on the north, by the Scottish county of Berwick, from which it is separated by the Tweed; and by the larger detached part of Durham (divided into Norhamshire and Islandshire), which includes Holy Island, and a large triangular space, the two other sides of which are bounded by the river Tweed and the North sea. It extends from $54^{\circ} 51'$ to $55^{\circ} 41'$ (N. Lat.), and from $1^{\circ} 9'$ to $2^{\circ} 28'$ (W. Lon.), and includes an area of one thousand eight hundred and seventy-one square miles, or one million one hundred and ninety-seven thousand four hundred and forty statute acres. The population, in 1821, was 198,965. The historical notices respecting the aboriginal inhabitants of Northumberland are extremely scanty. According to Ptolemy, the people inhabiting the tract of sea-coast which extends from the river Tyne to the Frith of Forth, were called the Otodini; to the west of whom, in the mountainous districts, and in Tiviotdale, were seated the Gadani; both which tribes appear to have been either dependent on, or confederated with, the Brigantes, whose extensive territory lying southward, included some portion of the south-western part of this county. The Romans did not penetrate into this part of Britain until the year 79, when Agricola led his legions into the north, and partly by the terror of his arms, and partly by the fame of his clemency, subjugated the country; to secure which he erected a chain of forts extending from the Solway Frith to Tyne-mouth. This barrier, however, being soon broken through by the British refugees, in conjunction with the Britons of Caledonia, the Emperor Adrian constructed a rampart of earth, which, connecting the forts of Agricola, likewise extended across the county from sea to sea. The Brigantes who settled north of this wall appear to have assumed the name of Meatæ, supposed to be derived from the British word meath, a plain. In the reign of Antoninus Pius, about the year 140, the Meatæ fought several severe battles with the Romans under Lollius Urbicus, who at length re-conquered the whole country as far as the isthmus, between the Friths of Forth and Clyde, where the Roman commander, by the emperor's order, constructed a second rampart, after the manner of Adrian's, and upon the same line along which Agricola had also previously built a second chain of forts. The country between the two ramparts being, however, again devastated by the barbarians, the Emperor Severus, about the year 207, took the field against them in person; and entering Caledonia at the head of a large army, compelled the inhabitants to purchase peace by the surrender of a large portion of territory: on his return he repaired and strengthened Adrian's rampart. During his subsequent indisposition at York, the Meatæ and Caledonians recommenced hostilities, which so much exasperated him, that he resolved upon their utter extermination: his son Caracalla led the army to the north; but, on the death of his father, which soon afterwards ensued, he hastily concluded a dishonourable peace, and returned to the southern provinces of Britain, the more effectually to prosecute his claims to the empire. A chasm of more than seventy years now occurs in the Roman history of Britain; and we find nothing on record regarding this particular district, until the year 306, about which time Constantine the Great, having allayed the disturbances on the northern frontiers, entrusted their defence to an officer, styled Duke of Britain, who had under him fourteen thousand foot, and nine hundred horse, being more than two-thirds of the whole Roman force in the island. In the reigns of the succeeding emperors, the rampart was frequently broken through by the northern tribes, denominated Scots, Picts, and Attacotes, and the contiguous districts on the south depopulated in the most savage and unrelenting manner. At length the Emperor Valentinian having sent over Theodosius with a formidable body of troops, that commander repelled the barbarians, and recovered all the country between the wall of Severus and the rampart of Antoninus, which tract now received the name of Valentia, and was added, as a fifth province, to the four into which the more southern parts of the island were divided. About the year 380, Maximus having withdrawn the Roman forces from Britain, to support him in aspiring to the government of the eastern provinces of the empire, the Scots and Picts renewed their incursions with dreadful success, until the arrival of the legion under the command of Stilicho, which was sent over to expel the northern invaders and to guard the rampart, but which, on the death of Theodosius in 402, was recalled to Italy to repel the Gothic invaders under Alaric. It is believed to have been during the stay of this legion in Britain that the wall was added to the former line of defensive works across this part of the country: this was a massive bulwark of stone, defended by an outer ditch, and guarded by an interior chain of forts and military stations, many vestiges of it still being visible: it extended in a line nearly parallel with Adrian's barrier, and at a very short distance from it. The Britons being left without the safeguard of a Roman force, and the extinction of the Roman authority in the island speedily following, a number of petty states sprang up, which were continually involved in sanguinary dissensions, whereby the barbarians of the north were more easily able to carry their devastations into the very heart of South Britain. The district north of the Tyne, under the name of Bernicia, formed at this period one of the numerous independent sovereignties.

The establishment of the Saxon dominion in this part of the country took place about the year 547, when the Saxon chief, Ida, landed at Flamborough, and after many obstinate conflicts, drove the Northumbrian Britons from the vicinity of the coast, and subsequently obtained sole dominion in the province of Bernicia, which appears to have comprised all the country between the Tyne and the Frith of Forth. Having assumed the title of King of Bernicia, he erected the strong fortress of Bambrough, on the coast opposite the Farn isles, in a remarkably eligible situation, and made it his principal residence: his reign was one of almost incessant warfare with the Scots and the fugitive Britons, and he was at length slain in battle by Owen, in 560, being succeeded by his son Adda. At the same period, Ælla, one of the chieftains who had come over with Ida, made himself master of the province or kingdom of Deira, being the whole of the country between the Tyne and the Humber. The two sovereignties were united by Ethelfrith, grandson of Ida, who having ascended the Bernician throne in 593, invaded Deira, then under the government of Edwin, son of Ælla, who had succeeded at the age of three years, and by expelling this infant monarch and espousing his sister Ethelfrith, became the first king of Northan-hymbra-land, as it is called in the ancient Saxon, signifying the land, or country, north of the Humber; which name was contracted by the Anglo-Saxons into Northymbreland, and has since been slightly corrupted into Northumberland, being in modern times confined to that portion of country only which lies on the eastern side of the island, between the rivers Tyne and Tweed, which was but a small part of the ancient Northumberland, or Northumbria, as it is called according to the Latin orthography. The young Edwin having found a protector in Redwald, King of East-Anglia, Ethelfrith waged war against the latter, and was slain in a battle fought on the banks of the Idle, in Nottinghamshire; upon which event Edwin, supported by the arms of Redwald, entered the capital of Northumbria, and in 617 was restored to the throne. Cwichelm, King of Wessex, having employed an assassin to murder Edwin in his palace, and the attempt failing, Edwin marched a powerful army against Cwichelm, and after devastating the kingdom of Wessex, returned to Northumberland in triumph. The reign of this prince was distinguished by the introduction of Christianity into the North of England, at the instance of his queen, a daughter of the Christian king of Kent, under whose influence the Roman missionary Paulinus succeeded in converting the Northumbrian sovereign and his people. Edwin was now the greatest prince of the Heptarchy, distinguished both by his influence over the other kingdoms, and by his strict and impartial administration of justice in his own dominions. He subdued a considerable part of Wales, including the isle of Anglesey, and for some time all the British princes paid him tribute; but the latter forming an alliance with Penda, King of Mercia, their united forces defeated those of Edwin on Hatfield Chase, in Yorkshire, who, with his son Osfrid, perished in the battle: Edwin's widow and his other children, together with the Archbishop Paulinus, were now compelled to take refuge in Kent, and Northumbria was again divided into two kingdoms, and reverted to paganism; Bernicia being taken possession of by Eanfrid, the son of Ethelfrid, who now returned from his exile in Scotland; and Deira by Osric, a cousin of Edwin. The former of these princes having perished by treachery, and the latter in battle against Cadwallon the Briton, Oswald, brother of Eanfrid, in 634, again united the two provinces: this prince surprised the camp of Cadwallon near Hexham, where, after a sanguinary conflict, he gained a complete victory over the Britons, who could never after successfully make head against the Saxons. In this reign the see of Lindisfarne was founded, and in a few years the church of Northumbria was fixed on a solid and permanent basis. Oswald being slain in battle against Penda, the pagan king of Mercia, at Oswestry in Shropshire, the latter ravaged Northumberland, but, being unable to make himself master of the royal city of Bambrough, he marched back to oppose the East Anglians, and the ancient division of Northumbria was once more revived; Oswy, the brother of Oswald, being elected king of Bernicia, while Oswin, son of Osric, the last king of Deira, assumed the sceptre of the latter province. Penda, King of Mercia, still exhibiting the most inveterate malignity against the Northumbrians of Bernicia, again marched against Oswy, who met, defeated, and slew him near Leeds.

In 664, on the death of Adelwald, who had succeeded his father Oswin on the throne of Deira, Oswy assumed the latter sovereignty. In the same year a council was held in Whitby abbey, to determine the proper time for the celebration of Easter. The dispute was conducted with great acrimony, and terminated against the opinion of the Scottish clergy; which circumstance is thought to have had some influence in protracting the subsequent wars between the Northumbrians and their northern neighbours. Oswy died in 670, and was succeeded by his son Egfrid, who, after repelling an incursion of the Picts, waged a violent war against the Mercians, which was terminated by the mediation of Theodore, Archbishop of York, after a sanguinary battle had been fought on the banks of the Trent. By the unsuccessful wars of this prince, the limits of the Northumbrian kingdom were afterwards greatly diminished; the Welch made encroachments on the western side, and the Picts on the northern, as far as the Solway and the Tweed. Alefrid, or Alfred, the natural son of Oswy, was raised to the throne on the demise of his brother: he was a meritorious prince, attentive to the welfare of his subjects, and reigned in peace over Northumbria for seventeen years. But from the time of this sovereign's death, in 705, until the kingdom became tributary to Egbert, King of Wessex, in 828, excepting only the vigorous reign of Eadbert, from 737 to 759, Northumberland seems to have been little else than a scene of the most frightful anarchy; one tyrannical usurper succeeding another on the throne, and one after another falling by open rebellion, or treacherous assassination; insomuch that the Emperor Charlemagne declared that the Northumbrians were more perfidious than pagans. It was under King Eardulf, who had been liberated from confinement through the intervention of that powerful potentate, by a bull from Pope Leo III., that Northumberland first became tributary to Wessex, being the last kingdom of the Octarchy which acknowledged that subjection.

The short period of tranquillity it now enjoyed was interrupted by the descents of the Danes, to which its situation particularly exposed it, who inflicted upon it a devastation still more horrible than it had ever before experienced. Northumbria ceased to be an Anglo-Saxon kingdom in 867, when Ivar, the Dane, assumed the government of all the country between the Humber and the Tyne; the people north of the Tyne then chose Egbert as their sovereign; but ten years afterwards Halfden completed the conquest of their country, which he parcelled out amongst his Danish officers, and in which the Danes became permanently settled, this being a part of the territory which, by treaty with Alfred, they were allowed peaceably to occupy. After Alfred's death, the Northumbrian Danes soon threw off their subjection; and when Athelstan ascended the English throne, in 925, Sygtryg, the Dane, enjoyed the title of King of Northumbria. To secure the attachment of the Anglo-Danes, Athelstan gave one of his sisters in marriage to the Northumbrian prince, who at the same time embraced Christianity, but he afterwards returned to paganism, and repudiated his wife; upon which Athelstan led his army through the whole extent of the Northumbrian territory, and annexed it to his paternal dominions. This conquest was finally completed by the great battle of Brunanburh, in which Athelstan and his son so signally overthrew the combined forces of the Scotch, Welch, Irish, and Danes, and which, among the various parts of the country where, by different antiquaries, it has been thought to have taken place, has been supposed by some to have been fought within the limits of the present Northumberland. But the Northumbrian Danes again revolted against Athelstan's successor, Edmund, and subsequently against Edred, who desolated their country, and under whom it ceased to be a nominal kingdom, being reduced to an earldom. It was soon after involved in the Danish conquest of all the North of England, which ensued upon the impolitic massacre of the Danes of the South, by command of Ethelred II. In the reign of Edward the Confessor, an army of Northumbrians, under Malcolm, son of the murdered Duncan, King of Scotland, and Siward, Earl of Northumberland, entered Scotland, destroyed the usurper Macbeth, and seated Malcolm on the throne. The rapacity of Tostig, brother to Harold, afterwards King of England, who was appointed Earl of Northumberland on the death of Siward, provoked the people to revolt, and elect Morcar for their earl, which election was confirmed by King Edward. After the death of the latter, Harold espoused the sister of Morcar, and defeated his brother Tostig, who attempted to resume his authority in Northumberland. It was also at the instigation of Tostig that Harfagar, King of Norway, undertook the formidable invasion of England, which terminated in Harold's memorable victory at Stamford-bridge, when the expelled earl and the Norwegian king were both slain.

In this part of England, the resistance to the Norman conquerors was the most obstinate, and the revolts against their power the most frequent and formidable. The unsparing devastation which this persevering resistance of the northern English brought upon them from the vengeance of the Conqueror was such, that this county, in common with the remainder of that district, lay uncultivated and unpeopled for a century after. To this desolation is attributed the omission in the Norman survey of the northern counties of Northumberland, Durham, Cumberland, and Westmorland. Nearly a century later, however, about the year 1170, it was included in the survey made by order of Hugh Pudsey, Bishop of Durham, of all the ancient demesne lands and possessions of his bishoprick, which is recorded in a small folio volume, called "Boldon Buke," still existing in the office of the bishop's auditor, at Durham. The succession of the earls of Northumberland after the Conquest may be thus briefly summed up, nearly in the words of Camden:—Copsi, being made earl by William the Conqueror, expelled Osulf, the former earl, who soon after slew him at Newburn, but did not long survive this revenge, being killed by a javelin from the hands of a robber. Gospatric then purchased the earldom of the Conqueror, but was soon deposed. Waltheof, the son of Siward, succeeded him, but was soon after beheaded on a charge of treason brought against him by his wife, niece to the Conqueror. Walcher, Bishop of Durham, next enjoyed the earldom, but was slain in a riotous assemblage of the people. Robert Mowbray then attained this honour, which he forfeited by attempting to depose William Rufus in favour of Stephen, Earl of Albemarle. King Stephen gave the earldom to Henry, son of David, King of Scots; and his son William afterwards assumed the title in right of his mother, who was of the family of the Earls of Warren. Some time afterwards, Richard I. sold it to Hugh Pudsey, Bishop of Durham, for life; but when that king had been made prisoner in his return from the Holy Land, the same bishop having contributed what Richard considered too small a sum towards his ransom, the king divested him of his earldom, and the title lay dormant for about one hundred and eighty years, until it was revived in the ancient family of Percy, in which it still continues.

The period of the Norman Conquest may be regarded as the commencement of that long era of rivalry between the English and the Scottish crowns, which occasioned an almost uninterrupted series of hostilities upon the common border of the two kingdoms, until the accession of James VI. of Scotland to the English crown. The military movements which took place in this county during these five centuries are far too numerous to be here detailed: the following are some of the most remarkable. In 1043, Alnwick was successfully defended against Malcolm, King of Scots, and his eldest son Edward, both of whom were surprised and slain by Robert de Mowbray, Earl of Northumberland. In 1095, Tynemouth castle, under Earl Robert de Mowbray (who had revolted in consequence of his having received no reward for his victory at Alnwick), after a siege of two months, was taken by William Rufus; but the earl escaped to Bambrough castle, which the king immediately invested, but being unable to take it by siege, he commenced a blockade, by building a castle, called Malvoisin, to interrupt supplies from the surrounding country, when the earl, endeavouring to escape, was taken prisoner at Tynemouth, and his wife surrendered Bambrough castle to the king, on his threatening to put out her husband's eyes if she refused; the earl was carried to Windsor castle, where he suffered a long imprisonment. In 1073, Harbottle castle was taken by William, King of Scotland, who shortly after, at the siege of Alnwick, was defeated and made prisoner. In 1215 and 1216 Northumberland was ravaged by an army of Flemings, under King John, in consequence of the barons of the county having done homage to Alexander of Scotland, at Felton-hall. In 1244, at Ponteland, peace was concluded between England and Scotland, through the medium of the prior of Tynemouth. In 1295, Carham was burned by Sir William Wallace. In 1302, on Red Rigs, near Yeavering, ten thousand Scots, under Earl Douglas, were defeated by Henry, Lord Percy, and George, Earl of March. In July 1314, after the battle of Bannockburn, Harbottle castle was taken by the Scots. In 1316, Tynemouth priory was plundered by the insurgents under Sir William Middleton and Walter de Serlby, who were shortly after taken prisoners, sent to London, and hanged. In 1318, Harbottle, Milford, and Werk castles were demolished by the Scots; and, in 1333, Bambrough castle, in which was Philippa, Queen of Edward III., was ineffectually besieged by them. In 1341, Newcastle was successfully defended by Sir John Nevill, against David, King of Scotland. In 1346, Hexham priory was pillaged, and the surrounding country devastated, by David, King of Scotland. In 1388, at Otterburn, on the 9th of August, the English were defeated, having two thousand five hundred men killed and wounded, and one thousand, with their commander, Sir Ralph Percy, taken prisoners, by the Scots, whose general, Earl Douglas, was slain; which battle furnished the subject of the celebrated ballad of Chevy Chase, in which, however, there are material deviations from truth. In 1414, the Scots were defeated at Yeavering, by Sir Robert Umfraville, Lord Warden of the Marches; and in 1419, Werk castle was taken by them, but retaken by the English. In 1463, Margaret, Queen of Henry VI., having landed from France at Berwick, advanced to Bambrough castle, which she took, and proceeded to Hexham, near which town was fought, on Lyvel's plain, on the 24th of June, the celebrated battle in which she was defeated by John Nevill, Lord Montague, brother of the great Earl of Warwick, when her general, the Duke of Somerset, with Lords Ros and Hungerford, were taken prisoners, and she herself, with her son, Prince Edward, after falling into the hands of banditti, at length escaped into Scotland, and thence to Flanders. After this victory, Bambrough and Dunstonbrough castles were taken from the Lancastrians by the Earl of Warwick, who also besieged the French garrison in that of Alnwick, which, however, was rescued by the arrival of a Scottish army under the Earl of Angus. A few days before the battle of Hexham, a body of Lancastrians, on their march to join the queen, had been defeated by Lord Montague, on Hedgeley moor. James IV. of Scotland, in his invasion of the north of England in 1513, took Etal castle; but a division of his army was routed on Millfield plain, by the men of Durham, under Sir William Bulmer; and on the 9th of September, on Branxton-Westfield, near Flodden Hill, the Scotch sustained that signal defeat from the English forces under the Earl of Surrey, in which their king, with the flower of his nobility, and about ten thousand men, was slain. In 1523, Werk castle was successfully defended against the Scots and their French auxiliaries, under the Scottish Regent, the Duke of Albany. In 1640, the army of the Scottish covenanters, under General Leslie, having crossed the border, defeated the king's forces under Lord Conway at Newburn.

On the breaking out of the parliamentary war, this was one of the four northern counties which, together with the town of Newcastle, were placed by the king under the command of the Earl of Newcastle, who levied a considerable army in this part of England at his own expense. In 1644, General Leslie again entered Northumberland, and after capturing the castle of Tynemouth, besieged Newcastle unsuccessfully; but after a second siege, which continued from August 14th to October 22nd, it surrendered to the Earl of Callender and General Leven. At the time of the unsuccessful movement in the year 1648, in favour of the captive king, Charles I., the garrison of Tynemouth castle having declared for the king, it was taken by assault by the parliamentarians, and its governor beheaded. In the ill-concerted rebellion of 1715, the friends of the Stuart family assembled on the 6th of October at Greenrigs, under the conduct of Mr. Thomas Foster, member of parliament for the county, and on Waterfalls-hill were joined by the Earl of Derwentwater, after which they proceeded to Rothbury. The next day they marched to Warkworth, and on the 10th they passed through Alnwick to Morpeth, where their number was about three hundred horse. Finding the gates of Newcastle shut against them, they marched to Hexham, where they proclaimed James III., and on the 19th returned to Rothbury, where they formed a junction with the Scots under Viscount Kenmure. On the 20th they marched to Wooler, and thence proceeded to Kelso in Scotland. Of the three marches into which the northern borders were anciently divided, the Middle march, comprising Tyndale and Reedsdale, was within the present limits of this county, the greater part of the Western march being included in that of Cumberland, and of the eastern in the detached portion of the county of Durham, which extends to the mouth of the Tweed. Each of these marches was governed by a lord-warden, with almost unlimited authority. These border jurisdictions, and their laws, were abolished in the early part of the seventeenth century, on the accession of James VI. of Scotland to the English throne. Many of the moss-troopers, however, as the border plunderers were commonly called, still continued their depredations, until they were checked by an edict which prohibited all borderers, except gentlemen of rank, from wearing weapons. The civil war in the reign of Charles I., however, afforded some of them an opportunity of resuming their ancient practices; and in the reign of Charles II., several fresh statutes were enacted against the moss-troopers, who are stated in the preambles to have been very numerous. So lately as the year 1701, the police of Tyndale and of Reedsdale was maintained by officers called country-keepers, who, for a certain sum, ensured their respective districts against theft and robbery. Many of the borderers were engaged in the rebellion of 1715; but in the course of the last century, their ancient peculiarities have entirely disappeared, and their habits, manners, and customs, have become assimilated to those of their countrymen in general.

Northumberland is contained in the diocese of Durham, excepting the parishes of Allendale, Hexham, St. John Lee, and Throckington, which are included in that of York: it is in the province of York, and forms an archdeaconry, which includes the five deaneries of Alnwick, Bambrough, Corbridge, Morpeth, and Newcastle, and comprises eighty-seven parishes, of which eighteen are rectories, forty-one vicarages, and the remainder perpetual curacies. For purposes of civil government it is divided into six wards, viz., those of Bambrough (North and South), Castle (East and West), Coquetdale (East, North, South, and West), Glendale (East and West), Morpeth (East and West), and Tindale (East, North-East, North-West, South, and West). It contains the borough, market, and sea-port town of Newcastle; the borough and market town of Morpeth; the market and sea-port town of North Shields; the market towns of Allendale, Alnwick, Belford, Bellingham, Haltwhistle, Hexham, Rothbury, and Wooler; and the small sea-port towns of Alnmouth, Bamborough, Blyth, Hartley, Seaton, and Warkworth. Two knights are returned to parliament for the shire, and two representatives for each of the boroughs: the county members are elected at Alnwick. This county is included in the northern circuit: the assizes are held at Newcastle, and the quarter sessions alternately at Newcastle, Morpeth, Hexham, and Alnwick; the county goal is at Morpeth: there are forty-three acting magistrates. The rates raised in the county for the year ending March 25th, 1827, amounted to £78,923.17, the expenditure to £79,117.17., of which £69,290.7. was applied to the relief of the poor.

The surface of the county is very various; along the sea-coast it is nearly level, but nearer the middle it is more diversified, and rises into large swelling ridges, which are separated by the principal rivers: these districts are well enclosed, and in some parts are adorned with woods and plantations, which, however, are but thinly scattered. The whole western side of the county is an open, mountainous, and uncultivated tract. Of these mountainous districts, the parts around Cheviot are the most valuable, being in general fine green hills, in an endless variety of form, and enclosing numerous deep, narrow, and sequestered glens: they extend from the source of the Coquet down to Allenton, and thence northward to Prendick, Branton, Ilderton, Wooler, Kirknewton, and Mindrim, and occupy an area of at least ninety thousand acres. The other mountainous tracts are not marked by any striking irregularities of surface, being in general open, extensive, elevated, solitary wastes, having little vegetation besides heath, and affording an extremely scanty subsistence to the flocks that are depastured upon them: the greatest expanse of these reaches from the Roman wall to the borders of the Coquet, and beyond that river includes the moors to the north of Rothbury. The whole of the mountainous tracts are included in the three wards of Tindale, Coquetdale, and Glendale; and comprise about four hundred and fifty thousand acres of land, which is unfit for any kind of cultivation. These three wards, however, contain also a considerable portion of enclosed and cultivated country; and the three others, namely Bambrough ward, Morpeth ward, and Castle ward, all which adjoin the sea-coast, being without any mountainous tracts, have long been under cultivation: the vast beds of coal, also, which these three possess, and the increased population which the coal trade has occasioned in them, give them a decided pre-eminence in wealth, although in magnitude they are far inferior, occupying less than one-fourth of the whole county. At the distance of a mile from the main land, opposite the mouth of the river Coquet, is Coquet island, which is about a mile in circumference. The Farn islands, situated off the coast, to the south of Coquet Island, form two groups of islets and rocks, seventeen in number, several other rocky points appearing above the surface of the sea at low water: the one nearest to the shore, from which it is distant a mile and sixty-eight chains, is called House island.

The climate, with regard to temperature, is very variable, and generally changes to extremes. Upon the mountains snow often continues for several months, and frequently to a considerable depth, when none is to be seen in the lower districts. In the spring months, cold, piercing, easterly winds are the most prevalent; and the longest droughts experienced are always accompanied by them: in some parts of Northumberland, in consequence of the slow progress of vegetation whenever they continue for a few weeks, they have received the provincial name of sea pines; and so great is the cold attending them, that hardly any benefit is experienced from rain which falls during their prevalence. Mild breezes from the west and south are rarely experienced earlier in the year than the month of June: they are the certain harbingers of rain and vigorous vegetation, and are the most prevailing winds during the summer and autumn: in the latter season they often blow with tempestuous fury, and frequently do great damage by shaking out the grain from the ears of corn.

The various soils are disposed as follows: a strong fertile clayey loam occupies the level tract of country along the sea-coast, and, in its whole length, almost every where extends as far inland as the great north road from London to Edinburgh: it is well adapted to the culture of wheat, pulse, and clover, and to the purposes of grazing. Sandy, gravelly, and dry loam, or what is generally called a turnip soil, is found on the banks of the Tyne, from Newburn to Haltwhistle; on those of the Coquet about and above Rothbury; on those of the Aln, from its mouth to Alnwick; and on the borders of the Tweed: but a still greater extent of this kind of soil is found in the vales of Breamish, Beaumont, and the river Till. The hills surrounding the Cheviot mountains are mostly of a dry, sharp-pointed, gravelly loam. Moist loams on a cold, wet, and clayey bottom occupy a large portion of the county, prevailing most in the middle and south-eastern parts of it: the soil which is composed of them is unsafe for sheep, and unfit for turnips, and is principally employed in the production of grain, the rearing of young cattle, and the feeding of ewes and lambs. Black peat-earth is the prevailing soil in most of the mountainous districts, and is found in many places in the lower parts of the county.

On the arable lands the following rotations of crops are commonly practised, viz.: on the clayey soils, first, fallow; second, wheat; third, clover for one or two years, pastured by sheep; fourth, beans or peas; on dry strong loams, first, turnips; second, barley; third and fourth, clover or grass seeds, pastured for two or three years by sheep, and a small number of cattle; fifth oats; sixth, beans or peas; seventh, wheat; and lastly, on the sandy and dry loams, after having been ploughed from grass, first, oats; second, turnips; third, barley or wheat, with clover, which is pastured for three or more years by sheep and a small number of cattle. Wheat is extensively cultivated, the produce varying considerably, but averaging from twenty-four to thirty bushels per acre. Rye was formerly the principal grain grown upon all the light dry soils, but it is now only grown on very sandy land: the produce is from twenty to thirty bushels per acre: the chief part of the rye grown here, and considerable quantities which are imported from abroad, are consumed in the southern parts of the county, where it forms the common bread of the labouring class: after being leavened until it gains a considerable degree of acidity, it is made into loaves and baked in a large brick oven, or made into cakes of one and a half or two inches thick, called "sour cakes," and baked on the girdle: this is very firm, solid, and dark-coloured, and retains its moistness longer than any other kind of bread. Wheat and rye mixed, provincially called maslin, is sown in some parts of the county, and bread made from the grain thus raised, which is of finer quality than when the two species are grown separately, is esteemed by many as much superior to that made from wheat alone. Barley is grown to a considerable extent, being generally sown after turnips: the produce is from thirty to sixty bushels per acre: great quantities of this grain are made into pearl or shelled barley, or pot-barley, as it is here called, not only for home consumption, but also for exportation, very few corn-mills in the northern part of the county being found without the appendage of a barley-mill: the common bread of the labouring people in the northern parts is made from this grain, with the addition of grey peas or beans, in the proportion of one-third: the meal is kneaded with water, made into unleavened cakes, and immediately baked on a girdle; very little being ever leavened, or baked in loaves. Oats are grown in every part of the county; the varieties cultivated are numerous: the produce of common oats is from twenty to forty bushels per acre, that of the Poland and the Dutch kind from forty to sixty: those grown in Glendale are of remarkably fine quality and appearance, being known in the London market by the name of Berwick oats: oatmeal, both for home-consumption and for exportation, is prepared to a considerable extent: it is a principal article of food with the great mass of the inhabitants, not only in the form of bread, but in crowdies, or hasty-pudding, provincially called "meal kail," which is taken for breakfast and supper, with butter, or, more commonly, skimmed milk, being with the latter an agreeable, nutritive, and healthy food. The wheat is invariably cut with sickles: oats and barley are sometimes, though very seldom, mown. Beans have, from time immemorial, been a prevailing crop on all the strong lands, especially along the southern part of the sea-coast: twenty bushels per acre are considered a fair average produce. Peas were formerly a more general crop than at present; from twenty-five to thirty bushels per acre are considered a good crop. Turnips and tares are of common cultivation: the former are chiefly applied to the feeding and rearing of cattle and sheep, but small quantities are reserved for seed; the average produce being about twenty bushels, or half a ton, per acre; the latter are principally consumed as green food for horses. Potatoes are also much grown, and are frequently given raw as spring food to horses: cabbages are of less frequent cultivation. Rape, together with a little rye, is often sown for early spring food for sheep. The artificial grasses most commonly cultivated are red clover, white clover, and ray-grass, with which are sometimes mixed rib-grass and hop-medic: few of these are ever grown alone, except the red clover. Woad is cultivated at Newburn, on the banks of the Tyne. Of natural meadows, which term is generally understood to mean such lands as are occasionally overflowed by rivers, and receive no other manure than what is deposited by such inundations, this county has very few; what are here called meadows being such old grass lands as are employed for growing hay almost every year, the greatest part of which are upland, and generally produce from one ton to a ton and a half per acre: the aftermath, or fog, as it is herecalled, is mostly consumed in fattening oxen and cows. Natural pastures, or old grass lands, are most prevalent along the sea-coast, and are frequently pastured with both sheep and oxen.

The greatest number of oxen is grazed in the eastern part of the county, and a few in the vicinity of Whittingham: they are bought in May or June, and sold, as they become ready, to supply the large fleets of colliers and other trading vessels belonging to the ports of Newcastle, Shields, Sunderland, Hartley, and Blyth. A great number of sheep is fattened on grass in the same manner, and many for the same purpose; but a large portion of the lands being liable to give them the rot, the occupiers only venture to have ewes for one year: the lambs are sold fat in the months of May, June, and July, and the ewes are then fattened and sold in October and November. It was formerly a general practice to milk ewes after the lambs had been weaned, for six, eight, or ten weeks, and from this milk a great quantity of cheese was made; but it has almost wholly been discontinued. In the vicinity of Wooler, a large tract of low flat ground, called haughs, adjoining the rivers Till and Glen, being subject to frequent inundation, both that and haughs of a similar kind at Turvilaws, Doddington, Ewart, &c., have been successfully protected by means of embankments of from three to five feet high. Lime is very extensively applied as a manure, and has superseded the use of stone-marl, which was employed in considerable quantities on the borders of the Tweed; shell-marl is used with great advantage in some small tracts. Marine plants, thrown on shore by the tide, and here called sea-wrack, or sea-ware, are also applied with great effect for the same purpose, whenever they can be obtained: coal-ashes are much used in the vicinity of the principal towns, as a dressing for grass land.

Almost the only kind of cattle bred is the short-horned breed, which has been long established in every part of the county. In Chillingham park is a peculiar race of wild cattle, their colour being invariably white, with black about the mouths: the whole of the inside of the ear and about one-third of the outside, from the tip downwards, being red: the horns, which are very fine and are bent upwards, are white, with black tips: some of the bulls have a thin upright mane of about an inch and a half, or two inches long: their disposition, which is ferocious, has many singularities: the weight of the oxen is from thirty-five to forty five stones per quarter, that of the cows from twenty-five to thirty-five; and their flesh is finely marbled and of excellent flavour. Some of the graziers purchase, for the purpose of fattening, an excellent breed of small cattle, called Kyloes, which are brought from the Highlands of Scotland, and sold at Falkirk trysts, or meetings, or at Newcastle October fair. The few dairies which the county contains are chiefly for the supply of Newcastle and the other populous towns with milk and fresh butter: but the breeding of young cattle is practised in almost every part of it, and upon the large farms many cows are kept, much more for this purpose than for the profit of the dairy. Oxen are sometimes, but not generally, worked. Of sheep, Northumberland contains three distinct breeds, the Cheviot, the heath, and the long woolled. The Cheviot are a very hardy and valuable mountain sheep, without horns, and their faces and legs generally white: when fat they weigh from twelve to eighteen pounds per quarter: they are bred only on the hilly districts in the north-western part of the county, and are seldom found much farther south than Preedwater: none of them are bred on the mountain of Cheviot itself, the higher districts being pastured with old sheep. The heath sheep have a fierce wild-looking eye, and short firm bodies, covered with fleeces of long, coarse, shaggy wool: they are an exceedingly active and hardy race, the best adapted for high, exposed, heathy districts, like that which they occupy, from the western parts of the county of Durham to the North Tyne. The old breed of long-woolled sheep, which formerly occupied the lower districts of the county, were called mugs, probably from their faces being covered with a muff of wool close up to the eyes; these, however, have been much improved in consequence of the introduction of the New Leicester sheep among them; the weight of the carcass in general is from eighteen to twenty six pounds per quarter; the fleece, upon an average, weighs seven pounds and a half: many of this kind are bred to be sold to the graziers to fatten. Scarcely any are bred in Castle ward, or the south-eastern part of Morpeth ward. Goats are kept in small numbers on many parts of the Cheviot hills, where the shepherds assert that the sheep are healthier in consequence: the chief profit obtained from them is by the sale of their milk to invalids, who resort to Wooler during the summer season. The Berkshire hogs and the large white breed of swine were formerly the most prevalent in this county; but they have been in a great measure superseded by the small, black, Chinese breed, besides which there is a small white breed of still more modern introduction. The horses are of various sorts, amongst which are excellent hunters, and road and carriage horses, besides the draught horses, which are in general middle-sized and active, well adapted to the husbandry of the country: the best draught-horses are obtained from Clydesdale, in Scotland; they are strong and hardy, being about fifteen and a half or sixteen hands high. Rabbits are found in considerable numbers among the sand hills on the sea-coast: foxes are also very numerous, and are very destructive to the young lambs. The nocturnal frosts, and the north-east winds, which are here so prevalent in the spring, are very hurtful to fruit crops; so that orchards are but rarely seen, at least nine-tenths of the apples consumed in the county being imported from Kent, Essex, and other southern counties. The commons capable of being converted into profitable tillage land are now very trifling; but the extent of the open mountainous districts incapable of affording profit by cultivation with the plough, is very great. Woods growing in a natural state are found chiefly on the banks of the rivers, those of the greatest extent being on those of the North and South Tyne, the Wansbeck, the Coquet, and their tributary streams; they comprise much valuable oak timber. The demand for small wood at the collieries and lead-mines has induced the proprietors of woods on the Derwent, Tyne, &c., to cut the oak, ash, and elm, which they contain, at from twenty-five to thirty years' growth; birch, willow, and alder, at a somewhat shorter growth; and hazel, for corf-rods, once in three or four years; these corves are a kind of large wicker baskets used for drawing up the coal from the pits. Flourishing plantations, on an extensive scale, are scattered over the county. among the great variety of the trees of which they are composed, the larch is one of the most prevalent and conspicuous. On the edges of the moors towards the western parts of the county a few peats are burned, but in every other part of it coal is generally used as fuel.

Of the rarer birds, the golden eagle is sometimes to be seen on the highest summits of the Cheviot hills, and the osprey breeds annually near Greenley lake. The common and the moor-buzzard are frequently seen; several species of owls, and the butcher-bird, inhabit the woods and mountainous wilds; the heron frequents the waters in Glendale; and the moors about Wallington, Elsdon, &c., abound with red grouse. The cormorant breeds in the cliffs of the Farn islands; and wild geese and ducks, with a variety of other aquatic birds, are often found on Prestwick Car and other waters. Among the fish on this coast are the lump-fish and the porpoise. Vast quantities of cod are taken weekly, and furnish a cheap food to the labouring poor. Ling, haddock, sole, plaice, flounders, turbot, herrings, skate, and thornbacks, are very plentiful. Mackarel, basse, gar, sturgeon, and halibut, are very scarce. The lamprey is frequently taken near the mouths of the large rivers, and the conger-eel abounds in the sea sands. A great variety of flat fish is found in the Tyne and other rivers. Crustaceous and testaceous fishes are taken in great diversity on the sea-coast, of which the most valuable is the lobster: it is said that between £12,000 and £15,000 worth of lobsters were caught in one year between Newbiggin and Newton. Cockles are very plentiful along the coast, the best and largest being found at Budle: oysters of an excellent quality are sometimes taken among the sea rocks. Every variety of trout abounds in the rivers, rivulets, and other waters of this county.

The most important mineral productions are coal and lead. The great coal field of the north-eastern extremity of England, which extends over the greater part of this county, and the neighbouring one of Durham, forms a most important object in the national economy. This district is included within an irregular triangle, having its apex at Berwick upon Tweed, and its base upon the river Tees: it consists of a series of beds, which, including several smaller ones of nearly the same material, amount to two hundred and twenty-nine: they consist of five different substances, some of which alternate with each other several times, viz., coal, sandstone, slate-clay or shale, limestone, and basalt. All the beds of coal dip towards the east, so that the lowest of them, which rises to the surface at Cross Fell, in Cumberland, is calculated to lie three hundred and eighty-seven fathoms below the lowest of the Newcastle beds, a little eastward of that town. The whole district has been divided into two separate formations, which are distinguished as the "Independent Coal Formation," and the "Newcastle Coal Formation," and familiarly into "lead measures" and "coal measures." The tract termed the lead measures, from the veins of lead which abound in a particular part of it, extends from Berwick on the north, to the Tees on the south; its northern part being bounded, on the east by the sea, and on the west by the Cheviot hills; and its southern part, on the east by the coal measures, and on the west by a range of high land, of which Cross Fell is the apex. The coal measures extend from the river Coquet on the north, nearly to the Tees on the south, the length of this tract being about fifty-eight miles, and its greatest breadth about twenty-four. The leading distinction between the two formations appears to be this; that of the numerous and various organic remains which have been found in the course of the mining operations in both of them, those discovered in the strata constituting the coal measures are exclusively vegetable, or belonging to fresh water; while in the strata of the lead measures are found both sandstone and limestone, containing marine shells, or impressions of them. The beds of the coal, and of the other strata composing the coal measures, are not every where of uniform thickness, but, from the best information, their thickness is calculated at one thousand six hundred and twenty feet; and the lead measures, which pass beneath them, and are tolerably regular, are estimated at two thousand seven hundred and forty-nine feet. The beds of coal rise to the surface one after the other, each to the eastward of that which immediately precedes it in point of age; they are sometimes visible, but are more frequently covered by alluvial soil. The latter contains masses of the different rocks composing the whole district, and among them portions of hard black basalt are found every where in abundance: of this stone the ancient Britons formed the heads of their battle-axes, which are usually denominated celts. Barbed arrow-heads of pale-coloured flint, neatly finished, are frequently found on the moors, and are provincially called elf-bolts. This alluvium also contains portions of the trap rocks of the Cheviot range; and masses of fine granite are scattered over the surface of the whole county. In the coal measures, potters' clay of a blueish, and sometimes of a yellow, colour, is found immediately below the vegetable soil, and is used for making coarse earthenware, bricks, and tiles. The number of beds of coal in the lead measures has not been precisely ascertained; seven have been enumerated, of which only four exceed three or four feet in thickness, and consist of a slate coal, similar to the Scotch, Welch, or Staffordshire, and which does not cake; it is used only for home consumption, and for burning lime, for which latter purpose it is peculiarly adapted, being also generally found together with limestone: the mines are very numerous between Berwick and the river Coquet, south of which there are but few in the tract termed the lead measures, and the coal is very inferior in quality to that of the mines north of that river; these mines are very shallow, and it is remarkable that the beds of coal and the strata between which they lie undulate with the surface of the country, which is not the case with the coal measures. The whole surface of the coal measures has been calculated at one hundred and eighty square miles: the majority of the numerous mines are situated on both sides of the river Tyne, and not far distant from its banks. In these measures forty beds of coal have been seen, but of that number many are of inconsiderable thickness: the two most important are those distinguished by the names of the high main and the low main; the thickness of the former being six feet, and that of the latter six feet six inches. The high main coal is about sixty fathoms above the low main, which, at St. Anthon's colliery near Newcastle, is a hundred and thirty-five fathoms from the surface: between them occur eight beds of coal, one of which is four feet thick, and another three: seven beds have been found under the low main, but the quality is inferior. Thus the quantity of coal in the district termed the lead measures is far less considerable than that in the coal measures, besides which, the superiority of the latter over every other is well known.

The quantity of coal raised annually in this district, and exported from Shields and Sunderland to London, and the whole eastern and southern coasts of Great Britain, is immense; and there is a curious distribution of the trade consequent upon the relative magnitudes of the rivers Tyne and Wear. The Tyne vessels, being large, are chiefly destined for the London market; the Wear vessels, on the contrary, are so small that they can make their way into all the small rivers and harbours, so that they supply the whole eastern coasts, and the southern as far westward as Plymouth. Besides the coal exported to different parts of England, a large quantity is consumed in the two counties, which cannot easily be calculated. About forty years ago a practise was adopted at the pits, where the coal was of a fragile nature, of erecting screens to separate the small from the larger coal. This system is now become universal, and immense heaps of coal are thus raised at the mouths of the pits: these soon take fire from the heat of the decomposing pyrites, and continue to burn for several years. Not less than one hundred thousand chaldrons are thus annually destroyed on the Tyne, and nearly an equal quantity on the Wear. The choak damp, the fire-damp, and the after-damp, or stythe, are the mining terms for the gases with which the coal mines are affected, and of these the second, both from its immediate violence and as occasioning the other kinds of damp, is the most to be dreaded; the accidents arising from it have become more frequent of late years, although every possible precaution is taken in examining and in ventilating the mines. The beds of sandstone in the lead measures, when coarse-grained, are called grit, which is quarried for mill-stones, whence the beds are termed mill-stone grit. In the coal measures, sandstone is termed post by the miners; but when the bed is very hard it is termed whin. A hard bituminous shale often forms the floor of the coal beds, and is used by the manufacturers of fire-bricks. No beds of limestone occur in the coal measures; but in the lead measures there are about twenty, varying in thickness from three feet to sixty or seventy, making an aggregate thickness of five hundred and sixty-seven feet: they are generally hard, of a blue colour, not crystalline, and are without petrifications, except two of the beds, one of which is full of madrepores, and hard enough to receive a polish; the other is full of shells, and is called the cockle-shell limestone.

The lead veins, which occupy but a small part of the large district named from them, are chiefly situated in a space of about fifteen miles from north to south, and twenty from east to west, the southern boundary of which, lying partly in this county and partly in that of Durham, may be defined to be a line extending about twenty miles eastward from Cross Fell. In this district there are two descriptions of nearly vertical veins: those which run north and south, or nearly so, are without lead, and are frequently filled with quartz; those running east and west contain it in great abundance: the latter are the most numerous, and have been wrought for at least two hundred years; some are only a few inches wide, while others are several fathoms: they also vary in width in the different veins through which they pass. The only lead-ore procured in abundance from these mines is galena: it contains silver, the proportion of which varies from two to forty-two ounces in the fother of twenty-one hundred-weight: the average is twelve ounces; but eight are considered to be worth extracting. When it is of good quality, thirty-two hundred-weight of clean ore yield twenty hundred-weight of lead. Basalt is found both in the lead and coal measures: in the first it occurs in the form of beds, interstratified with beds of sandstone, limestone, &c., in veins, and in masses lying on the surface, termed over-lying masses: in the latter situation it occurs in the general form of a long range, crossing the country from south-west to north-east, north of the lead-mines. Further north other masses are visible, and still further basaltic eminences form a striking feature in the country between Alnwick and Berwick, and have frequently been chosen for the sites of castles, as at Dunstanbrough, Bambrough, and Holy Island. Some of the small islands near the coast are also composed of this rock. The number of basaltic veins, or dykes, traversing the coal measures is very considerable; the largest, in the immediate neighbourhood of Newcastle, is that which passes through Coley-hill, about four miles west of the town, which is twenty-four feet wide, and in which a long range of quarries has been opened, in some places to the depth of fifty feet.

The richest fields of lead-ore are at Allenhead and Coalcleugh, which, with the other five mines in the parish of Allendale, furnish an annual produce of about two thousand five hundred tons of lead. Lead-ore is also found in some of the northern parts of the county: a strong vein is now worked near Fallowfield; and strings of ore have been discovered on the coast at Elwick, and on the eastern side of Holy Island. Arsenic is found in the lead mines. The washing of the ore and the other operations at these mines have been much facilitated during the last thirty years by the introduction of improved machinery. The ore is wrought by a measure containing eight hundred-weight of clear ore, called a bing; most of the proprietors have smelting-mills of their own, where they smelt the ore, take out the silver it contains by refining, and then cast the lead into pigs, of one hundred-weight and a half each. Ore of zinc is found in great abundance in most of the veins producing lead-ore; but its distance from any brass-works and the want of water-carriage render it of little value: in these mines is also found a great variety of the different kinds of spar. Iron-ore is found both in the coal and lead districts. Immense quantities of iron pyrites lie imbedded in the strata of indurated clay through all the coal-field. The iron-works at Lemington are chiefly supplied with this metal from the neighbouring collieries. Iron-stone is still more abundant in the shale of the lead-mines; but owing to the high price of fuel, and the great distance from any water-carriage, it cannot be manufactured to advantage. There were formerly furnaces at Lee-hall, near Bellingham, and at Bebside: iron-ore was got about four miles west of Blyth; and the Carron Company were once accustomed to collect on Holy Island a part of the ore smelted at their furnaces. The remains of some ancient blomeries are found in different parts of Northumberland, seeming to indicate that the Romans were acquainted with these iron mines, which is further evinced by a Roman altar, found at Benwell, inscribed to Jupiter Dolichenus, the deity who presided over iron.

The great coal trade of this district has been flourishing for the last five centuries, and has been constantly increasing with the increasing population of the country. Of the quantity raised it is not easy to form an exact estimate; but it is supposed to be about equal in extent to the exports of this article from the river Tyne, in which a considerable quantity from the county of Durham is included, the latter being reckoned equal to the quantity consumed within this county. The average annual export of coal from Newcastle, Sunderland, Hartley, and Blyth, for five years, ending with 1826, was one million three hundred and thirty-three thousand seven hundred and seventy Newcastle chaldrons; which, added to the home consumption and waste, estimated at three hundred and forty thousand chaldrons, makes the aggregate amount of coal raised annually from the mines in the counties of Durham and Northumberland, one million six hundred and seventy-three thousand seven hundred and seventy chaldrons, equal to four millions four hundred and thirty-five thousand four hundred and ninety tons and a half, nearly two-thirds of which was shipped at the different ports. The facilities derived from the introduction of steam machinery at these collieries has been immense; for, besides working the hydraulic machinery and drawing up the coal from the pits, it is now employed at nearly all the collieries in propelling the coal wagons along the rail-ways to the different staiths, or loading-places on the Tyne.

Limestone abounds through the whole of Bambrough ward, and that part of Glendale ward lying east of the river Till; and thence it stretches, in a south-westerly direction, through the central parts of the county, being found at Shilbottle, Long Framlington, Hartburn, Ryall, Corbridge, &c., and at numerous other places to the westward of these. Freestone, of various kinds, abounds in almost every part of the county, and is applied to all the purposes of building: many of the quarries afford tolerably good slate for roofing, and flag-stones for floors; and at some of them are obtained excellent grind-stones, of which many are exported. Whinstone, of the blue kind, is found in many parts of the county, particularly in that called Bambroughshire; and the district on the western side of the river Till, including all the Cheviot mountains, produces scarcely any other mineral substance than brown, red, or grey whinstone, which is a superior material for making roads, and is sometimes carried several miles for that purpose. Stone-marl abounds in many places near the Tweed; and shell-marl is found in a few places in Glendale ward: clay-marl is also found in small quantities, but in situations unfavourable to its being used as manure.

The staple manufactures of the county are principally derived from, or connected with, the coal trade and mines, such as ship-building, rope-making, and the production of the several articles made at the forges; foundries, copperas-works, soda, or marine alkali manufactories; white-lead works, potteries, glassworks, &c. Hexham has long been known for its manufacture of gloves, called "Hexham Tan." A manufacture of straw-plat is carried on to a considerable extent in the county, and in some of its branches much ingenuity is displayed. The coal trade is the chief basis of the commerce of the county, and the principal source of its wealth, as well as a nursery for some of the best seamen in the world. The principal exports from the Tyne, besides coal, are lead, shot, cast and wrought iron, grind-stones, bricks, earthenware, and glass. The exports through the medium of the port of Berwick are chiefly corn, flour, oatmeal, shelled barley, potatoes, eggs, pork, and wool, which are conveyed coastwise. The foreign trade is chiefly to the north of Europe. The port of Alnmouth also employs a few vessels in exporting corn, flour, &c.; and during the summer season a few are engaged in carrying lime from the neighbourhood of Bambrough to different parts of Scotland. Among the chief imports are corn, flax, hemp, linen, yarn, timber, and iron.

The principal rivers are the Tyne, the Tweed, the Coquet, the Aln, the Blyth, the Wansbeck, and the Till. The Tyne is formed by the confluence, a little above Hexham, of two streams of nearly equal magnitude, called the North Tyne and the South Tyne: the former has its sources in the mountainous heaths, on the extreme western confines of the county, and runs in a south-easterly direction towards Hexham. The South Tyne, rising behind Cross Fell in the county of Cumberland, enters the south-western extremity of the county, and runs directly east to its junction with the North Tyne, their united waters pursuing the same direction by Hexham to Newcastle, and thence to Shields, immediately below which the Tyne falls into the North sea: the tide flows up this river to a short distance above Newburn; it is navigable up to Newcastle for vessels of three or four hundred tons' burden, the larger vessels loading at Shields; about forty steam-boats now ply upon it between Newcastle and Shields. The conservancy of the Tyne belongs to the corporation of Newcastle, by grant of Edward II.; and their jurisdiction extends to high-water mark on both sides of the river, from Spar-Hawk, a rock at the mouth of the haven, to Hedwin streams, above Newburn, a distance of nineteen miles. The Tweed forms the northern boundary of the county for a few miles in the vicinity of Wark. The Tyne and Tweed have been long famous for their salmon fisheries, more especially the latter, in which the fish taken are the salmon, bull-trout, whitling, and large common trout, nearly the whole of which are sent to London, in pounded ice, by means of fast-sailing vessels, called smacks, constructed for the purpose: they are from seventy to one hundred and twenty tons' burden; twelve men on an average being employed in each. The Coquet, rising among the Cheviot hills, pursues an easterly course by Allenton, Rothbury, and Felton, to Warkworth, immediately below which it falls into the sea. The Aln has a source similar to that of the last-mentioned river, but its course is much shorter, although in the same direction, and only a few miles to the north of it: it passes by Whittingham and Alnwick, and falls into the sea at Alemouth, or Alnmouth. The Blyth rises to the east of the course of the North Tyne, and discharges itself into the sea at Blyth, the small harbour of which it constitutes. The Wansbeck, which runs a few miles to the northward of the last-mentioned, is formed by different small streams, which, descending from the mountain wastes, unite before they reach Morpeth, their combined waters continuing an easterly course to the sea, which they join at Cambois, a few miles below that town. The Till, which is the largest stream that joins the Tweed from this county, rises among the Cheviot hills, where it is called the Brennich, and has upon it the cataract called Linhope-spout, a fall of fifty-six feet: this name it retains until it has passed Wooler, at first running eastward; but it afterwards assumes a northerly course, receiving from the same mountainous tract the waters of different smaller streams, the principal of which is the Glen, and passing by Chillingham, Doddington, and Ford, below the latter village it soon enters the detached part of the county of Durham. The river Derwent forms the southern boundary of the county for the distance of some miles, both to the east and west of Allensford; and afterwards running through a small part of the county of Durham, it joins the Tyne above Newcastle. The road from London to Berwick, through York, enters this county from Chester le Street, in Durham, and runs the whole length of it, passing through Newcastle, Morpeth, Alnwick, and Belford, to Berwick. A railroad from Newcastle to Carlisle has been long projected, which it is thought will be of great convenience to those two commercial towns, and to all the intermediate country: contractors to commence and complete this great undertaking were advertised for about the year 1828.

The principal Roman remains, which, indeed, are among the most interesting in the island, are those of the great barrier constructed as a security against the incursions of the North Britons. Of the eighteen stations along its line, the sites of eleven are in this county, viz., Segedunum, Pons Ælii, Condercum, Vindobala, Hunnum, Cilurnum, Procolitia, Borcovicus, Vindolana, Æsica, and Magna, which are here enumerated as they occur in succession, from the mouth of the Tyne, westward, and which were at Wallsend, Newcastle, Benwell, Rutchester, Halton-Chesters, Walwick-Chesters, Carrawburgh, House-Steads, Little Chesters, Great Chesters, and Caervoran, respectively. Of all these there are traces, more or less distinct; and numerous remains of Roman buildings, utensils, coins, &c., of almost every description, have been discovered among their foundations, and deposited in various antiquarian repositories. The most extensive remains of a Roman, or Roman-British, town, are those at House-Steads, where they occupy a space of two miles and a half in length. The most conspicuous fragments of the wall itself are at Dentonburn, Heddon on the Wall, Harlowhill, and near Chollerford bridge, on the Tyne. In addition to the stations along the wall, there were others in this county, at Old Town, Bellingham, Corchester, Hexham, Tynemouth, Elsdon, and Rochester; which have also furnished various and interesting remains. Besides the paved way which ran from turret to turret, immediately within the wall, another was carried by the most direct course from one station to another, and is still distinguishable in different places. The Watling-street traversed the county from south to north, entering it at Corbridge on the Tyne, and crossing the great wall at Portgate, a mile and a half beyond which it separates into two branches, the one running north-north-east, and entering Scotland, near Berwick, the other north-north-west, crossing the border at Black Halls: the former branch, commonly called the Devil's causeway, passes on the east side of Kirk-Heaton, and crossing the Wansbeck, proceeds by the west of Hartburn church, in a straight line between Netherwitton and Wittonshiels, to Brinkburn Abbey: it may be distinctly traced across Rimside Moor, whence it proceeds by Glanton, Horton castle, Lowick, and Ancroft, to Cornmills, where it crosses the Tweed. The other line runs by Swinburn castle, Corsenside, Elishaw, Rochester, and over the head of the Coquet, between Chewgreen and Thirlmoor, to Black-Halls. The vicinal road called the Maiden Way, supposed to be a corruption of Made-way, runs from Caervoran, on the western side of the county, to Whitley castle, and thence to Whellop castle in Westmorland. The ecclesiastical architecture of Northumberland has little that is especially remarkable: the number of churches, in proportion to the size of the county, is but small, some of the parishes being very extensive, particularly in the more barren and mountainous portions of it. The religious houses, too, owing, it is probable, partly to the unfruitfulness of a great part of the county, and to the great insecurity of its border situation, during the whole period of the existence of those establishments, were not numerous, amounting only to about forty-nine, including hospitals and colleges. There are some remains of the abbeys of Alnwick, Blanchland, and Hulne; but the chief monastic ruins are those of the priories of Brinkburn, Hexham, and Tynemouth; the anciently conventual church of Hexham is one of the finest ecclesiastical buildings in the county. There are medicinal springs at Eglingham, Halliwell, Snowhope, and Thurston, but none of them are much frequented. There are numerous ancient castles remaining, either wholly or in part; amongst which that of Bambrough is of the highest antiquity, while that of Alnwick is the most extensive, and one of the greatest historical celebrity: in this class of remains are several of the ancient border towers, of comparatively small dimensions, but of strong though simple construction. Alnwick Castle, so long the seat of the noble family of Percy, with its modern additions, also takes the lead amongst the present mansion-houses of Northumberland. On the mountain streams there are several falls of considerable height, but owing to the very great barrenness of the tracts in which they are situated, they are less picturesque than those of the adjoining county of Durham. The lawless and predatory habits of the ancient borderers, so large a portion of whom inhabited this county, are well known; they were finally suppressed about the commencement of the last century; and the numerous ballads in which the achievements of these half-licensed brigands were celebrated, have, like the ballad of Robin Hood, ceased to engage the public mind, but have assumed a less changeable form in the volumes of Percy and of Scott, as lasting memorials of a state of manners which, at least in Britain, has probably disappeared for ever.

NORTHWAY, a joint tything with Newton, in the parish of ASHCHURCH, lower division of the hundred of TEWKESBURY, county of GLOUCESTER, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. N.E.) from Tewkesbury, containing, with Newton, 185 inhabitants.

NORTHWICH, a market town in the parochial chapelry of WITTON, which is included in that part of the parish of GREAT BUDWORTH which is in the hundred of NORTHWICH, county palatine of CHESTER, $17\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.N.E.) from Chester, and 173 (N.W.) from London, containing 1490 inhabitants. The name of this place is intended to point out its situation with regard to the other wiches, or salt towns. Camden states that it was called by the Britons Hellath, or Hellah Du, meaning the Black Salt Town: it is situated on the line of the northern Watling-street, and the same author is of opinion that its brine springs were used by the Romans. At the Norman survey it constituted part of the demesne belonging to the earldom of Chester, and eventually passed to the crown: in the reign of Richard III., the manor was, with many others, granted to the Derby family, but it has since been alienated. During the civil commotions in 1643, the town was fortified, and the parliamentary forces had a garrison here; the first attack of the royalists was unsuccessful, but, on the arrival of a reinforcement, they took the town and garrisoned it; it was, however, subsequently retaken by the parliamentarians, and retained by them during the remainder of the war. What is usually considered, from the contiguity of the streets, to constitute the town, lies on the verges of the adjoining townships of WITTON, Castle-Northwich, Winnington, Leftwich, Mars-ton, and Anderton, at the confluence of the rivers Dane and Weaver, and at the intersection of the high road from Chester to Manchester, with that from London to Liverpool: it is irregularly built, the streets are paved and lighted, many of the houses are ancient, and the inhabitants are supplied with water conveyed by pipes from a reservoir.

The commercial prosperity of Northwich is entirely dependent on its numerous brine springs and extensive mines of rock-salt, in which article the trade is so great as to produce an annual export of one hundred thousand tons from the springs alone: they were discovered at a very early period, and are usually from twenty to forty yards in depth; the water is so intensely impregnated as to be fit for immediate evaporation. The brine being raised by pumps set in motion by steam-engines, is conveyed directly, by means of pipes, into pans from thirty to forty feet square; these are fixed over furnaces, the heat arising from which causes the water to evaporate, when the salt chrySTALLIZES on the surface, and ultimately sinks to the bottom. The evaporation being completed, the salt is put into moulds perforated at the bottom to drain off the moisture, and afterwards dried in rooms heated by hot air pipes, or in stoves, when it is ready for sale. The grain of salt differs in size according to the degree of heat that is applied: a period of from twenty to twenty-four hours is required to dry a pan of coarse-grained salt, whilst two pans of salt having a fine grain may be worked off in that time; hence the latter is considerably cheaper than the former. The mines of rock-salt were discovered in 1670; the upper stratum, lying about sixty yards below the surface of the earth, is ten yards thick: about 1773, a second stratum, of superior quality and ten feet in thickness, was discovered, at the depth of one hundred and ten yards, the intermediate space being occupied by a solid mass of stone. This alone is worked, and by the following process: a shaft is sunk, and on reaching the mine, a roof is left, which is supported by pillars of the same material; as the excavation proceeds the fragments are raised in buckets, by means of steam-engines. The pits include an area of two, three, or four acres, and when greatly illuminated, present a singularly magnificent appearance, the light being reflected from all points in every variety of hue, as from a promiscuous assemblage of mirrors and prisms. The rock-salt is conveyed down the Weaver: one-third undergoes a refining process at Frodsham, and at the works on the Lancashire side of the Mersey, and the remainder is sent to Liverpool, whence it is exported to Ireland and the ports of the Baltic. From an account published in 1818, it appears that two hundred thousand tons of manufactured salt, and upwards of forty thousand tons of rock-salt, were landed at Liverpool during the preceding year, and that upwards of two hundred and eighty thousand bushels are annually sold for internal consumption, by far the greater portion having been obtained in this neighbourhood; since that period the business has materially increased. The number of vessels thus employed, and which return with coal, is about three hundred, of from ninety to one hundred tons' burden each. Many others are engaged exclusively in the importation from Liverpool of timber, grain, wine, spirituous liquors, raw cotton, grocery, &c., and these frequently return with oak timber. Some vessels of small burden are built here in the docks and ship-yards. Facilities of water-carriage are supplied by the Weaver, which flows through the town, and the Grand Trunk canal, which passes in a semicircular direction through the salt-works, about one mile to the northward. The market, which is held by prescription, is on Friday; and there are fairs on April 10th, for cattle only, on August 2nd, and December 6th, which are numerous attended by the manufacturers from Manchester, Yorkshire, Birmingham, and Sheffield, with their respective goods, and by venders of Irish linen; a commodious range of booths for their use was erected about a quarter of a mile from the town by Mr. Mort, a late lord of the manor of Northwich. Courts leet and baron are held, at which constables and other officers are appointed. The general quarter sessions, formerly held here once in the year, were removed to Knutsford in 1784. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. Here is a charity school for twelve poor children, with a small endowment given by Thomas Key, in 1735.

NORTHWICH, a hamlet in the parish of BLOCKLEY, upper division of the hundred of OSWALDSLOW, county of WORCESTER, though locally in the upper division of the hundred of Kiftsgate, county of GLOUCESTER, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (S.) from Chipping-Campden, containing 37 inhabitants.

NORTHWICK, a chapelry in that part of the parish of HENBURY which is in the lower division of the hundred of HENBURY, county of GLOUCESTER, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Tewkesbury: the population is returned with Redwick. It is within the peculiar jurisdiction of the Bishop of Bristol. The navigable river Severn runs through the chapelry.

NORTHWOLD, a parish in the hundred of GRIMSHOE, county of NORFOLK, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Stoke-Ferry, containing 981 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £29. 14. $9\frac{1}{2}$, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Ely. The church, built in the reign of Edward IV., and dedicated to St. Andrew, has a stately quadrangular tower of flint, embattled and quoined with freestone, and crowned with eight richly-carved pinnacles. The river Wissy runs through the parish. Bridget Holder, in 1736, gave certain land, and John Carter, in 1782, bequeathed £200, the income to be applied for teaching sixteen children.

NORTHWOOD, a township in that part of the parish of WEM which is in the Whitchurch division of the hundred of BRADFORD (North), county of SALOP, containing 182 inhabitants.

NORTHWOOD, a parish in the liberty of WEST MEDINA, Isle of Wight division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (S.) from West Cowes, containing, with the town of West Cowes, 3579 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, with the vicarage of Carisbrooke, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester. The parish is bounded on the east by the navigable river Medina. There is a small endowment for a school, the gift of Thomas Cole, in 1725. A rent-charge of about £15 was bequeathed by John Mann, in 1687, for the maintenance of poor orphans.

NORTON, a township in the parish of RUNCORN, hundred of BUCKLOW, county palatine of CHESTER, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Frodsham, containing 294 inhabitants. A priory of Augustine canons, originally founded in 1133, at Runcorn, by William Fitz-Nigell, was removed hither by his son William, constable of Chester: this house was dedicated to the Blessed Virgin Mary, and at the dissolution had a revenue of £258. 11. 8.: it was subsequently a private mansion, and was besieged by the royalists in the early part of 1643. The Mersey and Irwell and the Duke of Bridgewater's canal pass through the township.

NORTON, a parish in the hundred of SCARSDALE, county of DERBY, 3 miles (N. by E.) from Dronfield, containing 1697 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Derby, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Rev. Henry Pearson. The church, dedicated to St. James, contains several monuments, among which is an altar-tomb to the memory of the parents of John Blythe, Bishop of Salisbury, and Geffrey Blythe, Bishop of Lichfield, both which prelates were born here. There is a place of worship for Unitarians. A free grammar school was founded and endowed, in 1654, by Edward Gill, in pursuance of the will of his father: the annual income, including several subsequent gifts, is £80, which is applied to the education of about sixty children, in a school-room rebuilt upwards of forty years ago.

NORTON, a parish in the south-western division of STOCKTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, 2 miles (N.) from Stockton upon Tees, containing 1186 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Durham, rated in the king's books at £31. 11. $5\frac{1}{2}$, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Durham. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, was formerly collegiate: it is partly Norman, and partly in the early English style, with various windows of later date, and a tower rising from the centre, and has lately received an addition of four hundred and forty-five sittings, of which three hundred and thirty-nine are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £350 towards defraying the expense. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Henry II. granted permission for a market to be held here weekly, on Sunday. Norton enjoys the privilege of one of the six scholarships founded in the University of Oxford, in 1536, by the Rev. John Claymund, then vicar of this parish, and master of Corpus Christi College. The Rev. John Wallis, author of the history and antiquities of Northumberland, died here in 1793.

NORTON, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of DUDSTONE and KING'S BARTON, county of GLOUCESTER, 4 miles (N. E. by N.) from Gloucester, containing 349 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Bristol. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a small structure, principally in the later English style.

NORTON, a township in the parish of BROMYARD, hundred of BROXASH, county of HEREFORD, 3 miles (N. E. by E.) from Bromyard, containing 574 inhabitants.

NORTON, a parish in the hundred of CASHIO, or liberty of St. ALBAN'S, county of HERTFORD, 1 mile (W. N. W.) from Baldock, containing 313 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of St. Alban's, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £5. 6. 8., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Rev. R. W. Sutton. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas.

NORTON, a parish in the hundred of FAVERSHAM, lathe of SCRAY, county of KENT, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W.) from Faversham, containing 98 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £10. 18. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Rochester. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is principally in the early English style of architecture.

NORTON, a parish in the hundred of FAWSLEY, county of NORTHAMPTON, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Daventry, containing, with the hamlets of Muscott and Thorpe, 474 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, and in the patronage of Beriah Botfield, Esq. The church is dedicated to All Saints. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The Grand Junction canal crosses the parish on the east and north.

NORTON, a township in the parish of CUCKNEY, Hatfield division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, county of NOTTINGHAM, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. by W.) from Worksop, containing 391 inhabitants.

NORTON, a parish in the hundred of BLACKBOURN, county of SUFFOLK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by S.) from Ixworth, containing 691 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £14. 3. 9., and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of St. Peter's College, Cambridge. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew.

NORTON, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of BLACKENHURST, county of WORCESTER, 3 miles (N. by E.) from Evesham, containing, with the chapelry of Lench-Wick, 386 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, rated in the king's books at £5. 17. 8½., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Worcester. The church, dedicated to St. Egwin, was a small cruciform structure, principally in the later English style, but the nave having fallen down, the tower is now distinct from the rest of the building. There is a trifling endowment, the gift of Anne Walter, for teaching poor children.

NORTON, a parish in the wapentake of BUCKROSE, East riding of the county of YORK, comprising the townships of Norton, Sutton, and Welham, and containing 1168 inhabitants, of which number, 1017 are in the township of Norton, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile (E. S. E.) from New Malton. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of the East riding, and diocese of York, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £1100 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of — Ewbank, Esq. Norton is separated from Malton by the river Derwent, which is here crossed by a stone bridge, at the foot of which there was formerly an hospital, founded early in the reign of Henry II., by Roger de Flamville, and made subordinate to the priory of Malton. From the great number of Roman coins discovered, this is supposed to have been anciently a place of more consequence than it is now.

NORTON, a township in the parish of CAMPSALL, upper division of the wapentake of OSGOLDCROSS, West riding of the county of YORK, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Doncaster, containing 668 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

NORTON (BISHOP'S), a parish in the eastern division of the wapentake of ASLACOE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 10 miles (W. N. W.) from Market-Rasen, containing, with the township of Atterby, 413 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Prebendary of Bishop's Norton in the Cathedral Church of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £9. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

NORTON by BREDON, a chapelry in the parish of BREDON, middle division of the hundred of OSWALDSLOW, county of WORCESTER, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Tewkesbury, containing 199 inhabitants.

NORTON (BRIZE), a parish in the hundred of BAMP-TON, county of OXFORD, 5 miles (S. E.) from Burford, containing 528 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Oxford, rated in the king's books at £9. 7. 11., and in the patronage of the Dean and Canons of Christ Church, Oxford. The church is dedicated to St. Brise. Ten poor children are educated for an annuity of £10, the gift of Goddard Carter, in 1723.

NORTON under CANNOCK, a parish in the southern division of the hundred of OFFLOW, county of STAFFORD, $8\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Lichfield, containing, with the township of Little Wyrley, 669 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Prebendary of Hansacre and Harmitage in the Cathedral Church of Lichfield, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and £1400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Prebendary of Alre-was in the Cathedral Church of Lichfield. The church, dedicated to St. Margaret, is an ancient structure, much dilapidated. The Essington and Wyrley canal passes through the parish, which abounds with excellent coal. Richard Gildart and Phineas Hussey, in 1776, founded a school, and endowed it with an estate now producing £20 a year, for teaching poor children. There is also a Sunday school for children, who are clothed and educated by voluntary contributions.

NORTON (CHIPPING), a market town and parish, having exclusive jurisdiction, though locally in the hundred of Chadlington, county of OXFORD, 18 miles (N. W.) from Oxford, and 73 (N. W. by W.) from London, containing, with the hamlet of Over Norton, 2640 inhabitants. The prefix Chipping is a corruption of Ceapan, a market, or place of trade, Norton implying the north town, from which it appears to have been a place of some note during the Saxon era. The streets are partially paved and lighted, and there is a plentiful supply of water. A woollen manufactory, which has existed here for some time, is now on the decline. The market is on Wednesday: fairs are held on March 7th, May 6th, the last Friday in May, July 18th, September 4th, the last Wednesday in September, November 8th, and the last Friday in November; there are also three statute fairs in October. The following large markets are for cattle; the last Wednesday in January, the second in April, June, and August, and the Wednesday next after December 11th. The civil government is vested in two bailiffs and ten burgesses, who are chosen at the court baron held at Michaelmas; the bailiffs are justices of the peace, exercising exclusive jurisdiction within the borough; they hold a court of session for the trial and punishment of offenders. The petty sessions are held here; and there was formerly a court of record, held under a charter of James I., for the recovery of debts under £4, now disused. The borough returned two representatives to parliament, once in the reign of Edward I., and twice in that of Edward III. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Oxford, rated in the king's books at £10. 6. 8., endowed with £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Gloucester. The church, which is dedicated to St. Mary, stands a little below the town, and exhibits specimens of exquisite workmanship, particularly in the middle aisle and the windows. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, and Methodists. On the dissolution of the Trinity guild, in the 1st of Edward VI., the grammar school was re-founded, its former endowment of £6 per annum, which had long been paid out of the revenue of the guild, having been continued, and since paid at the Salt office, out of the land revenue belonging to the crown. A bequest of £300 was left by Francis Barnes, by will, dated May 21st, 1762, the income arising from which is about £17 per annum: out of this sum the master is bound to keep his residence (which is rent-free) and school in repair: he receives boarders: two boys, appointed by the corporation, are gratuitously instructed in the elements of English and classical literature, the rest pay seven shillings and sixpence each per quarter. The Lancasterian school for girls is supported by voluntary subscription. Eight almshouses for poor widows, who are appointed by the bailiffs and burgesses, were built about 1649, by Henry Cornish, who, amongst other charities, also devised twelve cottages, on condition that they should always be let at the same moderate rent, for the residences of poor persons of good repute. In a part of the parish, called Cock's Town End, there are four almshouses for persons appointed by the corporation, which are repaired at the expense of the parishioners; but the origin of this charity is unknown. An ancient monument, called Rowldrich, or Rollrich stones, is situated about two miles from the town: it originally consisted of sixty stones, now reduced to twenty-two, forming a circle thirty-five yards in diameter from north to south, and thirty-three from east to west. Few of them exceed four feet in height, and sixteen inches in thickness, except one at the northern point, which is seven feet high, and five and a half broad. Eighty-four yards north-east is a large one, called the King stone, which is eight feet high, and seven broad, and about twelve inches in thickness. There are various conjectures as to the origin of this monument. Camden considers it to be a memorial of some victory, erected probably by Rollo, the Dane, who invaded England in 876; but Dr. Stukeley ascribes the work to the Druids, Rholdrwg signifying the circle, or church of the Druids. He assigns the same origin to the several barrows near this spot, one of which is sixty feet long and twenty broad. Near this monument are four stones contiguous to each other, each of which is the boundary of a county, the several counties of Oxford, Gloucester, Worcester, and Warwick, terminating at this point. At Cold Norton, in this parish, an Augustine priory was founded by William Fitz-Alan, in the reign of Henry II., and dedicated to the Virgin, St. John the Evangelist, and St. Giles, which having escheated to the crown in the reign of Henry VII., was purchased by Dr. William Smith, Bishop of Lincoln, and given to Brasenose College, Oxford.

NORTON le CLAY, a township in the parish of CUNDALL, wapentake of HALLIKELD, North riding of the county of YORK, 3 miles (N.) from Boroughbridge, containing 142 inhabitants.

NORTON (COLD), a parish in the hundred of DENGIE, county of ESSEX, 5 miles (S.) from Maldon, containing 226 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Essex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £16. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Governors of the Charter-house, London. The church, dedicated to St. Stephen, stands on a hill.

NORTON (COLD), a township in the parish of CHEBSEY, southern division of the hundred of PIREHILL, county of STAFFORD, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.E. by E.) from Eccleshall, containing 44 inhabitants.

NORTON (EAST), a parish in the eastern division of the hundred of GOSCOTE, county of LEICESTER, 6 miles (W. by N.) from Uppingham, containing 120 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, with the vicarage of Tugby, in the archdeaconry of Leicester, and diocese of Lincoln. The church is dedicated to All Saints. A small sum, the bequest of Catharine Parker in 1747, is applied to teaching poor children.

NORTON (GREENS), county of NORTHAMPTON.—See GREENS-NORTON.

NORTON in HALES, a parish in the Drayton division of the hundred of BRADFORD (North), county of SALOP, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.E. by N.) from Drayton in Hales, containing 241 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £5. 9. 4. The King presented for that turn in 1786. The church is dedicated to St. Chad. The learned Dr. Lightfoot, Master of Clare Hall, Cambridge, was rector of this parish.

NORTON under HAMBDON, a parish in the hundred of HOUNDSBOROUGH, BERWICK, and COKER, county of SOMERSET, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.N.E.) from Crewkerne, containing 482 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £9. 16. 3., and in the patronage of W. Locke, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

NORTON (HOOK), a parish in the hundred of CHADLINGTON, county of OXFORD, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N.E. by N.) from Chipping-Norton, containing, with the township of Southrope, 1351 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Oxford, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Oxford. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyan Methodists. William Hobbs, in 1810, bequeathed £5 towards the support of a Sunday school, which is further aided by subscriptions, and an annuity of £2. 2. from the lessees under the Bishop of Oxford.

NORTON by KEMPSEY, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of OSWALDSLOW, county of WORCESTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Worcester, containing 517 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Worcester, rated in the king's books at £2. 12. 6., endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant. The church is dedicated to St. James. There are extensive quarries of limestone within the parish.

NORTON (KING'S), a parish comprising the chapelry of Stretton Parva and part of that of Illston on the Hill, and the township of King's Norton, in the hundred of GARTREE, county of LEICESTER, and containing 199 inhabitants, of which number, 71 are in the township of King's Norton, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Leicester. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Leicester, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £7, and in the patronage of Henry Greene, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. John the Baptist.

NORTON (KING'S), a parish (formerly a market town) in the upper division of the hundred of HALF-SHIRE, county of WORCESTER, 6 miles (S. S. W.) from Birmingham, containing, with Headley, Moseley, Moundsley, and Rednal, 3651 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Bromsgrove, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester. The church, which is dedicated to St. Nicholas, is spacious, and principally in the decorated style of English architecture, with later insertions; the tower and spire are very fine. A free grammar school was endowed by Edward VI. This town received the grant of a market from James I.; and during the succeeding reign, in the year 1645, Hawkesley house, then belonging to the Middlemores, was burnt down by the royalists. The market is disused; but fairs are held April 25th and September 5th. The Birmingham and Worcester canal, in passing through this parish, forms a junction with that of Stratford on Avon, and is conveyed through a tunnel into the parish of Alvechurch.

NORTON (MIDSOMER), a parish in the hundred of CHEWTON, county of SOMERSET, comprising the tythings of Clapton, Downside, Midsummer-Norton, and Wilton, and containing 2326 inhabitants, of which number, 893 are in the tything of Midsummer-Norton, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Bath. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £10. 3. 4., and in the patronage of the Dean and Canons of Christ Church, Oxford. The church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, is a large and handsome structure, with a modern tower, having on the south side a recess containing a statue of Charles II. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. At the southern extremity of the parish is a modern Roman Catholic establishment, from Douay in French Flanders, called Downside College, where young men are prepared for ordination for the priesthood, and a number of boys educated: connected with the institution is a very elegant chapel, completed about eight years ago, also a good library. The parish is bounded on the east by the old Roman Fosse-way, and abounds with coal of a superior quality, of which there are extensive mines, affording employment to a great portion of the inhabitants. A fair for cattle, pigs, &c., is held annually on April 25th. Ann Harris, in 1719, gave the residue of her personal estate, now producing about £45, for teaching poor children; forty are instructed.

NORTON on the MOORS, a parish in the northern division of the hundred of PIREHILL, county of STAFFORD, containing, with the townships of Bermersley and Norton on the Moors, 1983 inhabitants, of which number, 1793 are in the township of Norton on the Moors, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Hanley. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Stafford, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Rev. J. Wildig. The church is dedicated to St. James. The Caldon canal passes through the parish. Five poor children are educated for a trifling bequest by Hugh Ford, in 1730.

NORTON (OVER), a hamlet in the parish of CHIPPING-NORTON, hundred of CHADLINGTON, county of OXFORD, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile (N. by E.) from Chipping-Norton, containing 374 inhabitants.

NORTON (ST. PHILIP), a parish in the hundred of WELLOW, county of SOMERSET, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by E.) from Bath, containing 669 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Hinton-Charterhouse annexed, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £5. 11. 3., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bath and Wells. The church, dedicated to St. Philip and All Saints, is partly in the later style of English architecture. There is a place of worship for Baptists. Rachael Coles, in 1756, bequeathed £10 per annum towards the foundation of a school for twenty poor children.

NORTON (PUDDING), a parish in the hundred of GALLOW, county of NORFOLK, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S.) from Fakenham, containing 14 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £6, and in the patronage of Thomas Wright, Esq. Of the church, which was dedicated to St. Margaret, there are no remains, except a small square tower.

NORTON juxta TWYXCROSS, a parish in the hundred of SPARKENHOE, county of LEICESTER, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Market-Bosworth, containing, with the chapelry of Bilstone, 502 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Leicester, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £14, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to the Holy Trinity. William Whiston, the celebrated divine, was born here in 1667, during the incumbency of his father.

NORTON-BAVANT, a parish in the hundred of WARMINSTER, county of WILTS, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Warminster, containing 268 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £6. 0. 10., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to All Saints. Ann Jacob, in 1709, bequeathed £100, directing the interest to be applied for teaching poor children.

NORTON-CANON, a parish in the hundred of GRIMSWORTH, county of HEREFORD, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Weobley, containing 347 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Dean of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £5, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Hereford. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas. A court leet is annually held here. There is a small school, endowed by a Mr. Barnett with about £8 a year.

NORTON-COLEPARLE, a parish in the hundred of MALMESBURY, county of WILTS, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Malmesbury, containing 110 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Wilts, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £2. 19. 9 $\frac{1}{2}$., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of E. T. Gould, Esq. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

NORTON-CONYERS, a chapelry in that part of the parish of WATH which is in the wapentake of ALBERTONSHIRE, North riding of the county of YORK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Ripon, containing 87 inhabitants. This was the seat of Richard Norton, Lord Chief Justice of England in the early part of the reign of Henry IV.; and subsequently of the gallant royalist, Sir Richard Graham, who, having received numerous wounds in the battle of Marston Moor, and finding it lost, fled to his house here, and died the same night.

NORTON-DISNEY, a parish in the lower division of the wapentake of BOOTHBY-GRAFFO, parts of KESTVEN, county of LINCOLN, 7 miles (N. E. by E.) from Newark, containing 214 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £6. 6. 10., endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Sir Thomas Clarges, Bart. The church is dedicated to All Saints. The parish is bounded on the east by the river Witham.

NORTON-FALGATE, an extra-parochial liberty, locally in the Tower division of the hundred of Ossulstone, county of MIDDLESEX, adjoining the ward of Bishopsgate (Without) in the city of London, containing 1896 inhabitants. Norton-Falgate, or Folgate, called also Norton-Folley, derives its name from its situation north of Bishopsgate, and probably the adjunct from the Saxon Foldweg, a highway, the Roman Irmin-street having passed through the place. It is a precinct exempt from archidiaconal jurisdiction, being subject to the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's, to whom the manor belongs, and who are stated in Domesday-book to have held ten cottages and nine acres of land here in the reign of Edward the Confessor. According to some authorities, this place belongs to the parish of St. Faith under St. Paul's, but the inhabitants consider it an extra-parochial liberty, marrying and burying where they please, and maintaining their own poor, except in that part of the liberty which includes part of Long-alley, Hog-lane, and Blossom-street, the inhabitants of which pay poor rates to the parish of Shoreditch, but as to watch and ward they pay to this liberty. It is within the jurisdiction of the court of requests held for the Tower Hamlets, for the recovery of debts under 40s. A courthouse formerly stood in the High-street, which was long used as a free school for boys, founded in 1691; but the school has been removed to Primrose-street, in the parish of St. Botolph, Bishopsgate, where a school-house was erected in 1775, in which sixty boys are educated, and thirty of them clothed. The endowment consists of £7000 three per cent. consols., arising from the benefactions of Mr. Richard Turner and others, which, with a house in Lombard-street, produces £228 per annum. A school for girls was established in this liberty in 1703, by voluntary subscription; it is now endowed with £1720 stock in the three per cents., with the dividends on which, aided by subscriptions, thirty-six girls are clothed and educated. In Elder-street are almshouses for six poor members of the Weavers' Company, founded and endowed, in 1729, by Nicholas Garrat, Esq., and adjoining them are others for the poor of Norton-Falgate, erected in 1728. St. Mary Spital, a priory for canons and brethren of the order of St. Augustine, was founded by William Brune, a citizen of London, in 1197: its revenue, at the dissolution, was £557. 14. 10.

NORTON-FITZWARREN, a parish in the hundred of TAUNTON and TAUNTON-DEAN, county of SOMERSET, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Taunton, containing 475 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Taunton, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £20. 10. 10. William Peachey, Esq. was patron in 1797. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

NORTON-HAWFIELD, a ville in the hundred of CHEW, county of SOMERSET, containing 43 inhabitants.

NORTON-LINDSEY, a parish in the Snitterfield division of the hundred of BARLICHWAY, county of WARWICK, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Warwick, containing 149 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Claverdon, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, endowed with £200 royal bounty. The church is dedicated to the Holy Trinity.

NORTON-MALERESWARD, a parish in the hundred of CHEW, county of SOMERSET, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W.) from Pensford, containing 118 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Bath, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £9. 2. 6., and in the patronage of the Rev. W. P. Wait.

NORTON-MANDEVILLE, a parish in the hundred of ONGAR, county of ESSEX, 3 miles (N. E. by E.) from Chipping-Ongar, containing 141 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Essex, and diocese of London, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of C. Cure, Esq. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

NORTON-SUBCOURSE, a parish in the hundred of CLAVERING, county of NORFOLK, 6 miles (N. by W.) from Beccles, containing 367 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Sir Edmund Bacon, Bart. The church is dedicated to St. Margaret. A chantry, or college of eight Secular priests, was removed hither from Raveningham, in the reign of Edward III.; in 1387 the number was increased to thirteen, and in 1393 the society was translated to Castle-Mettingham in Suffolk.

NORWELL, a parish in the northern division of the wapentake of THURGARTON, county of NOTTINGHAM, 6 miles (N. by W.) from Newark, containing, with the chapelry of Carlton upon Trent, and the township of Norwell-Woodhouse, 874 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage divided into three portions, denominated respectively Norwell-Secunda, Norwell-Tertia, and Norwell-Overhall, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Chapter of the Collegiate Church of Southwell; Norwell-Secunda is rated in the king's books at £4. 12. 11., and in the patronage of the Prebendary of Norwell-Tertia; Norwell-Overhall is rated in the king's books at £4. 12. 11., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Prebendary thereof. The church is dedicated to St. Lawrence.

NORWELL-WOODHOUSE, a township in the parish of NORWELL, northern division of the wapentake of THURGARTON, county of NOTTINGHAM, $7\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Newark, containing 111 inhabitants.

Arms.

NORWICH, a city and county of itself, locally in the hundred of Humbleyard, county of NORFOLK, of which it is the capital, 108 miles (N. E. by N.) from London, containing, exclusively of that part of the parish of Hellesdon which is in the hundred of Taverham, and of that part of the parish of Thorpe St. Andrew which is in the hundred of Blofield, 50,288 inhabitants. This ancient city, which rose from the ruins of the Venta Icenorum of the Romans, so named from the river Wentsum, or Wensum, the site of which is now occupied by the village of Cais-tor, was by the Britons, in allusion to that circumstance, called Caer Gwent; and by the Saxons, in reference to its situation with respect to the Roman station, Northwic, or the northern castle, of which its present name is an evident contraction. Uffa, first king of the East Angles, is stated to have built a castle here in 575, and to have made it his residence: Henry I. granted to Harvey, first Bishop of Ely, exemption for the lands of his church from the service of castle guard to Norwich, by which tenure they were held previously to the erection of the monastery of Ely by Ethelreda, daughter of Anna, King of the East Angles, and wife of Egfrid, King of Northumbria, in the year 673. According to Spelman, it was a residence of the kings of East Anglia, who established a mint here, from which issued coins of Alfred and several succeeding kings. Being an object of frequent contention between the Saxons and the Danes, it was alternately in the possession of each party, and was repaired and fortified by Alfred the Great against the latter, to whom, after a treaty of peace, that monarch finally conceded it. The Danes being subsequently driven out, it remained in the possession of the Saxons till 1004, when those invaders, stimulated by the weakness of Ethelred II. and the treachery of Alfric, Earl of Mercia, landed on the coast of Essex under Sweyn their king, plundered and burnt the city, and left it in a state of desolation till their return in 1018, when they again took possession of it under Canute, by whom it was rebuilt and the fortifications of the castle were restored. From this time it rapidly increased in extent and importance till the Norman conquest, when it was inferior only to the city of York. It was bestowed by the Conqueror on Ralph Guader, who, with the Earls of Hereford and Northumberland, entered into a conspiracy against the king; but, being frustrated in his design by the vigilance of the Bishop of Worcester, the sheriff for that county, and Walter Lucy, Baron of Hereford, he withdrew into Brittany, leaving in the castle a garrison of Britons under the command of his wife, who heroically sustained a protracted siege, till, being reduced by famine, she surrendered to the king, on condition of being suffered to leave the kingdom with all her forces in perfect security. During this siege the city sustained material injury, and was so much reduced that, from one thousand three hundred and twenty burgesses who inhabited it in the reign of Edward the Confessor, there were only five hundred and sixty remaining. It gradually recovered from this severe calamity, and in 1094, Herbert de Lozinga, who accompanied William Rufus from Normandy, being made bishop of East Anglia, removed that see from Thetford to Norwich, where he erected a cathedral, an episcopal palace, and a monastery, in which he placed sixty monks.

From this time the city rapidly improved, and, according to William of Malmesbury, soon became famous for the number of its inhabitants, and the extent of its trade. It was rebuilt in the reign of Stephen, who incorporated the inhabitants, and gave the town as an appanage to his third son William, from whom it was afterwards taken by Henry II.; whose son gave it to Hugh Bigod, Earl of Norfolk, in order to secure his interest in his rebellion against his father. The earl having repaired the fortifications, and placed a strong garrison of French and Flemings in the castle, held it for some time against the king, but, after a vigorous defence, he was compelled to surrender it, and to purchase peace by the payment of one thousand marks. In the reign of John, the Dauphin of France, whom the confederated barons had invited to their assistance, besieged and took possession of the castle, plundered the citizens, and committed numerous depredations. In the reign of Edward I., having recovered from the injury it had sustained, and grown into importance, it abounded with opulent citizens, who environed it with walls of great strength; and in the reign of Henry IV., in 1403, they obtained permission to elect a mayor and sheriffs, in lieu of their ancient bailiffs, whereby Norwich was constituted a county of itself. In the reign of Richard II. an insurrection was excited by John Listher, a dyer in the town, which was quelled by the exertions of the Bishop of Norwich, by whom he was defeated, and, being taken prisoner, was executed in 1381. The city suffered severely by continued discord between the monks and the citizens; the latter assaulted and set fire to the monastery, which, with the exception of the chapel, was burnt down. The king, having been informed of this outrage, visited Norwich, and, after due examination, caused thirty young men of the city to be executed. In 1446, another assault on the monks was restrained by the activity of the Duke of Norfolk, who seized and punished the ringleaders, displacing the mayor from his office, and appointing Sir John Clifton governor of the city, till the king might be pleased to restore its forfeited privileges. Soon after the suppression of these tumults, the city, which had repeatedly suffered from a similar calamity, was nearly consumed by a fire, which broke out in a house in the parish of St. George. In the reign of Edward VI., Robert Kett, a tanner, and his brother William, both of Wymondham, under the pretence of resisting the enclosure of waste lands, excited a formidable rebellion; and, having seized on the palace of the Earl of Surrey, plundered and converted it into a prison, in which they confined many noblemen and gentlemen: they then encamped on Mousehold heath, where they were at length defeated by the Earl of Warwick with a numerous army, and the two brothers being taken prisoners, Robert was hanged on Norwich castle, and William on the steeple of Wymondham church. In the reign of Elizabeth, the manufacture of bombazine and other articles, for which the city has been since noted, was introduced by the Dutch and Walloons, who, fleeing from the Netherlands, found in this country an asylum from the persecution of the Duke of Alva: that queen, who, by the encouragement she gave to the emigrants, laid the foundation of the commercial and manufacturing prosperity of this and other towns, visited Norwich, where she was received with great demonstration of respect, and pompously entertained for several days. During the civil war in the reign of Charles I., the city was held by the parliamentary forces, who defaced the cathedral, stripped it of all its plate and ornaments, and greatly damaged the episcopal palace. After the Restoration, Norwich was visited by Charles II. and his consort, and subsequently by Queen Anne, who were hospitably entertained by the corporation.

The city is pleasantly situated on the summit and acclivities of an eminence rising gently from the river Wensum, which, after pursuing a winding course through the town, joins the river Yare, thus affording a line of navigation from the sea at Yarmouth. The houses are in general of antique appearance, and the city, from being thickly interspersed with orchards and garden-grounds, presents a rural aspect, almost unparalleled in towns of such extent: the principal streets are well paved, the others only partially. There are not less than nine bridges over the river, connecting the various parts of the town, which has recently been lighted wholly with gas: the streets are in many places narrow, and diverge from one common centre. The town, extending a mile and a half in length, and one mile and a quarter in breadth, was formerly surrounded on all sides, except where it was defended by the river, with embattled walls, in which were forty towers and twelve principal gates; the former are in a dilapidated state, and the latter have been taken down. Various parts of it are supplied with water by means of public water-works. The environs, which are in the highest state of cultivation, have, from the salubrity of the air, and the pleasantness of their situation, become the residence of numerous opulent families. A public subscription library, established in 1784, contains more than fourteen thousand volumes: the admission ticket is £5. 5., and the annual subscription £1. 1. The Norwich and Norfolk Literary Institution, under the direction of a committee of twenty-one members, was formed by a proprietary, who also subscribe annually £1. 11. 6.: it is open to subscribers not being shareholders at £2. 2. per annum. The Norwich and Norfolk United Medical Book Society was established in 1824, and is supported by professional members in the city and county. A society of artists was instituted in 1803, for promoting the study of painting, sculpture, and architecture; and, in 1816, some of the original members instituted the Norwich and Norfolk society of artists and amateurs, who hold their meetings in a room built for that purpose near the corn exchange. The Friars' Society, for the dissemination of useful knowledge, was established in 1785; and a mechanics' institution in 1825. The theatre royal, a handsome building tastefully fitted up, is a newly-erected edifice opened in 1826, under the direction of the Norwich company. Near it is an extensive suite of assembly-rooms, consisting of a larger ball-room, sixty-six feet long, and twenty-three wide; a smaller, fifty feet long, and twenty-seven wide; and a tea-room, twenty-seven feet square, which, by the removal of partitions, form one room one hundred and forty-three feet in length; they are lighted with gas, and furnished in an elegant style; there are also two appropriate card-rooms. The new concert-room, in the parish of St. Andrew, erected by subscription in 1816, is fifty feet in length, and thirty-five wide; it is handsomely ornamented, and well adapted to its purpose; the orchestra contains an excellent organ. The public gardens, in which is a handsome edifice called the Pantheon, are tastefully laid out for the reception and entertainment of visitors. The cavalry barracks, in Pockthorpe, form an extensive and handsome range of building of red brick, consisting of a centre and two wings: the walls enclose an area of ten acres, for the exercise of the troops.

The principal articles of manufacture are bombazines, crapes, camlets, shawls, plaids, worsted stuffs, fabrics in which silk, wool, and mohair are interwoven (called Norwich shawls), and various others; to prevent fraud in the manufacture of which, eight wardens, of whom four are chosen from the citizens, and four from the neighbourhood, are annually appointed, with full powers of inspection: the number of looms in these several factories is about fourteen thousand, affording employment to more than fifteen thousand persons. There are several silk-mills, in the principal of which from three to four hundred persons are employed; it is worked by steam-engines of various degrees of power: the silk, after being properly prepared, is distributed to the weavers to be manufactured into crape. The towns of Yarmouth, Bungay, and North Walsham, participate in the benefit of this manufacture, of which branch establishments have been opened in those several places. There are extensive iron-foundries, breweries, establishments for making vinegar, snuff-manufactories, and numerous corn-mills: a considerable trade in agricultural produce arises from the situation of the town in the centre of an extensive district remarkable for its fertility and the improved state of its agriculture. The trade between Norwich and Yarmouth is carried on by keels and wherries of very light construction, varying from fifteen to forty tons' burden, by which coal, timber, grain, and various other articles of merchandise, are brought from that port by the river, on which is a regular establishment of steam-packets; and great facility will be also afforded to the trade of the city by a navigable communication with the sea at Lowestoft, in the county of Suffolk, now in progress under the superintendence of the Norwich and Lowestoft Navigation Company, incorporated in the 8th of George IV. Besides the British products just mentioned, considerable quantities of wine and oil are imported from the continent of Europe, and yarn from Ireland; and the manufactures of Norwich are exported from London and Yarmouth to Russia, the Baltic, Germany, the Netherlands, France, Spain, Portugal, and Italy, as well as the East and West Indies and to America. The market days are Wednesday and Saturday, the latter being a very considerable market for corn: the corn exchange is a commodious building, erected in 1828, the front of which is ornamented with a noble Ionic portico of four columns, and the interior constitutes one of the most spacious rooms in the kingdom. A very extensive market is held on the same day, on the Castle Ditches, for horses and cattle; and there is a market for fish daily. The fairs are on the day before Good Friday, and on the Monday and Tuesday in Easter and Whitsun weeks.

The government of the city, by charter of Charles II., is vested in a mayor, recorder, steward, two sheriffs, twenty-four aldermen, and sixty common council-men, assisted by a town clerk, chamberlain, two coroners, water-bailiff, sword-bearer, serjeants at mace, and subordinate officers. The mayor is nominated annually by the resident freemen, who appoint two of the aldermen, the latter choosing one to be mayor; the other officers of the corporation are also appointed by the aldermen. The mayor, recorder, steward, and such of the aldermen as have filled the office of mayor, are justices of the peace within the city and county of the city. The freedom is inherited by birth, acquired by servitude, or obtained by purchase. A court of assize is held annually under the judges travelling the Norfolk circuit, which is opened by a commission distinct from that for the county of Norfolk; courts of general quarter session, for the trial of all but capital offenders; and, under a grant from Richard I. and other charters, a court of record for the recovery of debts to any amount, called the "Court of Guildhall of the City of Norwich," is held on Wednesdays and Saturdays, the judges of which are the sheriffs, assisted by the steward, who is a barrister. A court of requests is held every Monday, under an act passed in the 12th and 13th of William and Mary, before an alderman and two common council-men, for the recovery of debts under 40s. The guildhall, situated on the north of the market-place, is an ancient structure of black flint, containing convenient and well-arranged courts for the assizes and quarter sessions for the city and county of the city, with the requisite offices for the town clerk, chamberlain, and other officers of the corporation: the mayor's council-chamber is a noble room, splendidly fitted up, and ornamented with a series of historical paintings and with numerous portraits of eminent persons; at the east end is a fine window of stained glass: in this chamber is deposited the sword of Don Xavier Francisco Winthuysen, the Spanish admiral, presented to the corporation by Admiral Lord Nelson, and accompanied with a letter in his lordship's own hand-writing. St. Andrew's Hall, formerly the church of the monastery of the Black friars, and now converted into a banqueting-hall, and used occasionally for public meetings, is an ancient structure, of which the front has been carefully restored: the choir is used as a church for the inmates of the city workhouse, which stands near it, having been formerly appropriated to the use of a Dutch congregation, and thence called the Dutch church: the nave, one hundred and twenty-four feet long, is elegantly fitted up, and decorated with paintings; the roof is supported on twelve lofty pillars, and the windows, which are of large dimensions and ornamented with rich tracery, were formerly embellished with painted glass: among other decorations in the hall is the ensign of the French ship Le Genereux, captured in the Mediterranean by the squadron under the command of Admiral Lord Nelson, in 1800, and presented to the corporation by Captain Sir Edward Berry, Knt.; and at the east end is a fine portrait, by Sir William Beechy, of Admiral Lord Nelson, presented to the corporation in 1804: in this hall are held the grand musical festivals. The new city gaol erected in 1829, at an expense of £24,000, is a massive and appropriate building, containing requisite wards, airing-yards, and other offices adapted to the classification of prisoners, and amply supplied with water by means of pumps worked by the tread-mill. The city first exercised the elective franchise in the 23rd of Edward I., since which time it has regularly returned two members to parliament: the right of election is vested in the freeholders, and in the freemen generally not receiving alms, the number of whom is about four thousand: the sheriffs are the returning officers. The assizes and quarter sessions for the county of Norfolk are held in the shire-hall, a spacious edifice, erected in 1822; and, this being the county town, the election of knights of the shire regularly takes place in it. The castle, which, though situated in the centre of the city, belongs to the county of Norfolk, has been converted into a prison for that county, and a new gaol and shire-hall have lately been erected in connexion with it. The principal remains of the ancient building are, the shell of the keep, a massive structure on the summit of an artificial eminence, and Bigod's tower, a fine specimen of the Norman style of architecture; over the fosse, an ancient stone bridge of one circular arch, of forty feet span, is still entire, and, from the supposed date of its erection, is considered to be of Saxon architecture. The outer walls, of which only some small portions are remaining, formerly enclosed an area of twenty-three acres, on part of which the new buildings have been erected. The county gaol and house of correction is a commodious building, comprising fifteen wards, fifteen day-rooms, and the same number of airing-yards, in one of which is a tread-mill, applied to the grinding of corn, for the employment of the prisoners.

Norwich was raised into an episcopal see by Herbert de Lozinga, who having been made Bishop of Thetford (which had become the head of the diocese of East Anglia, founded by Segebert, King of the East Angles, in 630), whither the episcopal chair had been removed from North Elmham in 1091, transferred the seat of the diocese to this city in 1094, where, having purchased a large plot of ground near the castle, he erected a cathedral, an episcopal palace, and a monastery for sixty Benedictine monks, the revenue of which, at the dissolution, was £1050. 17. 6. The diocese comprehends the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, and eleven parishes in the county of Cambridge: the ecclesiastical establishment consists of a bishop, dean, four archdeacons, six prebendaries, six minor canons, of whom one is precentor, an epistoler, a gospeller, eight lay clerks, ten choristers, an organist, and other officers. The bishop is a suffragan of the Archbishop of Canterbury; and, besides being entitled by his episcopal dignity, he sits in the House of Peers as titular abbot of St. Bene't at Holme, being the only abbot in England. The cathedral church, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, after being destroyed by fire, was rebuilt by John of Oxford, the fourth bishop; and having suffered materially from frequent accidents, and from repeated assaults arising from the dissensions between the monks and the citizens, it has undergone numerous repairs and alterations, especially in 1806, when a thorough reparation took place. In its present state it displays much of its original Norman architecture, of which it affords some of the finest specimens in the kingdom: it is a spacious cruciform structure, with a tower of the most finished and highly ornamented Norman style rising from the centre, and surmounted by an octagonal spire in the later decorated style, crocketed at the angles; the west front of Norman character, has a central entrance, with a large window above it in the later English style; the east end has several circular chapels, and the lady chapel, now destroyed, was in the early English style of architecture: there are some vestiges of a part resembling that portion of Canterbury cathedral which is called Becket's Crown, and, amidst all the alterations and insertions which have been made, there are still numerous remains of its ancient character. The interior is finely arranged, and has an impressive grandeur of effect; the nave, of which and of the aisles the roof is finely vaulted, is purely Norman; the triforium is large, and surmounted by a fine range of clerestory windows; the choir is richly ornamented with tracery in the later English style, of excellent design, and is decorated with screen and tabernacle-work of elaborate execution: the font, in St. Luke's chapel, is remarkably beautiful, and there are some ancient monuments of great beauty and interest. The cloisters are peculiarly fine, displaying a continued series of the purest specimens, from the early decorated to the later style of English architecture. In the chapel of St. Mary the Less, within the cathedral, are held the consistorial episcopal courts. The chapter-house has been demolished: of the bishop's palace the entrance gate and hall are remaining; and St. Ethelbert's and Erpingham gates, both beautiful structures, are in good preservation. The precincts of the cathedral are under the special jurisdiction of the dean and other members of the establishment, who exercise magisterial powers within them.

All the above parishes, with the exception of those of St. Andrew, St. Helen, St. James, St. Paul, and Lakenham, which are within the peculiar jurisdiction of the Dean and Chapter, are in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich.

Many of the churches, of which the prevailing style is that of the later English, with portions of an earlier date, and some Norman remains, are deserving of architectural notice: among these are the church of St. Peter Mancroft, a spacious structure in the later style of English architecture, with a lofty square embattled tower highly enriched; the interior is remarkably light and elegant; the intervals between the arches of the nave are ornamented with niches of exquisite design, and the windows are large and filled with excellent tracery; the east window is ornamented with stained glass, and in the vestry are some ancient portraits of the saints, and a painting of the Resurrection; there are numerous ancient monuments, of several of which the inscriptions are obliterated. The church of St. Michael Coslany is a handsome structure of flint and stone, and affords a fine specimen of that mode of building; the prevailing character is the later English, intermixed with the decorated and early styles; the details are elaborately wrought, and the chancel in particular is beautifully ornamented. The churches of St.

Benedict, St. Etheldred, and St. Julian, have round towers, in which, though greatly obscured by alterations and repairs, many remains of Norman architecture are discernible. The church of St. Lawrence is a handsome edifice, with a tower of flint and stone one hundred and twelve feet high; over the western entrance are sculptured representations of the martyrdom of St. Lawrence, and of St. Edmund, King of East Anglia. The churches of St. Andrew, St. George Colegate, St. Giles, St. Saviour, and various others, are handsome structures in the later style of English architecture, with lofty and elegant towers of flint and stone, and contain numerous interesting portions in earlier styles, together with valuable specimens of architectural skill. There are four places of worship for Baptists, two for the Society of Friends, two each for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists, and one each for those in the late Countess of Huntingdon's Connexion, and Unitarians, a synagogue, and two chapels belonging to the Roman Catholics, one of which is an elegant edifice lately erected.

The free grammar school, originally built by Bishop Salmon, was established by Edward VI., and is endowed by the corporation, who have the appointment of the master, and the nomination of the scholars; the master's salary is £50 per annum, with a house and the privilege of taking boarders; the under-master's salary is £30: gratuitous instruction in the classics is afforded to a certain number of boys of the city. Belonging to this school and that at Aylsham are three scholarships, of £2. 13. 4. each per annum, founded at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, by Archbishop Parker; and two scholarships for boys educated at Norwich, Aylsham, or Wymondham; four scholarships, of £5 each per annum, founded at Emanuel College, Cambridge, by William Braithwaite, in 1618; and two of three scholarships, of £5 per annum each, founded at Caius College, for natives of Norfolk. Edward Coleman also, in 1659, bequeathed £20 per annum to Corpus Christi College, for the maintenance of four scholars from this school, or from the school of Wymondham. The boys' hospital, founded in 1618 by Mr. Thomas Anguish, mayor, for the maintenance and education of forty boys; and the girls' hospital, endowed in 1649, for thirty-two girls, are both conducted under good regulations, and provide for an increased number of children. There are twelve charity schools supported by subscription, for the clothing and education of children, in which are two hundred and ten boys, and one hundred and thirty girls. In 1775, Mr. Moy, of this city, bequeathed £1000 Bank stock, directing the interest to be appropriated to apprenticing children educated in the schools; and Mr. Elmy left £400 for the same purpose. The National schools afford instruction to nearly one thousand eight hundred children; and in the county of Norfolk there are not less than ten thousand children instructed in these institutions, which are supported by subscription. The Norwich British and Foreign school was instituted in 1811, and is supported by subscription; there are nearly four hundred children in this establishment.

St. Giles' hospital was founded, in 1249, by Bishop Suffield, who endowed it for the maintenance and support of aged persons of both sexes, who are nominated by the corporation: the ancient collegiate church of St. Helen has been appropriated to its use; the choir is fitted up for the residence of fifty women, part of the nave has been prepared for the reception of fifty men, and the remainder is used as a chapel: this edifice, notwithstanding the alterations it has undergone, still displays many interesting portions of its ancient architecture. Doughty's hospital was founded, in 1687, by Mr. William Doughty, who bequeathed £6000 for its erection and endowment; there are forty aged persons of both sexes, who have a weekly sum of money, clothes, firing, and other necessities; according to the directions of the founder, no person can be admitted who is under sixty years of age. Cook's hospital was founded prior to the year 1701, by Robert and Thomas Cook, who endowed it for the residence and support of ten poor women of the city, who receive each a weekly allowance of money. The Norfolk and Norwich hospital, a handsome building of red brick, erected in 1771, at an expense of £13,323. 8. 11., contains spacious accommodation for the reception of all classes of patients: the institution is under the direction of a president and a committee, and is gratuitously attended by the principal medical practitioners of the city: as a school of medicine and surgery it is distinguished by its successful operations in cases of lithotomy. The Magdalen asylum is under the management of a committee of ladies; there are now twenty females in it, the greatest number which it can accommodate. Bethel hospital, for the reception of lunatics, was erected by Mrs. Mary Chapman, in 1713, and is supported by funds arising from donations, and by annual subscription; and at Thorpe, about two miles from the city, is the Norfolk and Norwich lunatic asylum, established in 1814, under the statute of the 48th of George III., "for the better care and maintenance of lunatics, being criminals or paupers." The Norwich dispensary, established in 1804, is chiefly supported by subscription. An infirmary for the cure of diseases of the eye was established in 1822, since which period nearly two thousand five hundred persons have been cured or relieved. The institution for the relief of the indigent blind, established chiefly by the exertions of Thomas Tawell, Esq., one of its greatest benefactors, embraces also a school for the instruction of blind children, in which there are thirty pupils, in addition to eight aged persons now in the asylum: it is under the direction of a president, three vice-presidents, and a committee of subscribers, by whom a matron and an instructor of the blind are appointed. Among the charitable associations are, a society for the relief of clergymen's widows; a benevolent medical society, for the widows and children of surgeons and apothecaries, and indigent members of that profession, in the city and county, and a similar society for the widows and children of attornies; a society for the relief of decayed tradesmen, their widows, and orphans; the Friendly Society, for the relief of poor women in sickness and old age; the society of universal good will, for the relief of strangers; the Humane Society, for the recovery of persons apparently drowned, and various others; and there are also considerable charitable bequests for distribution among the poor.

Of the monastic establishments formerly existing in the town and neighbourhood, numerous vestiges of which are still visible, were the priory and church of St. Leonard at Thorpe-wood, near the city, in which Herbert de Lozinga placed several monks, while he was erecting the cathedral; also an hospital for lepers, endowed by him, the revenue of which, at the dissolution, was £10: the hospital of St. Paul, founded in 1121, by the prior and convent of Norwich; a nunnery, dedicated to St. Mary and St. John, and endowed by King Stephen, for sisters of the Benedictine order, who in 1146 founded a new convent at Carrow, the revenue of which, at the dissolution, was £84. 12. 1 $\frac{3}{4}$.; St. Edward's hospital, founded in 1200, by Hildebrand de Mercer, citizen of Norwich, which had so far decayed, that at the dissolution its revenue was only 14s. 6d.; the monastery of the Black friars, founded in the reign of Edward II., of which the ancient church is now St. Andrew's Hall; the monastery of the Grey friars, founded in 1226, by John de Hastingford, the site of which is now occupied by Cook's hospital; the monastery of White friars, founded in 1256, by Philip Congate, merchant, which remained till the dissolution; the convent of Augustine friars, founded in the reign of Edward I., by one of the bishops; a convent of friars of the order "de poenitentiâ Jesu," founded in 1266, and which, after the suppression of that order, was annexed to the convent of the Black friars; the college of St. Mary, originally a chapel, founded in 1250, by Sir John Broun, or Brom, and at the time of the dissolution consisting of a dean, four prebendaries, and others, with a revenue of £86. 16.; also various hospitals, vestiges of which may be traced in several parts of the city.

William Bateman, Bishop of Norwich in the fourteenth century, and founder of Trinity Hall, Cambridge; Matthew Parker, second Protestant Archbishop of Canterbury, chaplain to Queen Anne Boleyn, whom he attended to the scaffold; Dr. John Kaye, or Caius, founder of Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge, author of a treatise on the antiquities of that university, and other works; Robert Green, a popular writer in the reign of Elizabeth; Dr. John Cosin, Bishop of Durham in the reign of Charles II.; the learned Dr. Samuel Clarke, the son of an alderman of this city, born in 1675; Edward King, F.R.S. and F.S.A., a most erudite antiquary, and author of a work on ancient architecture, entitled "Munimenta Antiqua," born in 1734; the Rev. William Beloe, the translator of Herodotus; and Sir James Edward Smith, M.D., founder and first president of the Linnæan Society, and author of the "Flora Britannica," were natives of this city. Among the distinguished residents were Sir Thomas Erpingham, Knight of the Garter, and chamberlain to Henry IV.; he distinguished himself at the battle of Agincourt, and built the beautiful gate facing the western end of the cathedral, which is still called Erpingham gate; he died in 1428, and was interred in the cathedral: Sir John Fastolf, a renowned warrior, who signalized himself in the wars with France in the reigns of Henry IV., V., and VI.; he died in 1459, and was interred in a chapel which he had founded in the abbey of Holme; and various others.

NORWOOD, a precinct and parochial chapelry in the hundred of ELTHORNE, county of MIDDLESEX, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Hounslow, containing 1124 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Hayes, in the exempt deanery of Croydon, which is in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Canterbury, endowed with £210 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty. The chapel has received an addition of three hundred and sixty free sittings, towards defraying the expense of which the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels contributed £300.

NORWOOD, a district partly in the parish of LAMBETH, eastern division of the hundred of BRIXTON, partly in that of BATTERSEA, western division of the same hundred, and partly in that of CROYDON, first division of the hundred of WALLINGTON, county of SURREY, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from London. The population is returned with the respective parishes. The village derives its name from an adjacent wood, which borders on a common formerly a noted resort for numerous camps of gypsies. Its elevated situation, the beauty of the surrounding scenery, and the salubrity of the atmosphere, have of late years caused the erection of many elegant seats in the vicinity. The only manufactory is a pottery, where coarse earthenware is made. Norwood is within the limits of the new police act. There are two new churches in this district. The church dedicated to St. Luke, in the parish of Lambeth, is a large and handsome edifice in the Grecian style, with a Corinthian portico, and a steeple tower, containing one thousand four hundred and twelve sittings, of which six hundred and eighty-eight are free: it was commenced in 1823, and completed in 1825, at an expense of £12,897. 13. 10., of which the commissioners gave one moiety, and lent without interest the other, together with the sum of £49. 6. 9. for extra expenses; they also lent on interest the further sum of £4325. 6. 11., expended in making a cemetery, furnishing the church, &c. The living is a district incumbency, in the patronage of the Rector of Lambeth. The church situated at Beaulieu Hill, in the parish of Croydon, is in the English style of architecture, with four turrets, containing one thousand and five sittings, of which six hundred and thirty-two are free: it was completed in 1829, by a grant of £3000 from the commissioners. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Vicar of Croydon. There is a place of worship for Independents. A school of industry for poor children of the parish of Lambeth has been founded here; also a charity school for the instruction of children of both sexes.

NORWOOD, a joint township with Clifton, in the parish of FEWSTON, lower division of the wapentake of CLARO, West riding of the county of YORK, 6 miles (N. by E.) from Otley. The population is returned with Clifton.

NOSLEY, an extra-parochial liberty, in the hundred of GARTREE, county of LEICESTER, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Market-Harborough, containing 18 inhabitants. A chantry, or college, was founded here about 1274, by Sir Anketine de Martival; it was dedicated to the Ascension of our Lord and the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin, and in the reign of Henry VI. was valued at £6. 13. 4. per annum.

NOSTAL, a joint township with Hurstwick, in that part of the parish of WRAGBY which is in the upper division of the wapentake of OSGOLDCROSS, West riding of the county of YORK, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Pontefract. The population is returned with Hurstwick. A priory of Augustine canons, in honour of St. Oswald, king and martyr, was founded here in the time of William Rufus, by Ilbert de Lacy, the revenue of which at the dissolution was valued at £606. 9. 3.

NOTGROVE, a parish in the hundred of BRADLEY, county of GLOUCESTER, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.) from North Leach, containing 198 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £15. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Bartholomew.

NOTLEY (BLACK), a parish in the hundred of WITHAM, county of ESSEX, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S. by E.) from Braintree, containing 418 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Colchester, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £15, and in the patronage of Marmaduke Wyvill, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul. There is a school for fifteen poor children, endowed by James Coker in 1702. On raising gravel, in 1752, some curious relics of antiquity were discovered, consisting of fragments of a fluted column and a vessel, both of copper, also an oblong blue glass vessel, with pieces of another, and of several glazed earthen urns. The learned William Bedell, Bishop of Kilmore, was born in this parish, in 1570, as was also John Ray, A.M., author of some works on Natural history.

NOTLEY (WHITE), a parish in the hundred of WITHAM, county of ESSEX, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.W.) from Witham, containing 397 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Colchester, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £10. D. Pennell, Esq. was patron in 1804.

NOTTINGHAM, a borough, market town, and county of itself, locally in the county of Nottingham, of which it is the chief town, 124 miles (N. N. W.) from London, containing, with the extra-parochial liberty of Standard Hill, and the limits of the castle, which are in the south division of the wapentake of Broxtow, 40,415 inhabitants. This place, from the numerous caverns and subterraneous dwellings excavated in the sandy rock on which it is situated, was by the Saxons called Snottinga ham, or place of caverns, of which its present name is only a slight modification. According to the Saxon Chronicle, the Danes, having in one of their numerous predatory incursions made themselves masters of the town, in 868, were attacked by Burrhed, King of Mercia, who, having obtained the assistance of King Ethelred I. and his brother Alfred, afterwards Alfred the Great, compelled the invaders to conclude a treaty of peace, and to retire to York. The town having subsequently suffered material injury from their renewed attempts to take possession of it, in which they were frequently successful, was fortified with a wall by Edward the Elder, who in 910 built a bridge over the river Trent. In 924, the town was repaired on the south side, towards the river, but soon after fell again into the hands of the Danes, who retained it till they were finally subdued by Edmund, in 940. In the reign of Edward the Confessor, Tosti, brother of Harold, had considerable possessions in Nottingham, which at that time contained one hundred and ninety-two burgesses; but this number, at the time of the Conquest, had decreased to one hundred and twenty. The Conqueror, in order to keep his new subjects in awe, erected on the site of the ancient fort a formidable castle, the government of which he conferred on William Peverel, his natural son: this castle, from its situation on the summit of a bold eminence, rising perpendicularly from the river Leen, and from the strength of its fortifications, was regarded as impregnable, and the town was at the same time strongly fortified. During the war between Stephen and Matilda, Nottingham was besieged by the Earl of Gloucester, who having gained possession of it, plundered and burnt it, and in a few years after it experienced a similar calamity from the partisans of the young prince Henry, in his rebellion against his father, Henry II. On the death of the prince, and the consequent pacification of the kingdom, the king greatly contributed to the rebuilding of the town; and to reward the fidelity and loyalty of the inhabitants, granted them a charter, by which he confirmed all the privileges they enjoyed under Henry I. Richard I., previously to his embarking in the crusades, assembled a parliament here, to deliberate upon the requisite measures for the administration of the government during his absence, which was entrusted to his younger brother John, in whose attempts to usurp the dominion, the castle was alternately in the possession of his partisans and of those of his absent brother, by whom, on returning from his captivity in Germany, it was finally reduced. Richard, on taking possession of the throne, held another parliament in this town, in which he demanded justice against the unnatural usurpation of his brother John, whom, however, he ultimately pardoned. In the reign of John the town and castle were unsuccessfully assaulted by the confederate barons, who had invited the Dauphin of France to accept the English crown. In the early part of the reign of Edward III., Mortimer, Earl of March, and the queen dowager Isabel, resided in the castle, which was strongly fortified; but a party of noblemen in the interest of the king, having obtained entrance through a subterranean passage which led to the keep, surprised that nobleman in an apartment adjoining the queen's, and having seized him, conveyed him to London, when, being convicted of high treason, he was hanged at Elmes. In the same reign a parliament was held here, which passed the first enactments for prohibiting the exportation of English wool, and for encouraging foreign manufacturers to settle in the kingdom. David Bruce, who had been made prisoner at the battle of Durham, was for some time confined in the castle, previously to his removal to London; and in 1386, Richard II. held a council here, the members of which having declared the proceedings of the parliament which had impeached his ministers to be illegal, were afterwards accused of treason by the House of Commons, and many of them executed. In 1461, Edward IV., after landing at Ravenspur in Yorkshire, assembled his forces in this town, where he caused himself to be proclaimed king, and made extensive additions to the castle, which were completed by Richard III., who marched hence with his forces to Bosworth Field. Henry VII. held a council of war here previously to the battle of Stoke, in which the rebels who had espoused the pretensions of Lambert Simnel were defeated, with the loss of four thousand men.

Previously to the commencement of the parliamentary war, Charles I., having retired to York, received the answer of the parliament to his various propositions for an accommodation; but the conditions proposed by that body being so humiliating and unreasonable, the monarch resolved upon war as the milder alternative, and collecting what forces he could in those parts of the country that still adhered to his cause, advanced to Nottingham, where he set up his standard on a hill within the limits of the castle, which is still distinguished by the appellation of Standard Hill; but, wishing to avoid extremities, he again made overtures for a treaty, which were still refused. Very early in the war, Prince Rupert, commanding a body of cavalry which had been stationed at Worcester, to observe the movements of the Earl of Essex, defeated a party under the command of Colonel Sandys, who was killed in the encounter, a short time prior to the battle of Edge Hill. The town and castle were soon afterwards besieged and taken by the parliamentarians, who stationed Colonel Hutchinson, with a powerful body, as a check on the garrison at Newark, which still held out for the king. During the usurpation of Cromwell, the castle was dismantled, and so far demolished as to render it unserviceable. After the Restoration, it became the property of the Duke of Buckingham, who sold it to the Duke of Newcastle, by whom it was pulled down, and a mansion commenced on a part of the site, which was completed in a few years after his death. At the time of the revolution in 1688, the Earl of Devonshire and other noblemen who had declared for a free parliament, held a meeting here on the landing of William, Prince of Orange, whom they assisted with all their influence in establishing his claims to the crown. During the French revolution of 1798, there existed a considerable degree of political excitement in the town; and in the years 1811 and 1812, the workmen, ascribing their distresses to the introduction of the improved machinery, were excited to the destruction of property to a considerable amount, by the party called "Luddites;" since which time some disturbances, originating with the frame-work knitters, occasioned the passing of the act of the 57th of George III.

The town is situated nearly in the centre of the kingdom, and at the south-western extremity of the Forest of Sherwood, and occupies the acclivity of a sandy rock, commanding an extensive view of the beautiful vale of Trent, the fertile meadows watered by that river, and the Leen, from the bank of which rises the precipitous rock on which its castle is built, and skirted by the pleasant village of Sneinton on the east: it is sheltered from the winds by a chain of hills on the north, and on the south is open to the vale of Belvoir, the Nottinghamshire wolds, and the Leicestershire hills. The streets in the central and more ancient part of the town are narrow, but, since the increase of the manufactures, it has experienced considerable improvement, and several spacious streets have been formed, and handsome ranges of building erected: it is well paved, lighted with gas, and supplied with water by two companies, incorporated by act of parliament in 1827, and with spring water of great purity by pumps in various parts; the general appearance of the town is interesting, and, from its elevated situation, the streets are always clean. At the distance of a mile, on the London road, is an ancient stone bridge of twenty arches over the river Trent, which is here of considerable breadth, being increased by the waters of the Derwent, the Soar, the Dove, and the Erwash: this bridge, for the repairs of which ample funds are vested in the corporation, having been repeatedly damaged by floods, exhibits a great diversity of style, corresponding with the several times at which it has been repaired: from the frequency of the rapid floods to which the river is exposed in rainy seasons, a flood-road, or causeway, over the meadows has been constructed, by act of parliament, and a strong embankment raised for the protection of the lower part of the town, which are maintained by a toll granted under the act: the approaches have been widened and greatly improved, and a considerable improvement has been effected in the entrance from Mansfield. The environs abound with pleasant walks, and with interesting and diversified scenery. A public subscription library and news-room was established in 1816; and, in 1821, a spacious mansion at the west end of the market-place was purchased by the subscribers (of whom there are about two hundred and thirty-five), and appropriated to the use of the institution: it contains a commodious suite of rooms, comprising the library, in which there are eight thousand volumes (a valuable library of old books, given by the Rev. Mr. Standfast, in 1744, is also deposited here, but kept distinct from the other works), a news-room, lecture-room, law library, and a billiard-room: a mineralogical cabinet has been recently added to the establishment: the price of a proprietor's share is £20, and the annual subscription £2; the admission to the news-room is £1. 5. per annum. A Literary Society, consisting of one hundred members, established in 1824, meets every alternate Monday, during the winter, in the lecture-room of the library, for the discussion of literary and scientific subjects. A mechanics' institution, formed in 1824, has a library of two thousand volumes, and a reading-room; the members hold their meetings in one of the upper apartments of the Exchange buildings, where is also a commodious suite of assembly-rooms, in which concerts and balls are held; there are also other assembly-rooms, in that part of the town called the Low Pavement, where the assize and race balls are held. The theatre, a small plain building in Marygate, is open generally for about three months in the year. Races formerly took place on the second Tuesday in August, but have lately varied; they are well attended: the course, which is situated to the north-east of the town, is one of the finest in the kingdom, and is two miles in circumference; the grand stand, a handsome brick building, was erected by subscription, in 1777: adjoining the course is a spacious cricket ground. The cavalry barracks, an extensive range of building at the upper extremity of the Castle park, were erected in 1793, on land leased to the crown by the Duke of Newcastle. Near the Castle-gate is a spacious brick building, erected in 1798, as a riding-house, by the Nottingham yeomanry cavalry, which is occasionally used as a circus, and for other public amusements.

The staple manufactures are cotton and silk stockings, bobbin-net and lace, which afford employment to nearly forty thousand persons in the town and environs; and so much has the trade of the town increased, that the manufacturers have agents, or factors, in most parts of the world with which commercial intercourse is carried on. For its present prosperity Nottingham is greatly indebted to science for the improvements lately made in the machinery employed in these branches of national industry, which have given to the manufactures of the town a decided superiority. The machines for making the bobbin-net and lace are exceedingly expensive, and being therefore beyond the purchase of the poor, are let out to them at a weekly rent by the proprietors, who invest large capitals in this species of property, which has lately so much decreased in value, that a machine which, about four years since, would have cost from £1000 to £1200, may now be purchased for about £200. The improved lace machines have been latterly worked by steam, but the recent depression of the lace trade has compelled the manufacturers to limit the hours of employment, and, in some instances, to suspend their operation for a time: the machines for stockings and lace are principally made in the town, and afford employment to a considerable number of persons, who, till the depression in the lace trade, were receiving very high wages. There are several mills for spinning and twisting silk, and for spinning cotton and woollen yarn. In addition to the staple branches of manufacture, pin-making, wire-drawing, and the manufacture of brass fenders, are carried on to a considerable extent; there are also white lead-works, an iron-foundry, and several breweries; the trade in malt is very extensive; and the ale brewed here is in high repute. The town derives great facility of trade from its situation on the river Trent, which is navigable to the Humber; from the Grantham canal, affording communication with Lincolnshire and part of Leicestershire; and from the Nottingham, Cromford, and Erwash canals, with those of Staffordshire, Leicestershire, and Derbyshire, and opening a communication with the extensive mines of coal, lead, and iron, in those counties, and affording a medium of intercourse with the metropolis and the principal manufacturing towns. The market days are Wednesday and Saturday; the latter, which is principally for corn and cattle, is the most considerable in the midland district: the fairs are on the Friday after January 13th, for cattle; March 7th and 8th, for cheese, cloth, and cattle; Thursday before Easter, for horses; October 2nd, called Goose fair, which is very considerable for geese, cheese, cloth, and cattle, and continues nine days. The market-place, including an area of more than five acres and a half, is one of the most extensive and commodious in the kingdom: it is surrounded with lofty buildings, the first stories of which, projecting over the pavement, form a piazza. At the east end is the New Exchange, a handsome building of brick, erected by the corporation in the early part of the last century, and in 1814 repaired and faced with Roman cement; the ground-floor has been converted into shops, behind which are the shambles; the upper stories contain a suite of noble rooms for the transaction of public business; of these the principal is seventy-five feet long, thirty feet wide, and thirty feet high, with an arched ceiling; two other rooms communicate with the principal hall by folding doors, forming a suite one hundred and twenty-three feet in length.

The town, with the exception of the castle and the county gaol, was separated from the county of Nottingham, and constituted a distinct county, under the designation of "the Town and County of the Town of Nottingham," in the 27th of Henry VI., by which title it is recognised in an act of the 3rd of George I. The inhabitants have been incorporated by various charters from time immemorial; under the last of which, granted by Henry VI., the government is vested in a mayor, recorder, deputy recorder, two sheriffs, six aldermen, eighteen senior and six junior common council-men, assisted by a town clerk, two chamberlains, two coroners, two bridge-masters, and subordinate officers. The mayor is elected from among the aldermen by the corporation at large, by whom also vacancies in that body are filled up: the common council-men are chosen by the burgesses at large; the senior members from those who have filled the office of chamberlain, after which they are chosen sheriffs, and the junior members from the burgesses generally. The mayor and aldermen are justices of the peace, with whom the county magistrates have concurrent jurisdiction, by an act passed in the 43rd of George III., called the Nottingham election and police bill, in consequence of the tumultuous proceedings which took place at the election in 1802. The freedom of the borough is inherited by the eldest sons of freemen, born in the town, and by the younger sons after the expiration of their indentures of apprenticeship in any place; by others it is obtained by servitude to a resident freeman, by gift from the corporation, or by purchase: among the privileges of the freemen is the right of depasturing three head of cattle, or forty-five sheep, in the common fields and meadows, which comprise nearly sixteen hundred acres. The corporation hold courts of quarter session for the borough for the trial of all but capital offenders; a court of record, under the mayor and sheriffs, every alternate Wednesday, for the recovery of debts to any amount, the power of which extends to the recovery of freehold property by ejectment; the sheriffs hold their monthly county court for the recovery of debts under 40s., and courts leet and baron are held twice in the year. The town hall, rebuilt in the reign of George I., is a spacious and commodious edifice, two stories in height, containing on the ground-floor the town prison or common gaol, comprising cells and rooms for the classification of prisoners, and on the first story the court-room for the sessions, appropriately fitted up, and other apartments. The town bridewell, or house of correction, is an extensive edifice, well adapted to the classification and employment of the prisoners, to whom one-half of their earnings is given on their discharge. The borough has returned two members to parliament from the reign of Edward I.: the right of election is vested in the freemen generally, and in freeholders to the amount of 40s. per annum; the number of whom is about five thousand; the sheriffs are the returning officers. This being the county town, the election of knights of the shire, and the assizes and quarter sessions for the county are held in it. The county hall, rebuilt in 1770, is a handsome edifice with a stone front, containing two well-arranged courts for the Crown and Nisi Prius bar, with the requisite rooms for the grand jury, and offices for transacting the business of the county: behind it is the common gaol for the county, comprising one ward for debtors, one for prisoners convicted of misdemeanor, three for felons, and five airing-yards, for the classification of prisoners.

The town comprises the parishes of St. Mary, St. Nicholas, and St. Peter, in the archdeaconry of Nottingham, and diocese of York, and the liberty of St. James, which is extra-parochial. The living of St. Mary's is a vicarage, rated in the king's books at £10. 5., and in the patronage of Earl Manvers: the church is a spacious and elegant cruciform structure, in the later style of English architecture, with a beautiful tower rising from the centre to the height of two stages, and crowned with battlements and pinnacles: the west front, which has been modernized, presents a striking contrast to the rest of the building, which is of beautiful design and of elaborate execution; the south porch is highly enriched with panels and fan tracery, depending from the roof, which is finely groined; the interior is lighted by ranges of noble windows of exquisite tracery, and under the end windows of the north and south transepts are two monuments of elegant design. It has received an addition of three hundred free sittings, in consequence of a grant of £500 from the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels. The archbishop holds his triennial, and the archdeacon, his annual, visitation in this church. The living of St. Nicholas' is a discharged rectory, rated in the king's books at £2. 16. 8., endowed with £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Crown: the church was rebuilt in 1678, the former structure having been taken down during the parliamentary war: it is a neat edifice of brick, with quoins and cornices of stone, and was enlarged in 1756 and in 1783, by subscription, and the churchyard enclosed with neat iron palisades in 1824. The living of St. Peter's is a discharged rectory, rated in the king's books at £8. 7. 6., endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Crown: the church is a spacious edifice, in the later style of English architecture, of which it retains some few good portions, though the greater part of it has been modernized; it has a lofty spire, and has lately received three hundred and eighty additional sittings, of which two hundred and sixty-four are free, at the expense of the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels, who granted £800 for that purpose: the spiritual courts are held in this church. St. James' church, or chapel, was erected in 1808, on Standard Hill, which is extra-parochial, and within the county of Nottingham: it is a neat edifice in the later style of English architecture, with a low square embattled tower: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the subscribers, for a certain number of years, with reversion to the Crown. St. Paul's, a chapel of ease to the vicarage of St. Mary's, was erected in 1822: it is a handsome edifice in the Grecian style of architecture, with a portico of the Doric order. There are four places of worship each for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists, one each for the Society of Friends, Huntingdonians, Sabellians, Sandemanians, and Unitarians, a synagogue, and a Roman Catholic chapel, which last is a handsome edifice in the Grecian style of architecture.

The free grammar school was founded, in 1513, by Agnes Mellors, but had nearly fallen into disuse prior to 1807, when the corporation made some regulations for its better government; the property with which it is endowed produces about £500 per annum: there are nearly one hundred scholars instructed in the classics gratuitously, and in writing and arithmetic, on payment of ten shillings per annum. The Blue-coat school, for the clothing and instruction of children, is supported by an income arising from property in land, and by subscription; there are sixty boys and twenty girls in this establishment: the school-house, a neat building, was erected on land given for that purpose by Mr. William Thorpe. A National school, established about twenty years since, is supported by subscription; and in 1815 a Lancasterian school was opened, which is supported by subscription, chiefly among the dissenting congregations, who maintain a similar institution for girls: there are Sunday schools in connexion with the established church and the dissenting congregations, in which more than three thousand children are instructed: an infant school has also been established.

Plumtree hospital was founded, in 1392, by John de Plumtree, who endowed it for two chaplains, of whom one was master, and thirteen aged widows; in 1751, a descendant of the founder built four new tenements, to which two more were added by his son, who also repaired the old buildings: in 1823, John Plumtree, Esq., the late trustee, obtained an act of parliament to dispose of part of the trust property, and rebuilt the hospital. Exclusively of the widows who reside in the hospital, and receive each a weekly allowance of six shillings, a ton of coal, and a gown annually, there are thirty out-pensioners, who receive each £10 per annum: the premises are neatly built of brick, coated with cement, and in the ancient style of English architecture. Collins' hospital was founded, in 1704, by Mr. Abel Collin, who bequeathed an estate for its erection and endowment: there are in this institution twenty-four aged widowers and widows, who have each a tenement consisting of three rooms, a weekly allowance of four shillings, and two tons and a half of coal annually. Willoughby's hospital, in Fishergate, founded in 1525, and comprising nineteen tenements, has at present but a very trifling endowment, which is expected to be considerably augmented on the expiration of the present leases in 1831. Handley's hospital, in Stoney-street, comprising twelve ancient tenements for aged persons, who receive at present a quarterly sum of sixteen shillings and eightpence, is endowed with some estates, of which the produce is likely to be augmented. Bilby's almshouses, in Coal Pit lane, founded in 1709, comprise eight tenements for aged persons, who have each a sixpenny loaf weekly, and two tons of coal yearly, with a gratuity at Christmas. Labray's hospital was founded, in 1700, for six poor frame-work knitters, who have a weekly allowance of four shillings each. The Lambley hospital, a neat building, consisting of a centre and two wings, with a grass-plot in the front, comprises twenty-two tenements for decayed burgesses, or their widows, who are nominated by the corporation. Wartnaby's hospital was founded, in 1665, for six aged persons, who have a weekly allowance of one shilling, and an annual supply of clothes and coal. Warser-gate hospital, Wooley's almshouses, and St. Nicholas' White rents, comprise each six tenements: there are also the Charitable Society, patronised by the Society of Friends, and several similar establishments, together with numerous charitable bequests for apprenticing poor children, and for distribution among the infirm and indigent. The general hospital, a spacious and commodious building, consisting of a centre and two projecting wings, was erected in 1781, on the highest part of Standard Hill, on a site given by the corporation and the Duke of Newcastle: it is supported by funds arising from liberal donations, and by annual subscription, and is under the direction of a president and committee, being open to invalids from any part of the country: near it is a house of recovery from fever, under the same management. The lunatic asylum, a large and well-arranged building, erected in 1812, at an expense of nearly £20,000, in an airy situation in the parish of Sneinton, about a quarter of a mile to the north-east of the town, is under the inspection of the town and county magistrates: it is adapted to the reception of three classes of patients; namely, such as are in circumstances to pay a full remuneration, the poor who are admitted on very moderate terms, and paupers who are paid for by the county: it comprises distinct wards and separate airing-grounds for the classification of patients, according to their rank and degree of malady, and is partly supported by donations and subscription.

Some fragments of the town walls are visible on the side of the hill above Narrow Marsh; and of the ancient castle, the gateway, repaired some years since, and some portions of the outworks, are still remaining: a subterraneous passage, called Mortimer's Hole, is still an object of interest; and there are numerous caverns and galleries excavated in the rock, which are of great antiquity, and attract much notice. The mansion erected by the Duke of Newcastle in the seventeenth century, on the castle hill, a noble edifice in the Grecian style of architecture, with a handsome façade of the Corinthian order, in front of which is an equestrian statue of the founder, has been for many years divided into separate dwellings. Thurland Hall, formerly called Clare Hall, an ancient brick mansion faced with stone, of which the great room is still used as a dining-room on public occasions, was the temporary residence of James I., during his frequent visits to Nottingham. In the northern part of the town was an ancient hospital, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, founded about the reign of John, for a master, warden, two chaplains, and several sick persons, the revenue of which, at the dissolution, was £5. 6. 8. In the reign of Henry III., there was a cell for two monks in the chapel of St. Mary, in the rock under the castle, in which latter there were also a house of brethren of the Holy Sepulchre, and a college of Secular priests. To the west of the town was a convent of Grey friars, founded by Henry III., in 1250; and in the parish of St. Nicholas was a convent of Carmelite friars, founded in 1276, by Reginald, Lord Grey de Wilton, and Sir John Shirley, Knt. At Babington colliery, near Nottingham, a saline chalybeate spring has been recently discovered, the properties of which, according to an analysis by a medical gentleman in the town, are such as to render it one of the most valuable mineral springs in this country. Near the Forest of Sherwood, on the spot formerly used for the execution of criminals, a great quantity of human bones was lately discovered. Among the eminent natives of this town were, the Rev. Dr. Andrew Kippis, a celebrated biographer, who was born in 1725; the Rev. Gilbert Wakefield, distinguished for his acquaintance with classical literature, born in 1756; and the poet, Henry Kirke White, who was born in 1785, and died whilst pursuing his studies at Cambridge, in 1806. Nottingham gives the title of earl to the family of Finch-Hatton.

NOTTINGHAMSHIRE, an inland county, bounded on the north by Yorkshire, on the east by Lincolnshire, on the south by Leicestershire, and on the west by Derbyshire. It extends from 52° 51' to 53° 34' (N. Lat.), and from 44' to 1° 23' (W. Lon.); including an area of eight hundred and thirty-seven square miles, or five hundred and thirty-five thousand six hundred and eighty statute acres. The population, in 1821, was 186,873. This county, having formed part of the territory of the Coritani, was included in the Roman district called Flavia Cæsariensis. On the establishment of the Anglo-Saxon kingdom of Mercia, which took place about the year 560, the greater part of Nottinghamshire, viz., that on the north-western bank of the river Trent, became part of the country of the North Mercians, the portion on the other side of that river being in South Mercia. The first memorable event in the history of the octarchy, recorded as having occurred within its limits, is the defeat of Ethelfrith, King of Northumbria, by Redwald, King of East Anglia, who had espoused the cause of Edwin of Northumbria, expelled by Ethelfrith; the battle, in which the latter perished, having been fought on the eastern bank of the river Idel, or Idle. When Egfrid of Northumbria invaded Mercia in 679, the Mercians met him on the banks of the Trent, and in the first conflict his brother Ælfuin was slain; but the further effusion of blood was prevented by the mediation of Theodore, Archbishop of York. The Danes first visited this county in 868, when they crossed the Humber into Mercia, and possessed themselves of Nottingham, where they wintered, and where they were besieged by Burrhed, King of Mercia, and Ethelred, King of Wessex, with the whole force of their dominions, when a treaty was entered into, by virtue of which they evacuated Mercia, and retired with their plunder to York. The entire subjection of this shire to the Danish power was involved in the final overthrow of the Anglo-Saxon sovereignty of Mercia, which took place in 874. When Alfred had delivered the Mercian territory from its subjection to the Danes, he did not avowedly incorporate it with Wessex, but constituted Ethelred its military commander, to whom he afterwards gave his daughter Ethelfleda in marriage. In the early part of the following century, Nottinghamshire again fell under the Danish dominion, and so continued until 941, when it was again rescued by Edward the Elder. At the period of the Norman Conquest, a great portion of the territorial property of the county was given by the Conqueror to his illegitimate son, William Peverel, whose principal fortified residence was the castle of Nottingham. In almost all the English civil wars of the middle ages, the central situation of the county, and the circumstance of its being intersected by the large river Trent, which in those ages was an important barrier, defended by the two strong fortresses of Nottingham and Newark, made it the scene of numerous important military movements, and consequently of many ravages, which are detailed in the account of the places in which they respectively occurred. In 1216, King John died at Newark, after his disastrous march across the Washes of Lincolnshire; and in the neighbourhood of the same town, in 1487, Lambert Simnel, the pretended Earl of Warwick, assisted by John de la Pole, Earl of Lincoln, and Fitzgerald, Earl of Kildare, with a body of Irish, and two thousand Germans, was defeated and taken prisoner, with the loss of four thousand men, including the Earls of Lincoln and Kildare, and Lord Lovel.

In the course of the parliamentary war, this county was the scene of several of the most remarkable transactions. It was at Nottingham that the king first solemnly erected his standard, in August 1642. In 1643, Newark was successfully defended against the parliamentarians under Lord Willoughby of Parham, and Sir John Meldrum, whose forces, on the arrival of the troops under Prince Rupert, sent to raise the siege, were totally defeated, with the loss of their ordnance and ammunition. The castle of Nottingham being held for the parliament, several skirmishes occurred during the war between the garrison and detachments from the royalist garrison at Newark. In this county also, at Southwell, on the 6th of May, 1646, Charles I. surrendered himself to the commissioners from the Scottish army then lying before Newark, the garrison of which, under Lord Bellasis, surrendered to the Scots, on the 19th of the same month, by the king's special command. In the year 1812, the manufacturing district, of which Nottingham is the centre, was much agitated by the disturbances among the framework knitters, owing to the very low rate of wages; and by the operations of the Luddites, as they were called, being parties of the working manufacturers, who, with masks on their faces and otherwise disguised, broke into many houses and workshops in the night, and destroyed several stocking-frames; and in June 1817, the south-western part of the county was thrown into some alarm, by the insurrection of a number of misguided men in the vicinity of South Winfield, in Derbyshire, on the Nottinghamshire border, who attempted to march upon Nottingham, but were dispersed by a party of the military within a few miles of that town, when many of them were taken and committed to the prisons of Nottingham and Derby; several of whom being tried by special commission at Derby, in the following October, for high treason, three of those who were convicted were executed on the 7th of November.

Nottinghamshire is included in the diocese and province of York, and forms an archdeaconry, comprising the deaneries of Bingham, Newark, Nottingham, and Retford, which contain two hundred and five parishes, of which seventy-five are rectories, eighty-nine vicarages, and the remainder perpetual curacies. Two synods of the clergy of this county are held annually at Southwell. For purposes of civil government it is divided into six wapentakes, or hundreds, viz., Bassetlaw, which is subdivided into North Clay, South Clay, and Hatfield divisions; Bingham (North and South), Broxtow (North and South), Newark (North and South), Rushcliffe (North and South), and Thurgarton (North and South), and the liberty of Southwell and Scrooby. It contains the borough and market towns of Nottingham, Newark, and East Retford; and the market towns of Bingham, Mansfield, Ollerton, Southwell, Tuxford, and Worksop. Two knights are returned to parliament for the shire, two representatives for each of the boroughs of Nottingham and Newark, and two by the burgesses of East Retford, conjointly with the freeholders of the hundred of Bassetlaw: the county members are elected at Nottingham. This county is included in the midland circuit; the assizes are held at Nottingham; the quarter sessions at Nottingham, on January 11th, April 19th, July 12th, and October 18th; at Newark, on January 15th, April 23d, July 16th, and October 22d; and at East Retford, on January 18th, April 26th, July 19th, and October 25th.

VOL. III.

The county gaol is at Nottingham, and the county house of correction, or bridewell, at Southwell. Nottinghamshire was under the same shrievalty with Derbyshire, until the 10th year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth. There are fifty-eight acting magistrates. The rates raised in the county for the year ending March 25th, 1827, amounted to £99,085.18., the expenditure to £99,685.9., of which £71,935.13. was applied to the relief of the poor.

The shape of this county is elliptical. Its surface is for the most part uneven, but none of the hills are of great elevation: those of the sandy district, which anciently formed a considerable part of the celebrated Forest of Sherwood, are chiefly long ridges of gentle acclivity, running from west to east, and forming narrow valleys, through the principal of which run fine streams of water. The tract formed by these ridges would, on the whole, be dreary and monotonous, as the view from one generally extends only to the summit of the next, were it not that it is adorned by numerous noblemen's and gentlemen's seats, surrounded by very extensive parks and plantations, several of them having magnificent artificial sheets of water: the view from its southern extremity at Nottingham, over the vale of the Trent and into Leicestershire, is rich and extensive. The noble river Trent is bordered, in the whole of its course through Nottinghamshire, by a fine rich tract of level land, varying in breadth from about a mile and a half to upwards of five miles, many parts of which are bounded by high woody cliffs; below Newark, however, its borders are flatter: it is for the most part enclosed, and the greater proportion, particularly in the immediate vicinity of the river, is rich grass land. The part of the county lying south of the Trent, and forming the three hundreds of Bingham, Rushcliffe, and Newark, comprises, besides the lower and more extensive part of the vale of Belvoir, and the fertile levels in the vicinity of the Soar, at the south-western extremity of the county, the range of high bleak country, called the Nottinghamshire Wolds, lying to the south and south-east of Bunny, and including the townships of Clipston, Normanton on the Wolds, Broughton-Sulney, Plumtree, Stanton on the Wolds, Widmerpool, Willoughby on the Wolds, and Wysall, most of which are enclosed. The view from Beacon Hill, in the hundred and near the town of Newark, is remarkably extensive. The hundred of Bassetlaw comprises the whole northern part of the county, from the vicinity of Mansfield, and includes the towns of Ollerton and Tuxford: from Gringley on the Hill, near its north-eastern extremity, are obtained some remarkably fine and extensive views, over the broad vale of the Trent, the Isle of Axholme, and a great extent of the counties of Nottingham, Lincoln, and York: the other two hundreds occupy the space between the southern border of the last-mentioned and the river Trent, that of Broxtow on the west, and Thurgarton on the east: they include a considerable part of those tracts of the forest which still remain unenclosed, and which are of comparatively small extent.

The soils may be divided into the three classes of sand or gravel, clay, and limestone and coal land. The forest district, the soil of which is for the most part a deep light sand, extends northward, from Nottingham to the northern boundary of the county at Tickhill, Bawtry, Finningley, and West Stockwith, in length about thirty miles, and in breadth from seven to ten, including the towns of Mansfield, Ollerton, Worksop, Retford, and Blyth. The tract of level country on the eastern bank of the Soar, and that on the borders of the Trent, from its entrance into the county to the vicinity of Sutton, where the clay soil reaches down to the river on the western side, have in general a mellow vegetable mould, resting on sand or gravel, which in some places rise to the surface: nearly similar is also the ground lying between the wolds and the level of the Soar, on an elevation between the two, and contained in the townships of East and West Leake, Cortlingstock, and Rempstone; as well as the strip of higher land on the borders of the Trent vale, comprising the townships of East Bridgford, Kneeton, Flintham, and Stoke, both of which have a good mellow mixed soil of easy tillage. At the north-eastern extremity of the Trent vale district of light land just described, is a tongue of land on the eastern bank of the Trent, projecting into Lincolnshire, of a sandy soil, which is in general very poor. The clay lands north of the Trent include the North and South clay division of the hundred of Bassetlaw, and almost the whole of the hundred of Thurgarton: they are in general not of the most tenacious quality, being rendered more friable by the intermixture of a portion of sand, particularly the red clay, of which there is a great extent in the country round Tuxford, and in the hundred of Thurgarton, and the black clay soil, commonly called a "woodland soil." The whole of the vale of Belvoir, with the exception of those parts included in the districts of the lighter soils before described, consists of clay, or very strong loam; the soil of the wolds is a cold clay. The limestone and coal district is a narrow tract lying on the western side of the county, to the west of a line drawn from the little river at Shireoaks, in the north, nearly south by west to the river Lene near Wollaton and Radford, no limestone being found east of the Lene; the limestone, running from Shireoaks, begins to abut upon the coal near Teversall, to the west of Mansfield, and afterwards runs between it and the sand; the line of coal, which in this county is scarcely more than a mile broad, commencing a little to the north of Teversall, runs nearly south by west to Brookhill, then south to Eastwood, and thence, in nearly a south-easterly direction to Bilborough, Wollaton, and the river Lene: the soil upon the limestone is of a hungry quality; that upon the coal a cold blue or yellow clay.

Nearly all the enclosed part of the forest district which is not occupied by woods, most of the coal and lime district, and a considerable portion of the other parts of the county, are under tillage. It has been besides an immemorial custom for the inhabitants of townships to take up "breaks," or temporary enclosures, and keep them in tillage for five or six years: for this the permission of the lord of the manor is necessary, and two verderers of the forest must inspect, who report to the lord chief justice in Eyre that it is not to the prejudice of the king or subject; they are also to see that the fences are not such as to exclude the deer: the increased number of enclosures, and the consequent decrease in the waste lands, have rendered this custom almost obsolete. The crops usually cultivated are, wheat, rye, barley, oats, beans, and peas. The produce of wheat varies from two to four quarters per acre. Rye is chiefly grown in the Trent vale, in the vicinity of Markham, &c., and on the forest; the produce is generally from three to four quarters per acre. Barley is very extensively cultivated, the produce varying from three to six and sometimes seven quarters per acre. Oats of various kinds are grown: the produce is generally from four to seven quarters per acre, but sometimes as much as ten quarters: the Trent vale produces remarkably fine oats: there is also cultivated an inferior species of oats, almost peculiar to this county, called skegs, which will grow on the forest land, and although seldom brought to market, they are much esteemed by those who grow them, and are frequently given as fodder in the straw. The produce of beans varies from three to five quarters per acre; that of peas, from four to six quarters: in the clay district north of the Trent, crops of peas and beans mixed are not unfrequent. Buck-wheat is cultivated in small quantities. Turnips are most cultivated on the sandy and lighter soils; and on the limestone tract the Swedish turnip is also frequently grown: rape is sometimes sown instead of turnips in the clayey districts, as food for sheep and oxen; and when reserved for seed, it is generally found to produce four or five quarters per acre. Winter tares are common in several parts, as green food for horses and cattle. Potatoes in small quantities are grown in every part of the county: the common artificial grasses, red and white clover, trefoil, ray-grass, and rib-grass, are cultivated, as is also lucerne: burnet grows naturally and plentifully in the Trent meadows. Hops form a considerable article in the produce of the clay districts north of the Trent, more particularly in the part about Retford, and, in a minor degree, in the vicinity of Southwell: they are generally known by the name of North Clay hops, and are much stronger than the Kentish, but those who are accustomed to the latter object to their flavour as rank; they are also cultivated to a small extent at Rufford, Ollerton, and Elksley, situated on the sand; the quantity grown fluctuates, some grounds being laid down and others taken up every year: the extent of land occupied in this manner is upwards of one thousand acres. The crops in the best seasons are small compared with those of the Kentish plantations, and do not in the very best years average eight hundred-weight per acre. Woad is cultivated at the northern extremity of the county, on the light soils in the vicinity of Scrooby, Ranskill, and Torworth, but the quantity varies greatly, according to the demand; it is sown with barley and clover, and is pulled up from among the clover the next year, when the latter is coming into blossom, and then tied in bundles and dried: about six hundred-weight per acre is an average crop.

On the banks of the Trent and the Soar is much excellent grass land, which is employed more for feeding than for the dairy, except along the course of the Soar, and in the vale of the Trent above Nottingham, where there are large dairies, the chief produce of which is cheese. The large island formed by the two branches of the Trent near Newark is remarkably fine feeding land. In the clay district north of the Trent, most of the farmers keep cows for the dairy; but it is not their principal object, except in the vicinity of Fled-borough; and thence also along the Trent, as far as Gainsborough, a good many young cattle are reared, and in some parts, particularly in the North Clay, many cattle are fed. In the forest district very little land remains permanently in grass, except the bottoms near brooks and rivers, as meadow. A considerable quantity of meadow land has been improved by irrigation in various parts of the county, the most considerable tract being in the valley of the Maun, between Mansfield and Edwinstow, the property of the Duke of Portland. Lime to a greater or less extent is used as a manure in every part of Nottinghamshire, and in various quarters of it bone-dust, malt-combs, and soot are commonly used for the same purpose. The cattle on the borders of the Soar are of the long-horned breed; almost all the cow-calves are reared, and at three years old are taken into the dairy, and the old cows fed off. The cattle reared in the clay district north of the Trent are of a poor coarse kind, commonly called "woodland beasts:" those reared in the vale of Belvoir are a mixture between the long-horned and the short-horned breed. The lime and coal district has a mixture of long-horned and short-horned woodland cattle: few are reared in either the forest district, or in the Trent vale; those fed in the latter tract are generally of the short-horned, Lincolnshire, and the Holderness breeds.

The old forest sheep are a small polled breed (though some few have horns), with grey faces and legs, and a fleece of fine wool, the average weight of which is nearly two pounds; when fat they weigh from seven to nine pounds per quarter: this breed has of late years been much improved by crossing with the Leicestershire sheep, and the new sort thus produced are a round compact kind, carrying a fleece of about four pounds weight, and weighing generally from seventeen to twenty-two pounds per quarter. In the Trent vale, and the vale of Belvoir, the breed has also been much improved by the introduction of Leicester sheep, and they are now of a good size, and carry a fleece upwards of seven pounds' weight. In the clay district north of the Trent they are of a mixed kind, generally between the forest and the Lincolnshire pasture sheep, with an intermixture of the New Leicester breed. In the lime and coal district also the Leicester sheep now prevail: of late years many of the South Down breed have been introduced. The breed of hogs for bacon is the old lop-eared; that for pork the Chinese, or swing-tailed; a mixture with the old sort is very prevalent. In the Trent vale some horses are bred, chiefly tolerably good, middle-sized, black cart-horses; in the clay district north of the Trent, some of the same kind also are reared, though of a rather inferior sort; in the lime and coal district the breed of black horses is much attended to, and many of them are sold to the southern dealers, who come down to purchase them. The rabbit warrens were formerly very numerous and extensive in the forest district, and they are still very considerable: in the clay district north of the Trent more pigeons are kept than in any other district of equal size in the kingdom. In several parts of the county are considerable market-gardens and nursery-grounds, particularly in the vicinity of Newark; and in the clay district are many orchards of apples and pears, among the most considerable of which are those about the villages of Halam and Edingly, and in the vicinity of Southwell; a very ready sale for this fruit is found at Mansfield market, whence it is forwarded for the supply of the Peak of Derbyshire: some of it is also sent to Sheffield. Little waste land is now left in the county, by far the greater part of the forest being enclosed: the parts which remain are chiefly about the centre of the forest district, in the space between the towns of Mansfield, Southwell, and Ollerton, and consists in great part of rabbit warrens. On the tongue of sandy land east of the Trent, between Newark and Gainsborough, before mentioned, are some low, flat, barren commons, almost always under water in the winter. The Nottinghamshire Wolds, properly so called, are wastes in the open parishes, which afford a stinted pasture for young cattle and horses.

The ancient royal Forest of Sherwood extends from Nottingham to the vicinity of Worksop, in length about twenty-five miles, and varies in breadth from seven to upwards of nine miles. Several smaller tracts of land, particularly in the northern part of the county, as far as Rossington bridge, have been usually called forest; but, from the survey made in the year 1609, they appear either not to have belonged to the forest, or to have been diafforested before that period. In Sherwood Forest are included several large parks, which have been taken in at different times, as those of Welbeck, Clumber, Thoresby, Beskwood, Newstead, Clipstone, and several villages, or lands, belonging to them. The whole soil of the forest is understood to have been granted from the crown to different lords of manors, reserving only what is called in forest language the "vert and venison," or trees and deer: the latter, which were all of the red kind, though formerly very numerous, are now, in consequence of the advance of cultivation over their sylvan haunts, entirely extirpated. The forest is the only one that remains under the superintendence of the lord chief justice in Eyre, north of the Trent, or which now belongs to the crown in that portion of England. The officers are, the lord-warden, at present the Duke of Newcastle, who holds his office by letters patent from the crown during pleasure; the bow-bearer and ranger, who is appointed by the lord warden, and holds his office also during pleasure; four verderers, elected by the freeholders of the county for life, who have each a tree out of the king's hays of Birkland and Bilhagh, and a fee of £2. 2. on attending the enclosure of a break; a steward; nine keepers, appointed by the verderers during pleasure, who have so many different walks, and receive a salary of £1 per annum from the Duke of Newcastle, paid out of a fee-farm rent from Nottingham castle; and two sworn woodwards for Sutton and Carlton. Thorneywood Chase comprises a great part of the southern division of the forest lying on the eastern side: the Earl of Chesterfield is hereditary keeper of it, by grant of the 42nd of Queen Elizabeth to J. Stanhope, Esq.

The principal remains of the ancient woods are the hays of Birkland and Bilhagh, situated to the north of Ollerton and Edwinstow, which form an open wood of large old oaks, most of them in decay, and stag-headed, as it is called; that is, the tops have decayed, and the highest branches now forming the top, being sapless, have somewhat the appearance of a stag's horns: this wood is about three miles in length, and one and a half in breadth, occupying an extent of about one thousand four hundred acres, and is without underwood, except some birch in one part, which has given name to one of its divisions. From a survey made in the year 1790, it appears that there were then, in both, ten thousand one hundred and seventeen trees, valued at £17,147. 15. 4.: during the late war with France, however, nearly all the valuable timber was felled for the use of the royal navy: a part of this tract has been taken by grant into Thoresby park. Harlow wood, Thieves' wood, and the scattered remains of Mansfield woods, are of small extent, containing timber of an inferior size: in Clumber park are also some remains of ancient woods. The effects of a disposition for planting which has prevailed among the noblemen and gentlemen of this county since the middle of the last century, are amazing, the Duke of Newcastle, in Clumber park alone, having one thousand eight hundred and forty-eight acres of plantation. Extensive tracts of plantations, consisting chiefly of firs of various kinds, occupy many miles of country to the south and south-east of Mansfield; and there is an immense extent of the same kind of woods in a similar direction from Worksop, chiefly on the large estates of the Duke of Norfolk, the Duke of Portland, the Duke of Newcastle, and Earl Manvers. There are besides numerous large plantations still further north in the county, and some close upon its western border. In the clay districts, north of the Trent, are considerable tracts of wood, which are chiefly sprung, their principal value, in common with that of all other spring woods in the county, arising from the ash hop-poles and the stakes and bindings, &c. for the farmers' use, which they produce: in the limestone and coal district are also considerable woods, and in the sandy tongue of land east of the Trent, are extensive plantations: but in the rest of the county they are comparatively few, and of small extent. Besides the various kinds of fir, including Weymouth pine, the woods contain much fine oak, ash, beech, chesnut, and elm, besides inferior kinds of timber: numerous plantations of willow, sallow, and owler, are made in the low bottoms. The fuel almost universally used is coal, much of which is raised in the lime and coal district, and a great deal brought from Derbyshire, by the Erwash, Cromford, and Chesterfield canals.

The chief minerals are coal, gypsum, and stone of various kinds. Coal is got in the line before described, on the western border of the county, whence it is conveyed by the Erwash and Nottingham canals, or distributed over the country by land-carriage. Gypsum of an excellent quality is dug on Beacon Hill, near Newark, and is much used for plastering floors: a considerable quantity is also sent in lumps to the colourmen of London; and some of the white kind, ground and packed in hogsheads, is likewise sent to the metropolis. At Red Hill, at the junction of the Trent and the Soar, is a quarry of the same mineral: it is also found at Great Markham, the Wheatleys, and many other places in the red clay district. Lime is burned at various places in the limestone tract, as also on Beacon Hill, near Newark, from a blue stone. At Mansfield a very good yellowish freestone is quarried, for the purpose of building, paving, &c., and a courser red kind for cisterns and troughs.

At Maplebeck is a blueish stone used for building, which, with continued exposure to the air, bleaches to nearly a clear white. At Beacon Hill, near Newark, is obtained a blue stone for hearths, approaching to a marble in texture, and which also burns to lime. At Linby, a few miles to the south-west of Mansfield, a coarse paving stone is raised, much used at Nottingham.

The manufacture of stockings from cotton and silk is that most anciently established in the county, and is carried on to a great extent, affording employment to a large number of persons at Nottingham, and the villages for some miles round it, as also in Mansfield and its neighbourhood. The very high state of improvement to which the machinery for manufacturing British lace was here brought, about twelve years ago, and the great demand for the superior article thus produced, have rendered the manufacture of "bobbin net," and the embroidering of machine lace, a source of employment to a great portion of the inhabitants of the same district, the dense population of which it has also materially contributed to collect. The cotton-mills and silk-mills for the supply of these manufactures are very numerous. The bleaching trade in the vicinity of Nottingham is very extensive; there are several large starch-mills and some paper-mills in different parts of the county. The malting business is carried on to a great extent, particularly at Nottingham, Newark, Mansfield, Worksop, and Retford: a great deal of malt is sent up the Trent and the canals into Derbyshire, Cheshire, and Lancashire. At Newark are large breweries, which rival those of Burton in their trade to the Baltic and other quarters: Nottingham also has extensive breweries. The exports are chiefly lace and stockings, much of which is sent to London by the stage coaches and light vans, coal, oak timber and bark, and malt and hops; the principal imports are coal, into the northern part of the county, from Derbyshire, foreign timber, and iron.

The principal river, the Trent, ranks the first in England after the Thames and the Severn; after forming, for about two miles, the boundary between Derbyshire and this county, it enters it near Thrumpton, and runs in a north-easterly direction, by the Trent bridge, south of Nottingham, to the vicinity of Newark, where it forms a large island; a small branch of it passing by that town, while the main stream flows two miles to the northward of it, and then almost immediately assumes a direction nearly north, which it continues throughout the rest of its course, beginning, a little above Dunholm ferry, to form the eastern boundary of the county, which it separates from Lincolnshire, and so continuing until just below Stockwith, where it wholly quits Nottinghamshire, and enters Lincolnshire. The tide in this river, which flows for a distance of some miles above Gainsborough, more particularly at spring tides, rushes up with great violence, bearing a breast of water several feet in perpendicular height, provincially called the agar, supposed to be a corrupt pronunciation of the word eager. The Trent is navigable for merchant ships of considerable burden up to Gainsborough, and for barges during the rest of its course in this county: to facilitate this navigation, there is a side-cut of ten miles in length, in order to avoid the numerous shallows which occur in about thirteen miles of its course, between the Trent bridge, at the commencement of the Nottingham canal, and Sawley ferry in Derbyshire, at the commencement of the Trent and Mersey canal: this side-cut, sometimes called the Trent canal, has a rise of twenty-eight feet, and not only crosses and communicates with the Erwash canal near Sawley, but has also a short cut and lock into the Trent at Beeston. The Soar forms the south-western boundary of the county, which it separates from Leicestershire for the distance of between seven and eight miles, above its junction with the Trent near Thrumpton; this river is navigable for the Trent barges. The Erwash forms the boundary between this county and that of Derby, for the distance of ten or twelve miles, down to its junction with the Trent, a little below Thrumpton. No less than five fine streams cross the sandy forest district, from west to east: the junction of two of these, the Maun from Mansfield, and the Meaden, forms the river Idle, which, receiving the other streams at irregular distances, flows northward by Retford and Bawtry, and thence eastward to the Trent at Stockwith, having below Bawtry formed the northern boundary of the county for a few miles. From Bawtry to the Trent it has been rendered navigable, and has gates at its mouth sixteen feet high, for the purpose of preventing the tide from overflowing the low lands which border the latter part of its course: this channel in one part has the name of Bycar Dyke, and about half a mile from Stockwith assumes that of Misterton Sluice. Numerous smaller streams pursue a more direct course from the higher parts of the county to the Trent; the principal being the Lene, which falls into it at Nottingham; the Dover, or Darebeck, which joins it near Caythorpe; the Greet, from Southwell; and the Smite and Devon, united, from the vale of Belvoir, which have their confluence with it at Newark.

The commerce of this county is materially facilitated by its great extent of canal navigation. The Nottingham canal, commencing in the Trent near that town, passes along the southern side of it, and then proceeds in a devious north-westerly course of about fifteen miles to its termination in the Cromford canal, near Langley bridge, and not far from the termination of the Erwash canal, the rise being comparatively small: the Trent canal, before mentioned, forms a junction with this a little to the westward of Nottingham: the Nottingham canal was completed in 1802: the articles brought down it are chiefly coal from the Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire pits, and lime from Crich, in the former county; those conveyed up it are for the most part corn and malt, for the supply of the populous district in the central parts of Derbyshire. A small part of the course of the Erwash canal is within the county of Nottingham. The Grantham canal commences from the Trent near Holme-Pierrepont, and takes a course nearly east towards the head of the vale of Belvoir, where it enters the north-eastern extremity of Leicestershire: it has a branch of upwards of three miles in length to the town of Bingham; in the ascent from the Trent to the Wolds, this canal has a rise of eighty-two feet in a space of only six miles and a half. The proprietors of the Trent river navigation, having been at considerable expense in deepening the river near the entrance of this canal, are entitled to certain toll on all goods passing along that river, from this to the Nottingham canal. The Chesterfield canal enters Nottinghamshire near Shire-Oaks, on the north-western border of the county, and proceeds to Worksop, at a little distance below which it crosses the small river Ryton, by an aqueduct, and continues its course in an irregular easterly direction to Retford: here, having crossed the Idle, it takes a northerly direction to Drakelow, where it passes through a tunnel of two hundred and fifty yards in length, and then runs, in a north-easterly direction, near Gringley on the Hill, across Misson Car to Misterton, and across Walkeringham moor to West Stockwith, terminating in a large basin which communicates with the Trent: the whole line of this canal is about forty miles in length, and from the summit level, at Norwood in Derbyshire, it has a fall to the Trent of three hundred and thirty-five feet. [For an account of the Pinxton railway, see the article on MANSFIELD.]

The great north road from London to Edinburgh enters Nottinghamshire about three miles to the south of Newark, passing through which town it crosses the Trent, and continues by Tuxford and Retford, quitting the county as it enters Bawtry in Yorkshire. The great road from London to Sheffield and Leeds enters it from Leicestershire immediately to the south of Rempstone, and passing through Nottingham and Mansfield, quits it for Derbyshire at Pleaseley, about three miles beyond the latter town. The Leeds mail road enters from Leicestershire between Nether Broughton and Over Broughton, whence it crosses the Nottinghamshire Wolds, and falls into the last-mentioned road at the southern extremity of the Trent bridge, near Nottingham. An excellent turnpike-road branches from the great Leeds road at Mansfield, and passing through Worksop quits the county for Yorkshire at South Carlton, in its way to Doncaster, where it falls into the great north road. A branch of the great north road also diverges from it at Newark, and passing through Ollerton, falls into the last-mentioned road at Worksop.

Nottinghamshire possesses comparatively few monuments of remote antiquity: the most remarkable British remains are the caves in the sand-rock near Nottingham. At Barton, four miles to the south-west of Nottingham, is Brent's Hill, considered by Aubrey to have been a fortified place of the Britons; and at Oxtun are three large tumuli, supposed by Major Rooke to be of equal antiquity: brass celts have also been found, particularly between Hexgrove and the little stream called Rainworth-water. Of Roman antiquities, the camp on Holly-hill, near Arnold, is considered by Dr. Gale to have been the important Roman station Causennis; and about two miles from Mansfield are still the remains of a Roman villa, while in various other parts of the county have been found spears, fibulæ, and brass keys, of Roman workmanship. The principal remains of Roman roads are those of the Fosse-way, which, coming from Leicestershire, enters this county near Willoughby on the Wolds, proceeds to Newark, and crossing the line of the Ermin-street, enters Lincolnshire. This may be traced for many miles across the Wolds, being literally a fosse, dug to a great depth, so as to form a spacious covered way. Another ancient road, formerly called "the Street," commences at Newark and proceeds through part of Southwell to Mansfield: it is still discernible between the two former towns. The most various and interesting examples of ancient ecclesiastical architecture are conspicuous in the collegiate church of Southwell; fine specimens may also be seen in the churches of Worksop, Newark, and Nottingham: in those of Southwell and Worksop in particular, the Anglo-Saxon, or early Norman style, is strikingly exhibited. The religious houses, including colleges and hospitals, were about thirty-nine: the chief remains of monastic buildings are those of the abbeys of Newstead and Worksop, and of the college at Southwell. There are considerable remains of the once important castle of Newark, and some interesting relics of that of Nottingham. Bunny Park, the seat of Viscount Raneliffe, and Thurland Hall, in Nottingham, are among the most curious specimens of ancient mansion houses. Among the most distinguished of the numerous modern seats which adorn the county, more especially the northern part of its once dreary forest district, may be enumerated Worksop manor, the property of the Duke of Norfolk, and the residence of the Earl of Surrey; Welbeck abbey, the property and residence of the Duke of Portland; Clumber park, that of the Duke of Newcastle; Thoresby park, that of Earl Manvers; Wollaton Hall, that of Lord Middleton; and Newstead abbey, recently that of the late Lord Byron, but now of Lieut. Col. Wildman. The ordinary houses, except on the borders of Derbyshire, where stone is more plentiful, are generally of brick and tiled, though sometimes thatched: some of the poor cottages and barns in the clay country are of lath and plaster, but all new buildings are there of brick and tiled: in the southern part of the county, many of the better class of houses are slated. The traditions respecting Robin Hood and the Sherwood outlaws of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, which, in the form of popular ballads, were current for ages among the lower orders, seem to have fallen into oblivion in the latter part of the last century, and are now scarcely preserved, except in the libraries of the curious.

NOTTON, a township in the parish of ROYSTON, wapentake of STAINCROSS, West riding of the county of YORK, 5 miles (N.) from Barnesley, containing 339 inhabitants.

NUFFIELD, a parish in the hundred of EWELME, county of OXFORD, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by S.) from Wallingford, containing 198 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Oxford, rated in the king's books at £7. 16. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$. The Rev. B. R. Fisher, and the Rev. W. Hopkins, were patrons in 1826. The church is dedicated to the Holy Trinity. A house of friars, of the order of the Holy Trinity, existed here before the 33rd of Edward III.

NUN-BURNHOLME, a parish comprising the township of Thorpe in the Street in the Holme Beacon, and the township of Nun-Burnholme in the Wilton-Beacon, division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, East riding of the county of YORK, and containing 240 inhabitants, of which number, 203 are in the township of Nun-Burnholme, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by S.) from Pocklington. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of the East riding, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £9. 12. 6., and in the patronage of the Archbishop of York. The church is dedicated to St. James. Here was a small Benedictine nunnery, founded by an ancestor of Roger de Morley, Lord of Morpeth, who lived in the time of Henry III; wherein a short time previous to the dissolution were eight religious, it had a revenue of £10. 3. 3.

NUNEATON, a market town and parish, in the Atherstone division of the hundred of HEMLINGFORD, county of WARWICK, 18 miles (N. N. E.) from Warwick, and 100 (N. W. by W.) from London, containing, with the hamlets of Attleborough and Stockingford, 6610 inhabitants. The name of this place is derived from the river in its neighbourhood, Ea in Saxon signifying water, and from a priory established here, in the reign of Stephen, by Robert, Earl of Leicester, for nuns of the order of Fontevrault, in whose convents abroad there were sometimes nuns and monks in one establishment, but here there were only a prior, a prioress, and nuns, the prioress having supreme authority. In the reign of Henry III., a weekly market was granted to the prioress, and at the dissolution the revenue of the nunnery was £290. 15. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$. The town is pleasantly situated on the river Anka, over which are two bridges, and consists principally of one long street, from which a cross street leads to the market-place; the houses are in general of mean appearance, though interspersed with some handsome modern buildings: it is neither paved nor lighted, but is well supplied with water. The principal source of occupation is riband-weaving for the London market, in which branch of manufacture French looms and machinery have been recently introduced, especially in the figured gauze riband. The Birmingham and Coventry canal passes by the north-west extremity of the town, and about two miles distant are coal mines: fine clay for pottery, and also manganese, are dug here, and there are quarries of freestone in the parish. The market is on Saturday; and fairs are held on May 14th, 15th, and 16th, for cattle and hardware; on February 18th, and October 31st, for horses and cattle; and a statute fair is held fourteen days before Michaelmas. Three constables are annually elected, and sworn in at the court leet for the town and hamlets; there is also a permanent constable: the town hall is a neat modern edifice of brick, containing in the upper story several apartments, of which one is used as a subscription news-room, and two others for a Sunday school.

The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Coventry, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £24. 14. 7., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Nicholas, is a fine structure, exhibiting portions in the various styles of English architecture, with a square embattled tower having pinnacles at the angles: the interior consists of a nave, chancel, and aisles separated by clustered columns and pointed arches; the roof is of oak, divided into panels, and richly ornamented with ribs and foliage. A proprietary chapel has been recently erected, and elegantly fitted up in the cathedral style, but it is not yet used. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. The free grammar school was founded in the 6th of Edward VI., and endowed with one hundred and three acres of land at Coventry: the management is vested in twelve trustees, who appoint the masters; the classical master has a salary of £50 per annum, with a house and garden; and the under master, who teaches reading, writing, and arithmetic, £45 per annum. An English free school, for forty boys and thirty girls, under the management of seven trustees, was founded in 1712, by the will of Mr. Richard Smith, of St. Ann's, Westminster, and endowed with ninety-four acres of land at Hartshill: the salary of the master is £15 per annum, and that of the mistress £7 per annum, with houses and gardens: a great augmentation of the endowment having taken place, from the discovery of mines of manganese on the estate, an additional annual gratuity of £10 is given to the master, and one of £8 to the mistress. In the churchyard is an almshouse for four aged persons, who receive each a small annual stipend: there is likewise a fund arising from land, for putting out poor apprentices. The site and ground-plan of the ancient monastery, with fragments of columns, and richly-moulded arches, together with a considerable portion of the walls of the main building, are yet visible; the outer walls, which enclosed a spacious quadrangular area, are still standing on the east and north sides; a considerable portion of the materials was used in repairing or rebuilding the church.

NUNEHAM-COURTNEY, a parish in the hundred of BULLINGTON, county of OXFORD, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Oxford, containing 312 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Oxford, rated in the king's books at £15. 6. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Archbishop of York. The church, dedicated to All Saints, is an elegant building of the Ionic order, erected in 1764, at the expense of Simon, Earl of Harcourt. The parish is bounded on the west by the river Isis. Nuneham gives the inferior title of viscount to the Earl of Harcourt, who has a splendid mansion and park here.

NUNKEELING, a parish in the northern division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESS, East riding of the county of YORK, $10\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Beverley, containing, with the hamlet of Bewholme, 243 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of the East riding, and diocese of York, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of R. R. Dixon and H. Hudson, Esqrs. A priory of Benedictine nuns, in honour of St. Mary Magdalene and St. Helen, was founded here in the reign of Stephen, by Agnes de Archis, the revenue of which, at the dissolution, was £50. 17. 2.

NUNNEY, a parish in the hundred of FROME, county of SOMERSET, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Frome, containing, with the hamlet of Trudox-hill, 1120 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £15. 9. 4 $\frac{1}{2}$. C. Theobald, Esq. was patron in 1817. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, is a handsome structure, and has lately received an addition of four hundred sittings, of which three hundred and fifty are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £250 towards defraying the expense. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The Rev. Samuel Whitchurch, in 1797, left an annuity of £2. 10. in support of a Sunday school for both sexes. On the banks of the Frome is a small manufactory for agricultural implements. Here are the remains of a castle, erected by the family of De la Mere, and subsequently garrisoned for Charles I., during which it was besieged and taken, after a stout resistance, by the parliamentary forces, in September 1643. Near the site is an old decayed mansion, now occupied as a farm-house; and on a steep hill in the neighbourhood are vestiges of a single intrenched Roman camp.

NUNNIKIRK, a township in the parish of NETHER-WITTON, western division of MORPETH ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $9\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Morpeth, containing 13 inhabitants.

NUNNINGTON, a parish in the wapentake of RYEDALE, North riding of the county of YORK, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Helmsley, containing 418 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cleveland, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £13. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to All Saints. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

NUNRIDGE, a township in that part of the parish of MITFORD which is in the western division of MORPETH ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Morpeth, containing 39 inhabitants.

NUNTHORPE, a chapelry in the parish of AYTON, western division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, North riding of the county of YORK, 4 miles (N. N. E.) from Stokesley, containing 110 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cleveland, and diocese of York, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of T. Simpson and T. Masterman, Esqrs. The chapel, dedicated to St. Mary, is much dilapidated. This place, anciently called Thorpe, received its distinguishing appellation about 1162, from a Cistercian nunnery, then removed hither from Hutton.

NUNTON, a chapelry in the parish and hundred of DOWNTON, county of WILTS, 3 miles (S. S. E.) from Salisbury. The population is returned with Bodenham.

NUNWICK, a joint township with Howgrave, in that part of the parish of RIPON which is in the liberty of RIPON, West riding of the county of YORK, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Ripon, containing, with Howgrave, 28 inhabitants. Here were formerly five stones, each eight feet high, and twenty in girt, enclosing a circular area.

NURSLING, otherwise NUTSHALLING, a parish in the hundred of BUDDLESGATE, Fawley division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 3 miles (S.) from Romsey, containing 637 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £13. 11. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Winchester. The church has a tower surmounted by a wooden spire. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The Andover canal runs through the parish. A Sunday school is partly supported with £1. 10. per annum, the bequest of the Rev. Robert Cramer. Nursling is within the jurisdiction of the Cheyney Court held at Winchester every Thursday, for the recovery of debts to any amount. Grove House, formerly a hunting-seat which belonged to Queen Elizabeth, has been converted into a private asylum for lunatics.

NURSTED, a parish in the hundred of TOLTING-TROUGH, lathe of AYLESFORD, county of KENT, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. by W.) from Gravesend, containing 33 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Rochester, rated in the king's books at £4. 15., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of H. Edmeads, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Mildred, is a small decayed building with a square western tower.

NURSTED, a tything in the parish of BURITON, hundred of FINCH-DEAN, Alton (South) division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S.) from Petersfield. The population is returned with the parish.

NUTFIELD, a parish in the second division of the hundred of REIGATE, county of SURREY, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (W.) from Bletchingley, containing 707 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Surrey, and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £14. 14. 7., and in the patronage of the Principal and Fellows of Jesus College, Oxford. The church, dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul, is partly in the early, and partly in the later, style of English architecture. Fullers' earth is found here in great quantities and of superior quality. In 1755, an earthen vessel was discovered, containing nine hundred coins of the Lower Empire.

NUTHALL, a parish in the southern division of the wapentake of BROXTOW, county of NOTTINGHAM, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.W.) from Nottingham, containing, with the chapelry of Awsworth, 465 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Nottingham, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £3. 14. 9½., and in the patronage of Robert Holden, Esq., whose elegant mansion, Nuthall-Temple, occupying a commanding site near the village, is built in imitation of the Villa Capra, at Vicenza in Italy, one of the most celebrated works of Palladio. The church is dedicated to St. Patrick. Richard Smedley, in 1744, gave certain land, directing the income to be applied in teaching twenty children.

NUTHAMPSTEAD, a hamlet in the parish of BARKWAY, hundred of EDWINSTREE, county of HERTFORD, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by S.) from Barkway, containing 222 inhabitants. Here was formerly a chapel, which has been long since demolished.

NUTHILL, formerly a parish in the southern division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESS, East riding of the county of YORK, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from Kingston upon Hull. The living is rated in the king's books at £2, as a rectory, in the archdeaconry of the East riding, and diocese, of York: but the church is in ruins, and there is now only one farm-house, which is assessed with the parish of Burstwick.

NUTHURST, a parish in the hundred of SINGLECROSS, rape of BRAMBER, county of SUSSEX, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S.S.E.) from Horsham, containing 628 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £10, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Chichester. The church, dedicated to St. Andrew, is in the decorated style of architecture.

NUTHURST, a hamlet in the parish of HAMPTON in ARDEN, Solihull division of the hundred of HEMLINGFORD, county of WARWICK, containing 76 inhabitants. The chapel is demolished.

NUTLEY, a parish in the hundred of BERMONDSPIT, Basingstoke division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 5 miles (S. S. W.) from Basingstoke, containing 130 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Preston-Candover, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester.

NYLAND, formerly a parish in the hundred of GLASTON-TWELVE-HIDES, county of SOMERSET, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Wells, containing, with the tything of Batcombe, 38 inhabitants. Here was anciently a church, dedicated to St. Andrew, which, in 670, was given by Kenewalch, King of the West Saxons, to the abbot of Glastonbury, to which parish Nyland is now considered to belong.

NYMETT (BROAD), a parish in the hundred of NORTH TAWTON with WINKLEY, county of DEVON, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (W. S. W.) from Bow. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Barnstaple, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £2. 4. 2., and in the patronage of Sir T. B. Lethbridge, Bart. This parish is very small, containing only fifty acres.

NYMETT-ROWLAND, a parish in the hundred of NORTH TAWTON with WINKLEY, county of DEVON, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S.S.E.) from Chulmleigh, containing 102 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Barnstaple, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £6. 1. 3., endowed with £400 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £300 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Rev. H. Radford. The church is dedicated to St. Bartholomew.

NYMPSFIELD, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of BERKELEY, county of GLOUCESTER, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. by N.) from Dursley, containing 462 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £11. 5. 0½., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Margaret.

NYMPTON (BISHOP'S), a parish in the hundred of WITHERIDGE, county of DEVON, 3 miles (E. S. E.) from South Molton, containing 1096 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £20. 7. 3½., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Exeter. The church contains some elegant screen-work, and a rich monument to one of the Pollard family. Cattle fairs are held here on April 14th and October 20th.

NYMPTON (ST. GEORGE), a parish in the hundred of SOUTH MOLTON, county of DEVON, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.S.W.) from South Molton, containing 259 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Barnstaple, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £9. 19. 2., and in the patronage of Sir T. D. Acland, Bart.

NYMPTON (KING'S), a parish in the hundred of WITHERIDGE, county of DEVON, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Chulmleigh, containing 623 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Barnstaple, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £28. 6. 8. The Rev. J. Southcombe was patron in 1820. The church, dedicated to St. James, has a handsome wooden screen. A considerable number of poor children are supported and educated at the expense of — Buller, Esq., of Nympton-park.

O.

OADBY, a parish in the hundred of GUTHLAXTON, county of LEICESTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Leicester, containing 856 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Leicester, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £8, endowed with £240 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Miss Wright. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, contains some fine specimens of ancient sculpture. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

OAKE, a parish in the hundred of TAUNTON and TAUNTON-DEAN, county of SOMERSET, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W.) from Taunton, containing 189 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Taunton, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £11. 0. 5., and in the patronage of the Rev. Bowse Ford. The church is dedicated to St. Bartholomew. Six poor children are educated for a trifling rent-charge, the gift of the Rev. Francis Prowde.

OAKEN, a hamlet in that part of the parish of TETTENHALL which is in the northern division of the hundred of SEISDON, county of STAFFORD, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Wolverhampton, containing 244 inhabitants. It is within the jurisdiction of the royal peculiar court of Tettenhall.

OAKENGALE, a hamlet in the parish of SHIFFNALL, Shiffnall division of the hundred of BRIMSTREE, county of SALOP. The population is returned with the chapelry of Priors-Lee.

OAKENSHAW, a hamlet in the parish of BIRSTALL, wapentake of MORLEY, West riding of the county of YORK, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. by E.) from Bradford. The population is returned with Clackheaton. The printing of muslins and calicoes is carried on here to a great extent.

OAKFORD, a parish in the hundred of WITHERIDGE, county of DEVON, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Bampton, containing 474 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Barnstaple, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £24. The Bishop of Exeter, by lapse, presented in 1813. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. Gertrude Pyncombe, in 1730, left an annuity of £5 for teaching poor children of the parish.

OAKHAM, or OAKHAM-LORDSHOLD, a parish and market town, in the soke of OAKHAM, county of RUTLAND, of which it is the chief town, 95 miles (N. N. W.) from London, containing, with Oakham-Deanshold, which includes the chapelry of Barleythorpe, 2160 inhabitants. This place is situated in the luxuriant vale of Catmose, so called from the woods with which it abounded (Coet-maes signifying, in the British language, a woody plain), and is supposed to have derived its name from the oaks which formerly grew in the vicinity. A castle, of which there are still some remains, was erected here soon after the Norman Conquest, by Walkelin de Ferrars, in relation to which a singular custom still prevails; but whether originating with the family of Ferrars, whose arms are three horse-shoes, or of later origin, has not been distinctly ascertained. Every peer of the realm, on first passing through the town, is compelled to give a shoe from the foot of one of his horses, which, upon his refusal, the bailiff of the lordship may take by force, or, in commutation, a sum of money for the purchase of a horse-shoe, to be nailed upon the castle gate, or placed in some part of the building. Among many of different sizes, in proportion to the sum paid for the purchase, and of which some are gilt and stamped with the donor's name, with which various parts of the castle are decorated, are those of Queen Elizabeth, the late Duke of York, and the late king, George IV., when Prince Regent. Richard II. having advanced Edward, son of the Duke of York, to the earldom of Rutland, assigned to him the castle, which, in the reign of Henry VIII., was the baronial seat of Thomas, Lord Cromwell. Of the ancient building the hall only is remaining, in which the assizes are held, and the public business of the town and county is transacted; the other parts are in ruins. The houses are neatly built, and the inhabitants are amply supplied with water. The town formerly enjoyed the staple of wool, and many French merchants settled in it, of whose descendants several may still be traced among the present inhabitants. A silk-manufactory was established here about three years since, chiefly for weaving silk shag for covering hats; but the town is not at present distinguished for trade, though it possesses the advantage of a canal to Melton-Mowbray in Leicestershire, by which coal is brought from Derbyshire, and corn sent to Manchester and Liverpool. The market, which is well supplied with corn, is on Saturday; the fairs are on March 15th, May 6th, September 9th, under the original charters, and on February 4th, April 9th, June 2nd, July 16th, August 13th, October 15th, November 19th, and December 15th, which have been established within the last thirty years, and are principally for the sale of cattle. The town is within the jurisdiction of the county magistrates; and courts leet are held annually by the lord of the manor of Lordshold, and triennially by the Dean of Westminster, who is lord of the manor of Deanshold, for the election of parochial and other officers. The assizes and quarter sessions for the county, and the election of knights of the shire, take place in this town. The common gaol and house of correction for the county is a commodious edifice, containing seven wards, seven work-rooms, and the same number of day-rooms and airing-yards, for the classification of prisoners.

The living is a vicarage, with the perpetual curacies of Brooke and Langham, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £28. 3. $1\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of George Finch, Esq. The church, dedicated to All Saints, is a spacious structure, chiefly in the later style of English architecture, with a fine tower, surmounted by a lofty spire. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists. The free grammar school was founded, about 1584, by the Rev. Robert Johnson, Archdeacon of Leicester, who also founded a similar school at Uppingham; these schools, to each of which an hospital for the relief and support of poor persons is annexed, were incorporated by Queen Elizabeth, who endowed them with certain alienated ecclesiastical property, producing an income of more than £3000 per annum, and placed them under the control of twenty-four governors, including the Bishops of London and Peterborough, the Deans of Westminster and Peterborough, the Archdeacon of Northampton, and the Masters of Trinity and St. John's Colleges, in Cambridge: these schools, the masters of which receive a salary of £150, and the ushers one of £120 each, are open gratuitously to all boys of the towns of Oakham and Uppingham, whose parents cannot afford to pay, and, upon moderate terms regulated by the governors, to others of those towns. There are belonging to them twenty exhibitions, of £40 per annum each, tenable for seven years, to any of the colleges of Oxford or Cambridge; four scholarships of £24 per annum each, in Emanuel College; four of £20 per annum each, in Sidney Sussex College; four of £13 per annum each, in Clare Hall; and four in St. John's College, Cambridge, founded by Archdeacon Johnson, in the gift of the master and senior fellows, with preference to boys from Oakham and Uppingham schools; and two exhibitions, of £40 per annum each, founded by W. Lovett, for the sons of graduated clergymen, who have been for three years in the schools of Oakham or Grantham. In the hospitals annexed to them were originally twenty-eight aged men, the number of whom has been augmented to one hundred, who receive each £10 per annum at their own dwellings, the buildings of the hospitals being occupied by the schoolmasters for the accommodation of boarders. The hospital of St. John and St. Anne, originally founded about the 22nd of Richard II., by Walter Dalby, for two chaplains and twelve aged men, and of which at the dissolution the revenue was £12. 12. 11., was refounded in the reign of Elizabeth, by Archdeacon Johnson, who enlarged the endowment: there are at present twenty aged men on this foundation, who receive each £6 per annum at their own dwellings, the buildings of the hospital, with the exception of a house for the warden, who has a salary of £15 per annum, and in which the sub-warden, whose salary is £10 per annum, at present resides, a chapel, and four separate tenements under one roof, having fallen to decay. A National school, established in 1816, is supported by subscription. There are also several charitable bequests for distribution among the poor. Geoffrey Hudson, a dwarf only three feet nine inches in height, was a native of Oakham; he was of mean parentage, but became page to Henrietta Maria, consort of Charles I., and during the civil war he was a captain of cavalry in the king's service; after which he went to France with his mistress, and there fought a duel and killed his antagonist; in the reign of Charles II., he suffered imprisonment as a Roman Catholic, on account of the pretended Popish plot; and being discharged, died in poverty about 1682.

Seal and Arms.

the head of the earldom of Devon, and the seat of the hereditary county sheriffs, keepers of the castle of Exeter. This great barony was given by the Conqueror to Baldwin de Brionis, one of his most faithful followers, who distinguished himself for courage and generalship at the battle of Hastings. The castle erected by this nobleman, was remarkable for its grandeur, of which there is abundant evidence in the venerable remains. The power and possessions of the barons were co-extensive: they exercised the right of capital punishment over eight manors; besides these, they held a great number in demesne, no less than one hundred and sixty-four having been at one time occupied by inferior tenants. They acted as stewards at the installation of the bishops of the diocese, claiming on the occasion perquisites to a very great amount. They possessed also numerous advowsons, and were the patrons of several priories; holding three fees of the see of Exeter, and ninety-two by knights' service. In the reign of Henry II. this barony came, by marriage, to the Courtenay family, in which it continued till the reign of Edward IV., when Thomas, Earl of Devon, was beheaded at Pontefract, for taking part with Henry VI. at the battle of Towton Field, in 1461. From this period until the accession of Henry VII. it passed through divers hands, but in that reign it was restored to the Courtenays, of whom Henry having forfeited his life under a charge of treasonable correspondence, the park of Oakhampton was laid waste, and its noble castle reduced to ruins. During the great civil war, this town was twice visited by King Charles, and as often by his victorious enemy, Sir Thomas Fairfax. Oakhampton is situated in the lowest part of a valley, watered by a rapid stream, called the Ock, or Oke, over which there is a bridge, leading into the market-place. The forest of Dartmoor lies on the south and south-east, and the town is on all sides surrounded by hills. It is of mean appearance, but is a great thoroughfare between Exeter and Cornwall: there is a plentiful supply of water from pumps. The roads in the vicinity have been lately improved, a new road having been made to Plymouth about eight years since. The forest of Dartmoor affords pasturage to numerous flocks of sheep, the flesh of which, from the sweetness of the herbage, is esteemed for its superior flavour, in consequence of which, great numbers are sent hence to the London market. At the weekly market, which is held on Saturday, by prescription, there is an excellent supply of every necessary commodity, including fish and corn. Six annual fairs are held by charter, viz., second Tuesday after March 11th, May 14th, first Wednesday after July 6th, August 5th, first Tuesday after September 11th, and first Wednesday after October 11th: there are also great markets on the Saturday before Christmas, and on the Saturday after "Giglet's market," where the rustic swain, weary of his bachelorship, enjoys the privilege of self-introduction to any disengaged female who may attract his particular notice.

Oakhampton is governed by a mayor, recorder, justice, five principal burgesses, and eight assistants, aided by a town clerk and other officers. The mayor is chosen on the first Monday after Michaelmas-day, by the entire body, from two principal burgesses nominated by the late mayor: the principal burgesses are in all eight, the mayor, the late mayor, who is styled justice, and the town clerk, being included: the mayor, the late mayor, and the recorder, are justices of the peace: there is also a portreeve, who is appointed annually. The county magistrates have concurrent jurisdiction only as regards regulations for the poor: quarter sessions are held for the borough, but there are seldom any prisoners. A court of record formerly held for the recovery of debts not exceeding £30, has become obsolete. The freedom is acquired by birth and servitude; the eldest son alone becomes free at his father's death, though not unless born within the borough. The first return of members to parliament was in the reign of Edward I., and the next in the 7th of Edward II., after which there was an intermission till 1640, but from that period the returns have been regular. The right of election is vested in the freemen and proprietors of freeholds within the borough, about two hundred in number: the mayor is the returning officer. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Totness, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £20, and in the patronage of Albany Saville, Esq., as lord of the manor. The church, dedicated to All Saints, is an ancient edifice, about half a mile from the town, with a handsome square tower, surmounted with pinnacles, and having north and south porches. St. James' chapel, a small structure, was originally founded as a chantry, and now belongs to the corporation, divine service being performed in it during the sessions, and occasionally in Lent. There is a place of worship for Independents. Some small endowments have been left for the education of poor children; a school for boys, and another for girls, are principally supported by subscription. Two almshouses were founded, in 1586, by Mr. Richard Brock; and there is another, called the Wester almshouse. Several sums have been given for apprenticing poor boys and other purposes. The castle, situated about half a mile from the town, is a most interesting ruin, and is particularly striking when first observed on approaching from the south: it occupies the summit and declivity of a conoidal mount, so thickly clothed with trees that, although the ruins are of considerable extent and magnitude, the keep and a smaller fragment northward are alone visible from the road. This road is cut along the western side of a valley, from the bed of which the mount rises; the latter is close to the road, and its summit nearly on the same level.

OAKHAMPTON (MONK), a parish in the hundred of BLACK TORRINGTON, county of DEVON, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Hatherleigh, containing 229 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Totness, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £6. 14. 7., and in the patronage of Sir S. Northcote, Bart.

OAKINGHAM, county of BERKS.—See WOKINGHAM.

OAKINGTON, a parish partly in the hundred of CHESTERTON, but chiefly in that of NORTHSTOW, county of CAMBRIDGE, 5 miles (N. N. W.) from Cambridge, containing, with the hamlet of Westwick, 440 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Ely, rated in the king's books at £4. 13. 1½., and in the patronage of the President and Fellows of Queen's College, Cambridge. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

OAKLEY, a parish forming, with the parishes of Clapham and Milton-Ernest, a detached portion of the hundred of STODDEN, county of BEDFORD, 4 miles (N. W.) from Bedford, containing 486 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Bedford, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £8. 14. 9., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Provost and Fellows of Eton College. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, contains an ancient altar-tomb, and effigy in robes, of the family of Reynes.

OAKLEY, a parish in the hundred of ASHENDON, county of BUCKINGHAM, 6 miles (N. W. by N.) from Thame, containing 382 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £5. 17. 1. Sir J. Aubrey, Bart. was patron in 1810. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, was formerly the mother church of Brill, Borstall, and Addingrave; the two first have been made distinct parishes; the last had a chapel of ease, which has gone to decay. A rent-charge of £25, upon the parish charity estate, is applied to the education of poor children.

OAKLEY, a township in that part of the parish of CROXALL which is in the northern division of the hundred of OFFLOW, county of STAFFORD, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Tamworth, containing 31 inhabitants.

OAKLEY, a township in that part of the parish of MUCKLESTON which is in the northern division of the hundred of PIREHILL, county of STAFFORD, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Drayton in Hales, containing 94 inhabitants.

OAKLEY, a parish in the hundred of HARTISMERE, county of SUFFOLK, 3 miles (N. N. E.) from Eye, containing 403 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, annexed to that of Broome, in the archdeaconry of Sudbury, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £9. 4. 9½. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas.

OAKLEY (CHURCH), a parish in the hundred of CHUTELY, Kingsclere division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Basingstoke, containing 246 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £11. 13. 11½., and in the patronage of the Provost and Fellows of Queen's College, Oxford. The church is dedicated to St. Leonard. George Wither, in 1666, gave certain lands and tenements, also a rent-charge of £8, in support of a school for the education of eight poor boys; and Gilbert Wither, in 1676, gave a rent-charge of 40s., to be applied in apprenticing boys. William Warham, successively Bishop of London, and Archbishop of Canterbury, and an eminent statesman, was born here; he died in 1532.

OAKLEY (GREAT), a parish in the hundred of TENDRING, county of ESSEX, 7 miles (S. E. by E.) from Manningtree, containing 990 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Colchester, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £23, and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of St. John's College, Cambridge. The church is dedicated to All Saints. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. This parish, with the other Oakleys, lies contiguous to an inlet of the North sea, opposite Pewit island, and is celebrated as the scene of a bloody battle fought between King Ethelwolf and the Danes. It had formerly a castle, the remains of the keep and moat of which are still visible.

OAKLEY (GREAT), a parish in the hundred of CORBY, county of NORTHAMPTON, 5 miles (N.) from Kettering, containing 183 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, and in the patronage of Sir Richard Brooke, Bart. The church is dedicated to St. Michael.

OAKLEY (LITTLE), a parish in the hundred of TENDRING, county of ESSEX, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by W.)

from Harwich, containing 262 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Colchester, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £13. 11. 0½. Thomas Scott, Esq. was patron in 1800. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

OAKLEY (LITTLE), a parish in the hundred of CORBY, county of NORTHAMPTON, 5½ miles (N. N. E.) from Kettering, containing 121 inhabitants. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

OAKLEY (PARVA), in the hundred of HARTISMERE, county of SUFFOLK, 2¾ miles (N. N. E.) from Eye. This was formerly a distinct parish, which was consolidated with Oakley Magna in 1449. The church, now in ruins, was dedicated to St. Peter.

OAKMERE, a township in the parish of DELAMERE, first division of the hundred of EDDISBURY, county palatine of CHESTER, containing 90 inhabitants.

OAKOVER, a parish in the northern division of the hundred of TOTMONSLOW, county of STAFFORD, 2½ miles (N. W. by W.) from Ashbourn, containing 69 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, and in the patronage of H. F. Okeover, Esq.: it is exempt from the jurisdiction of the Archdeacon, but there is no official. The church, dedicated to All Saints, is a small ancient structure, completely overgrown with ivy, eglantine, and roses. The river Dove runs through the parish. In the park are several tumuli, and in the neighbourhood a square intrenchment, all of them supposed to be of Roman origin. This parish is entitled to partake in the benefit of a bequest by Rowland Okeover, in 1727, now applied for clothing and apprenticing poor children. Oakover is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s.

OAKSEY, a parish in the hundred of MALMESBURY, county of WILTS, 5½ miles (N. E.) from Malmesbury, containing 385 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Wilts, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £6. 8. 4. Thomas Ryder, Esq. was patron in 1808. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

OAKSHOT, a hamlet in the parish of STOKE D'ABERNON, second division of the hundred of ELMBRIDGE, county of SURREY, 2¼ miles (N. N. W.) from Leatherhead. The population is returned with the parish.

OAKTHORPE, a hamlet partly in the parish of MEASHAM, partly in that of STRETTON en le FIELDS, but chiefly in that of CHURCH-GRESLEY, hundred of REPTON and GRESLEY, county of DERBY, 3¾ miles (S. W. by S.) from Ashby de la Zouch, containing, with the hamlet of Donisthorpe, 732 inhabitants. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyan Methodists. Oakthorpe is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s.

OAKWOOD, a chapelry in the parish, and first division of the hundred, of WOTTON, county of SURREY, 9 miles (S. S. W.) from Dorking. The population is returned with the parish. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Surrey, and diocese of Winchester, endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Sir J. Evelyn, Bart. The chapel is dedicated to St. John the Baptist.

OARE, a chapelry in the parish of CHIEVELEY, hundred of FAIRCROSS, county of BERKS, 5½ miles (N. N. E.) from Speenhamland. The population is returned with the parish.

OARE, a parish in the hundred of FAVERSHAM, lathe of SCRAY, county of KENT, 1½ mile (N. W. by N.) from Faversham, containing 197 inhabitants. The living is a discharged perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. The parish is bounded on the north-east by the Swale, over which there is a ferry to Harty Island.

OARE, a parish in the hundred of CARHAMPTON, county of SOMERSET, 12 miles (W.) from Minehead, containing 66 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Taunton, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £4. 17. 6., endowed with £400 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £300 parliamentary grant. Mrs. Oliver and others were patrons in 1809. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

OBLEY, a joint township with Clunbury, in the parish of CLUNBURY, hundred of PURSLOW, county of SALOP, 9 miles (S.) from Bishop's Castle. The population is returned with Clunbury.

OBORNE, a parish in the hundred of SHERBORNE, Sherborne division of the county of DORSET, 1¼ mile (N. E. by E.) from Sherborne, containing 123 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Dean of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £6. 5. 10., and in the patronage of Earl Digby. The church is dedicated to St. Cuthbert.

OBTHORPE, a hamlet in the parish of THURLBY, wapentake of NESS, parts of KESTIVEN, county of LINCOLN, containing 12 inhabitants.

OBY, a parish in the western division of the hundred of FLEGG, county of NORFOLK, 3½ miles (N. by E.) from Acle. The population is returned with Ashby. The living is a rectory, with that of Ashby, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich.

OCCANEY, an extra-parochial district, in the upper division of the wapentake of CLARO, West riding of the county of YORK, 3½ miles (N.) from Knaresborough. The population is returned with Walkingham Hill.

OCCLESTONE, a township in that part of the parish of MIDDLEWICH which is in the hundred of NORTHWICH, county palatine of CHESTER, 3½ miles (S. S. W.) from Middlewich, containing 94 inhabitants.

OCCOLD, a parish in the hundred of HARTISMERE, county of SUFFOLK, 2½ miles (S. by E.) from Eye, containing 461 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Sudbury, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £19. 1. 5½., and in the patronage of George Thomas, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas.

OCKBROOK, a parish in the hundred of MORLESTON and LITCHURCH, county of DERBY, 5½ miles (E. by S.) from Derby, containing 1203 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Derby, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, endowed with £800 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £300 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of John Pares, Esq. The church, dedicated to All Saints, has portions in the Norman style of architecture, and some of later date. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. A National school, erected in 1816, is attended by about two hundred and fifty children. The rivers Derwent and Trent, and the Derby canal, run through the parish. On the banks of the former are extensive cotton-mills, affording employment to upwards of three hundred of the poor in the manufacture of bobbin and lace thread for the Buckingham, Nottingham, and Loughborough markets. At a short distance from the village is a considerable establishment of the Moravians, founded in 1750: the principal buildings stand in a regular line, and consist of the single sisters' house, containing thirty or forty females, who are employed in fine muslin work, a smaller house for about the same number of single men, and between them a commodious chapel, and a boarding-school for fifty boys and thirty girls.

OCKENDON (NORTH), a parish in the hundred of CHAFFORD, county of ESSEX, 4½ miles (E.S.E.) from Hornchurch, containing 325 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Essex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £16. 13. 4, and in the patronage of Sir Charles Hulse, Bart. The church is dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene.

OCKENDON (SOUTH), a parish in the hundred of CHAFFORD, county of ESSEX, 4¼ miles (N.N.W.) from Grays-Thurrock, containing 777 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Essex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £33. 6. 8. G. Leith, Esq. was patron in 1819. The church, dedicated to St. Nicholas, has a circular embattled tower. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Some Saxon silver coins have been found in the parish, and vestiges of a Roman road may be traced. There is a building, called Furnace House, where iron was formerly smelted.

OCKHAM, a parish in the second division of the hundred of WOKING, county of SURREY, 1 mile (E.) from Ripley, containing 565 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Surrey, and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £11. 2. 1, and in the patronage of Lord King. The church, dedicated to All Saints, has portions in the decorated, and some in the later English, style.

OCKLEY, a parish in the first division of the hundred of WOTTON, county of SURREY, 6¼ miles (S. by W.) from Dorking, containing 642 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Surrey, and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £16. 5. 2½., and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Clare Hall, Cambridge. The church, dedicated to St. Margaret, has lately received an addition of one hundred and fifty-four free sittings, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £100 towards defraying the expense. Eight children are taught for £8. 8. a year, the produce of £100, bequeathed by Elizabeth Eversted in 1721. On Holmbury Hill are vestiges of a Roman encampment; and a battle is stated to have taken place here, in 851, between the Saxons and the Danes, which terminated in the defeat of the former, with great slaughter.

OCLE-LIVERS, an extra-parochial liberty, in the hundred of Broxash, county of HEREFORD, 6½ miles (N.E.) from Hereford. Here was a priory of Benedictine monks, a cell to that of Lira, in Normandy, founded about 1160.

OCLE-PITCHARD, a parish in the hundred of Broxash, county of HEREFORD, 7½ miles (N.E. by E.) from Hereford, containing 224 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £4. 19., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Representatives of the Rev. J. Lilly. The church is dedicated to St. James.

OCTON, a township in the parish of THWING, wapentake of DICKERING, East riding of the county of YORK, 8 miles (W.) from Bridlington. The population is returned with the parish.

OCTON-GRANGE, a township in the parish of THWING, wapentake of DICKERING, East riding of the county of YORK, 9 miles (W.N.W.) from Bridlington. The population is returned with the parish.

ODCOMBE, a parish in the hundred of HOUNDSBOROUGH, BERWICK, and COKER, county of SOMERSET, 3¼ miles (W. by S.) from Yeovil, containing 540 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £15. 9. 9½., and in the patronage of the Dean and Canons of Christ Church, Oxford. The church is dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul. Humphrey Hody, an eminent divine, was born here in 1659; he died in 1706.

ODDINGLEY, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of OSWALDSLOW, county of WORCESTER, 3 miles (S.) from Droitwich, containing 168 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, rated in the king's books at £4. 19. 4½., and in the patronage of J. H. Galton, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. James. A charity school is supported by voluntary subscription.

ODDINGTON, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of SLAUGHTER, county of GLOUCESTER, 2½ miles (E.) from Stow on the Wold, containing 458 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £21. 7. 1., and in the patronage of the Precentor of the Cathedral Church of York. The church has a Norman door, but the rest of the building is of later date; it has recently received an addition of sixty free sittings, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £50 towards defraying the expense. Edward Chamberlayne, an English historian, was born here in 1616; he died in 1703.

ODDINGTON, a parish in the hundred of PLOUGHLEY, county of OXFORD, 7 miles (S.W. by S.) from Bicester, containing 166 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Oxford, rated in the king's books at £12. 16. 0½., and in the patronage of the President and Fellows of Trinity College, Oxford. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew. The river Ray runs through the parish.

ODELL, a parish in the hundred of WILLEY, county of BEDFORD, 1¼ mile (N. E. by N.) from Harrold, containing 439 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Bedford, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £19. T. Alston, Esq. was patron in 1798. The church is dedicated to All Saints. This place formerly possessed a market, granted to William Fitzwarren, in 1222, which has been long disused; but a fair is held on the Thursday and Friday in Whitsun-week. Odell castle, the seat of the Alston family, a small part of which constitutes the remains of the ancient building of the same name, stands conspicuously on an eminence, commanding a fine view of the river Ouse.

ODESTONE, a hamlet in the parish of SHACKERSTONE, hundred of SPARKENHOE, county of LEICESTER, 3½ miles (N. by W.) from Market-Bosworth, containing 216 inhabitants.

ODIHAM, a market-town and parish in the hundred of ODIHAM, Basingstoke division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 26 miles (N. E.) from Winchester, 37 (N. E.) from Southampton, and 40 (W. S. W.) from London, containing, with the chapelry of Lyss-Turney, and the tythings of Hillside, Murrell-Green, Rye with Stapeley, and North Warnborough, 2983 inhabitants. This place was formerly a free borough belonging to the Bishops of Winchester; and the castle, which stood about a mile north-west of the town, was built before the time of King John, in whose reign it became celebrated for its resistance to the army of Louis, the Dauphin of France, having sustained a siege for fifteen days, though garrisoned only by three officers and ten private soldiers. That monarch was here a few days before the signing of Magna Charta, attended by a retinue of not more than seven knights. In the 27th of Edward I., the town, park, and hundred, were granted to the queen, as part of her dower. In the reign of Edward III., David Bruce, King of Scotland, having been made prisoner at the battle of Neville's Cross, was confined in this fortress for eleven years. The town is pleasantly situated on the side of a chalk hill, and from the neighbouring chalk-pits the adjacent country is supplied with manure, the means of conveying which is afforded by the Basingstoke canal, which passes about a mile north-east of the town. A book-club has been established about forty years, and races were formerly held here. The manufacture of cotton stockings was carried on a few years since, but at present there is no trade deserving particular notice. In some parts of the parish hops are cultivated. The market is on Tuesday; and fairs are held on the Saturday preceding Mid-Lent Sunday, and July 31st, for horses and cattle. The county magistrates hold a meeting every fortnight; and constables are annually chosen at the court leet of the manor, held at Easter: a court for the recovery of small debts has fallen into disuse. Odiham was summoned to send members to parliament in the reigns of Edward I. and Edward II., but never made any return.

The living is a vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Grewell, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £23. 11. 5½., and in the patronage of the Chancellor of the Cathedral Church of Salisbury. The church, which is dedicated to All Saints, is a large ancient building of brick, coated with stucco. There are places of worship for those in the Connexion of the late Countess of Huntingdon, and Independents. A free school, for the education of twenty boys, was founded in 1694, by Robert May, and endowed with £600 for its support, and £200 for apprenticing the children; the funds were subsequently augmented by a rent-charge of £10 for five additional children, and an addition of £20 per annum to the apprentice fund, the bequest of James Zouch, Esq., but this benefaction has become much reduced in value from losses: about twenty-three children are educated, and three on an average are annually apprenticed. A National school is supported by subscription, and another school, in which the children are partly clothed, is supported by dissenters. Near the church is an almshouse, founded and endowed by Sir Edward More, in 1623, with property producing about £80 per annum, for the support of eight poor widowers and widows; and there are apartments for two more poor persons, with stipends from other benefactions. Vestiges of the keep of the ancient castle are visible about a mile north-west of the town; and the remains of a royal residence have been converted into a farm-house, still called Palace Gate. William Lilly, the grammarian and astrologer, was born here about 1468.

ODSTOCK, a parish in the hundred of CAWDEN and CADWORTH, county of WILTS, 3 miles (S.) from Salisbury, containing 133 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £11. 17. 11., and in the patronage of the Earl of Radnor. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

ODSTONE, a tything in the parish of ASHBURY, hundred of SHRIVENHAM, county of BERKS, containing 31 inhabitants.

OFFCHURCH, a parish in the Kenilworth division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, county of WARWICK, 5 miles (E. by N.) from Warwick, containing 337 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Coventry, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £7. 7. 6., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty. T. W. Knightley, Esq. was patron in 1805. The church is dedicated to St. Gregory. The Warwick and Napton canal intersects the old Roman Fosse-way on the southern boundary of the parish. In the Anglo-Saxon times this was a place of some importance, and during the Octarchy, Offa, King of Mercia, made it his residence.

OFFCOAT, a joint liberty with Underwood, in that part of the parish of ASHBURN which is in the hundred of WIRKSWORTH, county of DERBY, containing, with Underwood, 341 inhabitants. It is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s.

OFFENHAM, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of BLACKENHURST, county of WORCESTER, 2½ miles (N. E. by N.) from Evesham, containing 342 inhabitants. The living is a discharged perpetual curacy, annexed to that of Littleton, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, rated in the king's books at £6. 11. 5½. The church is dedicated to St. Milburgh. Offenham took its name from the Saxon King, Offa, who had a palace here; it was afterwards possessed by the abbots of Evesham, and became their favourite residence, some remains of the boundary walls being still discernible. The navigable river Avon is here crossed by a ferry. A small school is supported by the income arising from £110, left by Mr. Brent.

OFFERTON, a township in the parish of STOCKPORT, hundred of MACCLESFIELD, county palatine of CHESTER, 2½ miles (S.E. by E.) from Stockport, containing 401 inhabitants. There is a trifling sum, left by Richard Dodge in 1765, for teaching two poor children whose parents do not receive parochial relief.

OFFERTON, a hamlet in the parish of HOPE, hundred of HIGH PEAK, county of DERBY, 5½ miles (N.E.) from Tideswell, containing 40 inhabitants.

OFFERTON, a township in the parish of HOUGHTON le SPRING, northern division of EASINGTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, 4 miles (W.S.W.) from Sunderland, containing 198 inhabitants. The ancient manor-house has been converted into a public-house.

OFFHAM, a parish in the hundred of LARKFIELD, lathe of AYLESFORD, county of KENT, 3¼ miles (E. S. E.) from Wrotham, containing 274 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Rochester, rated in the king's books at £6, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is principally in the early style of English architecture, with a tower steeple. The great Roman military way, from the Weald to London, crosses this parish. Jack Straw, the rebel in the reign of Richard II., is said to have been born at Pepingstraw in this parish. Offham-green is remarkable for having on it the ancient instrument of amusement called a quintin, which the lord of the manor is obliged to preserve.

OFFHAM, a tything in the parish of SOUTHSTOKE, hundred of AVISFORD, rape of ARUNDEL, county of SUSSEX, 1¾ mile (N.E.) from Arundel. The population is returned with the parish.

OFFLEY, a parish in the hundred of HITCHIN and PIRTON, county of HERTFORD, 3¼ miles (W.S.W.) from Hitchin, containing 873 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Huntingdon, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £9, and in the patronage of the Marquis of Salisbury. The church, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene, has a very handsome chancel, erected, in 1777, by Dame Sarah Salusbury, who also left £1000, which has been applied to the foundation and support of a charity school; the children, seventy in number, are partly clothed. Mrs. Alice Pigott, in 1724, endowed the living with a rent-charge of £20 in aid of the vicarial tithes, and bequeathed another of £10 for apprenticing two poor children. Offley received its name from King Offa, who resided, and is said to have died, here. In a wood at Highdowns are several barrows and dikes, supposed to be of British origin.

OFFLEY (HIGH), a parish in the northern division of the hundred of PIREHILL, county of STAFFORD, comprising the townships of Loynton and High Offley, and containing 609 inhabitants, of which number, 569 are in the township of High Offley, 4¼ miles (S.W.) from Eccleshall. The living is a vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Prebendary of Offley and Flixton in the Cathedral Church of Lichfield, rated in the king's books at £6. 6. 0½., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. The Birmingham and Liverpool canal passes through the parish.

OFFLOW (BISHOP'S), a township in the parish of ABDASTON, northern division of the hundred of PIREHILL, county of STAFFORD, 3 miles (W.) from Eccleshall, containing 210 inhabitants. Eight poor children are taught for £4 a year, the bequest of John Wright, in 1724.

OFFORD-CLUNY, a parish in the hundred of TOSELAND, county of HUNTINGDON, 5 miles (N. N. E.) from St. Neots, containing 237 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Huntingdon, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £19. 2. 1., and in the patronage of the Bishop of London. The church is dedicated to All Saints. A charity school is endowed with £30, the bequest of Dr. Newcome, in 1763.

OFFORD-DARCY, a parish in the hundred of TOSELAND, county of HUNTINGDON, 4½ miles (N. N. E.) from St. Neots, containing 214 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Huntingdon, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £15. 2. 8½., and in the patronage of G. Thornhill, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

OFFTON, a parish in the hundred of BOSMERE and CLAYDON, county of SUFFOLK, 5 miles (E.) from Bildeston, containing 328 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, with that of Little Bricett, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £7. 16. 0½. J. G. Sparrow, Esq. was patron in 1796. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

OFFWELL, a parish in the hundred of COLYTON, county of DEVON, 2½ miles (E. S. E.) from Honiton, containing 379 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £14. 3. 6½., and in the patronage of the Rev. G. B. Coplestone.

OGBOURN (ST. ANDREW), a parish in the hundred of SELKLEY, county of WILTS, 2 miles (N.) from Marlborough, containing 415 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, with Temple Rockley, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Dean and Canons of Windsor, rated in the king's books at £15. 2. 11. At Rockley the knights of St. John of Jerusalem had formerly a preceptory: there was also a chapel of ease, dedicated to St. Leonard, but it has been long demolished. In the neighbourhood are several mineral springs. The remains of Barberry Castle, a large British encampment, may still be traced; they are partly in this parish, but chiefly in that of Wroughton.

OGBOURN (ST. GEORGE), a parish in the hundred of SELKLEY, county of WILTS, 3¼ miles (N.) from Marlborough, containing 493 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Wilts, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £14. 5. 10., and in the patronage of the Dean and Canons of Windsor.

A priory of Benedictine monks, subordinate to the abbey of Bec-Herlowyn in Normandy, was founded here about 1149, and became the richest and principal cell to that house in England. In 556, a most sanguinary battle between the Britons and the West Saxons was fought here, which lasted a whole day, and ended in the total rout of the Britons, and the capture of their neighbouring fortress, Barberry Castle, in the vicinity of which numerous barrows are still visible.

OGLE, or OCLE, a township in the parish of WHALTON, western division of CASTLE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $7\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W.) from Morpeth, containing 148 inhabitants. There are slight remains of the once strong fortress of Ogle castle, in which David, King of Scotland, was confined after the battle of Nevill's Cross.

OGLY-HAY, an extra-parochial district, in the southern division of the hundred of OFFLOW, county of STAFFORD, containing 23 inhabitants. The Essington and Wyrley canal passes through this place.

OGWELL (EAST), a parish forming, with the parish of West Ogwell, a distinct portion of the hundred of WONFORD, county of DEVON, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (W. S. W.) from Newton-Abbots, containing 295 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £19. 3. 9., and in the patronage of P. J. Taylor, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Bartholomew. Richard Reynell, in 1735, gave certain land, the income arising from which, about £10 a year, is applied in teaching twenty-eight children. Here are two almshouses, founded by Lady Lucy Reynell.

OGWELL (WEST), a parish forming, with the parish of East Ogwell, a distinct portion of the hundred of WONFORD, county of DEVON, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Newton-Abbots, containing 42 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £7. 2. 11., and in the patronage of P. J. Taylor, Esq. The church contains three ancient stone stalls.

OKEFORD (CHILD), a parish in the hundred of REDLANE, Sturminster division of the county of DORSET, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Blandford-Forum, containing 694 inhabitants. The living consists of two rectories, Superior and Inferior, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, the former rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., and the latter at £7, and in the patronage of the Rev. Charles Edward North. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas. The navigable river Stour runs through the parish. On Hameldon Hill are traces of an extensive intrenchment, in which Roman coins have been found.

OKEFORD-FITZPAINE, a parish in the hundred of STURMINSTER-NEWTON-CASTLE, Sturminster division of the county of DORSET, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Blandford-Forum, containing 499 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £21. 12. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of Lord Rivers. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew. The navigable river Stour runs through the parish. Okeford was anciently possessed by the family of Nichole, one of whom obtained the privilege of a market to be held here; from them it came to the Fitz-Paynes, and, by a corruption of that name, is vulgarly called Fipenny-Okeford. Several British silver coins were found here in 1753. In the neighbourhood is Banbury Hill, a circular camp with a single trench.

OKENEY cum PETSOE, a parish in the hundred of NEWPORT, county of BUCKINGHAM, 2 miles (S. S. E.) from Olney. The population is returned with Emberton. The living is a discharged rectory, with that of Petsoe, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £2. 17. 6. The church, which was dedicated to St. Martin, has been long since demolished. The parish is assessed with the adjoining parish of Emberton.

OLAVE (ST.) MARY-GATE, a parish partly in the liberty of ST. PETER of YORK, East riding, and partly in the wapentake of BULMER, North riding, of the county of YORK, comprising the township of St. Olave Mary-Gate, and part of those of Clifton and Rawcliffe, and containing 992 inhabitants, of which number, 666 are in the township of St. Olave Mary-Gate, adjacent to the north-western side of the city of York. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York.

OLD, or WOLD, a parish in the hundred of ORLINGBURY, county of NORTHAMPTON, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Kettering, containing 450 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £18. 12. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Principal and Fellows of Brasenose College, Oxford. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew. There is a place of worship for Independents.

OLDBERROW, a parish forming a detached portion of the lower division of the hundred of BLACKENHURST, county of WORCESTER, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W.) from Henley in Arden, containing 102 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, rated in the king's books at £4, and in the patronage of the Rev. John Peachell. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

OLDBURY, a parish in the hundred of STOTTESDEN, county of SALOP, 1 mile (S. by W.) from Bridgenorth, containing 110 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £5, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas. His Majesty's Commissioners have proposed a grant for the erection of a new church. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists. The iron trade is here carried on to a considerable extent: there are also steel-works; and an abundance of iron-stone and coal is obtained. The Birmingham canal nearly surrounds the village. Fairs are on June 6th and October 3rd. A court of requests is held, once a fortnight for the recovery of debts under £5, also courts leet and baron annually: here is a spacious prison for debtors. Edmund Darby, in 1659, gave land, among other purposes, for the erection and endowment of a school, in which twenty children are educated.

OLDBURY, a hamlet in the parish of MANCETTER, Atherstone division of the hundred of HEMLINGFORD, county of WARWICK, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Nuneaton, containing 79 inhabitants. Here was a small nunnery of the Dominican order, dedicated to St. Lawrence, and subordinate to Pollesworth; it is said to have been founded by Walter de Hastings and Athawis his wife, and at the dissolution possessed a revenue of £6. 0. 10.

OLDBURY on the HILL, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of GRUMBALD'S ASH, county of GLOUCESTER, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Tetbury, containing 371 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, united to that of Didmarton, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £16. The Duke of Beaufort was patron in 1803. The church is dedicated to St. Arila.

OLDBURY upon SEVERN, a chapelry in the parish of THORNBURY, lower division of the hundred of THORNBURY, county of GLOUCESTER, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Thornbury, containing 528 inhabitants. The navigable river Severn passes in the vicinity.

OLDCASTLE, a township in the parish of MALPAS, higher division of the hundred of BROXTON, county palatine of CHESTER, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S. W.) from Malpas, containing 93 inhabitants. This place took its name from an ancient castle, which was destroyed before 1585. A battle was fought here in 1644, between the parliamentary forces from Nantwich and some of the king's cavalry, in which the latter were defeated, and Colonels Vane and Conyers killed.

OLDCASTLE, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of ABERGAVENNY, county of MONMOUTH, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Abergavenny, containing 67 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecon, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Earl of Oxford. The church is dedicated to St. John the Baptist.

OLDCOTT, a township in the parish of WOLSTANTON, northern division of the hundred of PIREHILL, county of STAFFORD, containing 615 inhabitants.

OLDFIELD, a joint township with Heswall, in the parish of HESWALL, lower division of the hundred of WIRRAL, county palatine of CHESTER, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Parkgate. The population is returned with Heswall.

OLDHAM cum PRESTWICH, a parochial chapelry in the hundred of SALFORD, county palatine of LANCASTER, comprising the chapelries of Chadderton and Royton, and the townships of Crompton and Oldham, and containing 38,201 inhabitants, of which number, 21,662 are in the township of Oldham, 7 miles (N. E. by E.) from Manchester. This place, the name of which appears to indicate some degree either of absolute or of relative antiquity, is not connected with any event of historical importance, and has only within the last fifty years risen into notice from the rapid progress of its manufactures, for which it is indebted to its vicinity to Manchester, and to the mines of excellent coal which abound in the neighbourhood. The town is situated on elevated ground, near the source of the river Irk, and is bounded on the east by a branch of the Medlock. The houses are irregularly built, but, since the extension of its manufactures, the town has been very much enlarged, and is undergoing considerable improvement. It was first lighted with gas on March 1st, 1827, the works, situated at the bottom of Greaves-street, having been erected by a company incorporated in 1825, at an expense, including the laying of the mains, &c., of £20,000: it is supplied with water conveyed by iron pipes from a reservoir covering about twelve acres of ground, in Strines-dale, about two miles and a half east of the town, partly in Lancashire and partly in Yorkshire, the whole having been constructed at an expense of £28,000: it is only partially paved. The affairs of the town are regulated by commissioners appointed under a police act obtained in 1828, which also provides for the erection of a town hall and other offices. A subscription library has been established. Oldham has for a long period been celebrated for the manufacture of hats, which was established so early as the fifteenth century, and is still carried on to a considerable extent; but the principal manufactures are fustians, velveteens, cotton and woollen corduroys, and the spinning of cotton, for which there are now about seventy-five mills in full operation, for the most part worked by steam, and not less than one hundred and fifty steam-engines employed in the other different factories and in the mines. A great quantity of the coal obtained in the neighbourhood is sent to Manchester, where it obtains a ready market, at a superior price; the mines are exceedingly productive, and afford employment to a considerable number of persons. The trade of the town is greatly facilitated by the Oldham canal, constructed in pursuance of an act of parliament obtained in 1792, which commences at Hollinwood, and forms a direct communication with Manchester, the grand mart for the sale of its manufactures, and with Ashton under Line and Stockport, and the Rochdale canal, which passes through the township of Chadderton. A railway has been projected from Oldham to Manchester, but not yet carried into effect. A customary market for provisions is held on Saturday; and fairs are held on the first Thursday after Candlemas-day, May 2nd, July 8th, and the first Wednesday after October 12th, for horses, cattle, sheep, and pedlary. Petty sessions for the Middleton division of the hundred of Salford are held here once a fortnight.

The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Rector of Prestwich. The ancient chapel, dedicated to St. Mary, erected in 1476, by "Sir Ralph Langley, priest of Prestwich," and third warden of Manchester college, was taken down and rebuilt on a larger scale, the first stone having been laid on the 16th of October, 1827, and the expense estimated at upwards of £12,000: the present edifice, dedicated to St. Paul, is in the later style of English architecture, with a handsome embattled tower surmounted by angular turrets and pinnacles. St. Peter's chapel was built by subscription in 1765, and enlarged in 1804: the living is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £2200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Rector of Prestwich. The church dedicated to St. James, erected in 1829, by grant from the parliamentary commissioners, at an expense of £8905. 16. 6., is a neat edifice in the later style of English architecture, with a tower and campanile turret, and contains two thousand and eighty-one sittings, of which one thousand two hundred and eighty-five are free: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Incumbent of Oldham: this church is situated about a quarter of a mile east of the town, where a subscription library and news-room has been established. Near Chadderton Hall, within the township of Oldham, is an episcopal chapel, built in 1765; and there are two other chapels of ease at Crompton and Royton. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, Kilhamites, Moravians; Primitive, Wesleyan, and Independent, Methodists; and Unitarians. The free grammar school was founded, in 1611, by James Assheton, Esq., of Chadderton Hall, who endowed it with an acre of land in the town, which has been let for building, and the endowment was augmented by the bequest of £3 per annum from Mr. Thomas Nuttall, in 1726; the whole income is about £35 per annum, and the school is free to all boys of the town for instruction in the classics, a quarterly sum being paid for writing and arithmetic, and six boys are taught English on Mr. Nuttall's foundation. In 1747, Samuel Scoles gave £16 per annum, for which thirty-nine poor children of the township of Oldham are instructed at three different schools. A school was founded by subscription in the hamlet of Hollingwood, in this parish, in 1786, with an endowment of £8 per annum, chiefly from a bequest by the Rev. John Darbey in 1808, and £7 per annum from another benefaction, for which twenty children are instructed. Thomas Henshaw, Esq., by will dated the 14th November 1807, gave the sum of £20,000 for the endowment of a Blue coat school at Oldham, and a like sum for an asylum for the blind at Manchester, and subsequently added a codicil by which he gave the farther sum of £20,000, for the endowment of the school, with liberty to his trustees to establish it either at Oldham or Manchester on condition that persons at either place would provide a site and suitable buildings for the institution in this town, the trustees determined, upon establishing the school here. The testator having died in 1810, a bill was filed in the Court of Chancery by his heirs, praying that the will might be set aside, but a decree was ultimately obtained by the trustees in favour of the charity. In consequence of the delay occasioned by this suit, on the part of the inhabitants of Oldham and Manchester, on providing land and building, the sum bequeathed has accumulated to nearly £100,000; and three acres of land having been given for that purpose by R. Radcliffe and Joseph Jones, Esquires, the first stone of a commodious and substantial edifice in the English style of architecture, for the use of this school, was laid at Oldham-Edge, in April 1829, and the building completed at an expense of about £8000, defrayed by subscription. There are other benefactions for the education of boys and girls. A benevolent, or medical charity, for the relief of the poor, was established in 1814; and there is also a humane society. Hugh Oldham, Bishop of Exeter, and Mr. Thomas Henshaw, an opulent hat-manufacturer, whose munificent charitable endowments are noticed here and in Manchester, were both natives of this town.

OLDLAND, a chapelry in the parish of BITTON, upper division of the hundred of LANGLEY and SWINEHEAD, county of GLOUCESTER, 5 miles (E. S. E.) from Bristol, containing 4297 inhabitants. The chapel has lately received an addition of three hundred and eighty-five free sittings, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £408 towards defraying the expense. An additional chapel, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, has been built, under the provisions of a late act, towards defraying the expense of which the same society contributed £700; it contains one thousand and nineteen sittings, of which eight hundred and eighty-eight are free. The navigable river Avon, and the Julian way, pass in the vicinity.

OLDMOOR, a township in that part of the parish of BOTHALL which is in the eastern division of MORPETH ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 4 miles (N. E. by E.) from Morpeth, containing 79 inhabitants.

OLD-PARK, a township in that part of the parish of AUCKLAND ST. ANDREW which is in the south-eastern division of DARLINGTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Bishop-Auckland, containing 30 inhabitants.

OLDRIDGE, a chapelry in the parish of ST. THOMAS the APOSTLE, hundred of WONFORD, county of DEVON, 3 miles (S. by W.) from Crediton. The population is returned with the parish. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Exeter, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £800 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Tavistock. The chapel was erected at the expense of James Buller and the late Giles Yarde, Esqrs.

OLERSET, a hamlet in the parish of GLOSSOP, hundred of HIGH PEAK, county of DERBY, containing 293 inhabitants.

OLLERTON, a township in the parish of KNUTSFORD, hundred of BUCKLOW, county palatine of CHESTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Nether Knutsford, containing 246 inhabitants.

OLLERTON, a market town and chapelry in the parish of EDWINSTOW, Hatfield division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, county of NOTTINGHAM, $18\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Nottingham, and $138\frac{1}{4}$ (N. N. W.) from London, containing 576 inhabitants. This is a small town in the Forest of Sherwood, situated on the banks of the little river Mann. In the neighbourhood a considerable quantity of hops is produced. The market, which is but of trifling importance, is held on Friday; and there is a fair for cattle and sheep on the 1st of May. The chapel is a modern edifice in the English style of architecture. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. A small bequest for the education of poor children was left by Francis Thompson.

OLLERTON, a township in the parish of STOKES upon TERN, Drayton division of the hundred of BRADFORD (North), county of SALOP, $7\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Newport, containing 133 inhabitants.

OLNEY, a market town and parish, in the hundred of NEWPORT, county of BUCKINGHAM, 19 miles (N. E.) from Buckingham, and 57 (N. W. by N.) from London, containing 2339 inhabitants. The town is situated on the northern bank of the Ouse, and consists of one long street, paved, but not lighted: most of the houses were thatched previously to the occurrence of a destructive fire in 1786, and those erected since are covered with tiles; they are in general built of stone, and some of them are of very respectable appearance: the inhabitants enjoy an abundant supply of water. Over the Ouse is a bridge, with four large arches, and a considerable number of smaller ones, the latter extending across the adjoining low meadow lands, which are frequently overflowed during heavy rains. For keeping in repair this causeway and the foot-paths around the town there is an especial fund, arising from a public benefaction. The principal branch of manufacture was that of bone-lace, which has declined, in consequence of the general use of machinery; and a few persons are now employed in making worsted hose, and in silk-weaving, both of recent introduction. The market is held on Thursday; and there are fairs on Easter-Monday, June 29th, and October 21st. Courts leet and baron for the manor are held annually. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £13. 6. 8., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £500 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Earl of Dartmouth. The church, dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul, is a large ancient edifice, in the English style, with a handsome tower and a spire, which was partially rebuilt in 1807. In the churchyard was formerly a chapel, dedicated to the Virgin Mary, with a chantry, founded by Lord Basset. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists. National and Lancasterian schools are supported by subscription. Almshouses for twelve single women have been erected and endowed by the Misses Smith. Moses Browne, author of "Piscatory Eclogues," and other works, was vicar of Olney; and John Newton, afterwards minister of the parish of St. Mary Woolnoth, Lombard-street, London, and a popular preacher and writer, was once curate; at which time Cowper, the poet, resided here, his house and garden, with his favourite seat, being still shewn.

OLVESTON, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of LANGLEY and SWINEHEAD, county of GLOUCESTER, comprising the tythings of Olveston and Upper Tockington, and containing 1351 inhabitants, of which number, 681 are in the tything of Olveston, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W.) from Thornbury. The living is a vicarage, to which that of Elberton was united, in 1767, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Bishop of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £24, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Bristol. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The parish is partly bounded by the river Severn, and contains extensive strata of limestone.

OMBERSLEY, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of OSWALDSLOW, county of WORCESTER, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W.) from Droitwich, containing, with the townships of Borley, Hadley with Hay-Elms, Mayeux with Chatley, Northampton-Parsonage with Powers, Ombersley, Sychampton with Brookhampton and Comhampton, Uphampton, Winnall with Acton and Dunhampton, 1814 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, rated in the king's books at £15. 7. $3\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Marchioness of Downshire. The church, dedicated to St. Andrew, has lately been rebuilt, in the later style of English architecture, and is now one of the most elegant in the county: in the churchyard are the remains of an ancient cross, supported on steps. The river Severn passes through the parish. Here was formerly a market, granted by Edward III., but it has been long disused. A charity school was founded, in 1701, by Thomas Tolley, to which Thomas Baker, in 1722, bequeathed £100, and Richard Lloyd, in 1723, liberally endowed it with land and houses.

OMPTON, a township in that part of the parish of KNEESALL which is in the South-clay division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, county of NOTTINGHAM, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Ollerton, containing 106 inhabitants.

ONECOTE, a chapelry in that part of the parish of LEEK which is in the northern division of the hundred of TOTMONSLOW, county of STAFFORD, 5 miles (E. by S.) from Leek, containing 585 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Stafford, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £1400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Leek. The chapel is a small stone structure. There are copper-mines at Mixen, and small portions of copper and lead are found imbedded among limestone in most of the hills in the neighbourhood. Within the chapelry is a deep valley surrounded by rocks, called Narrowdale, in which the inhabitants, during several months in the year, cannot behold the sun.

ONE-HOUSE, a parish in the hundred of Stow, county of SUFFOLK, 2 miles (W.) from Stow-Market, containing 185 inhabitants, exclusively of the house of industry for the hundred of Stow, which is in this parish, and contains 235 inmates. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Sudbury, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £7. 2. 6, and in the patronage of R. Pettward, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. John the Baptist. Two streams, which run through the parish, are formed into ornamental pieces of water below the park. There is also a mineral spring. The chapel of Stow and the Hundred-House are situated within this parish.

ONELY, a hamlet in the parish of BARBY, hundred of FAWSLEY, county of NORTHAMPTON, 7 miles (N. W. by N.) from Daventry. The population is returned with the parish.

ONGAR (CHIPPING), a market town and parish in the hundred of ONGAR, county of ESSEX, 12 miles (W. by S.) from Chelmsford, and 21 (N. E.) from London, containing 768 inhabitants. Its name is derived from the Saxon aungre, i. e. the place, or, as Morant supposes, from the old word hangre, a hill, the addition of chipping, or cheaping, signifying a market. It was anciently denominated Ongar ad Castrum, on account of its castle, and to distinguish it from High Ongar, a village in the vicinity. The town is of considerable antiquity, having probably been founded by the Saxons soon after their settlement in England. At the time of the Norman survey, the manor was held in demesne by Eustace, Earl of Boulogne, and after passing through several families, came into the possession of Richard de Lucy, Chief Justice of England under Henry II., who procured for the town, as the head of the barony, a market and fairs, and built the castle on a high circular eminence to the east of it, surrounded by a moat and some earthworks, of which there are still traces; the castle itself was destroyed in the reign of Elizabeth. The town occupies an eminence on the bank of the river Roden, and consists principally of one long street, within the area of an extensive intrenchment, which may be distinctly traced: it is neither paved nor lighted, but amply supplied with water from wells and springs. A new road has been recently made through it from London to Clare, in Suffolk. A market for corn and cattle is held on Saturday; and there is a fair on the 12th of October, for hiring servants. The magistrates hold a petty session on the market day. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Essex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £6, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Mrs. Bennett. The church, dedicated to St. Martin, is a small neat structure, partly built with Roman bricks, and is remarkable for the castellated loop-hole appearance of its windows. There is a place of worship for Independents. A free school was founded, in 1678, pursuant to the will of Joseph King, a native of this town, who bequeathed to trustees five houses, the rents of which, amounting to £70 per annum, are applied to the education and apprenticing of six poor boys, for teaching poor girls to read, and for other charitable purposes; any one of the scholars that may be eligible for the University is entitled annually to £5 for four years from this fund.

ONGAR (HIGH), a parish in the hundred of ONGAR, county of ESSEX, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile (N. E.) from Chipping-Ongar, containing 1126 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Essex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £39. 10. 5. The Executors of the Rev. E. Earle were patrons in 1823. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is lofty and spacious, with an arched roof, having clouds, stars, and a rising sun, painted on it.

ONIBURY, a parish in the hundred of MUNSLOW, county of SALOP, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W.) from Ludlow, containing 445 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £8. 17. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Hereford. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. A court baron is occasionally held here. William Norton, in 1593, left a rent-charge of £6. 6. 8. for teaching poor children.

ONN (HIGH), a township in the parish of CHURCH-EATON, western division of the hundred of CUTTLESTONE, county of STAFFORD, $7\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Penkridge. The population is returned with the parish.

ONN (LITTLE), a township in the parish of CHURCH-EATON, western division of the hundred of CUTTLESTONE, county of STAFFORD, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Penkridge. The population is returned with the parish.

ONSTON, a township in the parish of WEAVERHAM, second division of the hundred of EDDISBURY, county palatine of CHESTER, 5 miles (W. by N.) from Northwich, containing 71 inhabitants.

OPENSHAW, a township in the parish of MANCHESTER, hundred of SALFORD, county palatine of LANCASTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by S.) from Manchester, containing 497 inhabitants.

ORBY, a parish in the Marsh division of the wapentake of CANDLESHOE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from Spilsby, containing 282 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £9. 19. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Lincoln. The church is dedicated to All Saints. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

ORCHARD (EAST), a parish in that part of the hundred of SIXPENNY-HANDLEY which is in the Shaston (West) division of the county of DORSET, 4 miles

(S. S. W.) from Shaftesbury, containing 193 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Iwerne-Minster, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol.

ORCHARD (WEST), a parish in that part of the hundred of SIXPENNY-HANDLEY which is in the Shaston (West) division of the county of DORSET, 5 miles (S. S. W.) from Shaftesbury, containing 173 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Fontmell-Magna, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol.

ORCHARD-PORTMAN, a parish in the hundred of TAUNTON and TAUNTON-DEAN, county of SOMERSET, 2 miles (S. S. E.) from Taunton, containing 100 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Taunton, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £7. 11. 5, and in the patronage of E. B. Portman, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Michael.

ORCHARDLEIGH, a parish in the hundred of FROME, county of SOMERSET, 2 miles (N.) from Frome, containing 27 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £2, and endowed with £600 royal bounty. T. S. Champneys, Esq. was patron in 1818.

ORCHESTON (ST. GEORGE), a parish in the hundred of HEYTESBURY, county of WILTS, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Amesbury, containing, with the tything of Elston, 177 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £19. 7. 6. The Rev. Francis Gibbs was patron in 1802.

ORCHESTON (ST. MARY), a parish in the hundred of BRANCH and DOLE, county of WILTS, 7 miles (N. W. by W.) from Amesbury, containing 110 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £13. 13. 9., and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Clare Hall, Cambridge.

ORCOP, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of WORMELOW, county of HEREFORD, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Ross, containing 491 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Chancellor of the diocese of Hereford, and in the patronage of William Palmer, Esq. Limestone is obtained here.

ORDSALL, a parish in the Hatfield division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, county of NOTTINGHAM, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S.) from East Retford, containing 632 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Nottingham, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £19. 10. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$, and in the patronage of Lord Wharncliffe. The church, dedicated to All Saints, exhibits various styles of architecture. On the river Idle, in this parish, are some paper-mills. The Chesterfield canal passes through the parish.

ORE, a parish in the hundred of BALDSLOW, rape of HASTINGS, county of SUSSEX, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Hastings, containing 546 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Lewes, and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £3. 0. 2 $\frac{1}{2}$. Miss Palmer was patroness in 1815. The church, dedicated to St. Helen, is principally in the later style of English architecture.

has been reduced to an inconsiderable hamlet. The town is situated on the river Alde, and consists of houses irregularly scattered and indifferently built: the streets are neither lighted nor paved, but the inhabitants are well supplied with water. Its decline is attributable to the loss of the harbour by the retiring of the sea, which, on its retreat, threw up a barrier that rendered the navigation dangerous. The oyster fishery is carried on here, under license from the corporation. Coal is imported, and corn exported to London and other places. The river Alde is navigable up to Aldborough quay, for vessels of three hundred tons' burden. The market, which was on Monday, is disused: a toy fair is held on June 24th.

The inhabitants received a charter of incorporation prior to the reign of Richard III., by which monarch, by Elizabeth, and by James I., their privileges were confirmed. Under the charter granted by King James, the corporation consists of a mayor, eight portmen, and twelve capital burgesses, assisted by a recorder, coroner, chamberlain, town clerk, two sergeants at mace, two water-bailiffs, and a harbour-master. The mayor and two portmen are justices of the peace. The corporation are empowered to hold sessions twice a year, or as often as may be requisite, and a court of record for the recovery of debts under 40s., at which the mayor, two portmen, the recorder, and the town clerk, preside. The freedom is obtained by gift or purchase for £5. The elective franchise was granted in the 23rd of Edward I., but the exercise of it was discontinued till the reign of Henry VIII., since which period two members have been regularly returned to parliament: the right of election is vested in the mayor, portmen, capital burgesses, and freemen not receiving alms: the number of voters is about one hundred: the mayor is the returning officer, and the patronage of the borough belongs to the Marquis of Hertford.

The living is a perpetual curacy, with the rectory of Sudbourne, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich. The church, which is dedicated to St. Bartholomew, was, when entire, a spacious and magnificent structure of great antiquity, with a square embattled tower: the chancel, now in ruins, appears to be more ancient than the rest of the building, and is separated from the church by a wall built across the east end of the nave; the ruins are in the Norman style, and consist of a single row of massive columns, supporting semicircular arches decorated with zigzag mouldings and other highly finished carvings; the columns are cased with hewn freestone, and display great diversity of style in their embellishments. In the church is a font of exquisite workmanship and great ORFORD, a borough and parish, formerly a market town, having separate jurisdiction, though locally in the hundred of Plomesgate, county of SUFFOLK, 20 miles (E. by N.) from Ipswich, and 89 (N. E. by E.) from London, containing, with the hamlet of Gedgrave, 1119 inhabitants. This was formerly a place of trade and importance, but antiquity, and, amongst several others, a monument to the memory of the Rev. Francis Mason, who died in 1621, at the advanced age of one hundred and ten years, eighty of which he was rector of Sudbourne. The porch, which is curious, was formerly adorned with eleven heads of kings, and is still decorated with escutcheons: the windows contain rich tracery, and there is an elegant cross of exquisite workmanship. At the west end of the town are the ruins of an ancient castle, supposed to have been built about the time of the Conquest, and evidently of Norman architecture; the keep only remains, a polygonal building of eighteen sides, flanked by three square embattled towers, equidistant from each other, on the north, north-east, and south-east; the lower part of the walls is solid, the upper parts contain chambers: the whole was formerly surrounded by a double fosse, with a bridge and gateway tower. This structure was anciently in the centre of the town, as the names of fields taken from streets formerly existing, and the frequent discovery of the foundations of buildings sufficiently prove. In the interior of the castle a room has been elegantly fitted up by the Marquis of Hertford, which commands two extensive views of the North sea, and one of the interior of the country for many miles. An hospital for a master and brethren was founded in the time of Edward II., and dedicated to St. Leonard, which continued until after 1586; and a priory of Augustine friars was founded in the 23rd of Edward I.: part of the walls of a monastery, and the burial-ground, yet remain; in the latter a quantity of bones and of Saxon and Roman coins has been found. On the south-east of this parish, towards the North sea, is a lighthouse; and in the parish of Sudbourne, a little north of the Ness, is another, together being designated "The Orford Ness Lights." Orford confers the title of earl upon the Walpole family.

ORFORTH, an extra-parochial district, in the southern division of the wapentake of WALSHCROFT, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN. The population is returned with the parish of Binbrooke St. Mary.

ORGARSWICK, a parish in the liberty of ROMNEY-MARSH, though locally in the hundred of Worth, lathe of SHEPWAY, county of KENT, 5 miles (N. N. E.) from New Romney, containing 10 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £3, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury. The church has been demolished.

ORGREAVE, a hamlet in the parish of ALREWAS, northern division of the hundred of OFFLOW, county of STAFFORD, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Lichfield, containing 87 inhabitants.

ORGREAVE, a township in that part of the parish of ROTHERHAM which is in the southern division of the wapentake of STRAFFORTH and TICKHILL, West riding of the county of YORK, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. by W.) from Rotherham, containing 47 inhabitants.

ORLESTONE, a parish partly in the liberty of ROMNEY-MARSH, and partly in the hundred of HAM, lathe of SHEPWAY, county of KENT, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by W.) from Ashford, containing 453 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £4. 15. 9., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of J. Thornhill, Esq.

The church is dedicated to St. Mary. The Royal Military canal passes through the parish, in which there are some chalybeate springs, but of no great efficacy.

ORLETON, a parish in the hundred of WOLPHY, county of HEREFORD, 6 miles (N. by E.) from Leominster, containing 574 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford, endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Governors of Lucton school. The Leominster canal passes through the parish. Courts leet and baron are held in March and October; and the petty sessions for the division take place here. There is a great fair for cattle annually on the 23rd and 24th of April. Blount, the celebrated antiquary, was a native of the parish, and lies buried in the chancel of the church.

ORLETON, a chapelry in the parish of EASTHAM, upper division of the hundred of DODDINGTREE, county of WORCESTER, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by S.) from Tenbury, containing 135 inhabitants.

ORLINGBURY, a parish in the hundred of ORLINGBURY, county of NORTHAMPTON, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Wellingborough, containing 343 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £20. 7. $3\frac{1}{2}$, and in the patronage of Sir B. W. Bridges, Bart. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. The Rev. Owen Manning, the editor of Lye's Saxon Dictionary, was born here in 1721.

ORMSBY, a parish partly in the eastern and partly in the western division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, North riding of the county of YORK, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Guildsborough, containing, with the chapelry of Eston, and the townships of Morton, Normanby, and Upsall, 785 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cleveland, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £6. 18. $6\frac{1}{2}$, and in the patronage of the Archbishop of York. The church is dedicated to St. Cuthbert. A rent-charge of £10, from an unknown benefactor, is paid for teaching poor children.

ORMSBY (ST. MARGARET), a parish in the eastern division of the hundred of FLEGG, county of NORFOLK, 3 miles (N. W.) from Caistor, containing, with Scratby, 687 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Ormsby St. Michael, and with which was united, in 1548, the vicarage of Scrowtby, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £10. 0. 10., endowed with £210 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Norwich.

ORMSBY (ST. MICHAEL), a parish in the eastern division of the hundred of FLEGG, county of NORFOLK, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Caistor, containing 261 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, united to the vicarage of Ormsby St. Margaret, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich.

ORMSBY (NORTH), a parish in the wapentake of LUDBOROUGH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $6\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Louth, containing 111 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £3, endowed with £600 royal bounty. The Misses E. and S. Ansell were patronesses in 1813. The church is dedicated to St. Helen. A monastery, for nuns and brethren of the Sempringham order, was founded here in the time of Stephen, by William, Earl of Albemarle, and Gilbert, son of Robert de Ormesby: it was dedicated to the Blessed Virgin Mary, and its revenue was valued at the dissolution at £80.

ORMSBY (SOUTH), a parish in the hundred of HILL, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $7\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Spilsby, containing, with Ketsby, 261 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with that of Ketsby, with which the vicarage of Calceby, and the rectory of Driby, were united in 1774: it is in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £14. 13. $11\frac{1}{2}$, and in the patronage of C. B. Massingberd, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Leonard. Within the parish are the remains of a Roman exploratory camp.

ORMSIDE, a parish in EAST ward, county of WEST-MORLAND, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. E. by S.) from Appleby, containing 202 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Carlisle, rated in the king's books at £17. 17. $3\frac{1}{2}$, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Carlisle. The church, dedicated to St. James, is a small ancient structure, situated on a commanding eminence. In the bed of the river Eden, which runs through the parish, several brazen vessels were discovered in 1689, which probably were placed there during the parliamentary war.

ORMSKIRK, a parish in the hundred of WEST DERBY, county palatine of LANCASTER, comprising the market town of Ormskirk, the chapelry of Skelmersdale, and the townships of Bickerstaffe, Birkdale, Burscough, Lathom, and Scarisbrick, and containing 12,422 inhabitants, of which number, 3838 are in the town of Ormskirk, 13 miles (N. N. E.) from Liverpool, 40 (S. by W.) from Lancaster, and 209 (N. W. by N.) from London. This place is supposed to derive its name from a church built here by two sisters of the name of Orm; and it constituted part of the possessions with which Robert Fitz-Henry, lord of Latham, endowed Burscough priory, an establishment founded by him for Black canons, in the reign of Richard I. The town, which is situated on the road from Liverpool to Preston, is clean and well built: it consists chiefly of four streets, diverging at right angles from a central area used as the market-place: it is not lighted, but paved under the direction of the surveyors of highways. Its trade and manufactures are on a limited scale; the principal establishments are hat-manufactories and roperies. The manufacture of cotton and silk has also been introduced, but the produce has hitherto been inconsiderable: there is also a small trade in balance-making. The loamy soil in this parish produces a great quantity of carrots, which are sent to the market at Liverpool; and the farmers in the neighbourhood are noted for the culture of early potatoes of a superior quality. The inhabitants have also long been famous for making gingerbread, which meets with a rapid sale in the surrounding towns, and is even exported. The disposal of local produce, and the importation of articles of consumption, are greatly facilitated by the Leeds and Liverpool canal and the Douglas navigation, which are about three miles distant from the town. There are considerable coal mines within the parish. The market, granted in the 14th of Edward I. to the prior of Burscough, is on Thursday; and fairs are held on Whit-Monday and Whit-Tuesday, and on the 8th of September. The petty sessions for the division are held here; and a court leet is held annually in October, at which a constable and other officers are appointed for the town. Quarter sessions, formerly held here, have been removed to Kirkdale.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £10, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Earl of Derby. The church, dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul, is of ancient, but obscure, foundation. It is stated to have been built at the expense of the two sisters above named, to a disagreement between whom, regarding the completion of the design, tradition ascribes the peculiarity of its possessing a tower and a steeple detached from each other: but it is more probable that the tower was erected for the express purpose of receiving eight bells, removed hither from Burscough priory, on the dissolution of that monastery. Within the building are a chapel and vault, constructed pursuant to the will, dated in 1572, of Edward, the third Earl of Derby, for a cemetery for that noble family, the deceased members of which have been interred here since the dissolution of the priory, when such bodies as were not already reduced to ashes, were removed hither. An episcopal chapel at Skelmersdale was erected by subscription in 1776, and greatly enlarged in 1823: it is presented to by the Vicar. That at Latham is a donative, belonging to Lord Skelmersdale. There are places of worship for Independents, Methodists of the New Connexion, and Unitarians. The free grammar school was founded about 1614, and is endowed with various benefactions, producing £138. 15. per annum: the salary of the master is £60 per annum, with permission to receive small gratuities: the school is open to all boys of the parish, and about forty free scholars are instructed in classical and general literature. A school-room, in Church-street, was built in 1724, at the expense of James, Earl of Derby, for a Blue-coat school, now called the United charity school, in which seventy boys and fifty girls receive gratuitous instruction on Dr. Bell's plan: it is supported partly from permanent funds, amounting to about £32 per annum, and partly by subscriptions. There is also an infant school. A dispensary was established in 1705; and a bank for savings in 1822.

ORPINGTON, a parish in the hundred of RUXLEY, lathe of SUTTON at HONE, county of KENT, 3 miles (S. by W.) from Foot's Cray, containing 754 inhabitants. The living comprises a sinecure rectory and a discharged vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of St. Mary Cray, the rectory rated in the king's books at £30. 14. 4½., and in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the vicarage at £11. 10. 5., and in the patronage of the Rector. The church is dedicated to All Saints. There is a place of worship for Independents. The river Cray, which has its source in this parish, gives name to several places in the neighbourhood. Queen Elizabeth was splendidly entertained at the manor-house in 1573. Orpington is entitled to participate in the advantages of a school at St. Mary Cray.

ORRELL, a joint township with Ford, in the parish of SEPHTON, hundred of WEST DERBY, county palatine of LANCASTER, 4½ miles (N.) from Liverpool, containing, with Ford, 217 inhabitants.

ORRELL, a township in that part of the parish of WIGAN which is in the hundred of WEST DERBY, county palatine of LANCASTER, 3¼ miles (W.) from Wigan, containing 2106 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Independents. At Orrell Mount is an establishment of French Benedictine nuns, who, driven by the Revolution from their native country, first settled at Heath in Yorkshire, and in 1821 removed hither. There are mines of coal in the neighbourhood.

ORSETT, a parish in the hundred of BARSTABLE, county of ESSEX, 18½ miles (S. S. W.) from Chelmsford, containing 1130 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the jurisdiction of the Commissary of Essex and Herts, concurrently with the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of London, rated in the king's books at £29. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church is dedicated to St. Giles and All Saints. There is an endowed school for educating and clothing fourteen boys, founded by Edward Anson, Esq. Orsett Hall, the manor-house, was erected upwards of three hundred and fifty years ago. In the neighbourhood are vestiges of ancient intrenchments, enclosing four or five acres.

ORSTON, a parish in the northern division of the wapentake of BINGHAM, county of NOTTINGHAM, 6¼ miles (E. by N.) from Bingham, containing, with a part of Flawborough chapelry, 391 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, to which is annexed the perpetual curacies of Scanington and Thoroton, in the archdeaconry of Nottingham, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £12. 4. 7., and in the patronage of the Dean of Lincoln. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The small river Smite runs through the parish; and here is a powerful chalybeate spring impregnated with sulphur. Limestone abounds here. Orston is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s.

ORTON, a parish in the ward and county of CUMBERLAND, comprising the townships of Baldwin-Holme and Orton, and containing 442 inhabitants, of which number, 208 are in the township of Orton, 5½ miles (W. by S.) from Carlisle. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Carlisle, rated in the king's books at £9, and in the patronage of Sir Wastell Brisco, Bart. Near the church is the school-house, endowed, in 1785, by Thomas Pattinson, with the interest of £100, for teaching ten children. A market, once held here, has been long disused. Orton was anciently of greater importance than it is now, many Roman remains having been discovered in the neighbourhood. The whole parish was formerly encompassed by a rampart and ditch, and at each extremity of two lanes, running northward and eastward from the village, is an intrenchment for the defence of the road, across which an iron chain was fixed, to guard against sudden attacks from the moss-troopers during the border warfare. A remarkably neat sandal was found some years since in digging peat. Coal is found in the parish. William Nicholson, a learned divine and antiquary, was born here in 1655; he died in 1727.

ORTON, a chapelry in the parish and hundred of ROTHWELL, county of NORTHAMPTON, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Kettering, containing 91 inhabitants.

ORTON, a liberty in the parish of WOMBOURNE, southern division of the hundred of SEISDON, county of STAFFORD, containing 170 inhabitants.

ORTON, a market town and parish, in EAST ward, county of WESTMORLAND, 9 miles (S.W. by S.) from Appleby, and 275 (N.W. by N.) from London, containing, with part of Birbeck Fells and Fawcett Forest, 1525 inhabitants. The town is pleasantly situated near the river Lune, and consists chiefly of one irregular street, which is neither paved nor lighted: it is supplied with water by two small rivulets, which unite at its extremity. The knitting of hose was formerly carried on to a considerable extent, but has now fallen into decay. There is a copper mine in the neighbourhood, which also abounds with limestone: at Coalflat, about a mile from the town, is a small mill for spinning flax. A small market is held on Friday, the grant of which was confirmed by Cromwell, in 1653; and there are fairs on May 3rd, Friday before Whit-Sunday, and on the second Friday after Old Michaelmas, for horned cattle and sheep. The land is freehold, the manorial rights being vested in the landowners; the freeholders elect four nominal lords, who hold a court occasionally for the enrollment of the names of purchasers of land, and for other matters. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Carlisle, rated in the king's books at £16. 17. 3½., and in the patronage of the Landowners. The church, which is dedicated to All Saints, stands upon rising ground on the north side of the town; it is a neat edifice, in the ancient style of English architecture, with a low embattled tower: in the interior is a monument in memory of Dr. Richard Burn, vicar of Orton, chancellor of the diocese, author of treatises on "The Office of a Justice of the Peace," and on "Ecclesiastical Law," and, conjointly with Joseph Nicholson, of the History of Westmorland and Cumberland. The free school, which was founded by subscription, about 1730, was rebuilt on a different spot in 1809; Mrs. Frances Wardale, in 1781, bequeathed the sum of £400, which with other benefactions produces annually £21. 15.; from seventy to eighty children are instructed, those who can afford it paying a small quarterage. At Tebay, within this parish, is a free grammar school, endowed by Robert Adamson, in 1672, with land in Kendal parish, producing £45 per annum; about sixty children are instructed gratuitously: another, at Greenholme, was endowed by George Gibson, Esq., in 1733, with £400 original Bank stock: the master receives a small quarterly payment from some of the children. On the highest part of Orton Scar there was formerly a beacon, communicating with those of Penrith, Stanmore, and Whinfell, in Kendale; and behind the Scar, to the east, is Castle-Folds, a place of safety for cattle, in case of incursions from the Scottish borderers, before the union of the two kingdoms. Near Raisgill hall is a circular tumulus of loose stones, one hundred yards in circumference, on digging beneath which, a human skeleton and several bones were found. In a field, called "Gamelanes," is a number of large granite stones, considered to be the remains of a Druidical temple. Near the church is Our Lady's Well, with a small chapel, formerly appropriated to the reception of offerings made by pilgrims. Dr. Thomas Barlow, Bishop of Lincoln, and a writer of some eminence, was born in this parish in 1607; he died in 1691.

ORTON on the HILL, a parish in the hundred of SPARKENHOE, county of LEICESTER, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.) from Atherstone, containing 370 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Leicester, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £6. 12. 8., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Oxford. The church is dedicated to St. Edith. This parish is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s.

ORTON-LONGVILLE, a parish in the hundred of NORMAN-CROSS, county of HUNTINGDON, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.W. by W.) from Peterborough, containing 213 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, to which that of Botolph-Bridge was united in 1721, in the archdeaconry of Huntingdon, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £12. 6. 5½., and in the patronage of the Earl of Aboyne. The church is dedicated to the Holy Trinity.

ORTON-WATERVILLE, a parish in the hundred of NORMAN-CROSS, county of HUNTINGDON, 3 miles (S.W. by W.) from Peterborough, containing 282 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Huntingdon, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £12. 11. 5½., and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Pembroke Hall, Cambridge. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

ORWELL, a parish in the hundred of WETHERLEY, county of CAMBRIDGE, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.N.W.) from Royston, containing 475 inhabitants. The living comprises a sinecure rectory and a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Ely, the rectory rated in the king's books at £19. 19. 4½., and the vicarage at £7. 10. 10., the former in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Trinity College, Cambridge, and the latter in that of the Rector. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew. At Malton, anciently a distinct parish, is a desecrated church, now used as a barn. A school for poor children was founded and liberally endowed, in 1750, by the Rev. John Colbatch, D.D., some time rector.

OSBALDESTON, a township in the parish, and lower division of the hundred, of BLACKBURN, county palatine of LANCASTER, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.W. by N.) from Blackburn, containing 319 inhabitants.

OSBALDWICK, a parish in the liberty of St. PETER of YORK, East riding, though locally in the wapentake of Bulmer, North riding, of the county of YORK, comprising the townships of Murton and Osbaldwick, and containing 310 inhabitants, of which number, 176 are in the township of Osbaldwick $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E.) from York. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Prebendary of Strensall in the Cathedral Church of York, rated in the king's books at £4, and endowed with £600 royal bounty. The church is dedicated to St. Thomas.

OSBASTON, a township partly in the parish of MARKET-BOSWORTH, but chiefly in that of CADEBY, hundred of SPARKENHOE, county of LEICESTER, 2 miles (N.E.) from Market-Bosworth, containing 176 inhabitants.

OSBOURNBY, a parish in the wapentake of AVELAND, parts of KESTIVEN, county of LINCOLN, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.) from Falkingham, containing 428 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £7. 0. 5., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Duke of Devonshire. The church, dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul, is principally in the decorated style of architecture: it contains some stalls, the remains of a rood-loft, screen, and a large ancient font.

OSGARTHORPE, a parish in the western division of the hundred of GOSCOTE, county of LEICESTER, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Ashby de la Zouch, containing 352 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Leicester, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £7, and in the patronage of the Marquis of Hastings. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. A free school was erected by Thomas Hardy, Esq., who, in 1670, vested in trustees so much money as would purchase lands to the value of £100 a year, for the maintenance of a schoolmaster and six clergymen's widows. A canal passes from Barrow Hill, in this parish, crosses the parish of Sheepshead, and terminates in that of Loughborough.

OSGODBY, a township in the parish of LAVINGTON, or LINTON, wapentake of BELTISLOE, parts of KESTIVEN, county of LINCOLN, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Corby, containing 95 inhabitants.

OSGODBY, a joint parish with Kirkby, in the northern division of the wapentake of WALSHCROFT, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 4 miles (N. W.) from Market-Rasen. The population is returned with Kirkby. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

OSGODBY, a township in the parish of HEMINGBROUGH, wapentake of OUZE and DERWENT, East riding of the county of YORK, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Selby, containing 185 inhabitants.

OSGODBY, a township in the parish of CAYTON, PICKERING lythe, North riding of the county of YORK, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. by E.) from Scarborough, containing 72 inhabitants.

OSGOODBY-GRANGE, a hamlet in that part of the parish of KILBURN which is in the liberty of RIPON, West riding of the county of YORK, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by S.) from Thirsk. The population is returned with the township of Hood.

OSLESTON, a joint township with Thurvaston, in the parish of SUTTON on the HILL, hundred of APPLE-TREE, county of DERBY, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Derby, containing, with Thurvaston, 440 inhabitants.

OSLOW, a township in the parish of CHURCH-EATON, western division of the hundred of CUTTLESTONE, county of STAFFORD. The population is returned with the parish.

OSMASTON, a parish in the hundred of APPLE-TREE, county of DERBY, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. E. by S.) from Ashbourn, containing 296 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Derby, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, and in the patronage of the Rector of Brailsford. The church, dedicated to St. Martin, has lately received an addition of forty-eight free sittings, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £50 towards defraying the expense.

VOL. III.

OSMASTON, a parish in the hundred of REPTON and GRESLEY, county of DERBY, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. E.) from Derby, containing 159 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Derby, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Sir Robert Wilmot, Bart. The church is dedicated to All Saints. The river Derwent and the Derby canal pass through the parish.

OSMINGTON, a parish in the hundred of CULLIFORD-TREE, Dorchester division of the county of DORSET, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Melcombe-Regis, containing 318 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £11. 0. $2\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Salisbury. The church is dedicated to St. Osmond. The parish is bounded on the south by the English channel.

OSMOTHERLEY, a township in the parish of ULVERSTONE, hundred of LONSDALE, north of the sands, county palatine of LANCASTER, 3 miles (N. by W.) from Ulverstone, containing 264 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. A school has been erected by subscription; the income is about £10. 10. per annum, for which twenty children are educated.

OSMOTHERLEY, a parish in the wapentake of ALLERTONSHIRE, North riding of the county of YORK, comprising the townships of Ellerbeck, West Harsley, Osmotherley, and Thimbleby, and containing 1087 inhabitants, of which number, 755 are in the township of Osmotherley, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. N. E.) from North Allerton. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Court of the Bishop of Durham for Allerton and Allertonshire, rated in the king's books at £8. 10., endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £1000 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Durham. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. Here are places of worship for the Society of Friends, Wesleyan Methodists, and Roman Catholics. There are extensive quarries of freestone in the parish, and mills for spinning small cordage. Two small endowments were bequeathed by the Rev. Mr. Nicholson, in 1757, and by Daniel Tyerman, in 1786, for teaching poor children. A Carthusian priory was founded here, about 1396, by Thomas, Duke of Surrey, the revenue of which, at the dissolution, was valued at £323. At West Harley are the remains of a castle, the tower of which having been much damaged by a thunder-storm, was, a few years since, taken down.

OSPRINGE-LIBERTY, a parish in the hundred of FAVERSHAM, lathe of SCRAY, county of KENT, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile (W. S. W.) from Faversham, containing 912 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £10, and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of St. John's College, Cambridge. The church, dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul, is principally in the early style of English architecture. This was doubtless the site of the ancient Durolevum, though some have fixed that station at Newington. A Roman fortification and burial-place have been discovered here, besides numerous Roman antiquities of various kinds. Ospringe is an independent franchise, governed by its own constable, and has a fair annually on May 25th.

Here is a neat range of infantry barracks, erected during the late war. On a stream which flows through the village are extensive gunpowder-mills, belonging to government, and on its northern bank are some remains of a Maison Dieu, founded by Henry III., about 1235, and dedicated to the Blessed Virgin Mary; it was formerly of great repute, and consisted of a master and three brethren of the order of the Holy Cross, and two Secular clerks; but falling into decay, at the close of the reign of Edward IV., it escheated to the crown, and its remains have since been converted into dwelling-houses.

OSSETT, a chapelry in that part of the parish of DEWSBURY which is in the lower division of the wapentake of AGBRIGG, West riding of the county of YORK, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W.) from Wakefield, containing 4775 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, endowed with £800 private benefaction, £800 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Dewsbury. The chapel, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, has lately received an addition of three hundred free sittings, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £300 towards defraying the expense. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. A school was established by subscription in 1745; part of the money was applied for the erection of a school-room and a house for the master, and the remaining portion was invested in the purchase of certain premises, producing about £20 per annum; for several years the income has been allowed to accumulate for the repair of the school-house, and establishing a Sunday school.

OSSINGTON, a parish in the northern division of the wapentake of THURGARTON, county of NOTTINGHAM, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Tuxford, containing 301 inhabitants. The living is a donative, in the patronage of J. E. Denison, Esq. The church is dedicated to the Holy Rood.

OSWALD (KIRK), county of CUMBERLAND.— See KIRK-OSWALD.

OSWALD (ST.), county of NORTHUMBERLAND.— See WALL.

OSWALD-KIRK, a parish in the wapentake of RYEDALE, North riding of the county of YORK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from Helmsley, containing 212 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cleveland, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £10. 1. 8., and in the patronage of William Gray, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Oswald, is principally in the Norman style. Here are the remains of an old monastic edifice. Eight poor children are instructed for £4 a year, the gift of Mary Fyshe, and the charity school has an endowment of £5 per annum, by Thomas Carter. Roger Dodsworth, the antiquary, was born at Newton-Grange, in 1585; he died in 1654.

OSWALDTWISTLE, a township in that part of the parish of WHALLEY which is in the lower division of the hundred of BLACKBURN, county palatine of LANCASTER, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by S.) from Blackburn, containing 4960 inhabitants. Here are print-works on a large scale, and other establishments for the manufacture of cotton goods. Coal is obtained in the township.

OSWESTRY, a borough, market town, and parish, having separate jurisdiction, though locally in the hundred of Oswestry, county of SALOP, comprising the townships of Llanforda with Trefarclawdd, Pontregaer, and Llynymon; Maesbury with Morton and Crickheath; Middleton with Aston, Hisland, and Wooton; Weston with Sweeney, Treflach, and Trefonnen; and containing 7523 inhabitants, of which number, 3910 are in the town of Oswestry, 17 miles (N. W.) from Shrewsbury, and 180 (N. W.) from London. This town is supposed to have been founded, in the fourth century, by the Britons, and having been given by Cunetha Wledic, Prince of North Wales, to his son Ussa, in the sixth century, was named Maes Usswalt, and subsequently Maserfield. Its present appellation is a corruption of the Saxon Oswaldstre, Oswald's tree, or town, and originated in a battle fought here, August 5th, 642, between Oswald, the Christian King of Northumberland, and Penda, the Pagan King of Mercia, in which the former was slain; and the members of his body were severally affixed to three crosses, in token of conquest, and in derision of his religious tenets: on this account also the Welch called it Croes Oswald, which name they still retain. The esteem in which Oswald had been held by the monks led to his canonization; the scene of his death became hallowed, miraculous virtues were attributed to his relics, and a monastery was soon afterwards raised to his memory, from which institution this place received the appellation of Blanc minster, with other names of similar import. Oswestry continued in the possession of the Britons, and constituted a portion of the kingdom termed Powysland, until the year 777, when it was annexed to the kingdom of Mercia, by conquest, and an earthen mound, called Clawdd Offa, Offa's dyke, and vulgarly the Devil's ditch, was raised, as a line of demarcation between that kingdom and the principality of Wales. This dyke extends from the river Wye, along the counties of Hereford, Radnor, Montgomery, and Denbigh, and terminates near the Clwydian hills; near this town it crosses the race-course on Cefn-y-bwch. Parallel with it, but at unequal distances, is a similar rampart, called Watt's Dyke, or perhaps originally Watch Dyke, from the number of Watch forts on its course: the Welch call it Clawdd Wat, from Cadwalader, King of Wales. The formation of this work is of much earlier date, and is ascribed to the Britons, as a means of defence against Roman invasion: the intervening space was esteemed neutral ground, whereon the Britons, Daves, &c., were accustomed to meet for the purpose of traffic, without molestation. On the line of Watt's Dyke, about a mile northward of the town, is another work of the ancient Britons, denominated by their descendants Llys Ogran, or Ogyrvan, or Caer Ogran, Ogran's palace, or strong hold; and also Hén Dinas, old camp or city: its present name is Old Fort, or, by corruption, Old Port, and it is occasionally called Old Oswestry, there being a vulgar tradition that it was anciently the site of the town: it was a famous military post, being a lofty natural eminence, of an oblong shape, and surrounded by a deep triple intrenchment on the summit and sides, the area comprising nearly sixteen acres, and the fortifications, which are covered with timber and brushwood, upwards of forty.

Oswestry is not mentioned in the Norman survey: according to Dugdale, it was given by the Conqueror to Alan, ancestor of the Fitz-Alans, Earls of Arundel, in which noble family the barony continued upwards of five hundred years; but another authority states that the Fitz-Alans became lords of it by marriage of one of the lords of Clun with Maud, widow of Madog ap Meredydd, who, on partition of Powysland by his father, succeeded to the division termed Powys Vadog, of which Oswestry formed part. This was Madog's chief residence, and, according to the Welch records, he built the castle about 1149, though the English historians mention it to have existed before the Conquest: it stood on an artificial mound on the north-west side of the town, but there are scarcely any remains. When Henry II. attempted to subjugate the principality, in the year 1164, he assembled his army and encamped here for a considerable time, prior to the sanguinary conflict beneath Castell Crogen, now Chirk castle, the scene of which is yet marked by a heap of stones, called Adw'yr Bedhan, or the Passage of the Graves. During the contest between John and the barons, about 1216, the castle was destroyed by fire, and, in 1233, the town experienced a similar fate from Llewellyn ap Iorwerth, Prince of Wales. In 1277, Edward I., still meditating the subjugation of Wales, began to surround this town with walls, for the completion of which he imposed a murage tax upon the county for six years: they were about a mile in circumference, had four gates, and were flanked by a foss. Soon after the dissolution of the parliament held at Shrewsbury, in which the Duke of Hereford, afterwards Henry IV., accused the Duke of Norfolk of treasonable expressions, those illustrious persons were cited to appear before the king, and the commissioners appointed by that parliament, in this town. During an insurrection of the Welch, under Owen Glyndwr, in 1400, Oswestry was again nearly destroyed by fire; and in 1403; that renowned leader, having caused himself to be proclaimed Prince of Wales, assembled a force of twelve thousand men here, with a view to join Lord Percy against the king; but this union was not effected; and, on the issue of that celebrated battle, Glyndwr retreated precipitately into Wales. At the commencement of the parliamentary war, Oswestry was garrisoned in support of the royal cause; but on June 22nd, 1644, the forces were compelled to surrender to a detachment of the parliamentary army, under the command of the Earl of Denbigh and General Mytton: an ineffectual attempt was made to retake the town, and a few years afterwards the castle was demolished. A great part of the town was destroyed by casual fires, which occurred in 1542, 1544, and 1567: the western suburb is yet called Pentre poedd, the burnt town. In 1559, the plague swept off more than five hundred of its inhabitants, on which occasion the market was removed to a place on the road to Welchpool, about half a mile distant, where is the base of an old cross, called Croes Willin, which is supposed to have been erected at the time; in 1585, a similar visitation took place, and during its continuance, the flannel market, for which Oswestry was then noted, was held at Knockin.

The town, situated on the road from London to Holyhead, occupies the declivity of a range of hills which skirt it on the western side, and commands an extensive view over the fertile plain of Salop: the streets are paved and lighted, under the provisions of an act obtained in 1810, gas having been introduced in 1825; the old buildings, of timber and brick, have been succeeded by respectable modern edifices, and the town, which has long since stretched beyond its ancient boundaries, is still progressively increasing in size, and improving in appearance. A neat theatre, in Willow-street, is occupied by a respectable company in the autumn; races are held annually in September; and accommodation for occasional assemblies is provided at the Wynnstay Arms. The sale of Welch flannel and of cotton goods, which was formerly carried on to a great extent, was removed to Shrewsbury about 1625: at present the chief business of the town is in malting, and there is some trade in flannel. Coal abounds in the neighbourhood. The markets are on Wednesday and Saturday, the former being the principal. A fair on the eve, day, and morrow of St. Andrew was granted by Henry III.; fairs are also held on the third Wednesday in January, March 15th, May 12th, Wednesday before Midsummer-day, August 15th, Friday before September 29th, and December 10th. The first charter was granted to the inhabitants by William Fitz-Alan, their feudal lord, in the reign of Henry II., and the first royal charter by Richard II., confirmations having been received from subsequent sovereigns: the borough is now governed by the charter of Charles II., under which the corporate body consists of a mayor, high steward, twelve aldermen, and fifteen common council-men, assisted by a recorder, coroner, town clerk, murenger, and other officers. The mayor, recorder, and murenger, are elected by the aldermen and members of the common council; the high-steward and town clerk are appointed by the lord of the manor: the mayor for the preceding year acts as coroner. Courts for the borough, and petty sessions for the hundred, are held here. The guildhall is a plain stone edifice, with a small turret, comprising apartments for holding quarter sessions and other public meetings, and a jury-room; it is private property, and forms one side of the square denominated Bailey-head: near it is the town clerk's office, a lofty edifice built with the stone which formerly belonged to the town gates; behind it is a small prison.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £23. 15. 7½., and in the patronage of Lord Clive. The church, dedicated to St. Oswald, was originally the conventual church of the ancient monastery, and was greatly damaged during the commotions of 1616 and 1644, at which latter period the tower was taken down by the royalists, lest, as it stood without the town walls, their opponents should annoy them from its summit. On the north side of the churchyard is a pleasant walk, shaded by a double row of lime trees, and terminated by an alcove. A chapel of ease was erected, in 1810, at Trefonnen, in this parish, by subscription, for the accommodation of the Welch inhabitants, the service being performed in the Welch language. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists.

The free grammar school was founded, about the time of Henry IV., by Davy Holbecke, and endowed with land then worth £10; in 1776, the sum of £780 was raised by subscription, for the erection of a new school-room and a residence for the master; at the same time a field, called Cae Groes, from having contained the cross, or pole, on which the mangled remains of Oswald were exposed, was given to the school by Sir W. W. Wynn, Bart., having been regularly conveyed to it, by deed dated September 22nd, 1815, at a small rental, by the present baronet of that name: the premises then begun were completed by the present master, who also recovered about twenty-six acres of land for the institution, which had been considered lost. The annual rental arising from the original endowment is about £260: the master's salary, including the value of the house, &c., is about £300 per annum, and he receives a considerable number of boarders: the school is free to all the sons of parishioners for instruction in English and classical literature. Thomas Bray, D.D., a learned divine, the principal promoter of the "Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts," and the founder of parochial and lending libraries, received the early part of his education at this school. A National school for boys and girls is held in apartments above the town clerk's office and town hall, and is supported by voluntary contributions, the National Society having contributed £200 towards its establishment; here also schoolmasters are prepared for Wales. The house of industry, a spacious and handsome edifice of brick, about a mile from the town, was erected for the poor of this town and parish, and those of ten neighbouring parishes, with the township of Llwyntedman, in the parish of Llany-mynech, at the joint expense of the respective places, pursuant to an act passed in 1791. There is a society for ameliorating the condition of the poor. A little westward from the town is Oswald's well, a small basin under an arch in the recess of a stone wall, with a crowned head of Oswald, near the spot where that monarch is supposed to have fallen; a chapel formerly stood near it. On the ancient walls which surrounded the town were several towers, and the entrance was through four gates, called respectively, New gate, Beatrice gate, Willow, or, more properly, Wallia gate, and Black gate, the last-named having been taken down in 1766, and the others in 1782. Oswestry confers the inferior title of baron on the Duke of Norfolk.

OSYTH (ST.) CHICH, a parish in the hundred of TENDRING, county of ESSEX, 11 miles (S. E.) from Colchester, containing 1414 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Colchester, and diocese of London, and in the patronage of F. Nassau, Esq. The church is a large, irregular building, some parts being of considerable antiquity, and others of the time of Henry VI.: in the chancel are two handsome monuments in alabaster, erected to the memory of the two first Lords D'Arcy, and their wives. A creek, or arm of the river Coln, dividing into two branches, leads to two wharfs in this parish, and is navigable for barges and sloops. At the south-eastern boundary are a martello tower, for the defence of the coast, and a signal station. A school is endowed with land producing about £7 per annum. This place, remarkable for the remains of its noble monastery, derives its name from St. Osyth, daughter of Redwald, King of East Anglia, who, having made a vow of virginity, retired hither, where she founded a church and a nunnery: these were afterwards plundered by the Danes, who beheaded the foundress near an adjacent fountain. About the year 1118, Belmeis, Bishop of London, established a priory for Augustine canons on the supposed site of the nunnery, which, at the dissolution, had a revenue of £758. 5. 8. The quadrangle of this building is almost entire, excepting part of the north side, where are some modern apartments: the entrance is by a beautiful gateway of hewn stone, mixed with flints, having two towers and posterns: to the east are three towers, one larger and loftier than the rest.

OTFORD, a parish in the hundred of CODSHEATH, lathe of SUTTON at HONE, county of KENT, 3 miles (N.) from Seven-Oaks, containing 630 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Canterbury, endowed with £400 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £900 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Westminster. The church, dedicated to St. Bartholomew, is principally in the decorated style of architecture. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. An hospital for lepers existed here in the reign of Henry III. The river Darent runs through the parish. In the village are the extensive ruins of an ancient palace of the Archbishops of Canterbury, once the residence of the celebrated Thomas à Becket, the square tower of which is still in good preservation: some idea may be formed of its extent and grandeur from the repairs, in Warham's time, having cost upwards of £33,000. Near it is a well, thirty feet deep and fifteen in diameter, enclosed by a wall, which is called Thomas à Becket's well, and said to have been used by him as a bath. Archbishop Winchelsea died here in 1313. At this place, in 773, Offa, King of Mercia, gained a great victory over Ealhmund, King of Kent; and here Edmund Ironside, in 1016, defeated the Danes with great slaughter: many skeletons and bones of the slain have been discovered in the neighbourhood.

OTHAM, a parish in the hundred of EYHORNE, lathe of AYLESFORD, county of KENT, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Maidstone, containing 337 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £9. 17. 3½., and in the patronage of the Rev. W. Horne. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas. The small river Lenham forms the northern boundary of the parish, in which there is an abundance of what is called Kentish ragstone. An abbey of Premonstratensian canons was founded here, and dedicated to the Blessed Virgin and St. Lawrence, about the time of Henry II.; but, in the reign of John, they removed to a more convenient situation at Beaulieu, in the parish of Frant. Bishop Horne was born in this parish in 1730; he died in 1792.

OTHERTON, a township in that part of the parish of PENKRIDGE which is in the eastern division of the hundred of CUTTLESTONE, county of STAFFORD, 1 mile (S. S. E.) from Penkridge, with which the population is returned.

OTHERY, a parish in the hundred of WHITLEY, county of SOMERSET, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Langport, containing, with a part of Boroughbridge, 509 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, within the jurisdiction of Glastonbury, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £12, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bath and Wells. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is a large cruciform structure, with a handsome tower, seventy-five feet in height. The navigable river Parret forms the western and southern boundaries of the parish, in which there is a quarry of good building stone.

OTLEY, a parish in the hundred of CARLFORD, county of SUFFOLK, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.W. by N.) from Woodbridge, containing 629 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £16. 6. $5\frac{1}{2}$, and in the patronage of the Earl of Abergavenny. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

OTLEY, a parish comprising the market town of Otley, the chapelries of Baildon, Bramhope, Būrley, and Poole, and the townships of Esholt, Hawksworth, and Menstone, in the upper division of the wapentake of SKYRACK, and the chapelry of Denton in the lower, and the townships of Farnley, Lindley, Newhall with Clifton, and Little Timble in the upper, division of the wapentake of CLARO, West riding of the county of YORK, and containing 9358 inhabitants, of which number, 3065 are in the market town of Otley, 28 miles (W. by S.) from York, and 206 (N.N.W.) from London. The name has been considered a contraction of Oat-lea, from the quantity of oats formerly cultivated in the neighbourhood; but, with more probability, and on better evidence, it is believed to be a corruption of Othelai, as spelt in Domesday-book, meaning the field of Othe, or Otho. The town, which is pleasantly situated on the banks of the river Wharf, is small, and neatly built. A few persons are employed in the worsted manufacture. Considerable quantities of smelts, eels, and trout, are taken in the river, near Otley, and occasionally salmon. The market, which is amply supplied with corn, cattle, sheep, and calves, is on Friday; and fairs are held, on the first Monday after August 2nd, for horses and cattle; on the Friday between New and Old Martinmas day, for hiring servants; and on every second Monday, for cattle and sheep.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £13. 1. 8., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, which is dedicated to All Saints, was originally of Norman architecture, but of the ancient building the north door alone remains: it is a spacious edifice, and contains several monuments of the families of Fairfax, Fawkes, Vavasour, &c. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists. The free grammar school, founded by means of a bequest of £250 from Thomas Cave, in the year 1602, was established by letters patent of James I., and named, in honour of the then Prince of Wales, "The Free Grammar School of Prince Henry;" the above bequest having been augmented by subscription, a school-room, and other apartments, were erected about 1611, under the direction of the governors; the master receives £20 per annum: the school is open for gratuitous classical instruction to the sons of parishioners, but three boys only are taught on the foundation, and about forty are instructed by the usher, in English grammar, writing, and arithmetic, on paying quarterage. Here was anciently an hospital for lepers. Sir Thomas, afterwards

Lord Fairfax, the celebrated parliamentary general, was born at Denton Park, in this parish, in the year 1611, and died in the same house, on the 12th of November, 1671.

OTTERBOURNE, a parish in the hundred of BUDDLESGATE, Fawley division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.S.W.) from Winchester, containing 565 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Hursley, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Vicar of Hursley. The church is dedicated to St. Matthew. The Itchen navigation passes through the parish, which is within the jurisdiction of the Cheyney Court held at Winchester every Thursday, for the recovery of debts to any amount.

OTTERBURN, a township in that part of the parish of KIRKBY in MALHAM-DALE which is in the western division of the wapentake of STAINCLIFFE and EWCROSS, West riding of the county of YORK, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.E.) from Settle, containing 40 inhabitants.

OTTERBURN-WARD, a township in the parish of ELSDON, southern division of COQUETDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 11 miles (N.E. by N.) from Bellingham, containing 388 inhabitants, who are principally employed in the manufacture of woollen cloth, including carding, dyeing, and fulling. Otterburn castle was a strong fortress well adapted for sustaining the frequent attacks of the Scottish borderers. Here was fought, in 1388, the famous battle between the English, under Henry Percy, surnamed Hotspur, and the Scots, commanded by Earl Douglas, in which the latter fell by the sword of the former, who, with many of his knights, was afterwards taken prisoner. The ancient and popular ballad of "Chevy Chase," in which, however, there are material deviations from historical facts, was founded upon this sanguinary contest. On the spot where the battle was fought are several tumuli, also remains of intrenchments, and a cross erected where Douglas is said to have fallen.

OTTERDEN, a parish partly in the hundred of FAVERSHAM, lathe of SCRAY, but chiefly in the hundred of EYHORNE, lathe of AYLESFORD, county of KENT, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Charing, containing 172 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £6. 14. 2., and in the patronage of W. G. Paxton, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Lawrence, was erected in 1753, near the ruins of a more ancient edifice, which are still discernible.

OTTERFORD, a parish in the hundred of TAUNTON and TAUNTON-DEAN, county of SOMERSET, 7 miles (S.) from Taunton, containing 366 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Taunton, and diocese of Bath and Wells, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £300 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of R. Buncombe, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Leonard. John Boles, in 1769, bequeathed £50 in support of a school for six poor children.

OTTERHAM, a parish in the hundred of LESNEWTH, county of CORNWALL, 6 miles (N.E. by N.) from Camelford, containing 212 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £6. 14. 2., and in the patronage of W. Chilcott, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Denis.

OTTERHAMPTON, a parish in the hundred of CANNINGTON, county of SOMERSET, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.W.) from Bridg-water, containing 221 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Taunton, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £13. 6., and in the patronage of J. Evered, Esq. The navigable river Parret bounds the parish on the east.

OTTERINGTON (NORTH), a parish comprising the townships of North Otterington and Thornton le Beans, in the wapentake of ALLERTONSHIRE, and the township of Thornton le Moor, in that of BIRDFORTH, North riding of the county of YORK, and containing 585 inhabitants, of which number, 44 are in the township of North Otterington, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from North Allerton. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the jurisdiction of the peculiar court of Allertonshire, belonging to the Bishop of Durham, rated in the king's books at £4, and in the patronage of the Dean and Canons of Christ Church, Oxford. The church is dedicated to St. Michael.

OTTERINGTON (SOUTH), a parish in the wapentake of BIRDFORTH, North riding of the county of YORK, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by E.) from North Allerton, containing 201 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory in two portions, called Gamwell House, and Weatherel House, in the archdeaconry of Cleveland, and diocese of York, the former endowed with £200 royal bounty, each rated in the king's books at £7. 14. $4\frac{1}{2}$, and in the patronage of the Rev. J. Sampson. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew.

OTTERTON, a parish in the eastern division of the hundred of BUDLEIGH, county of DEVON, 4 miles (S.W. by W.) from Sidmouth, containing 1071 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £22, and in the patronage of Lord Rolle. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. There was formerly a chapel at Hederland. The river Otter runs through the parish. Fairs are held on the Wednesday in Easter week and October 11th. Here was an Alien priory of Black monks, founded in the reign of the Conqueror, and subordinate to the abbey of St. Michael in Pericula Maris, in Normandy; at the suppression, in the 1st of Edward IV., its revenue was estimated at £87. 10. 4., and its possessions were given to the monastery of Sion. The prior enjoyed the singular rights of first choice in the fish-market, of appropriating to himself the half of every dolphin brought thither, and of claiming every porpoise at the price of "twelve pence, and a loaf to each sailor, and two to the master."

OTTERY (ST. MARY), a parish, market town, and hundred, in the county of DEVON, 12 miles (E. by N.) from Exeter, and 156 (W.S.W.) from London, containing 3522 inhabitants. The town is agreeably situated on the eastern bank of the river Otter, from which it receives its name, the adjunct having originated either from the foundation of a collegiate church, in honour of the Virgin Mary, by John Grandisson, Bishop of Exeter, in 1337; or, from the manor having been given by Edward the Confessor to the church of St. Mary at Rouen, in Normandy. During the civil war between Charles I. and the parliament, this town was alternately occupied by both parties; and in 1645, a detachment of the parliamentary army being quartered here, under Sir Thomas Fairfax, on the refusal of the inhabitants to furnish the contributions required by that commander, his troops are reported to have defaced the church, and destroyed two organs in it. The town is situated a little to the south of the high road from Honiton to Exeter: it is irregularly built on very uneven ground, and, exclusively of a few respectable houses in the higher part of it, near the church, it is composed chiefly of cottages. There is a good supply of water from wells and springs, and the surrounding country is pleasant and fertile. The manufacture of serge, which once flourished here, has been superseded by extensive silk-works, the machinery belonging to which is very ingeniously constructed, and is put in motion by a water-wheel of large dimensions. Handkerchiefs and ribands are among the chief articles now made, and the factory furnishes employment to between three and four hundred persons. Here are also a tan-yard and a ropewalk, and some lace is made in the town. The market is on Thursday; and fairs are held on the Tuesday before Palm-Sunday, Whit-Tuesday, and August 15th, for cattle, and at the last a considerable quantity of cheese also is sold: there is a great market on the Thursday before the second Friday in every month. Courts leet and baron are held annually for the manor, at which two constables are appointed for the parish, and two for the town, and there is likewise a constable for the hundred, whose office is permanent.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £20, endowed with £1400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Crown. After the suppression of the college founded by Bishop Grandisson, the church, the cemetery, the school-house, and other collegiate buildings and premises, were granted in trust to four inhabitants of the town, who were incorporated as "Governors of the Church of St. Mary Ottery," who collect the small tithes, and have the exclusive possession of the choir of the church: they also nominate a chaplain, sexton, and church-keeper. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, a large and curious edifice, has been called "a cathedral in miniature," being constructed, like that of Exeter, with towers in the transepts, besides which it comprises a nave, choir, aisles, and Lady chapel. The principal part of the body of the church exhibits the early English style of architecture, having been erected about 1260. The groined roof of the whole of the interior is of a later date than the structure itself, and the north aisle of the nave, which is in the latest style, has a very rich ceiling, with pendant ornaments. The Lady chapel has, at the east end, some fine tabernacled niches, of a more modern date than the chapel itself. In the nave is a plain altar-tomb, with a recumbent statue of an armed knight, under a monumental arch, embellished with fine mouldings and pendant tracery, having an ogee canopy, with crockets and a handsome finial: the pulpit is decorated with carved wood-work. There are places of worship for Independents and Unitarians. A free grammar school was founded by Henry VIII., and endowed with £10 per annum from the church corporation trust, and with various subsequent benefactions, amounting in the whole to about £60 per annum, but no boys have been instructed on this foundation for many years; two or three free scholars only receive classical education, in consideration of a donation of land, in 1666, by Mr. Edward Salter.

who also assigned from the proceeds an exhibition of £6 per annum to any one of the colleges or halls of Oxford, for four years, for a scholar from this school; and in default of which, the sum thus appropriated was to be divided between two children of the school for their maintenance and education. A charity school is supported by subscription, also a Sunday school. Two sets of almshouses have been founded here; and there are considerable benefactions for distribution among the poor, and for other purposes. Races are held occasionally at Caddy Lawn, about half a mile from the town. In the neighbourhood is a spring, called "Hawkins' Well," said to be efficacious as a remedy for diseases of the eye.

OTTRINGHAM, a parish in the southern division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESS, East riding of the county of YORK, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Hedon, containing 637 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of the East riding, and diocese of York, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Chancellor of the University of Oxford. The church, dedicated to St. Wilfrid, is principally in the decorated style of architecture, with a tower surmounted by a spire. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Four poor children are instructed for the interest arising from £100 stock, the gift of Mary Fox, in 1792.

OUGHTERBY, a township in the parish of KIRKBAMPTON, ward and county of CUMBERLAND, $7\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W.) from Carlisle, containing 105 inhabitants.

OULSTON, a township in the parish of COXWOLD, wapentake of BIRDFORTH, North riding of the county of YORK, 4 miles (N. N. E.) from Easingwold, containing 225 inhabitants.

OULSWICK, a chapelry in the parish of MONKS-RISBOROUGH, hundred of AYLESBURY, county of BUCKINGHAM, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Wendover. The population is returned with the parish. The chapel, now demolished, was dedicated to St. Peter. Oulswick is within the peculiar and exempt jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Canterbury.

OULTON, a township in the parish of WIGTON, ward and county of CUMBERLAND, 2 miles (N. N. W.) from Wigton, containing 336 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Baptists, with a cemetery attached. A workhouse was erected in 1828, the expense of which was defrayed by the sale of an allotment of common land.

OULTON, a parish in the southern division of the hundred of ERPINGHAM, county of NORFOLK, 4 miles (W. N. W.) from Aylsham, containing 382 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £8. 5., and in the patronage of R. Bell, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Paul. There is a place of worship for Independents. A workhouse has been erected here for several united parishes.

OULTON, a parish in the hundred of MUTFORD and LOTHINGLAND, county of SUFFOLK, 3 miles (W.) from Lowestoft, containing 471 inhabitants, exclusively of the house of industry for the hundred, which is in this parish, and contains two hundred and thirty-three inmates. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £14. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Executors of J. Marston, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. The river Waveney bounds the parish on the west, and receives the surplus water of Lake Lothing on the south.

OULTON (LOW), a township in the parish of OVER, first division of the hundred of EDDISBURY, county palatine of CHESTER, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by N.) from Tarporley, containing 60 inhabitants.

OUNDLE, a market town and parish, in the hundred of POLEBROOKE, county of NORTHAMPTON, 30 miles (N. E.) from Northampton, and 77 (N. by W.) from London, containing, with the chapelry of Ashton, and the hamlets of Biggin, Churchfield, and Elmington, 2279 inhabitants. A monastery was established here before the year 711, when Wilfrid, Archbishop of York, died in it: by some it is thought to have been founded by that primate, whilst others consider it to have been a cell to the abbey of Peterborough, and part of its possessions. The town is situated on a gentle declivity on the northern bank of the river Nene, by which it is nearly surrounded, and over which are two bridges, leading respectively to the Thrapston and Peterborough roads: North bridge is remarkable for its length and the number of its arches, which support an elevated causeway. The streets are well paved and lighted, and, in consequence of recent improvements made under the provisions of a local act of parliament, the general appearance of the town has been entirely modernised: two or three houses yet remain, which were built with the stones of Fotheringhay castle. Several of the inhabitants are employed in making bobbin-lace. The market is on Thursday; and fairs are held on February 25th, Whit-Monday, and August 21st, for horses, cattle, and sheep, and on October 12th, for cheese, cattle, &c.: a commodious market-house and shambles have been recently erected. Manorial courts leet and baron, and a court for the hundred, are held annually: a court is likewise held for the rectorial manor of Oundle, once in two or three years. The petty sessions for the division take place here once a fortnight. A court for the recovery of debts under 40s. was attached to the hundred court, but it has been disused for several years.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £13. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, which is dedicated to St. Peter, is a spacious and very handsome cruciform structure, combining the different styles of English architecture, with a lofty tower, terminated at the angles by octagonal turrets, and surmounted by an hexagonal crocketed spire, erected in 1634: in the chancel are some rich stalls, good screenwork, and a portion of ancient stained glass. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists. The free grammar school was founded, in 1556, by Sir William Laxton, a native of this town, and lord mayor of London in 1544, the amount of endowment is about £400 per annum, and the management is vested in the Master and Wardens of the Grocers' Company, who appoint the master, with a stipend of £40 per annum, for himself and usher, and a gratuity of £60: the school is open to boys of the town for free instruction. A school, for the education of thirty poor men's sons, was built and endowed, in 1620, by the Rev. Nicholas Latham, with £10 per annum, for a master to teach reading and writing: the master at present receives a salary of £20 per annum, with a house for his residence, and the writing-master about £16. A Blue-coat school is supported by voluntary contributions. An almshouse, founded and endowed by Sir William Laxton, for seven poor men, is also under the superintendence of the Grocers' Company. An hospital for sixteen poor women, who must each exceed the age of fifty years, with two nurses for the sick, and a weekly allowance to each inmate, was also founded by the Rev. N. Latham. There are two contingent exhibitions to the University of Cambridge, of £4 per annum each, for poor scholars of the parishes of Oundle, Glapthorne, Cotterstock, and Tansor. In the vicinity of this town are some chalybeate springs.

OUSBY, a parish in LEATH ward, county of CUMBERLAND, $9\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Penrith, containing 276 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Carlisle, rated in the king's books at £13. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Carlisle. The church is dedicated to St. Luke: it contains in a niche a wooden effigy of a man in armour, probably of a knight who had fought under the banners of the cross, though, according to a vulgar tradition, it is said to represent a wild man killed in an attempt to repel an invasion of the Scots. Limestone and red sandstone abound here, and there are veins of lead-ore, also some small seams of coal. Ousby, properly Ulfaby, the seat of Ulf, a Dane, is situated to the west of that chain of mountains which runs in a south-east direction from the borders of Scotland, through Northumberland, Cumberland, Westmorland, and Yorkshire, and terminates in Derbyshire. Here are the remains of a British fortification, consisting of an outer and an inner rampart, within the area of which Roman urns and other antiquities have been found. The Maiden Way traverses the mountainous part of this parish, which, from its elevated position, is subject to great damage from the "Helm Winds" that occur frequently from September to May, and do great injury to the corn.

OUSDEN, a parish in the hundred of RISBRIDGE, county of SUFFOLK, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Newmarket, containing 331 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Sudbury, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £10. 3. 9., and in the patronage of the Rev. J. T. Hand. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. Richard Moseley, in 1743, gave £10 a year as a salary to a master for teaching twenty children.

OUSEBURN (GREAT), a parish in the lower division of the wapentake of CLARO, West riding of the county of YORK, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. E.) from Aldborough, containing 437 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the court of the honour of Knaresborough, rated in the king's books at £3. 10., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, has lately received an addition of one hundred and twenty sittings, of which sixty are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £60 towards defraying the expense. There is a place of worship for Independents. Six poor children are instructed for £3 a year, the produce of sundry trifling bequests for that purpose.

OUSEBURN (LITTLE), a parish comprising the townships of Kirkby-Hall and Thorp-Underwoods, in the lower, and those of Little Ouseburn and Widdington, in the upper, division of the wapentake of CLARO, West riding of the county of YORK, and containing 558 inhabitants, of which number, 293 are in the township of Little Ouseburn, 5 miles (S. E. by S.) from Aldborough. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £3. 8. 4., endowed with £100 and £3 per annum private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Precentor in the Cathedral Church of York. The church is dedicated to the Holy Trinity. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Five poor children are educated for a trifling annuity, the gift of Elizabeth Colston in 1756.

OUSEFLEET, a township in the parish of WHITGIFT, lower division of the wapentake of OSGOLDCROSS, West riding of the county of YORK, 7 miles (S. E. by E.) from Howden, containing 253 inhabitants: it is within the jurisdiction of the peculiar court of Snaith.

OUSTON, a township in that part of the parish of CHESTER le STREET which is in the middle division of CHESTER ward, county palatine of DURHAM, 9 miles (N.) from Durham, containing 304 inhabitants.

OUSTON, a parish in the hundred of GARTREE, county of LEICESTER, 8 miles (S. by E.) from Melton-Mowbray, containing, with the hamlet of Newbold, 212 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Leicester, and diocese of Lincoln, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Rev. Henry Palmer. The church, dedicated to St. Andrew, formerly belonged to a small priory of canons regular of the order of St. Augustine, which was founded here, in the time of Henry II., by Sir Robert Grimbald, and possessed, at the dissolution, a revenue of £173. 18. 9.

OUSTON, a township in the parish of STAMFORDHAM, north-eastern division of TINDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $12\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Newcastle upon Tyne, containing 32 inhabitants.

OUTCHESTER, a township in the parish of BAMBROUGH, northern division of BAMBROUGH ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by S.) from Belford, containing 109 inhabitants. This place, situated on the western bank of the river Warn, near its outlet into Budle bay, was the site of the Castrum Ulterius of the ancient port of Warnmouth. The camp is of a square form, and there are vestiges of a Roman road extending from it towards Alnwick. The bay affords secure anchorage for small vessels, which are principally employed in the exportation of corn and flour, and in importing coal and wood.

OUTERSIDE, a joint township with Allerby, in the parish of ASPATRIA, ALLERDALE ward below Darwent, county of CUMBERLAND, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Cocker-mouth, containing, with Allerby, 347 inhabitants. Coal is obtained in the township, which is bounded on the south by the river Ellen.

OUTSEATS, a hamlet in the parish of HATHERSAGE, hundred of HIGH PEAK, county of DERBY, containing 177 inhabitants. Benjamin Ashton left a rent-charge of £5 for teaching ten poor boys.

OUTTON, a township in the parish of ROTHWELL, lower division of the wapentake of AGRIGG, West riding of the county of YORK, containing 936 inhabitants.

OUTWELL, a parish, partly in the hundred of WISBEACH, Isle of ELY, county of CAMBRIDGE, and partly in the hundred of CLACKCLOSE, county of NORFOLK, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Wisbeach, containing 954 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £16, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Ely. The church, dedicated to St. Clement, is a very handsome structure. This parish is remarkable for its extensive market-gardens, the produce of which is conveyed by the Nene, which runs through the village, to many of the towns situated on that river. A school is supported by annual subscriptions. Molycourt priory, or the chapel of St. Mary de Bello Loco, which was situated in this parish, was founded before the Conquest, for Benedictine monks; but its revenue having considerably diminished, Henry VI. appropriated it to the priory of Ely, and it continues parcel of the possessions of that see.

OVENDEN, a township in the parish of HALIFAX, wapentake of MORLEY, West riding of the county of YORK, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N. W.) from Halifax, containing 6360 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

OVER, a parish in the hundred of PAPWORTH, county of CAMBRIDGE, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. by S.) from St. Ives, containing 802 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Ely, rated in the king's books at £19. 0. 10., and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Trinity College, Cambridge: the rectory, an impropriation belonging to the college, is rated at £51. 13. 11 $\frac{1}{2}$. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a place of worship for Baptists. Alice Walpole, in 1709, left a trifling sum for the education of children; and the late Mrs. Kirkby gave £300, since laid out in land, for the endowment of a charity school, and the relief of poor widows.

OVER, a parish having separate jurisdiction, locally in the first division of the hundred of Eddisbury, county palatine of CHESTER, comprising the town of Over (formerly a market town), the chapelry of Wethen-hall, and the township of Little Oulton, and containing 2514 inhabitants, of which number, 2157 are in the town of Over, $16\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E.) from Chester, and 168 (N. W. by N.) from London. The town is situated on the road from Middlewich to Chester, and consists chiefly of one long and irregular street, in which are remains of several crosses: over the river Weever, between the parishes of Over and Davenham, is Winsford bridge, on each side of which houses have been built, in consequence of the extension of the salt manufacture in this neighbourhood; on both sides of the river, which bounds this parish on the east, and is navigable to Winsford, are brine pits, and by means of it salt is conveyed in flats to Liverpool. The market, formerly held on Wednesday, under the authority of a charter of Edward I., has been disused for about a century: fairs are held on May 15th and September 25th. The town, called in ancient records the borough of Over, has been from time immemorial under the government of a mayor, who is chosen annually at the court leet and baron of the lord of the manor, held in October; two juries are then empanelled, one for the borough, called the

VOL. III.

Grand Jury, the other for the subordinate townships, called the County Jury: the former return six inhabitants of the lordship of Over to the lord of the manor, by whom, at an adjourned court held fourteen days afterward, one of them is nominated mayor for the year ensuing, and, during his mayoralty, acts as justice of the peace within the borough and lordship, including the parishes of Over and Whitegate, and has a sworn serjeant who executes all processes within his jurisdiction: on quitting office he takes the title of alderman, but is no longer invested with any authority. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £7. 4., endowed with £1000 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Chester. The church, dedicated to St. Chad, was rebuilt in 1543, by Hugh Starkey, gentleman usher to Henry VIII.; it is in the later style of English architecture: in the interior is a font with a decorated niche over a water basin, some good stained glass, tabernacle-work, and an altar-tomb, supporting an effigy in brass to the memory of Hugh Starkey. There is a place of worship for Independents. The free grammar school, near the church, was founded in 1689, by Mrs. Elizabeth Venables, and her son, Thomas Lee, Esq., at Darnhall, in the adjoining parish of Whitegate, and endowed with lands, the present value of which is £53 per annum: the school is open to children of Over and Whitegate, also to those of the township of Weever; it was removed to its present situation in 1803.

OVER, a hamlet in that part of the parish of CHURCHAM, which is in the lower division of the hundred of DUDSTONE and KING'S BARTON, county of GLOUCESTER. The population is returned with Highnam and Linton.

OVER, a tything in that part of the parish of ALMONDSBURY which is in the lower division of the hundred of LANGLEY and SWINEHEAD, county of GLOUCESTER, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Bristol, containing 133 inhabitants.

OVER (CHURCH), county palatine of CHESTER.—See UPTON.

OVERBURY, a parish in the middle division of the hundred of OSWALDSLOW, county of WORCESTER, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Tewkesbury, containing, with the chapelries of Alstone, Teddington, and Little Washbourn, and the hamlet of Conderton, 764 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, rated in the king's books at £9. 10., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Worcester. The church is dedicated to St. Faith. Here are some malt-kilns and a paper-mill.

OVERSLEY, a hamlet in that part of the parish of ARROW which is in the Stratford division of the hundred of BARLICHWAY, county of WARWICK, $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile (S. E.) from Alcester, containing 211 inhabitants.

OVERSTONE, a parish in the hundred of SPELHOE, county of NORTHAMPTON, 5 miles (N. E.) from Northampton, containing 192 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £12. 16. 3., and in the patronage of Earl Brownlow. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas.

OVERSTRAND, a parish in the northern division of the hundred of ERPINGHAM, county of NORFOLK,

1 $\frac{3}{4}$ mile (S. E. by E.) from Cromer, containing 154 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £2. 1. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Lord Suffield. The church, dedicated to St. Martin, which was formerly in a very dilapidated state, has lately received an addition of sixty sittings, of which fifty are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £10 towards defraying the expense.

OVERTON, a township in the parish of MALPAS, higher division of the hundred of BROXTON, county palatine of CHESTER, 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N. W.) from Malpas, containing 101 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

W.) from Lancaster, containing 344 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Lancaster. The chapel is a very ancient building. Overton occupies a peninsula formed by the river Lune and Morecambe bay.

OVERTON, a township in that part of the parish of RICHARD'S CASTLE which is in the hundred of MUNSLOW, county of SALOP, 1 $\frac{3}{4}$ mile (S. by W.) from Ludlow. The population is returned with the parish.

OVERTON, a parish (formerly a borough) in the hundred of OVERTON, Kingsclere division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 3 miles (E. N. E.) from Whitchurch, and 54 (W. S. W.) from London, containing 1341 inhabitants. This village is situated on the great western road: a manufactory for throwing-silk affords employment to the greater part of the female inhabitants. The river Test, which has its source about a mile distant, passes through the village. Fairs are held on May 4th, Whit-Monday, and July 18th, and on October 22nd is a considerable fair for sheep. This place formerly sent two members to parliament. The living is a vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Tadley, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Rector, rated in the king's books at £14. 12. 3 $\frac{1}{2}$.; the rectory is a sinecure, rated in the king's books at £29. 19. 7., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Winchester. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a place of worship for Independents.

OVERTON, a parish partly in the hundred of ELSTUB and EVERLEY, but chiefly in that of SELKLEY, county of WILTS, 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by W.) from Marlborough, containing, with the chapelry of Alton-Priors, the township of Lockeridge, and the tything of Stowell, 900 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Wilts, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £23. 0. 5., and in the patronage of the Duke of Marlborough. The church is dedicated to St. Michael.

OVERTON, a parish partly in the liberty of ST. PETER of YORK, East riding, but chiefly in the wapentake of BULMER, North riding, of the county of YORK, comprising the townships of Overton, Shipton, and Skelton, and containing 709 inhabitants, of which number, 59 are in the township of Overton, 4 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W.) from York. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cleveland, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £4. 8. 11 $\frac{1}{2}$., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Mrs. Earle. The church is dedicated to St. Cuthbert. A free school was founded, in 1655, under the will of Ann Middleton, who bequeathed £1000 for its erection and maintenance: the income is £40 a year, for which fifty boys are instructed.

OVERTON (COLD), a parish forming, with the parishes of Somerby and Withcote, a detached portion of the hundred of FRAMLAND, county of LEICESTER, 7 miles (S. E. by S.) from Melton-Mowbray, containing 123 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Leicester, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £19. 12. 3 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of E. H. Wigley, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. John the Baptist.

OVERTON (MARKET), a parish in the hundred of ALSTOE, county of RUTLAND, 6 miles (N. by E.) from Oakham, containing 468 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £14. 11. 3., and in the patronage of John Wingfield, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul. A market, formerly held on Tuesday, has been long disused.

OVING, a parish in the hundred of ASHENDON, county of BUCKINGHAM, 6 miles (N. N. W.) from Aylesbury, containing 372 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £7. 17. 11., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

OVING, a parish in the hundred of Box and STOCKBRIDGE, rape of CHICHESTER, county of SUSSEX, 2 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E.) from Chichester, containing 637 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £10. 11. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Precentor in the Cathedral Church of Chichester. The church is principally in the early style of English architecture. Stephen Challen, in 1731, left a small sum for teaching poor children.

OVINGDEAN, a parish in the hundred of YOUNSMERE, rape of LEWES, county of SUSSEX, 2 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by S.) from Brighton, containing 79 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £9. 5. 6., and in the patronage of the Rev. John Marshall. The church is in the early style of English architecture. In this parish, not far from the church, is an ancient farm-house, recently modernised, in which Charles II. sought refuge, and was entertained for a few days, by the then occupant, Mr. Maunsell, prior to his escape to the continent. The village is situated in a pleasant valley, about a mile from the coast.

OVINGHAM, a parish in the eastern division of TINDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, comprising the chapelry of Mickley, and the townships of Dukeshagg, Eltringham, Harlowhill, Hedley, Hedley-Woodside, Horsley, Nafferton, Ovingham, Ovington, Prudhoe, Prudhoe-Castle, Rouchester, Spittle, Welton, Whittle, and Wylam, and containing 2742 inhabitants, of which number, 265 are in the township of Ovingham, 11 miles (W.) from Newcastle upon Tyne. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Northumberland, and diocese of Durham rated in the king's books at £5. 8. 4., endowed with £200 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of C. W. Bigge, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a place of worship for Independents. The river Tyne passes through the parish, which abounds with mines of coal. Here are a brewery, a dye-house, and bleaching-grounds. Courts leet and baron are occasionally held; and there are two fairs, on April 26th and October 26th. The vicarage-house occupies the site of a cell of Black canons, founded by one of the Umfravilles, the revenue of which, at the dissolution, was valued at £13. 4. 8.

OVINGTON, a parish in the hundred of HINCKFORD, county of ESSEX, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. by W.) from Clare, containing 149 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, consolidated with that of Tilbury, in the archdeaconry of Middlesex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £7, and in the patronage of John Fisher, Esq. A small charity school is supported by annual donations.

OVINGTON, a parish in the hundred of WAYLAND, county of NORFOLK, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N. N. E.) from Watton, containing 219 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £7. 3. 6 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Chancellor, Masters, and Scholars of the University of Cambridge. The church is dedicated to St. John the Evangelist.

OVINGTON, a township in the parish of Ovingham, eastern division of TINDALE ward, county of NORTH-UMBERLAND, 12 miles (W.) from Newcastle upon Tyne, containing 362 inhabitants. An extensive coal mine is now in operation, and there are a large malthouse, and a brewery, within the township.

OVINGTON, a parish in the hundred of FAWLEY, Fawley division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 2 miles (W. by S.) from New Alresford, containing 180 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Incumbent, rated in the king's books at £9. 10., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Winchester. Ovington is within the jurisdiction of the Cheyney Court held at Winchester every Thursday, for the recovery of debts to any amount.

OVINGTON, a township in the parish of FORCETT, western division of the wapentake of GILLING, North riding of the county of YORK, 4 miles (E. N. E.) from Greta-Bridge, containing 166 inhabitants. A priory of Gilbertine canons, subordinate to that of Sempringham, was founded here about the reign of John, by Alan de Wilton, which, at the dissolution, was valued at £11. 2. 8.

OWERMOIGNE, a parish and liberty in the Blandford (South) division of the county of DORSET, $7\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. E.) from Dorchester, containing 377 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £23. 4. 7., and in the patronage of the Hon. William Damer. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. The parish is bounded on the south by the English channel. A charity school is supported by donations amounting to about £8 per annum.

OWERSBY, a parish in the northern division of the wapentake of WALSHCROFT, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.W. by N.) from Market-Rasen, containing 408 inhabitants, of which number 272 are in North, and 136 in South, Owersby. The living is a discharged vicarage, with those of Kirby and Osgodby, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £8. 18. 4., and in the patronage of Lord Monson. The church is dedicated to St. Martin. There is a school with a trifling endowment by Dunn Rawvy.

OWLPEN, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of BERKELEY, county of GLOUCESTER, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E.) from Dursley, containing 232 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Newington-Bagpath, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester. The church has lately received an addition of sixty sittings, of which forty are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £50 towards defraying the expense.

OWMBY, a parish in the eastern division of the wapentake of ASLACOE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Market-Rasen, containing 196 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Stow, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £9. 3. 4., and in the patronage of the King, as Duke of Lancaster. The church is dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul.

OWMBY, a joint parish with Searby, in the southern division of the wapentake of YARBOROUGH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W.) from Caistor. The population is returned with Searby. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the rectory of Searby, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln.

OWRAM (NORTH), a township in the parish of HALIFAX, wapentake of MORLEY, West riding of the county of YORK, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Halifax, containing 6841 inhabitants. A free school was erected here, about 1711, by Joseph Crowther, who endowed it with a dwelling-house and croft for the master, and certain lands let for £21 per annum, for which twelve poor children are instructed. Jeremiah Hall, in 1687, bequeathed land, directing the income to be applied towards the maintenance of two men and two women, each of them receiving an annuity of £5, and £5 per annum is paid for teaching five boys and five girls.

OWRAM (SOUTH), a township in the parish of HALIFAX, wapentake of MORLEY, West riding of the county of YORK, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (S. E.) from Halifax, containing 4256 inhabitants.

OWRE, county of KENT.—See OARE.

OWSLEBURY, a parish in the hundred of FAWLEY, Fawley division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 5 miles (S. S. E.) from Winchester, containing 603 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Twyford, and in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Vicar. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew. The parish is within the jurisdiction of the Cheyney Court held at Winchester every Thursday, for the recovery of debts to any amount.

OWSTHORPE, a township in the parish of Pocklington, Wilton-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, East riding of the county of YORK, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (N. by E.) from Pocklington, containing 9 inhabitants.

OWSTON, a parish in the western division of the wapentake of MANLEY, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Gainsborough, containing, with the chapelry of West Butterwick, and the township of Kelfield, 1969 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Stow, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £19. 10., endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £1600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Archbishop of York. The church is dedicated to St. Martin. Near Millwood park a Carthusian monastery was founded, about 1395, by Thomas Moubray, Earl of Nottingham, afterwards Duke of Norfolk: it was dedicated to St. Mary, St. John the Evangelist, and St. Edward the Confessor, and at the dissolution had a revenue of £290. 11. 7.

OWSTON, a parish in the upper division of the wapentake of OSGOLDCROSS, West riding of the county of YORK, comprising the townships of Owston and Skelton, and containing 452 inhabitants, of which number, 306 are in the township of Owston, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Doncaster. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £7. 0. $2\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of P. D. Cooke, Esq. The church is dedicated to All Saints. Four poor children are instructed for a trifling annuity left by Ann Jackson, in 1675.

OWSTWICK, a township partly in the parish of GARTON, and partly in that of ROOSS, middle division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESS, East riding of the county of YORK, $12\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from Kingston upon Hull, containing 139 inhabitants.

OWTHORNE, a parish comprising the township of Waxholme, in the middle division, and the townships of South Frodingham, Owthorne, and Rimswell, in the southern division, of the wapentake of HOLDERNESS, East riding of the county of YORK, and containing 415 inhabitants, of which number, 143 are in the township of Owthorne, $18\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Kingston upon Hull. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of the East riding, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £11. 6. 3., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, which was dedicated to St. Peter, fell into the sea on February 16th, 1816, and, in consequence of the continual encroachments of that element, the village has also sustained considerable damage.

OWTHORPE, a parish in the southern division of the wapentake of BINGHAM, county of NOTTINGHAM, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Nottingham, containing 138 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Nottingham, and diocese of York, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Sir R. H. Bromley, Bart. The church, dedicated to St. Margaret, was built by Colonel Julius Hutchinson, an active parliamentary officer during the great civil war, and for some time governor of Nottingham castle: he died a prisoner at Landown castle, in 1664, and lies interred in the family vault here; a monument having been erected to his memory, among others of the family. The Grantham canal passes through the parish, and the Foss road forms its western boundary.

OXBOROUGH, a parish in the southern division of the hundred of GREENHOE, county of NORFOLK, 3 miles (E. N. E.) from Stoke-Ferry, containing 320 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, with the vicarage of Foulden united, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £18. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge. The church, dedicated to St. John the Evangelist, is a spacious structure of flint and stone, with a square tower embattled, and surmounted by a lofty spire. The east window exhibits the most striking portions of our Saviour's history, the Virgin Mary, &c., in richly-stained glass, and the roof, composed of oak panels, is curiously carved with various emblems. Attached to the south aisle is a chantry, built in 1573, having a stone screen of the earliest revived Grecian architecture. The small river Wissey runs through the parish, in which are many tumuli, and some pits called Danes' graves. Roman and Saxon coins have been found here, from which, and the remains of a considerable vallum to the north-west of the village, it seems to have been anciently a place of importance. Edward I. granted a market, several fairs, and various other privileges, long since disused. The mansion-house, which much resembles Queen's College, Cambridge, was erected in the same year, and is a fine specimen of the style of architecture that prevailed in the time of Edward IV.; the outer walls stand in a moat supplied by a stream from an adjoining rivulet.

OXCLIFFE, a joint township with Heaton, in that part of the parish of LANCASTER which is in the hundred of LONSDALE, south of the sands, county palatine of LANCASTER, 2 miles (W.) from Lancaster. The population is returned with Heaton.

OXCOMB, a parish in the hundred of HILL, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 7 miles (N. E. by N.) from Horncastle, containing 28 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £6. 15. $7\frac{1}{2}$., endowed with £200 royal bounty. B. Grant, Esq. was patron in 1821. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

OXENDEN (GREAT), a parish in the hundred of ROTHWELL, county of NORTHAMPTON, 3 miles (S. by E.) from Market-Harborough, containing 277 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £13. 8. 4. Henry Boulton, Esq. was patron in 1786. The church is dedicated to St. Helen. Sir George Buswell, in 1667, founded and liberally endowed a free school and hospital here, for the benefit of the inhabitants of Clipston, East Farndon, Haselbeech, Kelmarsh, Marston, Oxenden, and Trussell, to which Francis Horton subsequently bequeathed £200.

OXENDEN (LITTLE), a hamlet in the parish of LITTLE BOWDEN, hundred of ROTHWELL, county of NORTHAMPTON, 2 miles (S. S. W.) from Market-Harborough, containing 6 inhabitants. The chapel has been demolished.

OXENHALL, a hamlet in the parish of DARLINGTON, south-eastern division of DARLINGTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S.) from Darlington, with which the population is returned. In the neighbourhood are three remarkable pools, termed Hell Kettles.

OXENHALL, a parish in the hundred of BOTLOE, county of GLOUCESTER, 1 mile (N. N. W.) from Newent, containing 323 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Hereford, and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £9. 12. 6., endowed with £400 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Gloucester. The church is dedicated to St. Anne. The Herefordshire and Gloucestershire canal passes through a tunnel, extending two thousand one hundred and ninety-two yards, in this parish.

OXENTON, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of TEWKESBURY, county of GLOUCESTER, 5½ miles (E. by S.) from Tewkesbury, containing 178 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, with that of Tewkesbury, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Earl of Coventry. The church is dedicated to St. John the Baptist.

to have derived its Saxon name, Oxenford, from its ford over the river for the passage of oxen. By others that name is said to be a corruption of Ouseford, from the river Ouse, now the Isis, from which source an island in that river, whereon the wealthy abbey was erected, was also named Ouseney, or Osney. To the establishment of schools in this place, supposed to have been originally by Alfred the Great, the origin of the city is by some historians attributed; but though Alfred unquestionably restored, and more liberally endowed, the university, its original foundation is demonstrated to have been many years prior to the reign of that monarch, in an act of confirmation by Pope Martin II., in 802, in which it is described as an ancient academy of learning. During the earlier times of the Saxons, a monastery, dedicated to St. Mary and All Saints, was founded here, about the year 730, by Didanus, one of the Saxon princes, for twelve sisters of noble birth, of which Frideswide, his daughter, was first abbess, who, being canonized after her death, the abbey, in which she was interred, was dedicated to St. Frideswide, in honour of her memory: this monastery having been plundered during the Danish wars, and the nuns dispersing, was restored for Secular canons. In the interval between the destruction of the abbey and its restoration, Alfred, with his three sons, resided here, where he founded three public schools, established a royal mint, and contributed greatly to the rebuilding of the city. In the reign of Ethelred, the Danes burnt the city, in retaliation for the general massacre of their countrymen by order of that monarch; and, in 1013, another party of those rapacious invaders, under the command of King Sweyn, landed in England, and having laid waste the adjoining country, compelled the inhabitants of Oxford to surrender, and to give hostages for their fulfilment of the terms of capitulation. The city was again burnt by the Danes, in 1032; and, in 1036, OXFORD, a university and city, having separate jurisdiction, locally in the hundred of Wootton, county of OXFORD, of which it is the capital, 55 miles (N. N. W.) from London, containing 16,364 inhabitants. This place, which, from a very remote period of antiquity, has been celebrated as a seat of learning, is supposed by some Harold Harefoot was crowned at Oxford, on which, in revenge for the slaughter of some of his men, he inflicted considerable injury. At the time of the Norman Conquest, Oxford, refusing to submit to the Conqueror, was, in 1067, taken by storm, and given to Robert D'Oily, who erected a strong castle on the west side of it, for the purpose of keeping the inhabitants in subjection, and fortified it with strong earthworks, within which he built a collegiate church, dedicated to St. George, and settled in it Secular canons of the order of St. Augustine. William Rufus held a council in the town, under Lanfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury, at which several bishops assisted, for the purpose of defeating a conspiracy formed against him by Odo, Bishop of Bayeux, his uncle, in favour of Robert, Duke of Normandy. Robert D'Oily, nephew of the former, and chamberlain to Henry I., founded the abbey of Osney, which was situated a little below the castle. Henry I. built a new hall, or palace, at Oxford, called Beaumont, where he celebrated the festival of Easter, in 1133, with great pomp, and in which Richard I. was born. Stephen, in the early part of his reign, assembled a council of the principal nobility here, to whom, in order to attach them to his interests, and to strengthen his party in the kingdom, he promised to abolish the tax called Dane Gelt, and to restore the laws of Edward the Confessor. Matilda, having obtained possession of the castle, was besieged by Stephen, but, previously to surrendering it, she contrived to escape by night over the river, which was at that time frozen. During this siege, the inhabitants being excluded from the church of St. George, within the castle, the chapel of St. Thomas was erected for their accommodation, and Stephen is reported to have repaired the city walls, which had fallen into decay: these walls are supposed to have been built in the seventh century, but by whom is uncertain.

During the contest between Henry II. and Thomas à Becket, that monarch held a parliament at Oxford, for the purpose of counteracting the authority of the pope, who had threatened to lay the kingdom under an interdict, and in 1167, another parliament, in which the partitioning of Ireland among those of his subjects who had at different times achieved the conquest of it, was deliberated upon. Richard I. invested Oxford, his native city, with many privileges, in gratitude for which, the citizens contributed largely to his ransom when detained prisoner in Austria, on his return from the Holy Land. King John held a parliament here in 1204, in order to raise supplies, which were liberally granted. In the reign of Henry III., who kept the festival of Christmas in this city, in 1222, Stephen Langton, Archbishop of Canterbury, held here a synod for reforming abuses in the ecclesiastical polity of the kingdom, by a decree of which two men were crucified, each pretending that he was Christ, and two women starved to death, for pretending to be the Virgin Mary, and Mary Magdalene. The same king, in 1227, when he became of age, assembled a parliament here, in which he assumed the government, and revoked the grant of Magna Charta, and the charter of Forests, alledging that they were signed by him when a minor. Towards the end of this reign, an adjourned parliament was held at Oxford, in which all Poitevins and other foreigners were ordered to leave the kingdom. In 1319, a man named Pondras, son of a tanner at Exeter, came to Oxford, affirming that he was the rightful heir of Edward I., and had been stolen from his cradle and exchanged for Edward II., the reigning prince; but the imposture was soon detected, and Pondras was executed at Northampton. Queen Isabel, on her return from France, remained for some time in this city, while prosecuting the war against the two Spensers. In the reign of Henry IV., a conspiracy was formed by the Earls of Huntingdon, Kent, Salisbury, and Rutland, for assassinating the king at a tournament to be held here, and restoring the deposed monarch, Richard II., to the throne; but their plot was discovered, and the Earls of Kent and Salisbury, Sir Thomas Blount, and others, were hung at Greenditch, near Oxford. Henry VIII. erected Oxford into a see, separating it, with the county, from the diocese of Lincoln, in which it had previously been included. Soon after the accession of Mary, Cranmer, Archbishop of Canterbury, Ridley, Bishop of London, and Latimer, Bishop of Worcester, were conveyed from the Tower, where they had been imprisoned, to hold a disputation with the learned men of the University, at a convocation held in St. Mary's church; and in the following year, the Bishops of London, Gloucester, and Bristol, were sent commissioners to Oxford, to examine Ridley and Latimer, whom they condemned to the stake. This sentence was executed in a place called Canditch, on the 16th of October, 1555, in presence of the chief magistrates of the university and city; and on the 21st of the following March, Cranmer, who had witnessed the spectacle from the prison Bocardo, in which he was confined, suffered martyrdom in the same place. In 1625, the parliament having adjourned from London, on account of the plague, assembled at Oxford; but, on symptoms of the infection appearing in the city, the king hastily dissolved it, after repeated and unavailing attempts to procure supplies.

Oxford was intimately connected with many of the principal events during the parliamentary war. In the earlier part of it, Sir John Byron, with a party of the royal forces, attempted to garrison the city for the king; but Lord Say, then lieutenant of the county, advancing against him with a superior force, the former retired, leaving Oxford in possession of the latter. Sir John Byron, on his retreat from Oxford, advanced to Worcester, of which he gained possession, and garrisoned it for the king, who, reinforced by numbers whom his victory at Edgehill had drawn over to his party, marched to Oxford, took possession of it, and there fixed his headquarters. During the king's occupation of the town, a treaty of negotiation was opened, and the Earl of Northumberland, and four members of the lower house, were appointed commissioners by the parliament: the conferences continued for several weeks, and after various propositions for a mutual accommodation, terminated without their differences being adjusted. A deputation from the citizens of London afterwards waited upon the king, who had resolved to pass the winter at Oxford, with proposals for peace, which, through the agency of the parliament, were also rendered ineffectual. The king invited the members who had either retired or had been expelled from the Westminster parliament, to meet him at Oxford, and assembled a parliament in the great hall of Christ Church College. Sir Thomas Fairfax, advancing with his army to besiege the city, was for a time diverted from his purpose by Prince Rupert, who attacked his castle at Leicester, but Fairfax returning to the siege, and the garrison being reduced by famine, it surrendered to the parliament, and the king escaping to Newcastle, placed himself under the protection of the Scottish army. In 1665, the plague raging in London, the parliament adjourned to Oxford, and continued their deliberations in the schools of the university. In this parliament, supplies were granted for carrying on the war against the Dutch, and statutes were enacted against the non-conforming clergy, who were prohibited approaching within five miles of any corporate town. During the continuance of the plague, the courts of law, at Michaelmas term, were held in this city; in which also Charles II., having dissolved the parliament at Westminster in 1681, assembled a new parliament, which, after sitting only a few days, was dissolved by the king, for the apparent purpose of preventing the differences that threatened to arise between the lords and the commons, the former having rejected a vote of impeachment decreed by the latter.

Oxford, for the splendour of its public buildings, among which the colleges and halls of the university are conspicuous, for the grandeur of their elevation, and, in many instances, for the beauty of their architecture, is not surpassed by any city in the kingdom; and, from the antiquity and importance of its venerable institutions, possesses an intense degree of interest. It is pleasantly situated on a gentle acclivity, at the confluence of the rivers Cherwell and Isis, by which it is nearly surrounded: over these rivers are several bridges, handsomely built of stone, of which, Magdalene bridge over the river Cherwell, and a new bridge over the Isis, on the Abingdon road, lately erected at an expense of £11,000, are the principal. The approaches are spacious, and afford striking and finely varied prospects of the city, and of its sumptuous edifices and stately towers. The entrance from the London road, over Magdalene bridge, is exquisitely beautiful; on the right is the small but pleasing vale of the Cherwell, in which the newly-erected church of St. Clement's forms an interesting feature, together with the grounds, the water-walk, and the noble tower of Magdalene College; and on the left are seen Christchurch meadows, watered by the Isis and the Cherwell, with the spire of the Cathedral Church, and the tower of Merton College in the distance. The entrance from Woodstock is remarkably fine, leading into the town through the broad street of St. Giles', on each side of which is a row of stately trees, and on the east side the college of St. John, and part of Balliol College. The entrance from Abingdon, over Folly, or the New bridge, leads through St. Aldate's street, on the east side of which is the magnificent front of Christchurch College, and the town hall. The city, which is more than a mile in length, from east to west, and, including the suburbs, more than three miles in circumference, is divided into four parts by two principal streets, which intersect each other nearly at right angles in the centre, where was formerly a handsome conduit, erected in the seventeenth century, by Otho Nicholson, one of the examiners in Chancery, but removed in 1787, and presented by the university to the late Earl of Harcourt, who placed it in Nuneham-Courtney park. The High-street is one of the noblest streets in Europe, presenting in pleasing succession, from its great length and easy and graceful curvature, many of the stately and venerable public edifices for which this city is so eminently distinguished: on the north side, after crossing Magdalene bridge, and passing the college of St. Mary Magdalene on the right, and the Physic Garden on the left, are Queen's and All Souls' colleges, beyond which are the churches of St. Mary and All Saints, and at its upper extremity, that of St. Martin, or Carfax; and on the south side are University College, and some handsome private houses. Near Magdalene bridge are the warm and cold baths, in St. Clement's parish, a handsome establishment recently constructed, comprising a saloon, reading-room, and other appendages, and a very superior arrangement of warm and cold baths, with dressing-rooms, and every requisite accommodation. Races are annually held on Port-meadow, near the city, and are well attended. The city is well paved, lighted with gas, and amply supplied with water. The gardens of the colleges afford delightful promenades, and in the environs, which contain many handsome residences, are varied rides and agreeable walks, of which latter, that to Headington Hill, commanding a fine view of the city and its vicinity, may be considered the principal. The rivers Cherwell and Isis, branching into several streams, and pursuing a winding course, contribute greatly to adorn the city, and their united streams afford the means of aquatic excursions. The trade is principally in corn and other agricultural produce of the surrounding district, which is extremely fertile. Coal is brought from Staffordshire by the Oxford canal, which communicates with those of Birmingham, Warwick, and Coventry; and a considerable traffic is carried on with the metropolis and the intermediate towns, by the Thames, which is navigable to London. Convenient wharfs and quays have been constructed at considerable expense, and every facility has been obtained for the promotion of the inland trade. Oxford has been long celebrated for the superior quality of its brawn, of which a considerable quantity is forwarded to London. The market days are Wednesday and Saturday, which are abundantly supplied, the latter being also for corn, which is sold by sample at the upper extremity of the High-street, near a spot called the Butter Bench, the farmers preferring to transact their business in the open air, though the corporation have offered them the use of a convenient area under the town hall. The market-place is a suitable area, arranged into various sections for the different kinds of produce, on the northern side of the High-street, from which there are entrances by means of iron gates, the houses in front being appropriated as shops. The fairs are on May 3rd, on Gloucester Green; another in St. Giles', on the Monday after the festival of St. Giles, which is a pleasure fair; and the Thursday before New Michaelmas-day, for cattle.

The city received a regular charter of incorporation from Henry II., confirming all preceding grants, and extending to the inhabitants all the rights and privileges enjoyed by the citizens of London, besides conferring upon the mayor the distinction of assisting, with the lord mayor of London, in the king's buttery at the coronation festivals, upon which occasion he is attended by the recorder, four aldermen, the town clerk, bailiffs, and mace-bearer, and receives a silver cup and cover richly gilt, from the king. This charter was confirmed by Henry III., who vested the government of the city in a mayor, four aldermen, eight assistants, two bailiffs, and twenty-four common council-men. Many other charters were granted by succeeding sovereigns, but that by which the city is at present more especially governed was granted by James I., in 1605; by this an addition was made of the offices of high steward (usually a nobleman of high rank), recorder, town clerk, two chamberlains, mace bearer, and subordinate officers. The mayor is chosen annually, from among the aldermen or assistants, by the freemen generally, and, previously to entering upon his office, takes an oath to observe the lawful customs and privileges of the university, as does also the sheriff for the county. The bailiffs must have served the office of chamberlain. The mayor, recorder, aldermen, and assistants, are justices of the peace within the city and liberties, which office they hold, not by their charter of incorporation, but by commission under the great seal, renewed from time to time, under which authority also they hold a commission of gaol delivery. The freedom of the city is inherited by birth, and acquired by apprenticeship to a freeman for seven years, by gift of the corporation, or by purchase: among the privileges is the right of depasturing cattle on Port-meadow, a tract of about four hundred and forty acres near the city. The corporation hold quarterly courts of session, which take cognizance of all capital offences except high treason; and two courts of record, for the trial of pleas and the recovery of debts to any amount, one called the mayor's court (styled also a Hustings' court), and in which actions of ejectment are tried, and the other the court of the mayor and bailiffs: the practice, which is similar in both, is nearly the same as in the common law courts at Westminster; the town clerk sits as judge, or assessor.

The town hall is a spacious stone building, one hundred and thirty-five feet in length, and thirty-two feet broad, with a basement story of rustic work, forming an open corridor, and surmounted in the centre by a handsome pediment. George IV., when Prince Regent, the late Emperor of Russia, the King of Prussia, the late Duke of York, the Prince of Orange, the Prince of Mecklenburgh, Prince Metternich, General Blucher, and other illustrious persons repaired to the town hall, and received the honorary freedom of the city, in 1814, during their visit at the university: the council-chamber is decorated with portraits of Queen Anne, John the first Duke, and George the third Duke, of Marlborough, and several distinguished members of the corporation and benefactors to the city. The city gaol was erected in 1789, prior to which delinquents were confined in the prison of Bocardo, over one of the city gates, which was taken down in 1771: the door of the cell in which Cranmer was confined has been preserved, and fixed up in the present gaol, with an appropriate inscription: this prison contains four wards for the classification of prisoners, and thirty-two cells, and has a neat chapel. The city has regularly sent two members to parliament from the earliest returns extant of the reign of Edward I.: the right of election is vested in the mayor and corporation, and in the freemen generally, the number of whom is about one thousand eight hundred: the mayor is the returning officer. The assizes for the county and the election of knights of the shire are held here, as the county town. The county gaol and house of correction is an extensive building, erected on part of the site of the ancient castle, the remains of which consist of the original tower and a vaulted magazine for the use of the garrison, the principal entrance is through a large gateway, flanked by embattled towers: it comprises eleven wards, the same number of day-rooms and airing-yards, for the classification of prisoners, and two tread-mills, on which they are employed in grinding corn and raising water for the use of the prison: the prisoners receive a portion of their earnings on their discharge.

The origin of the university is by different historians attributed to various eras and to different founders: by some, Oxford is supposed to have been selected as a place of resort for students at a very early period of British history, and to have attained considerable eminence as a seat of learning during the Saxon Arms of the University.

Octarchy; and it is stated that Alfred, during his residence in the city, founded and endowed three halls, or additional colleges, which, involved in its fate, were destroyed by the Danes, whose frequent incursions and devastation of this part of the country materially retarded the progress of the university. Amidst a mass of conflicting testimony its origin may, perhaps, be attributed to the monastic institutions established in the city and neighbourhood, which, by the encouragement they afforded to the pursuit of literature, drew around them a number of students, who, not being able to find admission as residents in these establishments, may have taken up their residence in the city and suburbs with the view of obtaining that assistance in their studies which the learned members of those institutions were capable of affording them. At the time of the Conquest, Robert D'Oily, to whom the Conqueror gave the government of the city, founded, within the precincts of the castle, the collegiate church of St. George, for Secular canons, which, being subsequently annexed to the abbey of Osney, founded by his descendant, the buildings were occupied by students, and the society existed for some time under the style of the Warden and Scholars of St. George within the Castle. Soon after the foundation of Osney abbey, Robert Pullein, a learned member of that institution, first began to read lectures on the sacred scriptures at Oxford, which had been much neglected, and revived the divinity lectures, which had fallen into disuse, and, under the patronage of Henry I. and his successors, greatly promoted the interests of literature. In the reign of Stephen, Roger Vacarius introduced the study of the Roman or civil law, which, being regarded as an innovation, was vehemently opposed by other professors. At this time the students are said to have amounted to nearly thirty thousand, and to have lived at their own expense in inns, or hostels, of which not less than three hundred were rented by them for their accommodation; for their supply, the country for twenty miles round Oxford was appropriated by the king, whose purveyor was not permitted within that distance to purchase provisions for the king's household: exclusively of such as lived in these hostels, and who were under the control of a governor, or principal, who presided over the literary and moral discipline of the seminaries, were several who were resident in St. Frideswide's priory, and Osney abbey. In 1209, a scholar having accidentally killed a woman of the city, while amusing himself with athletic sports, made his escape, and the exasperated citizens seized upon three scholars of the same hall, whom, upon receiving a mandate from the king (then at Woodstock) to that effect, they hanged, which so exasperated the students, that three thousand of them left the university for some time; but the citizens having obtained pardon from the pope's legate, then in England, and having done penance in the churches at Oxford, the scholars returned. Repeated disturbances arose between the citizens and the students, some of which were attended with very serious consequences. In 1229, disputes having arisen in Paris, on account of the high price of wine, Henry III. invited the students of that city to Oxford, where more than one thousand of them soon afterwards settled. Cardinal Otho, legate from the pope in 1236, on his arrival in England, took up his residence at Osney abbey, and the scholars having sent him presents, in token of their respect, waited upon him in great numbers to pay him their congratulations, when a dispute arising between the scholars, who pressed for admission, and the legate's servants, in which the legate's brother, who, from fear of treachery by poison, officiated as principal cook, was killed, thirty of the scholars were put under confinement, and, to compromise the affair, the principals of the schools were compelled to implore pardon of the legate.

In 1248, Henry III. granted the university a charter, to defend it more effectually against the attacks of the citizens, who had wantonly assassinated a young nobleman, a student in one of the schools. In 1274, Walter de Merton founded Merton College, which appears to have been the first regular establishment in the university, and the foundation of that system by which, under certain trifling modifications, it was afterwards organized, and is still governed. About this time the number of scholars in the various hostels was about fifteen thousand, but by what regulations they were controuled does not distinctly appear. The statutes of Merton College, which with little alteration are still observed, appear to be the result of experience, and to have been adapted, in an extraordinary degree, to the diffusion of learning and to the establishment of moral discipline. Henry III., who visited the shrine of St. Frideswide, and held a parliament in the city, to settle his disputes with the barons, conferred many privileges upon the university, renewing all previous charters; and in 1286, Edward I. invested the chancellor with authority to take cognizance of offences committed by the Jews resident at Oxford, and subsequently gave him power to summon any of the burgesses before him, to answer any plea originating in personal action with any of the scholars. Edward II. ratified all the rights and privileges of the university, and, by letters patent, took that institution under his immediate protection. Prior to this the pope had formally conferred upon Oxford, which was considered the next great school to Paris, the rank of university, a distinction then only enjoyed by Paris, Bologna, and Salamanca; and in the reign of Edward II., schools for the Hebrew, Arabic, and Chaldean languages were founded, by order of the council of Vienna, in 1311. In the reign of Edward III., a dispute having arisen between a scholar and an inn-keeper, the latter, by an appeal to the citizens, incited them to an insurrection against the scholars, and both parties having recourse to arms, a violent conflict ensued for two days, when, after repeated skirmishes, a party of two thousand rustics, whom the citizens had invited to their assistance, entered the city, which the scholars had barricaded, and attacking the halls, to several of which they set fire, killed sixty-three of the scholars, and plundered their halls. After the suppression of this tumult, the sheriff of the county, and the mayor of the city, being called to a severe account, were compelled to pay a very heavy fine, and to take an oath, on entering upon their office, to protect the interests and privileges of the university: the fine was afterwards commuted for the payment of one penny each by the mayor and principal citizens, annually in St. Mary's church, at the festival of St. Scholastica; but in the year 1825 the university relinquished all claim to the payment. On the breaking out of the war with France, in 1369, all the French students were ordered to quit the kingdom. The privileges of the university appear to have been an object of particular regard with all succeeding sovereigns; Henry VI., in 1444, gave power to the chancellor to banish any refractory person to the distance of twelve miles from the city, which, with all other privileges, was confirmed by Edward IV., in the first year of his reign. The wars between the houses of York and Lancaster appear to have had an unfavourable influence upon its interests, and, during their continuance, to have considerably diminished the number of students. Richard III. visited Oxford, and was met, on his way from Windsor, by the whole body, by whom he was escorted to Magdalene College, where he passed the night, and the following day attended the public exercises and disputations; and in 1501, Prince Arthur, son of Henry VII., came hither, where he was sumptuously entertained, and lodged in Magdalene College. In the reign of Henry VIII., the public chest of the university was robbed, and the registers stolen; and in 1518, the king and the queen, attended by Cardinal Wolsey and a large retinue of the nobility, having arrived at Abingdon, a deputation from the university waited on them to offer their respects, and escorted the queen to St. Frideswide's shrine, after having visited which, her majesty returned to Merton College, where she was sumptuously entertained. Queen Elizabeth paid visits to the university in 1566, 1571, and in 1592.

The members of the University of Oxford are a body corporate, possessing important privileges, which have been confirmed and extended by a long succession of royal charters, from the earliest period to the reign of Charles I.; and, under various munificent and royal patrons, its ancient halls have been endowed, and new colleges founded, which, taken collectively, form one of the most comprehensive and magnificent seats of learning in Europe. The university was incorporated in the 13th year of the reign of Elizabeth, by the style and title of the Chancellor, Masters, and Scholars of the University of Oxford; it comprises nineteen colleges, the members of which are all distinct corporate bodies, and five halls, which are not incorporated, associated for the acquirement of learning requisite to qualify their members for the learned professions, and the high offices of the state: these several colleges and halls have their own statutes, though subject to the paramount authority of the university. Every member of the university must be matriculated, and on appearing before the chancellor, or vice-chancellor, must declare his rank in life, whether the son of a nobleman, baronet, gentleman, or plebeian, and pay a matriculation fee accordingly, subscribe to the thirty-nine articles of the church of England, and, if sixteen years of age, take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and swear to observe all the statutes, privileges, and customs of the university, and neither to sue before the mayor or bailiffs of the city, nor answer before them as justices, so long as he continues to enjoy its privileges. The laws by which the university is at present governed were compiled by its members in the reign of James I., and confirmed in the 14th of the reign of Charles I., since which they have been modified or ratified by subsequent parliaments.

The principal officers are a chancellor, vice-chancellor, high steward, two proctors, a public orator, a keeper of the archives, a registrar of the university, a registrar of the university courts, two curators of the theatre, a librarian, keeper of the Ashmolean museum, two clerks of the market, three esquire bedels, three yeoman bedels, and other officers. The Chancellor, who is the highest officer in the university, and is generally a distinguished nobleman, is elected by the members of the house of convocation; his office was anciently for one, two, or three years, but was made perpetual in 1484, when Dr. John Russel, Bishop of London, was first elected for life: he does not attend the meetings of the university, except at his installation, and upon the occasion of royal visits. The Vice-chancellor, who is the highest resident officer, is always the head of a college, and is nominated by the chancellor, but must be approved by the house of convocation: he appoints four pro-vice-chancellors, also heads of houses, to assist him in his office, which is annual, though generally continued for four years, by renewed nominations: to him is assigned the superintendence of the university; he enforces the observance of every regulation, convenes the houses of congregation and convocation, and the courts; he is a magistrate for the university, the county and city of Oxford, and the county of Berks, and is preceded in all academic processions by the esquire and yeoman bedels; he grants wine licenses to taverns and vintners, and expels offenders from the city; at all meetings of convocation, and at the annual commemoration in the theatre, he remains covered during the whole ceremony. The High Steward, who is always a nobleman, is appointed by the chancellor, subject to approval by the house of convocation, and holds his office for life: his province is to assist the chancellor, vice-chancellor, and proctors, in the execution of their respective duties, and to defend the rights and privileges of the university; to hear and determine on capital causes in which either scholars or privileged persons are parties, and either personally, or by deputy, to hold the university court leet. The Proctors, who must be masters of arts of four years' standing at least, and of not more than ten, are appointed annually, and are taken from the various colleges in rotation: they each nominate two pro-proctors, also masters of arts, of any college or hall, as their deputies: the office of proctor is to inspect the conduct of all members of the university, and to take cognizance of, and punish for, all offences committed by them without the walls of their respective colleges, to see that the members of the several colleges appear in public in their proper dresses, that just weights and measures are used, and to preserve the public peace. The Public Orator, who must be at least master of arts, or bachelor of civil law, is chosen by the members of the house of convocation: his office is to write letters and addresses upon public occasions, and to pronounce harangues to princes and other illustrious persons visiting the university, to present the honorary degrees conferred by the university, and, alternately with the professor of poetry, to deliver the annual Creweian oration. The Keeper of the Archives (an officer established in 1634), who must be at least master of arts, is appointed by convocation: his duty is to take charge of, and to arrange, all charters, records, and documents, relating to the rights, privileges, and possessions of the university. The Registrar of the University, who must be at least master of arts, or a bachelor in civil law, and a notary public, is chosen by the house of convocation: his office is to attend all meetings, to register graces, dispensations, elections, and degrees; to copy all letters, leases, indentures, and grants, that pass the seal of the university, or the chancellor, and to receive the rents. The Registrar of the University Court is appointed by patent from the chancellor: his office is to make probates of wills, and grant letters of administration to the effects of persons dying intestate within the university, as well as to record all the transactions of the court. The Clerks of the Market, who must be principals of halls, masters of arts, or bachelors of divinity, law, or medicine, are appointed annually, one by the chancellor, and the other by the vice-chancellor: their office is to take cognizance of the quality of bread, and of all provisions, and to inspect the weights and measures.

The public business is transacted by two principal assemblies, called respectively the houses of congregation and convocation, in both which the chancellor, the vice-chancellor, or, in his absence, one of his deputies, and the proctors, or their deputies, preside. The house of congregation consists exclusively of Regents, who are either necessary regents, or regents ad placitum; the former are doctors of every faculty, and masters of arts during the first year of their regency; the latter are doctors of every faculty, resident in the university, heads of colleges and halls (and, in their absence, their deputies), professors, and public lecturers, the masters of the schools, the public examiners, the deans and censors of colleges, and all other masters of arts during the second year of their regency. The house of convocation, or, as it is sometimes called, the great congregation, consists both of regents and non-regents: the right of voting in this house is, by the statutes, restricted to the chancellor, vice-chancellor, the two proctors and their deputies, doctors in divinity, medicine, or civil law, who are necessary regents, masters of arts during the first year of their necessary regency, heads of colleges and halls, or their deputies; members on the foundation of any college, who have at any time been regents; doctors of divinity, medicine, or law, living with their families within the precincts of the university: professors, and public lecturers, who have at any time been regents, and have performed the exercises required by the statutes, and paid all fees due to the university; and convictores, or persons not on the foundation of any college or hall, who have at any time been regents, and whose names have been constantly on the books, from the time of their admission to the degree of master of arts, or to that of doctor in either of the three faculties. The business of the house of congregation is principally confined to the passing of graces and dispensations, and to the granting of degrees. All suffrages in cases of graces and dispensations are to be whispered in the ear of the proctors, by a majority of which, given in the words "placet," or "non placet," the fate of the measure is decided. The business of the house of convocation embraces all subjects affecting the credit, interest, or welfare of the university. Nine regents, exclusively of the vice-chancellor and the proctors, are necessary to form a congregation; the number requisite for a convocation is not defined. In both houses, the chancellor, or vice-chancellor singly, and the two proctors jointly, have an absolute negative upon all proceedings, except in elections. All elections, except for members of parliament, are made in writing by private scrutiny, at which the vice-chancellor presides, and the proctors act as scrutators, and, previously to their proceeding to elect, the act of the 31st of Elizabeth, and the statute de Electionibus are read, and the vice-chancellor administers an oath to the proctors that they will make a faithful scrutiny, and to each of the electors that he will vote only once, and for a person whom he firmly believes to be duly qualified: the election is decided by a majority; should two candidates have an equal number of votes, the senior is elected, if they are graduates, if not, the chancellor, or vice-chancellor, decides by a casting vote. For the better government of the university, a meeting takes place every Monday, and at other times when convened by the vice-chancellor; in these the vice-chancellor, heads of houses, and the proctors, deliberate upon all matters relating to the privileges and liberties of the university, previously to their being proposed in congregation, or decreed in convocation. The chancellor holds a court of record every week during term, at which his assessor presides, for the recovery of debts to any amount, the jurisdiction of which is confined to members of the university. The university received the elective franchise by charter of James I., in 1603, since which time it has regularly returned two members to parliament: the right of election is vested in the doctors and regent masters of arts in convocation: the vice-chancellor is the returning officer.

There are seven Regius Professorships, namely, Divinity, Civil Law, Medicine, Hebrew, Greek, Modern Languages and History, and Botany: the first five were founded by Henry VIII., who endowed each of them with a yearly stipend of £40, payable, those of Divinity, Hebrew, and Greek, by the Dean and Canons of Christ Church; the others out of the Royal Exchequer. The Regius Professorship of Modern Languages and History was founded by George I., in 1724, and confirmed by George II., in 1728; and the Regius Professorship of Botany by George III., in 1793. The original endowment of these professorships has been subsequently augmented; to that of Divinity have been annexed a canonry in Christ Church and the rectory of Ewelme, in this county; to that of Civil Law, a lay prebend in the Cathedral Church of Salisbury; to that of Medicine, the mastership of the hospital of Ewelme, with Tomlins' prelectorship of Anatomy, founded in 1623, by Richard Tomlins, Esq., of Westminster, and to that of Hebrew, a canonry in Christ Church. The Margaret Professorship of Divinity was founded by Margaret, Countess of Richmond, mother of Henry VII., who endowed it with an annual stipend of twenty marks, to which Charles I., in 1627, added a prebend in the Cathedral Church of Worcester: the election is vested in the graduates of divinity; the appointment is for two years from the 8th of September following the election, but the professor is usually continued, by re-election, for life. The Professorship of Natural Philosophy was founded, in 1618, by Sir William Sedley, of Aylesford in Kent, who bequeathed to the university £2000 for its endowment, which sum was invested in the purchase of an estate producing £120 per annum: the appointment is vested in the vice-chancellor, the president of Magdalene College, and the warden of All Souls. The Savilian Professorships of Geometry and Astronomy were founded and endowed, in 1619, by Sir Henry Savile, Knt; they are open to eminent mathematicians of all countries, who, if Englishmen, must have taken the degree of master of arts: the professors are admitted in congregation on the nomination of the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, the Chancellor of the university, the Bishop of London, the principal secretary of state, the chief justices, the chief baron of the Exchequer, and the dean of the Arches. The Camden Professorship of Ancient History was founded, in 1622, by William Camden, Clarencieux King at Arms, the celebrated antiquary, who endowed it with the manor of Bexley in Kent. The Professorship of Music, the appointment to which is annual, and vested in the proctors, was founded in 1626, by William Heather, doctor in music, who also established a fund for the payment of a Choragus, or Præfectus Musicæ Exercitationis, who is nominated by the vice-chancellor, the dean of Christ Church, the warden of New College, the president of Magdalene, and the president of St. John's. The Laudian Professorship of Arabic was founded, in 1636, by William Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury, who endowed it with lands in the parish of Bray, in the county of Berks: the appointment is vested in the presidents of St. John's and Magdalene Colleges, and in the wardens of New College, All Souls', and Merton. The Professorship of Botany was founded, in 1728, by William Sherrard, D.C.L., &c., some time fellow of St. John's, and afterwards consul at Smyrna, who bequeathed to the university £3000 for its endowment, and his valuable library and herbarium: the appointment is in the gift of the Royal College of Physicians. The Professorship of Poetry was founded and endowed by Henry Birkhead, Esq., barrister of the Inner Temple, and D.C.L., some time of Trinity, and afterwards fellow of All Souls': the appointment is in the members of convocation, being tenable for five years, and may be retained for five years more by re-election.

The Anglo-Saxon Professorship was founded, in 1750, by Richard Rawlinson, Esq., D.C.L., of St. John's College, who endowed it with rent-charges on lands in Lancashire: the appointment, which is tenable for five years, is in the members of convocation, and is open to candidates from all the colleges in rotation, reserving every fifth turn to St. John's: the candidate must be unmarried, and remain so while he holds the professorship; he must not be a member of the Royal or Antiquarian Societies, nor a native of Scotland, Ireland, the Colonies, or the son of any native of those places.

The Vinerian Professorship of Common Law was founded, in 1755, by Charles Viner, Esq., who bequeathed £12000 to the university for its endowment, and also for the endowment of as many fellowships of £50 per annum, and scholarships of £30 per annum, of the common law, as those funds would permit; the appointment is in the members of convocation. Sir William Blackstone was the first professor on this foundation, and the substance of his lectures forms the subject of his celebrated Commentaries. The Clinical Professorship for reading Clinical lectures to the students in the Radcliffe Infirmary was founded, in 1772, by the Earl of Lichfield, Chancellor of the university: the appointment, which is vested in the members of convocation, is tenable only by a person who has taken a doctor's degree in medicine five years before the time of election. The Aldrichian Professorships of Anatomy, of the practice of Medicine, and of Chemistry, were founded and endowed, in 1803, by George Aldrich, of the county of Nottingham, M.D.: the endowment of the professorship of Chemistry, which, with that of Medicine, is in the nomination of the members of convocation, has been augmented by a grant from the crown: the professorship of Anatomy is annexed to the prelectorship founded by Richard Tomlins, Esq., and both held with the regius professorship of medicine: one course of lectures in chemistry is annually delivered at the museum. The Professorship of Political Economy was founded, in 1825, by Henry Drummond, Esq., of Albury park, in the county of Surrey, who endowed it with a rent-charge of £100 on his estates in that county: the appointment is in the members of convocation, and is tenable for five years by a master of arts, or bachelor of civil law, who has regularly graduated at Oxford. The Lord Almoner's Reader in Arabic is appointed by the Lord Almoner, and has an annual stipend out of the Almonry bounty. The Readership in Experimental Philosophy was founded by grant from the crown, in 1810: two courses of lectures are read in the museum, comprising the principal experiments in mechanics, hydrostatics, optics, electricity, and magnetism. The Readership in Mineralogy, established in 1813, and the Readership in Geology, in 1818, were also founded by grants from the crown. The Anatomical Lectureship was founded, in 1750, by the late Matthew Lee, M.D., of Christ Church: two courses of lectures are delivered in the Anatomical school at Christ Church, one in Lent, and the other at Michaelmas term. The Bampton Lectures were founded, about the year 1780, by John Bampton, M.A., canon of Salisbury, who bequeathed funds for the annual preaching of eight divinity lecture sermons on the leading articles of the Christian faith; of which thirty copies are to be printed for distribution among the heads of houses: the preachers, who are appointed by the heads of colleges only, must have taken the degree of master of arts in either of the universities, and no person can be appointed to preach the divinity lecture sermons twice. The Whitehall Preacherships were founded by George I., in 1724: the preachers were appointed by the Bishop of London, as Dean of His Majesty's chapel, and were resident fellows of colleges during the time they held the office; there were twenty-four preachers, of whom twelve were chosen from each of the universities, but in 1829 the establishment was broken up by the Bishop of London. The University Sermons are, with certain exceptions, preached in St. Mary's church every Sunday morning during term, by the heads of colleges, the dean and canons of Christ Church, the two professors of divinity, and the professor of Hebrew: the dean and canons of Christ Church, when it comes to their turn, preach these sermons in their own cathedral church. Ten select preachers, who must be doctors, or bachelors in divinity, or in civil law, or masters of arts, are nominated by the vice-chancellor and proctors, and the Regius and Margaret professors of divinity; of these, five go out of office annually, but may be re-appointed after one year.

Dr. Radcliffe founded two fellowships in the university, which he endowed with £600 per annum, for the maintenance of two fellows for ten years, one-half at least to be spent in travelling in foreign parts for their improvement, and to whom, while in the university, he assigned chambers in New College; the Travelling Fellows are appointed by the electors of the Radcliffe librarian. The Vinerian fellowships of £50 each, and scholarships of £30 each, per annum, tenable for ten years only after the date of election, vary in number, according to the state of the revenue of the endowment: the election is made by the members of convocation: the fellows must have taken the degree of master of arts, or bachelor in civil law, at the time of their appointment; and if the candidate be not a barrister at the time, he must become one within a year after his election; the fellowships are given in preference to such as have been scholars on this foundation: the scholars must have completed twenty-four months from the time of their matriculation, and take the degree of bachelor in civil law as soon as possible after the appointment, and within one year after the taking that degree become barristers. The Craven Scholarships were founded, in 1647, by John, Lord Craven, who bequeathed lands for the endowment of two scholarships, tenable for fourteen years, in this university, and two in the university of Cambridge: the nomination is vested in the vice-chancellor, the regius professors, and the public orator: three additional scholarships, tenable for seven years only, supported by the same funds, were established by a decree of the Court of Chancery, in 1819; in the appointment to these scholarships, preference is given to candidates of the name or family of the founder, and no one is eligible who is a graduate in the university, or a fellow or scholar of any college, or whose parents are able to maintain him otherwise. The Ireland Scholarships were founded, in 1825, by John Ireland, D.D., Dean of Westminster, who transferred to the university £4000 in the three per cent. consols., for the endowment of four scholarships of £30 per annum each, for undergraduates, who shall not have exceeded their sixteenth term from the date of matriculation: the candidate must produce in writing the consent of the head of his college, and the certificate of his standing: the election is made by three examiners appointed by the trustees. A circular has recently been sent round to the respective colleges by the managers of the "Eldonian Testimonial Fund," stating that the Law scholarship, to be founded from that source, will be filled up in May or June, 1831; candidates to be persons who have previously gained distinguished honours at this university.

The four terms in the year are, Michaelmas, which commences on the 10th of October, and ends on the 17th of December; Hilary term, which commences on the 14th of January, and ends on the Saturday before Palm-Sunday, or, if that day be a festival, on the Monday after; Easter term, which commences on the 10th day after Easter-Sunday, and ends on the day before Whit-Sunday; and Trinity term, which commences on the Wednesday after Whit-Sunday, and ends on the Saturday after the first Tuesday in July: the full term begins on the first day of the week after the first congregation is held. Michaelmas and Hilary terms are kept, by six weeks' residence, by such as have not taken any degree in arts, and Easter and Trinity terms, by a residence of three weeks each. Sixteen terms are requisite to qualify for the degree of bachelor of arts, except the sons of English, Scotch, or Irish peers, matriculated as such, and not on the foundation of any college, who are admitted candidates for that degree after three years' residence. Twelve terms, exclusively of the term of matriculation, are requisite for bachelors of arts keeping terms for a master's degree, and for students in civil law, who, having resided three weeks in each term, assume the civilian's gown. For the degree of bachelor in civil law, without proceeding through arts, twenty-eight terms are requisite; but of these, two are considered as being kept by matriculation in term, and by taking the degree, and, as in the case of a master's degree, three others are dispensed with by congregation, and six more by the chancellor's letter. For the degree of doctor in civil law, five years are requisite, to be computed from the time of taking the bachelor's degree; but, upon making oath in convocation of intention to practise in Doctors' Commons, one year is remitted. For the degree of bachelor in medicine, one year is requisite from the regency, and for that of doctor, four years' residence from the time of matriculation. For the degree of bachelor in divinity, seven years are required from the time of matriculation, and for that of doctor, four years more. Candidates for all degrees, who possess certain property, must go out, according to the local phrase, as grand compounders; the property requisite for this purpose may arise either from civil or ecclesiastical property if the former, it must amount to 300 per annum: if the latter, the preferment must be rated in the king's books at £40: candidates who do not possess property to that amount are termed petty compounders, and must at least have ecclesiastical property of the annual value of five shillings, or property of any other description to the amount of £5 per annum. The exercises for the degree of bachelor of arts are, responsions held in Michaelmas, Hilary, and Trinity terms, to which candidates who have entered on their sixth term and not completed their ninth are admitted, on giving their names for that purpose to the junior proctor, at least three days previously to the commencement of the exercises, which consist of examination in the classics, the rudiments of logic, and in Euclid's elements of Geometry; and public examinations, held twice a year, in Michaelmas and Easter terms, to which candidates who have entered on their fourth year of matriculation, and have previously responded before the masters of the schools, are admitted, by giving their names for that purpose three days before the examination commences: the public examination comprehends the rudiments of religion, under which is included a sufficient knowledge of the Gospels in the original Greek, of the thirty-nine articles of the church of England, and of the evidences of natural and revealed religion; the literæ humaniores, including a competent knowledge of the Latin and Greek languages, rhetoric and moral philosophy, as derived from the Greek and Roman writers, logic, and Latin composition; and the elements of the mathematical sciences and of physics. In the literæ humaniores, and in the elements of the mathematical sciences and physics, the examiners have a certain discretionary power, but they have none with respect to the rudiments of religion, any failure in which inevitably excludes the candidate from his degree, without regard to his other attainments. The examinations, both in the responsions and in the public examinations, may be conducted either in the Latin or English language. The public examiners, who are nine in number, are chosen from those who have taken the degree of master of arts, or doctor of civil law; they are nominated by the vice-chancellor and proctors, but must be approved by the houses of congregation and convocation; six of them examine in literis humanioribus, and four must be present at each examination; the other four examine in Disciplinis Mathematicis et Physicis, and three at least must be present at each examination: there cannot be two examiners of either class from the same college or hall, neither can any of them examine a candidate belonging to his own college or hall. Three masters, who have been admitted regents in arts, preside over the schools, of whom one is nominated by the vice-chancellor, and one by each of the proctors, annually on the first day of Trinity term: two masters must always be present at the responsions, and when the proctors are absent during the performance of the exercises, the masters are invested with procuratorial power.

The exercises requisite for a bachelor's degree in divinity, law, or medicine, are disputations on two distinct days, before the professors of those respective faculties; in divinity, the preaching of a Latin sermon at St. Mary's, before the vice-chancellor, is also required. For a doctor's degree in either of the faculties, three distinct lectures are to be read in the schools, on three several days, which, by a dispensation from the houses of congregation or convocation, are permitted to be read at three different hours on the same day. Three prizes of £20 each are given annually by the chancellor for the best compositions in Latin verse, Latin prose, and English prose; for the first, candidates only who have not exceeded four years from their matriculation can contend; for the other two, all such as have exceeded four years, but not completed seven, and have not taken the degree of M.A., or B.C.L., may be competitors. Sir Roger Newdigate, in 1806, bequeathed to the university funds for an annual prize for English verses on ancient sculpture, painting, or architecture. Dr. Ellerton, fellow of Magdalene College, gave a rent-charge of £21, on an estate at Horspath, in the county of Oxford, for an annual prize for the best English essay on some doctrine or duty of the Christian religion, or on some subject in theology. The subjects of all these compositions are given out by the vice-chancellor, and the compositions are sent, under a sealed cover, without the author's name, but distinguished by a motto, a duplicate of which, signed with the author's name, is also sent to the registrar of the university, on a day fixed by the vice-chancellor, who, with the two proctors, the public orator, and the professor of poetry, decide on their merits in the theatre, where the compositions are publicly recited at the commemoration. The university enjoys the right of presentation to the rectory of South Moreton, in the county of Berks, held in trust for Magdalene Hall; the vicarage of South Petherwin cum Trewen, in the county of Cornwall; the vicarage of Holme-Cultram, in the county of Cumberland; the rectory of Gatcomb, in trust for the Principal of St. Edmund Hall, in the county of Southampton; the vicarage of Syston, in the county of Leicester; the rectory of Stutchbury, in the county of Northampton; the lectureship of St. Giles', in the city of Oxford; and the perpetual curacy of Kirkdale, in the county of York.

University College is supposed by some to have been founded so early as 872, by Alfred the Great, and to have constituted the largest of his three halls, but, with far greater probability, its foundation is ascribed to William, Archdeacon of Durham, who, in 1249, left three hundred and ten marks to the chancellor and university, in order to purchase certain annual rents for the support of ten, twelve, or more masters, at that time the highest academical title, the first purchase having been made in 1253. The funds left by him were appropriated to the support of a limited number of individuals, chosen by the various halls of the university, and who at first did not form an independent society, but were subordinate to the several schools in which they had been educated: in 1280, the institution of a society was determined upon, and the statutes eventually settled by the university bear the date 1292. The situation of the original house, or hall, is generally considered to be the site now occupied by Brasenose College, and historians assert that the society removed to the present college about 1343, under the style of "the Master and Scholars of the Hall of the University of Oxford," giving to their house the name of "University Hall;" at what period it was first denominated a college is unknown. The style at present in use, namely, "the Master and Fellows of the College of the Great Hall of the University, commonly called University College in Oxford," was fixed by Queen Elizabeth, in 1572. A common seal was used so early as 1320, and the statutes now in force were enacted in 1726. The foundation consists of a master, twelve fellows, and twenty-four scholars and exhibitioners: two of the fellowships were founded by William of Durham, for that county; three by Henry IV., for the dioceses of York and Durham; three, in 1442, by the Earl of Northumberland, for the dioceses of Durham, Carlisle, and York; and four, in 1631, by Sir Simon Bennet, for any part of England, except these three dioceses. The King became visitor in the beginning of the reign of George II., in consequence of a decree in the court of King's Bench, assigning the foundation to Alfred; the House of Convocation had previously exercised that power, as trustees under the will of William of Durham. The livings in the patronage of the Master and Fellows are, the rectory of Tarrant-Gunville, in the county of Dorset; the rectory of North Cerney, in the county of Gloucester; the rectory of Headbourn-Worthy, in the county of Southampton; the perpetual curacy of Flamstead, in the county of Hertford; the rectory of Elton, in the county of Huntingdon; the rectory of Checkendon, in the county of Oxford; the rectory of Kingsdon, in the county of Somerset; the rectory of Beckley, in the county of Sussex; the vicarage of Arncliffe, and the rectory of Melsonby, in the county of York. The college, which is on the south side of the High-street, is in the ancient style of English architecture, with portions in the Italian style, and comprises two parallel quadrangles: one, built at various periods, with a chapel and hall on the south side, is one hundred feet square; the other, built principally by Dr. Radcliffe, has only three sides, each being about eighty feet in length; on the south is the master's garden: the two constitute a front of about two hundred and forty feet in extent, from the High-street, which it faces, presenting a magnificent appearance; each quadrangle is entered by a gateway surmounted by a tower; over one entrance, in front, is the statue of Queen Anne, and within, that of James II.; over the other, in front, that of Mary II., and within, that of Dr. Radcliffe. The chapel, built in 1665, displays a profusion of painted glass, and contains a fine cenotaph, by Flaxman, to the memory of Sir William Jones. In the library, which was completed in 1660, is a very valuable collection of books and manuscripts. Amongst the most eminent members formerly belonging to this society may be enumerated Ridley, Bishop of London, who was burnt at the stake in this city; Bingham, author of Origines Ecclesiasticæ; Sir William Jones; Dr. Radcliffe; Edward, Lord Herbert of Cherbury; Dr. John Hudson, a learned critic; Carte, the historian; Richard Jago, an ingenious poet; Sir Robert Chambers, Vinerian Professor, afterwards a Judge in India; two archbishops, and nine bishops. The members on the books are two hundred and eighteen, of whom one hundred and ten are members of convocation.

Balliol College appears to have been founded, about 1260, by John Balliol, of Bernard Castle, father of John Balliol, King of Scotland: he gave to each of his scholars 8d. per week for their commons, and settled yearly exhibitions upon them, with the intention of providing a house and appropriate accommodation, which was carried into effect after his decease, in 1269, by his wife Devorguilla, who, in 1281, purchased a tenement in Horsemonger-street, now called Broad-street, and prescribed statutes for their government: in 1284, she likewise purchased the adjoining hall of St. Mary, and having repaired it, established the society there by charter of incorporation, which, being confirmed by the king, her son, and Oliver, Bishop of Lincoln, the name of New Balliol College was given to it: the code of statutes at present in force was enacted in 1507. The number of scholars has varied at different times, according to the state of the finances: in 1610 the society included not less than one hundred and twenty-seven persons; at present it consists of a master, twelve fellows, and fourteen scholars, of whom nine fellows and ten scholars are on the old foundation. In 1620, Lady Eliz. Periam, widow of the Lord Chief Baron, Sir William Periam, Knt., added one fellowship, which, as well as those on the old foundation, is open to candidates indiscriminately: in 1615, and 1676, the trustees of Mr. Peter Blundell founded two fellowships for persons to be elected from his grammar school at Tiverton, in the county of Devon: there are also thirty-three scholarships and exhibitions; and, in 1522, lands were given by Thomas Harrope to increase the number of scholarships: among the exhibitions are four founded by John Warner, Bishop of Rochester, in 1666 or 1667, for natives of Scotland, to support the cause of episcopacy in that country; they are endowed with £20 per annum each, and are now held by four of the exhibitors of John Snell, Esq. This college alone has the privilege of electing its own visitor, who at present is the Archbishop of Canterbury. The livings in the patronage of the Master and Fellows are the rectory and vicarage of Duloe, in the county of Cornwall; the vicarage of Beer-Regis, in the county of Dorset; the rectories of All Saints', St. Leonard, St. Nicholas, Holy Trinity, and the perpetual curacy of St. Botolph's, in the town of Colchester; the vicarage of Marks-Tey, and the rectory of Tendring, in the county of Essex; the vicarage of Abbotsley, in the county of Huntingdon; the rectories of Brattleby, Fillingham, and Riseholme, in the county of Lincoln; the consolidated vicarages of St. Lawrence Jewry and St. Mary Magdalene, Milk-street, London; the vicarage of Long Benton, in the county of Northumberland; and the rectories of Kilve cum Stringston, Huntspill, and Timsbury, in the county of Somerset. The buildings of this college chiefly form a quadrangle of one hundred and twenty feet by eighty, in addition to which is an area on the north-west side: in the centre of the front is a fine square embattled tower, surmounted by a turret, and ornamented with a highly enriched canopied niche, and the arms of the founder: on the west side of the quadrangle are the hall and master's residence; on the north the chapel and library, which latter, originally completed in 1477, was repaired and embellished under the direction of Mr. James Wyatt, architect, and contains a valuable collection of illuminated manuscripts, several rare English Bibles, and other works: the other sides consist of rooms for the fellows and scholars. The buildings to the north-east of the quadrangle were the gift of Archbishop Abbot; those to the south-west of it, fronting the street, and containing twelve sets of rooms, were erected at the expense of Mr. Fisher, formerly a fellow of this college; to which was added, in 1827, a building on the north, fronting the church of St. Mary Magdalene, containing twenty-two sets of rooms. Among the more eminent members may be enumerated John Wickliff, the Reformer, who was master; Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester; Tiptoft, Earl of Worcester; John Ross and Robert Parsons; Sir John Popham, Chief Justice of the King's Bench; Sir Robert Atkyns, Chief Baron of the Exchequer; Sir John Evelyn; Dr. Bradley, Astronomer Royal; Rev. John Hutchins, author of the History of Dorsetshire; three archbishops, and eight bishops. The members on the books are two hundred and forty-eight, of whom one hundred are members of convocation.

Merton College was founded by Walter de Merton, Bishop of Rochester, and Lord High Chancellor of England, who having previously founded one at Merton, in the county of Surrey, removed the society hither in 1274, under the name of Domus Scholarum de Merton, and the statutes bear that date: this college, in point of legal establishment, is the oldest in the university, and was so well endowed, that in the 26th of Henry VIII. its revenue was valued at £354. The society consists of a warden, twenty-four fellows, fourteen postmasters, four scholars, two chaplains, and two clerks. The natives of the following dioceses are ineligible to fellowships, viz., St. Asaph, Bangor, St. David's, Llandaff, Hereford, Chichester, Exeter, Rochester, Lichfield and Coventry, Chester, and Carlisle. Exhibitions for the twelve portionists, called postmasters, were given in 1380, by John Willyott, D.D., Chancellor of Exeter; these were increased to fourteen by John Chamber, fellow of Eton, and canon of Windsor, who directed his exhibitioners to be elected from Eton College: the four scholarships were founded, in 1753, by Henry Jackson, M.A., of this college, and afterwards a minor canon of St. Paul's, London: the sum of £20 per annum is vested in the Warden and Fellows, for general distribution among poor scholars. The Archbishop of Canterbury is visitor. The livings in the patronage of the Warden and Fellows are, the rectory of Gamlingay, in the county of Cambridge; the vicarage of Diddington, in the county of Huntingdon; the vicarage of Elham, in the county of Kent, on the nomination of the Archbishop of Canterbury; the rectory of Kibworth-Beauchamp, in the county of Leicester; the vicarages of Embleton and Ponteland, in the county of Northumberland; the rectories of Cuxham and Ibstone, with the perpetual curacies of Holywell and Wolvercote, in the county of Oxford; the perpetual curacies of St. John the Baptist, and St. Peter in the East, in the city of Oxford; the rectory of Farley, and the vicarage of Malden, with the perpetual curacy of Chessington, in the county of Surrey; the rectory of Lapworth, and the vicarage of Great Welford, in the county of Warwick; and the vicarage of Stratton St. Margaret, in the county of Wilts: the Archbishop of Canterbury must also collate one of the fellows, or one who has been a fellow, of this college, to the rectory of Denton, in the county of Norfolk. The college is situated on the south side of the city, in St. John's street, and its buildings form three quadrangles; the first, which opens by a noble arch into the inner quadrangle, is one hundred and ten feet by one hundred feet, and was rebuilt in 1589, with the exception of the tower and gatehouse, which were constructed in the early part of the fifteenth century, during the wardenship of the celebrated mathematician, Thomas Redburn, Bishop of St David's: it contains the warden's apartments, some portions of which are supposed to be coeval with the original edifice. The second, or grand court, is of modern date, and exhibits a mixed style of architecture; the centre elevation is adorned with tiers of columns of the Tuscan, Doric, Ionic, and Corinthian orders. The third, or small court, is ancient, and supposed to have been built, as it now stands, about the same time as the library, which forms its south and west sides, and was founded in 1376, by Rede, Bishop of Chichester: this is thought to be the most ancient structure of the kind in existence. At the western end of the outer court is the chapel, which is considered one of the finest in the university, and consists of a choir in the decorated style, and transepts, with a low massive tower at the intersection, in the later style of English architecture; the windows are of painted glass, and the east window of seven lights is ornamented with a rich wheel, crocketed canopies and pinnacles, being considered a remarkable specimen of fine taste, and is called the Catharine Wheel window: the tower is embattled and pinnaced. It is the parish church of St. John the Baptist, being used only as the college chapel, and the parochial duties are discharged by one of the chaplains of the college, a small portion of the interior being allotted as a burial-place for the inhabitants. Among the eminent members of this society may be classed Dr. Harvey, who discovered the circulation of the blood, warden of the college; the celebrated Duns Scotus; Archbishop Bradwardyn; John Wickliff; Sir Henry Savile; John Greaves; John Hales; Francis Cheynell; Hugh Cressy; Samuel Clarke; Anthony à Wood; the Oxford historian; Sir Richard Steele; the Earl of Essex; the parliamentary general; Thomas Farnaby, a learned critic; Dr. Edmund Dickenson; Thomas Tyrwhitt, editor of Chaucer's Tales; thirteen bishops, and five archbishops: Savile and Wood were buried here. The members on the books are one hundred and twenty seven, of whom sixty-four are members of convocation.

Exeter College was founded, in 1314, by Walter de Stapledon, Bishop of Exeter, and called Stapledon Hall: on the removal of his scholars to this spot from Hart Hall the foundation comprised a rector and twelve fellows, eight of the thirteen to be elected from the archdeacons of Exeter, Totness, and Barnstaple, four from the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and one, to be nominated by the Dean and Chapter of Exeter, from any other place, provided the candidate should be in priest's orders. Two additional fellowships were founded, in 1404, by Edmund Stafford, Bishop of Exeter (who obtained leave to bestow on the college its present name), to be chosen from the diocese of Salisbury; eight, in 1565, by Sir William Petre, Knt., for natives of the counties of Devon, Somerset, Dorset, Oxford, and Essex, and any others in which his descendants might have lands of inheritance, or other possessions, who also procured a new body of statutes, and a regular deed of incorporation for this college; one by Charles I., in 1636, for a native of Jersey or Guernsey; and two, about 1700, by Lady Elizabeth Shiers, for natives of the counties of Hertford and Surrey, which are exclusively in the gift of the rector and five senior fellows: the society at present includes a rector and twenty-five fellows; there are also sixteen scholarships and exhibitions. The Bishop of Exeter is visitor. The livings in the patronage of the Rector and Fellows are, the vicarage of Long Wittenham, in the county of Berks; the vicarage of Menheniot, in the county of Cornwall, on the nomination, by the Dean and Chapter of Exeter, of one who is or has been a fellow of the college; the rectory of Bushey, in the county of Hertford; the rectory of Wootton, in the county of Northampton; the vicarages of Merton and South Newington, in the county of Oxford; the rectories of Ripe and Waldron, in the county of Sussex; and the rectories of Baverstock and Somerford Magna, in the county of Wilts: the vicarage of Kidlington, in the county of Oxford, is annexed, without institution, to the rectorship. The front of this college is on the eastern side of the Turle, and is two hundred and twenty feet in length; a gateway of rustic work, surmounted by a tower, with Ionic pilasters, which support a semicircular pediment, ornamented with the arms of the founder, leads into the first quadrangle, in which are the hall, a handsome building in the later style of English architecture, erected about 1610, by Sir John Ackland; the chapel, in similar style, towards the erection of which, about 1623, Dr. George Hakewill contributed £1200, and which possesses the peculiarity of having two aisles; and the rector's lodgings: there is an inner court, of similar construction, one hundred and thirty-five feet square; behind it is a garden laid out with great taste. The library was erected, about 1778, and contains, with other valuable works, a fine collection of the Aldine classics, also a portrait of Mr. Sandford, a learned but eccentric divine, who included in his valuable bequest to this college, the extremely rare and valuable Hebrew Bible, printed at Soncino in Italy, in 1488. Among the eminent members may be enumerated the following writers: Trevisa; Grocyn; Sir John Dodderidge; Digory Whear; George Hakewill; Joseph Caryl; Browne, the poet; the celebrated lawyer, Sir John Fortescue; and Anthony Astley Cooper, Earl of Shaftesbury; Maundrell, the oriental traveller; Dr. William Borlase, the Cornish antiquary; Jonathan Toup, an eminent critic; Nicholas Tindal, the continuator of Rapin; Sir Michael Foster, a learned lawyer; Dr. Benjamin Kennicott; also two archbishops, and eleven bishops. The members on the books are two hundred and eighty-eight, of whom one hundred and twenty-three are members of convocation.

Oriel College was founded, in 1326, by license of Edward II. to his almoner, Adam de Brome, to build and endow a college to the honour of the Virgin Mary, towards which project that sovereign had, in 1325, given the advowson of St. Mary's, and the parsonage-house of that rectory: of this institution Brome became the first provost. In 1333, the parsonage-house was converted into an academical hall, called St. Mary's Hall, and Edward III. gave to the society a tenement, called L'Oriele, on which this college was founded, and whence its name is derived. The original foundation included a provost and ten fellows; four fellowships were added about 1441, by John Frank, Master of the Rolls, for the counties of Somerset, Dorset, Wilts, and Devon; one by John Carpenter, Bishop of Worcester, about 1476; one by William Smyth, Bishop of Lincoln, in 1507; and two by Richard Dudley, chancellor of the church of Salisbury, in 1529. A prebend in Rochester cathedral was annexed to the office of provost for ever, by Queen Anne. There are fifteen exhibitions.

The King is visitor. The livings in the patronage of the Provost and Fellows are, the rectory of Ufton, in the county of Berks; the rectory of Purleigh, in the county of Essex; the rectories of Abbot's Cromhall and Tortworth, in the county of Gloucester; the vicarage of Coleby, in the county of Lincoln; the perpetual curacy of Morton-Pinkney, in the county of Northampton; the vicarage of St. Mary the Virgin, in the city of Oxford; the rectory of Swainswick, and the vicarage of Twiverton, in the county of Somerset; the rectory of Cholderton, in the county of Wilts; and the vicarage of Aberford, in the county of York; the rectory of Plymptree, in the county of Devon; and the rectory of Saltfleet by St. Peter's, in the county of Lincoln; are in the gift of the Provost. The buildings consist of a spacious and handsome quadrangle, and two lateral ranges of chambers on the east and west sides of the garden; the eastern wing, erected by Robinson, Bishop of London, in 1719; the western, by Dr. George Carter, provost, in 1729; and in 1817 a modern stone building, comprising fifteen sets of rooms, was erected to the southward of Bishop Robinson's wing. The entrance to the quadrangle from the street is through a tower-gateway, the roof of which is decorated with the royal arms of Charles I., and the tower with a bay window, or oriel. The hall, immediately opposite, is approached by a flight of steps, under a portico, surmounted by statues of Edward II. and Edward III., in niches, and above these, in another niche, are sculptured representations of the Virgin and Child. The Provost's house is on the north side of the quadrangle; the south and west sides are occupied by the members' apartments: on the east side is the entrance to the chapel, which edifice was completed in 1642, and, with the hall, presents specimens of the later style of English architecture: the library was designed and constructed under the direction of Mr. James Wyatt. Among the eminent members are Dr. Joseph Butler, the learned Bishop of Durham; Sir Walter Raleigh; William Prynne; Sir John Holt, an eminent lawyer; and Dr. Joseph Warton. The members on the books are two hundred and ninety-eight, of whom one hundred and fifty-nine are members of convocation.

Queen's College was founded, in 1340, by Robert de Egglesfield, rector of Brough, in the county of Westmorland, and Confessor to Philippa, Queen of Edward III., and it has, in consequence, received the especial patronage of the Queens of England. The original foundation consisted of a provost and twelve fellows, afterwards increased to sixteen, to be elected exclusively from the counties of Cumberland and Westmorland; to these, eight fellowships were added, on the foundation of John Michel, Esq., of Richmond in Surrey, for natives of any county: there are also forty-eight scholarships and exhibitions: the Archbishop of York is visitor. The livings in the patronage of the Provost and Fellows are, the vicarage of Sparsholt, and the rectories of Sulhampstead-Abbas, and Sulhampstead Bannister, in the county of Berks; the rectory of Holwell, in the county of Somerset; the vicarage of Chedworth, in the county of Gloucester; the vicarages of Bramley, Carisbrooke, Godshill with the rectory of Niton,

Milford with the perpetual curacy of Hordle, Monks' Sherborne, Holy Rood (Southampton), the rectories of Bramshot, Knight's Enham, Headley, Newnham with the perpetual curacy of Mapledewell, Church-Oakley, and Weyhill, and the chapels of Pamber and Upton-Grey, in the county of Southampton; the rectories of Blechingdon, Charlton upon Otmere, Hampton-Poyle, and South Weston, in the county of Oxford; the vicarage of Newbold-Pacey, in the county of Warwick; and the vicarage of Brough, in the county of Westmorland. The livings on Mr. Michel's, or the New, foundation are, the vicarage of Wendron with Helston, in the county of Cornwall; the rectory of English-Bicknor, in the county of Gloucester; the second portion of the rectory of Pontesbury, in the county of Salop; and the rectory of Upton-Scudamore, in the county of Wilts. The whole of this magnificent edifice was erected in the last century: the entire area forms an oblong square of three hundred feet by two hundred and twenty, and is divided into two spacious courts by the chapel and hall; the principal front is on the north side of the High-street, and the grand entrance is under a large central gateway, which is surmounted by an open cupola, supported on pillars, and containing a statue of Queen Caroline, consort of George II., by whose munificence it was erected: this gateway leads into the first quadrangle, which was erected in 1710, by Hawksmore, at the expense of Provost Lancaster, and is one hundred and forty feet by one hundred and thirty, being thought to bear a resemblance to the Luxembourg palace in Paris: on three of its sides are lofty cloisters, supported by square pillars, leading to the lodgings of the provost, and the rooms of the different members of the society; the north side, at the extremities of which are the chapel and hall, consists of a grand Doric elevation, with an enriched central pediment, supported on four lofty columns, terminating in a circle, with intervening pilasters; and crowned with a balustrade and fine Ionic cupola: the south front is ornamented with six figures, of which, the two placed on pediments are Jupiter and Apollo: the chapel windows contain several exquisite specimens of ancient stained glass, and the ceiling is decorated with a painting of the Ascension by Sir James Thornhill. The inner court is one hundred and thirty feet by ninety: on its western side is the library, which was completed in 1690: it is one of the largest in the university, and contains, besides a valuable collection of books amounting to more than eighteen thousand volumes, some fine busts and paintings, two very ancient paintings in glass of Henry V., who was educated at this college, and a most magnificent cast of a Florentine boar. In the buttery is an ancient and curious drinking horn, capable of containing two quarts, and presented to the college by Queen Philippa; the ornamental engravings are rich and curious, and it bears several inscriptions of the Saxon word Wacceyl. Among the more eminent members may be enumerated, Dr. Holyoake, Wycheley, Halley, Addison, Tickell, and Burn, author of the "Justice of the Peace;" Henry V., said to have been a student here; Bernard Gilpin, called "the Apostle of the North;" Dr. John Mill, the learned editor of the New Testament; Sir John Davies, a learned lawyer and poet; Dr. Thomas Hyde, Professor of Arabic; Sir John Floyer, a learned physician; Dr. Thomas Shaw, the traveller; Collins, the poet; as clerical dignitaries, one archbishop, and fourteen bishops, including Cardinal Beaufort, and Bishops Gibson, Nicholson, and Tanner. The members on the books are three hundred and fifty-one, of whom one hundred and sixty-four are members of convocation.

New College was founded, in 1386, by William of Wykeham, Bishop of Winchester, and Lord High Chancellor of England, for a warden, seventy fellows and scholars, ten chaplains, an organist, three clerks, and sixteen choristers. In the original charter it is called the College of St. Mary of Winchester: the present popular appellation was acquired at the time of its erection, and has continued to the present time. Wykeham's school, at Winchester, was instituted as a nursery to supply scholars by election to this college, and is annually subject to the visitation of the warden; for which reason the fellows enjoy the privilege of admission to degrees, without obtaining a grace from the house of congregation, or being examined in the public schools, provided they have undergone examinations in their own college, according to the forms of the university: the fellows and scholars must be elected from the college, or school, at Winchester, at a regular meeting held annually for that purpose, and attended by the wardens of both colleges, two fellows of New College, and the subwarden and head master of that at Winchester. The founder's kin are fellows on admission; others are probationary scholars until the expiration of two years. The statutes of the founder, the counterpart of those at Winchester, were deemed so complete that they have served as a model in framing regulations for most of the succeeding colleges. The Bishop of Winchester is visitor. The livings in the patronage of the Warden and Fellows are, the rectories of Akely, Hardwick, Great Horwood, Newton-Longville, Radcliffe, and Tingewick, and the vicarage of Whaddon, in the county of Buckingham; the vicarage of Steeple-Morden, in the county of Cambridge; the rectory of Abbot's Stoke, in the county of Dorset; the rectories of Birchanger and Little Sampford, the vicarages of Hornchurch, and Writtle with Roxwell chapel, and the perpetual curacy of Romford, in the county of Essex; the vicarage of Marshfield, in the county of Gloucester; the vicarage of Heckfield with Mattingley chapel, in the county of Southampton; the rectories of Saham-Toney, Stratton St. Michael, St. John Madder-Market (in the city of Norwich), Weston, and Witchingham St. Faith consolidated with the vicarage of Witchingham St. Mary, in the county of Norfolk; the rectory of Paulers-Pury, in the county of Northampton; the vicarages of East Adderbury, Chesterton, and Swalcliffe with the chapelry of Epwell, and the rectories of Bucknell, Heyford-Warren, Stanton St. John, and Wootton, in the county of Oxford; the rectory of Worthen, in the county of Salop; the rectory of Long Ditton, in the county of Surrey; the rectory of Stockton, in the county of Warwick; the rectories of Alton-Barnes, Berwick St. John, and Donhead St. Mary, in the county of Wilts: the sinecure rectory of Colerne, in the county of Wilts, is annexed to the Wardenship, and the Warden is patron of the vicarage. This college is situated in New College lane, and consists of a principal quadrangle, measuring one hundred and sixty-eight feet by one hundred and twenty-nine, which includes the chapel, hall, and library; and a smaller quadrangle, called the Cloisters, adjacent to which is a lofty and substantial square tower: the other buildings, which form the garden-court, are an addition to the original design, and were built in imitation of the palace of Versailles, or, according to some, of the king's house at Winchester, but with battlements to correspond with the old quadrangle and city wall, by which the more ancient part of the buildings is surrounded: this part of the college was finished in 1684, and is separated from the garden, which is spacious and tastefully arranged, by an iron palisade; the approach to the great quadrangle is by a portal, surmounted by a tower, the front of which still retains, in one of its ornamented niches, the sculptured effigy of the founder. The chapel and hall, on the north side of the great court, present a magnificent elevation; the former was remarkable for its splendour prior to the Reformation, and still retains a primary rank among the sacred structures of the university: it is in the later style of English architecture, with a very rich interior, and consists of an ante-chapel, eighty feet by thirty-six, leading at right angles into a choir of one hundred feet by thirty-five: in the former division is a splendid display of painted glass, in four different styles of execution, but these are surpassed by the great west window, which is divided into two parts, the higher representing the Nativity, and the lower seven figures emblematical of the Christian and cardinal virtues, executed by Jarvis, from the designs of Sir Joshua Reynolds: on the north and south sides of the choir are other paintings; those on the south side were originally Flemish, and are said to have been done from designs by some of the scholars of Rubens; they were purchased by the college, and repaired in 1740: over the altar are some beautiful specimens of sculpture, by Westmacott. The costly and beautiful crosier of the founder, seven feet in height, of silver gilt, and richly decorated, is preserved in the chapel. Among the eminent literary persons educated here were Somerville, the poet; and Wood, author of the "Institutes;" amongst its clerical dignitaries, two archbishops, and twenty-nine bishops, including Archbishop Warham, and Dr. Lowth. The members on the books are one hundred and fifty-three, of whom sixty-six are members of convocation.

Lincoln College was founded, in 1427, by Richard Fleming, Bishop of Lincoln, from which see it takes its name, under permission, obtained from Henry VI., to make the church of All Saints collegiate, and establish a college for a rector and seven scholars: it was completed by Rotheram, Archbishop of York, who added five fellowships, and, by a new body of statutes, enacted in 1479, limited the election of all the fellows to the old dioceses of York and Lincoln, with one exception to the diocese of Wells: there are thirteen exhibitions, eight scholarships, and one bible clerkship. The Bishop of Lincoln is visitor. The livings in the patronage of the Rector and Fellows are, the rectory of Cublington, in the county of Buckingham; the rectory of Winterborne-Abbas united with that of Winterborne-Steepleton, in the county of Dorset; the rectories of Hadleigh and Great Leighs, in the county of Essex; the rectory of Waddington, in the county of Lincoln; the perpetual curacies of All Saints' and St. Michael's, in the city, and Long Combe, and Forest-Hill, in the county, of Oxford: the rectory of Twyford, in the county of Buckingham, is annexed to the Rectorship. The college, which is situated between All Saints' church and Exeter College, consists of two quadrangles, one eighty feet, and the other seventy feet square; the larger, begun soon after the founder's death, and finished by Bishop Rotheram, is entered by a tower gateway, and contains the hall, library, rector's lodgings, and rooms for members; the inner quadrangle was erected about 1612, and six sets of rooms were added, in 1759, from the funds of the college: the chief ornament of this court is the chapel, on its south side, erected by Bishop Williams; the windows, which present splendid specimens of painted glass and emblazonry, were procured from Italy, by that prelate, in 1629; the large east window is divided into six compartments, and exhibits a variety of scriptural subjects: in the twelve side windows are representations of the Prophets and Apostles: on the south side of the college is a handsome garden. Among the eminent members may be enumerated Sir William D'Avenant; James Hervey, author of the "Meditations;" John Wesley, the celebrated founder of Methodism, who, though a student of Christchurch, was elected a fellow of this college; Dr. Robert Sanderson, Bishop of Lincoln, a learned divine and casuist; Sir William Davenant; Dr. George Hickes; Sir George Wheler; Dr. Matthew Tindal; Archbishop Potter, and nine bishops. The members on the books are one hundred and forty-two, of whom sixty-seven are members of convocation.

All Souls' College was founded, in 1437, by Henry Chichele, Archbishop of Canterbury, who induced Henry VI. to assume the title of co-founder; it was chiefly endowed with the lands of Alien priories dissolved by that monarch. A code of statutes, on the model of Wykeham's, were drawn up by the archbishop, by which, in conformity with the charter, the society consists of a warden, forty fellows, two chaplains, and clerks; the fellowships are open to the descendants of the founder's family, or to others born within the province of Canterbury: there are also six scholarships. The Archbishop of Canterbury is visitor. The livings in the patronage of the Warden and Fellows are, the rectory of Weston-Turville, in the county of Buckingham; the vicarage of Barking, in the county of Essex; the perpetual curacy of Walton-Cardiff, in the county of Gloucester; the rectory of Welwyn, in the county of Hertford; the rectories of Chelsfield with Farnborough, Elmly, and Harrietsham, and the vicarages of New Romney and Upchurch, in the county of Kent; the rectory of Harpsden, and the vicarage of Lewknor, in the county of Oxford; the vicarage of Alberbury, or Abberbury, in the county of Salop; the rectory of Buckland, in the county of Surrey; the rectory of Barford St. Martin, in the county of Wilts; and the vicarages of Llangennith and Pen-arth, in the county of Glamorgan: the rectory of East Lockinge, in the county of Berks, is annexed to the Wardenship. The college buildings consist of two quadrangles; that erected by the founder is about one hundred and twenty-four feet by seventy-two, and still retains many of its ancient features: it is entered from the High-street, through two gateways, the western surmounted by a tower beautifully-ornamented with large and well-sculptured effigies of Henry VI. and Chichele: it contains a curious dial, designed by Sir Christopher Wren: the whole line of building is adorned with battlements. The other quadrangle is comparatively modern, and measures, with the court, one hundred and seventy-three feet by one hundred and fifty-five: it contains the grand entrance from Radcliffe square, and the cloister, on the west; the common and other rooms, with two magnificent towers, on the east; the chapel and hall on the south; and the library on the north: the whole of this square is in the later style of English architecture, with some admixtures. The chapel is very generally admired, and is separated from the ante-chapel by an elegant screen, constructed by Sir Christopher Wren; the windows are in chiaro oscuro, and among the interior decorations, immediately over the altar, is the beautiful Noli me tangere of Raphael Mengs, purchased of the artist for £315; above it is a remarkably fine al fresco painting, intended to represent the assumption of the founder, by Sir James Thornhill: the respective dimensions of the chapel and ante-chapel are seventy feet by thirty. The hall contains a fine marble bust of Chichele, and paintings. The splendid library, consisting of about forty thousand volumes, was the gift of Colonel Codrington, a member of the college, who, in addition to his own library, bequeathed £4000 for the purchase of books, and £6000 to defray the expense of the building: it was completed in 1756, and its principal room, exclusively of a central recess, containing a statue of the colonel, is one hundred and ninety-eight feet by thirty-three and a half; the foundation stone was laid by Dr. Young, author of the "Night Thoughts." Among the eminent members are, Leland, the antiquary; Linacre; Caius; Sir Christopher Wren, who removed hither from Wadham College; Sir William Blackstone; Dr. Thomas Sydenham; Robert Heyrick, the poet; and Marchmont Nedham, a political writer in the reign of Charles I.; with one archbishop, and twelve bishops. The members on the books are one hundred, of whom sixty-eight are members of convocation.

Magdalene College was founded, in 1456, by William of Waynfleet, Bishop of Winchester, and Lord High Chancellor of England, on or near the site of the ancient hospital of St. John the Baptist, which, with all the estates belonging to it, was given to him by Henry VI., for a president, forty fellows, thirty scholars (called demies, because formerly they were entitled only to half-commons), a schoolmaster, usher, four chaplains, an organist, eight clerks, and sixteen choristers. The fellows are eligible alone from the following dioceses and counties:—five from the diocese of Winchester, four from Norwich, two from York and Durham, two from Chichester, seven from the county of Lincoln, four from Oxford, three from Berks, one from

York, two from Gloucester, two from Warwick, one each from the counties of Buckingham, Kent, Nottingham, Essex, Somerset, Northampton, and Wilts, and one from the city of London. Demies are eligible from any of the above-mentioned dioceses or counties, excepting those of York and Durham. There are nine exhibitions, exclusively of some founded by John Hygden, D.D. The Bishop of Winchester is visitor. The livings in the patronage of the President and Fellows are, the rectories of Appleton, Aston-Tirrold, East-Ilsey and Tubney, and the vicarage of Ashbury, in the county of Berks; the rectories of Beaconsfield and Saunderton, in the county of Buckingham; the rectory of Stanway, in the county of Essex; the rectory of Slimbridge, in the county of Gloucester; the vicarages of Basingstoke, Selborne, and East Worldham, and the perpetual curacy of West Tisted, in the county of Southampton; the rectories of Candlesby, Horsington, Saltfleet by All Saints, and Swaby, in the county of Lincoln; the rectory of Brandistone, in the county of Norfolk; the vicarage of Evenley and the rectory of Great Houghton, in the county of Northampton; the rectory of East Bridgford, in the county of Nottingham; the rectories of Ducklington, Standlake, Swerford with the chapel of Showell, and the perpetual curacy of Horsepath, in the county of Oxford; the rectories of Ashurst and Bramber, and the vicarages of Findon, Beeding, New Shoreham, Old Shoreham, and Washington, in the county of Sussex; the vicarage of Willoughby, in the county of Warwick; and the rectories of Boyton, Fittleton, Winterbourne-Bassett, and the vicarage of Dinton, in the county of Wilts. The college is situated at the bottom of the High-street, on the western bank of the river Cherwell, near the bridge to which it gives name, and from the unaltered state of the buildings, it presents the most venerable appearance: it consists chiefly of two ancient quadrangles built by Waynfleet, one side of a third, called the New Buildings, a lofty tower, and the chaplain's court. The principal entrance is from the gravel walk, through a modern Doric gateway, ornamented with a statue of the founder, which leads into the first quadrangle, on the north side of which are the president's lodgings, and near them an ancient gateway, now disused, surmounted by a tower (in which is an apartment called the founder's chamber), with battlements and pinnacles, and adorned with small statues of the founder, Henry VI., St. Mary Magdalene, and St. John the Baptist, under canopies of exquisite workmanship: in the south-east angle of this court is a stone pulpit, from which an annual sermon was formerly preached on the festival of St. John the Baptist: a passage leads from this court into the second quadrangle, which is surrounded by covered cloisters, and from which are the entrances to the chapel, library, hall, common rooms, and apartments for the fellows and demies: the interior of this court is adorned by a series of hieroglyphics, the solution of which has been given by William Reeks, fellow of the college, in a manuscript preserved in the library. The chapel, which occupies its south-western angle, was erected by the founder, but has undergone several modern alterations, and is now under a course of considerable embellishment: near the west door, which opens into the first quadrangle, is a light detached stone arch: this elegant structure is adorned with beautiful stained windows, and the ante-chapel contains several interesting monuments; the western window, painted in chiaro oscuro, and executed after a design by Christopher Swartz, exhibits a representation of the Last Judgment; underneath the altar-piece, by Isaac Fuller, which was placed here about 1680, is the celebrated picture of Christ bearing his Cross, now generally attributed to Moralez, a Spanish artist of the sixteenth century, and presented to the college by William Freeman, Esq., of Hamels, in the county of Hereford: the inner chapel is paved with black and white marble, and separated from the ante-chapel by a handsome screen, over which is a fine organ. The library, which occupies the western side of the cloisters, is spacious. The hall, at the south-eastern angle, is decorated with various devices in wainscot, principally from scripture history, and with portraits of different dimensions; the windows exhibit some curious specimens of old painting in glass: the remainder of the quadrangle is occupied by the fellows' and demies' common rooms, the kitchen, and the rooms of members of the society; a passage on the north side leads to the New Buildings, the first stone of which was laid in 1733: the structure is three hundred feet in length, and consists of three stories, divided into their respective ranges of apartments: in front is a handsome covered cloister. Eastward of this quadrangle are the water walks, which, bordered with trees, and extending along the side of a branch of the Cherwell, surrounding a spacious meadow, afford a delightful and retired promenade: part of these is called Addison's Walk, from having been the favourite retreat of the poet, whilst a student at this college: on the north is the College Grove, adorned with more private walks, and enlivened by a number of deer. In the centre of a range of buildings, on the south side of the chaplain's court, is the lofty and elegant tower, crowned with eight rich pinnacles, which was completed in 1498; in the belfry story are two fine windows, and a rich open battlement, and it contains a ring of ten musical bells. On the summit of this tower, mass was performed every May-day, previously to the Reformation, for the repose of the soul of Henry VII., and some pieces of choral music are now annually performed there, by the choristers, at five o'clock in the morning of that day. Magdalene college is required by its statutes to maintain the Kings of England, and their eldest sons, on the occasions of their visiting the university of Oxford; the hall has, in consequence, been honoured at various times with the presence of several royal guests, amongst whom were Edward IV., Richard III., Prince Arthur, in 1496, James I., and Prince Henry, who was admitted a member in 1605. During the parliamentary war, Generals Cromwell and Fairfax, with their officers, were also entertained here in 1647, and after dinner amused themselves at bowls on the college green. Among the former eminent members were Lilly, the grammarian and astrologer; Fox, the martyrologist; Hampden, the patriot; Heylin, the controversial writer; the poets Addison, Collins, and Holdsworth; Cardinals Wolsey and Pole; Dean Colet, founder of St. Paul's school; Theophilus Gale, author of "The Court of the Gentiles;" Dr. Henry Hammond; Dr. Sacheverell; Gibbon, the historian, who took no degree; Dr. Richard Chandler, a learned traveller and antiquary; one archbishop, and twenty-seven bishops. The members on the books are one hundred and sixty-seven, of whom one hundred and thirty-one are members of convocation.

Brasenose College was founded, in 1509, by William Smyth, Bishop of Lincoln, and Sir Richard Sutton, of Prestbury, in Cheshire, the latter of whom revised its statutes. The society originally consisted of a principal and twelve fellows, who must be natives of the old diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, with preference to persons born in the county of Chester, and in those parts of Lancashire which were then in that diocese, especially in the parishes of Prescot and Prestbury; in default of eligible candidates, the society may elect from the diocese of Lincoln, or, if none be there found, from the university itself: eight additional fellowships have been founded, viz., two by the will of J. Williamson, rector of St. George's, Canterbury, in 1522, confined to his kindred, or those of John Port, serjeant at law, who are natives of the city, or county palatine, of Chester; one by John Elton, alias Baker, canon of Salisbury, in 1528, with preference to his kindred, born in the diocese of Hereford, or in that of Worcester, or, in default thereof, from the diocese of Salisbury, or elsewhere; one by William Porter, clerk, in 1531, for the county, or diocese, of Hereford, or, in default of a qualified person, then for a native of any diocese next adjacent to Oxford; one by Edward Darbie, Archdeacon of Stow, in the county of Lincoln, in 1538, for a graduate born in the said archdeaconry, or, in case of successive defects of graduates from the counties of Leicester, Northampton, Oxford, and Lincoln, then an under-graduate, to be elected under similar restrictions; one by William Clyfton, subdean of York, in 1538, for a priest and graduate of the counties of York and Lincoln alternately, or else of the county of Nottingham, or university of Oxford; one by Brian Higden, Dean of York, in 1549, alternately for the counties of York and Lincoln; and one, in 1586, by Joyce Frankland, of London, widow, for her kindred, especially those of the Trapps and Saxies, or, in defect of such, then for any county in England. There are also thirty-two scholarships, and fifteen exhibitions. The Bishop of Lincoln is visitor. The livings in the patronage of the Principal and Fellows are, the rectories of Dudcote and West Shefford, in the county of Berks; the lectureship of Rodborough, in the parish of Minchinhampton, county of Gloucester; the rectory of Tedstone-Delamere, in the county of Hereford; the rectory of Great Catworth, in the county of Huntingdon; the vicarage of Gillingham, in the county of Kent; the vicarage of Preston, and the perpetual curacies of Downham, Longridge, Newchurch in Pendle, Church Kirk in Whalley, in the county of Lancaster; the vicarage of Osburnby, in the county of Lincoln; the rectories of St. Matthew, Bethnal-Green, Stratford le Bow, St. Anne Limehouse, Christ Church Spitalfields, Stepney, St. George in the East, St. John Wapping, Poplar, St. Mary Whitechapel, and the perpetual curacies of St. John Bethnal Green, and Stepney chapel, in the county of Middlesex; the rectories of Great Billing, Cottingham, Middleton-Cheney, Old or Wold, and Stoke-Bruerne, in the county of Northampton; the rectories of Great Rollright, and Steeple-Ashton, in the county of Oxford; the rectories of Clayton and Selham, in the county of Sussex; and the rectory of Wootton-Rivers, in the county of Wilts, alternately with the President and Fellows of St. John's College; the rectory of Begbrooke, in the county of Oxford, is in the patronage of Sir George Dashwood, Bart., for three turns, and of the Principal of this college for the fourth. The college is situated on the west side of Radcliffe-square: the buildings consist of a spacious quadrangle, which contains the hall and rooms for members, and, in the centre, statues called "Cain and Abel," which were presented by Dr. Clarke; and a small court towards the south, in which are the chapel and library, and an elegant house for the principal, which fronts the High-street: over the gateway entrance to the great quadrangle is a square tower, ornamented with architectural designs: the small court was built in the seventeenth century, from the plan, as is believed, of Sir Christopher Wren; its style is of the mixed kind, windows with pointed arches being occasionally opposed by Grecian pilasters and capitals. Amongst the eminent members of this college may be reckoned, John Fox, the martyrologist, prior to his removal to Magdalene College; Prince, author of the "Worthies of Devon;" Sampson Erdeswick; John Gwillim, author of "the Heraldry;" James, Lord Ley; William and Robert Burton, of Leicester; Sir Elias Ashmole, founder of the museum called after his name; Sir Peter Leicester; John Watson, author of "the History of the Earls of Warren and Surrey;" Dr. Whitaker, the late learned Manchester historian, Reginald Heber, late bishop of Calcutta, and nine other bishops. The members on the books are four hundred and three, of whom two hundred and twenty-five are members of convocation.

Corpus Christi College was founded, in 1516, by Richard Fox, Bishop of Winchester, and Lord Privy Seal to Henry VII. and Henry VIII., for a president, twenty fellows, twenty scholars, two chaplains, two clerks, and two choristers: Hugh Oldham, Bishop of Exeter, gave six thousand marks towards the building, and land towards the endowment. The fellows are elected from the scholars, and these from the following dioceses and counties; four from the diocese of Winchester, of which two must be of the county of Southampton, and two of Surrey; two from the diocese of Bath and Wells, two from the diocese of Exeter, two from the county of Gloucester, two from the county of Lincoln, one from the county of Wilts, two from the county of Kent, one from the county of Lancaster, one each from the counties of Bedford and Oxford, one from the diocese of Durham, and one founded by William Frost, of Yavington, Hants, in 1529, for his kindred; in failure of which, election to be made from that county. The Bishop of Winchester is visitor. The livings in the patronage of the President and Fellows are, the rectory of Little Staughton, in the county of Bedford; the rectories of Childrey and Letcomb-Bassett, and the vicarage of West Hendred, in the county of Berks; the rectory of Ruan-Lanyhorne, in the county of Cornwall; the rectory of Skelton, in the county of Cumberland; the rectory of Great Holland, in the county of Essex; the rectories of Duntsbourn-Rouse and Maissey-Hampton, in the county of Gloucester; the rectory of Stoke-Charity, in the county of Southampton; the rectory of Pembridge, in the county of Hereford; the rectory of Bassingham, in the county of Lincoln; the rectories of Church-Brampton, Byfield, and Helmdon, in the county of Northampton; the rectories of Goddington and Lower Heyford, and the perpetual curacy of Warborough, in the county of Oxford; the rectory of Trent, in the county of Somerset; the rectory of Fenny-Compton, in the county of Warwick; and the rectories of Steeple-Langford and Stratford St. Anthony, in the county of Wilts. The entrance to this college is opposite to the south wall of Oriel college, through a gateway, above which is a square tower, ornamented in front with three vacant canopied niches: it leads to the quadrangle, which is one hundred and one feet by eighty, and contains in the centre a curious cylindrical dial, constructed by Charles Turnbull, fellow of the college, and described in a manuscript in the library, written by Robert Pegge: on the eastern side of the college are apartments for the gentlemen commoners; and in 1700, the fellows' building was erected, at the expense of Dr. Turner, president, on the site of the old cloisters, facing the broad walk in Christ Church meadow. In the chapel, which was built by the founder, is a very fine altar-piece of the Adoration, by Rubens, presented to the college, in 1804, by the late Sir R. Worsley, Bart.; there are also monuments to the memory of distinguished members. In the hall are three full-length portraits, admirably painted by Owen, of the Rt. Hon. Lord Tenterden, Lord Chief Justice of England; the Rt. Rev. Dr. Burgess, Bishop of Salisbury; and the Rt. Rev. Dr. Copleston, Bishop of Llandaff; formerly fellows on this foundation: in the college are still preserved the crosier of the founder, which is upwards of three hundred years old, of silver gilt, richly ornamented, and about six feet in length; his gold sacramental plate, salt cellar of silver gilt, rings, and other valuable relics. On the visit of the sovereigns to the university, the King of Prussia resided in the president's lodgings. Amongst its eminent members have been, Basil Kennett, author of the "Antiquities of Rome," and president of the college; Hooker, the celebrated author of "Ecclesiastical Polity;" Hales, commonly called 'the ever-memorable;' and Fiddes, the biographer of Cardinal Wolsey. The members on the books are one hundred and thirty-two, of whom eighty-one are members of convocation.

Christ Church College was founded, about 1525, by Cardinal Wolsey, on the site of the monastery of St. Frideswide, and intended to comprise a dean, subdean, one hundred canons, ten public readers, thirteen chaplains, an organist, twelve clerks, and sixteen choristers; but, on the disgrace of that dignitary, the establishment was suspended for a short time: in 1532 it was completed, under the name of Henry the Eighth's college, for a dean and twelve canons, again suppressed in 1545, and in the following year, on the removal of the episcopal see from Osney to this college, the church of St. Frideswide was constituted a cathedral, under the name of Christ's Church; the society to consist of a dean, eight canons, and one hundred students, eight chaplains, a schoolmaster, an organist, eight clerks, and eight choristers; an addition of one student was made, in 1664, on the foundation of William Thurstone, Esq.: many of the studentships are filled up from Westminster school, the rest open to all parts of the kingdom.

The deanery and canonries are in the gift of the Crown; one is annexed to the Regius Professorship of Divinity, and one to the Regius Professorship of Hebrew: there are thirty scholarships and exhibitions. The King is visitor. The livings in the patronage of the Dean and Canons are, the vicarages of Cople, and Flitton with the curacy of Silsoe, in the county of Bedford; the vicarages of Ardington, East Garston, and Marcham, and the rectory of East Hampstead, in the county of Berks; the perpetual curacies of Ashendon, Dorton, Hillersdon, Lathbury, the rectory of Slapton, and the vicarage of Willen, in the county of Buckingham; the vicarages of Great Budworth, Frodsham, Runcorn, and the perpetual curacy of Daresbury, in the county of Chester; the rectory of St. Tudy, in the county of Cornwall; the vicarage of Great Torrington, in the county of Devon; the vicarage of Tolpuddle, in the county of Dorset; the rectory of Sheering, in the county of Essex; the rectory of Batsford and Iron-Acton, the vicarages of Bledington, Ampney-Downe, Lower Swell, Thornbury, Turkdean, Twining, Wotton under Edge, and the perpetual curacies of Little Compton, North Nibley, and Temple Guiting, in the county of Gloucester; the rectory of Staunton upon Wye, in the county of Hereford; the perpetual curacies of Tring and Wigginton, in the county of Hertford; the vicarage of Hawkhurst, in the county of Kent; the vicarage of Kirkham, in the county of Lancaster; the perpetual curacies of Great Bowden and Market-Harborough, in the county of Leicester; the united rectories of Swanton-Novers and Wood-Norton, in the county of Norfolk; the vicarages of Badbey with that of Newnham, Easton-Maudit, Floore, Harringworth, Ravensthorpe, Staverton, and the perpetual curacy of Daventry, in the county of Northampton; the perpetual curacies of Bensington, alias Benson, Binsey, Caversham, Cowley, Drayton, and Stratton-Audley, the vicarages of Black-Bourton, Brize-Norton, Cassington, Chalgrove with the chapel of Berrick-Salome, Pirton, South Stoke, and Spelsbury, and the rectories of Wendlebury and Westwell, in the county of Oxford; the vicarage of St. Mary Magdalene, and the perpetual curacy of St. Thomas, in the city of Oxford; the rectory of Wentnor, in the county of Salop; the vicarages of Bath-Easton, Midsummer-Norton, and the rectory of Odcombe, in the county of Somerset; the vicarages of Charlton, Chippenham, East Lavington, the perpetual curacy of Maiden-Bradley, and the rectory of Semley, in the county of Wilts; the perpetual curacies of Badsey, Great Hampton, South Littleton with that of North Littleton, Offenham, and Wickhamford, in the county of Worcester; the vicarages of Bramham, Broughton, Carleton, Featherstone, Kildwick, North Otterington, Long Preston, Skipton, Thornton le Street, and Wath upon Dearn, in the county of York. The extensive buildings of this college occupy the site of the ancient monastery, and form three quadrangles: the grand front is in St. Aldate's-street, and extends to a length of four hundred feet, presenting a very grand elevation, though its effect is much weakened by the declivity of the ground on which it stands, the narrowness of the approach to it, and the proximity of other buildings. The principal entrance is through a gateway, begun by Wolsey, and finished by Sir Christopher Wren, over which is a most magnificent circular tower, surmounted by an ogee dome, and containing the huge bell, called "Great Tom of Oxford," which weighs nearly seventeen thousand pounds, is seven feet one inch in diameter, and five feet nine inches from the crown to the brim; the weight of the clapper is three hundred and forty-two pounds. It formerly belonged to Oseney abbey, and was recast in 1680: this bell tolls every night at a quarter after nine o'clock, as a signal for students to repair to their respective colleges, before the gates are closed, agreeably to the statutes of the university. The court to which this gateway leads is called the Great quadrangle, and measures two hundred and sixty-four feet by two hundred and sixty: it contains the hall, the dean's lodgings, those of some of the canons, and rooms for members of the society; in the centre is a small fountain, supplied with water from the Isis and from the spring at Hincksey; over the passage at the north-east corner is a statue of Bishop Fell, and over the opposite one leading to the hall and chapel is one of Cardinal Wolsey: the ascent to the hall, which is in the south-eastern angle, is by a stately staircase, with a vaulted roof supported by a single central pillar: the interior of this magnificent refectory, which was erected by Wolsey, is one hundred and fifteen feet by forty, and fifty feet in height; the roof, which is lofty, presents a fine specimen of open work in wood highly ornamented, and at the upper end of the south side is a large window, having a fine carved canopy in the ancient style of English architecture: in this hall many of the kings and queens of England have been entertained. The second quadrangle, called Peckwater square, derives its name from an ancient hall which stood at the south-west corner, and was the property of Richard Peckwater; but having been given to the ancient monastery, in the reign of Henry III., and having received, in that of Henry VIII., the addition of another, called Vine-hall, eventually formed the present quadrangle, which was rebuilt in 1705, and towards defraying the expense £3000 were bequeathed by Anthony Radcliffe, canon, an inscription on the north side of the court, which was built with his money, recording the munificence of the benefactor: the south side is formed by the library, which contains an ample collection of books, manuscripts, prints, and coins, also several paintings, statues, and busts; the upper room is one hundred and forty-one feet by thirty, and thirty-seven feet in height, having a richly-decorated ceiling, with wainscot and pillars of the best Norway oak. Eastward of Peckwater is Canterbury quadrangle, the smallest of the three, which consists of modern buildings; its principal ornament is a magnificent Doric gateway, erected, in 1778, under the superintendence of Mr. James Wyatt: the chapel is also the cathedral of the diocese, in the account of which it is described. Attached to this college, and situated southward of the great quadrangle, are a grammar school for choristers and other boys, and a theatre, which contains many anatomical preparations, and some very elegant and beautiful wax models: lectures are delivered here by Dr. Lees, Reader in Anatomy, who is appointed by the Dean and Canons. Here also are the chapter-house, common room, chaplains' quadrangle, Fell's buildings, and east cloisters, with a portal and passage leading to Christ Church meadow, which is bounded on the south and west by the Isis, on the east by the Cherwell, and on the north by a wide walk overshadowed by lofty elms, and leading to narrower walks on the margin of the rivers, forming a circumference of one mile and a quarter, and, being kept in excellent order, they constitute the most frequented promenade in the city. Some of the most illustrious names of which this or any other country can boast have been enrolled on the books of this college, amongst which are those of Littleton, Bolingbroke, Ben Jonson, Philip Sydney, Otway, Colman, Locke, Browne Willis, and Canning. The members at present on the books are nine hundred and twenty-two, of whom four hundred and forty-two are members of convocation.

Trinity College was originally founded and endowed by Edward III., Richard II., and the Priors and Bishops of Durham, and dedicated to the Holy Trinity, St. Mary, and St. Cuthbert; it was also called Durham College: at the dissolution the site and buildings were purchased by Sir Thomas Pope, Knt., of Tittenhanger, in the county of Hereford, and the present college was refounded by him, in 1554, for a president, twelve fellows, and twelve scholars: only two natives of the same county can be fellows at one time, excepting those from the county of Oxford, from which five are admissible as cotemporaries; the scholars to be chosen from the founder's manors, or, in default of candidates on Trinity Monday, which is the day of election, from any county in England: four scholarships and exhibitions have since been added. The Bishop of Winchester is visitor. The livings in the patronage of the President and Fellows are, the lectureship of St. Nicholas', Abingdon, in the county of Berks; the rectory of Farnham, and the vicarages of Navestock and Great Waltham, in the county of Essex; the rectories of Oddington and Rotherfield-Grays, in the county of Oxford; the perpetual curacy of Hill-Farrance, in the county of Somerset; and the rectory of Barton on the Heath, in the county of Warwick: the rectory of Garsington, in the county of Oxford, is annexed to the Presidentship. The college is situated opposite the Turl, in Broad-street, from which it is separated by an iron palisade, enclosing a spacious area. The chapel, as seen from the street, is a light and elegant edifice, with columns supporting a rich cornice, and surmounted by a balustrade, and is terminated at its western end by a tower of similar construction, beneath which is the principal entrance to the first quadrangle, which contains the hall, library, and lodgings of the president: in the chapel, which opens into this court, is a monument to the memory of the founder and his lady, whose remains were removed hither, in 1567, from the church of St. Stephen, Walbrook, London: the effigy in marble represents him in complete armour, with a helmet and crest at the head, and a griffin at the feet. The second court consists of three sides, with an opening on the east into a spacious garden, which is partly enclosed by yew hedges, in the formal Dutch style, and partly arranged in devious walks, interspersed with shrubs and evergreens. Among the more eminent names of former members enrolled here are those of Archbishop Sheldon, Chillingworth, Sir John Denham, Merrick, and Warton. The members at present on the books are two hundred and sixty, of whom one hundred and five are members of convocation.

St. John's College was founded, in 1557, by Sir Thomas White, a citizen and merchant of London, on the site of a college dedicated to St. Bernard, for student monks of the Cistercian order: the society comprises a president, fifty fellows, or scholars, one chaplain, an organist, six singing men, six choristers, and two sextons; six of the fellows are elected from the founder's kin, two from Coventry, two from Bristol, two from Reading, and one from Tunbridge grammar schools, and the rest from Merchant Taylors' school. Twelve of the fellows must enter on the law, and one may proceed in medicine, retaining his fellowship under the title of College Physician. The founder's kin are actual fellows on admission, others are scholars, or probationary fellows, until the expiration of three years: there are also eighteen scholarships and exhibitions. The Bishop of Winchester is visitor. The livings in the patronage of the President and Fellows are, the rectory of Sutton, in the county of Bedford; the rectory of Kingston-Bagpuze, and the vicarages of Fyfield and Reading St. Lawrence, in the county of Berks; the vicarage of Chalfont St. Peter, in the county of Buckingham; the rectory of Cranham, in the county of Essex; the rectory of Winterbourne, in the county of Gloucester; the sinecure rectory of Leckford, and the rectory of South Warnborough, in the county of Southampton; the vicarage of Linton, in the county of Hereford; the vicarage of Great Staughton, in the county of Huntingdon; the rectory of Barfreton, in the county of Kent; the vicarage of St. Sepulchre's, London; the rectories of Aston le Walls, Crick (to one from Merchant Taylors' school), and East Farndon, in the county of Northampton; the vicarages of Charlbury and Kirtlington, the rectories of Handborough and Tackley, and the perpetual curacy of Northmoor, in the county of Oxford; the vicarage of St. Giles', in the city of Oxford; the rectory of Bardwell, in the county of Suffolk; the rectory of Cheam, in the county of Surrey; the rectory of Codford St. Mary, in the county of Wilts; the rectory of Belbroughton, in the county of Worcester; and the rectory of Bainton, in the county of York. The buildings contain an outer and an inner quadrangle: in the former are the hall, chapel, and president's lodgings; a passage leads from this to the inner quadrangle, on the east and west sides of which are cloisters, supported by eight pillars, over which are busts, representing the four cardinal virtues, the three Christian graces, and the arts and sciences, with emblematical cornices: each cloister is divided by a Doric gateway, surmounted by a semi-circular pediment of the Ionic and Corinthian orders. This quadrangle leads to the spacious and picturesque gardens of the college: a range of buildings to the north-east includes two very handsome common rooms, and other apartments. The chapel belonged to the original monastery of St. Bernard; the altar is ornamented with a representation in tapestry of our Saviour and his two disciples at Emmaus, and on the north wall is a black marble urn, containing the heart of Dr. Richard Rawlinson, a distinguished benefactor to the college: the remains of the founder, of Archbishop Laud (once president), of Archbishop Juxon, and of Dr. Bailie, repose in vaults beneath the altar: in a small inner chapel, called Bailie's chapel, are various monuments to subsequent presidents. The library is on the south and east sides of the inner quadrangle, and consists of two spacious and handsome rooms: amongst its many curious and valuable contents are, a picture of Charles I., comprising the whole book of Psalms written in the lines of the face and on the hairs of the head; and an ancient crosier of dark wood beaded with silver, recently discovered in a garret of the president's lodgings; also many old missals, manuscripts, and coins. Amongst eminent members were, Archbishops Laud, Juxon, and Dawes; Bishops Meaux and Buckeridge; Shirley, the dramatic poet; William Louth and Charles Wheatley, learned divines and commentators; and Sherard, the botanist. The members on the books are two hundred and nineteen, of whom one hundred and twenty-nine are members of convocation.

Jesus' College was founded, in 1571, by Queen Elizabeth, on petition of Hugh ap Price, D.C.L., a native of Brecknock, and Treasurer of St. David's, for a principal, eight fellows, and eight scholars: in consequence of various benefactions, the society now consists of a principal, and nineteen fellows (among whom is one from Jersey or Guernsey, on the foundation of Charles I., in 1636), and there are eighteen scholarships and several exhibitions. The Earl of Pembroke is visitor. The livings in the patronage of the Principal and Fellows are, the rectories of Longworth and Remenham, in the county of Berks; the rectory of Aston-Clinton, in the county of Buckingham; the sinecure rectory of Badgeworth, the rectory of Badgington, and the perpetual curacy of King's Charlton, in the county of Gloucester; the rectory of Scartho, in the county of Lincoln; the perpetual curacy of Llanthewy-Vach, in the county of Monmouth; the rectories of Braunston and Furtho, in the county of Northampton; the rectories of Rotherfield-Peppard and Wigginton, in the county of Oxford; the rectory of Nutfield, in the county of Surrey; the vicarage of Shipston upon Stour cum Tidmington, and the rectory of Tredington, in the county of Worcester; the perpetual curacy of Holyhead, in the Isle of Anglesea; the vicarage of Holywell, in the county of Flint; and the rectory of Llandow, in the county of Glamorgan; the rectory of Llandyssul, in the county of Cardigan, and the rectory of Clynnog and the vicarage of Llanwnda, in the county of Carnarvon, are annexed to the Headship. The buildings consist chiefly of two quadrangles: the first contains the chapel and hall, and the second the library: the altar-piece in the chapel is a fine copy of Guido's painting of St. Michael overcoming the Devil: in the library are many scarce and curious books and manuscripts; the statutes of the society, written on vellum, beautifully illuminated; a curious metal watch, given by Charles I.; one of Queen Elizabeth's stirrups; and a capacious silver gilt bowl, containing ten gallons, and weighing two hundred and seventy-eight ounces, the gift of Sir Watkin Williams Wynn, in 1732. Amongst its eminent members were, David Powell, the celebrated antiquary; and John Davis, lexicographer and antiquary. The members on the books are one hundred and eighty-one, of whom fifty-seven are members of convocation.

Wadham College was founded, in 1613, on the site of an ancient and magnificent priory of Augustine friars, by Nicholas Wadham, Esq., of Edge and Merrifield, and Dorothy his wife, for a warden, fifteen fellows, fifteen scholars, two chaplains, and two clerks. The fellows are superannuated on the completion of eighteen years from the expiration of their regency; they are elected from the scholars, of whom, three are chosen from the county of Somerset, three from that of Essex, and the remainder from any county in Great Britain. There are also several other scholarships and exhibitions, among which are four for the study of Hebrew, six for Greek, and one for botany: the most eminent benefactor was the Rev. John Wills, D.D., Warden of the College, who died in 1806, and bequeathed, subject to legacy duty, £400 per annum to the office of warden, £1000 to improve the warden's lodgings, £100 a year for a law exhibition to a fellow, £20 a year for a law exhibition to a scholar, £100 for a medical exhibition to a fellow, and £20 for a medical exhibition to a scholar; also £31. 10. per annum to a divinity lecturer and preacher, £75 a year to one superannuated fellow, and £50 a year to a second; he also appointed the society his residuary legatees. The Bishop of Bath and Wells is visitor. The livings in the patronage of the Warden and Fellows are, the rectory of Fryerning, and the vicarage of Hockley, in the county of Essex; the vicarage of Southrop, in the county of Gloucester; the rectories of Maperton and Limington, in the county of Somerset; the rectory of Esher, in the county of Surrey; and the vicarage of Wadhurst, in the county of Sussex. The buildings form an extensive quadrangle of one hundred and thirty feet square: in the centre of the eastern side is a portico, ornamented with statues of James I., in his robes, and of Nicholas and Dorothy Wadham, with a Latin inscription commemorative of the foundation: in an adjoining court are two buildings of three stories, one erected in 1694, the other in 1829, and inhabited by members. The front of this college was greatly improved in 1822, by the removal of some heavy iron and stone work, and substituting light iron palisades. The chapel contains a fine east window, the work of Bernard Van Linge, exhibiting typical paintings and historical subjects, and presented by Sir John Strangeways: the subject of the altar-piece is the Lord's Supper, in brown and white crayons, on cloth, by Isaac Fuller, accompanied with other subjects. At right angles with the choir is a noble ante-chapel, containing monuments of several distinguished members of the society: on the north side of the chancel is a handsome marble monument to the memory of Sir John Portman, Bart., who died in 1624: there is also a well-executed brass eagle. The hall is one of the largest in the university, and adorned with handsome modern painted windows: the gardens are extremely neat. The Royal Society of London originated in this college. Amongst its eminent and scientific members may be classed, Walsh, the poet; Sir E. Sedley; Admiral Blake; Sir Christopher Wren; and Lord Chief Justice Pratt. The members on the books are two hundred and fourteen, of whom eighty-three are members of convocation.

Pembroke College, formerly Broadgate Hall, was founded, in 1624, by means of a bequest from Thomas Tesdale, Esq., of Glympton, in the county of Oxford, aided by a donation of Richard Wightwick, B.D., rector of East Ilsley, in the county of Berks, under letters patent of James I., and during the chancellorship of the Earl of Pembroke, from whom it received its name: the original foundation included a master, ten fellows, and ten scholars, now extended to fourteen fellows, and thirty-one scholars and exhibitioners; four fellows to be chosen from the kindred of Thomas Tesdale, Esq., and two from those of Richard Wightwick; the rest from the free school at Abingdon. In 1636, a fellowship was founded by Charles I., for a native of Guernsey or Jersey; and, about 1672, two fellowships were added by Sir John Bennet, afterwards Lord Ossulstone; also one, in 1749, by Sir John Phillips, Bart. The Chancellor of the university is visitor. The livings in the patronage of the Master and Fellows are, the rectory of Coln St. Denis, in the county of Gloucester; the rectory of Sibson, in the county of Leicester; the rectory of St. Aldate's, in the city of Oxford; the perpetual curacies of West Harroldston and Lambston, in the county of Pembroke; the rectory of Ringshall, in the county of Suffolk; the rectories of Brinkworth, Codford St. Peter, and Liddiard-Millicent, in the county of Wilts; the perpetual curacy of Colnbrook, in the county of Buckingham; and the perpetual curacy of Uxbridge, in the county of Middlesex; the two last intended for the exhibitioners on Townshend's foundation. This college, which is situated nearly opposite to the grand front of Christ Church College, consists chiefly of a quadrangle, erected at different periods, and regularly built. The interior has within the last two years been newly faced with Bath stone, and altered from the Palladian to a later style of English architecture, the whole presenting a neat appearance. The northern front and the master's lodgings have been very neatly decorated (these buildings likewise being originally Palladian) after a design by Mr. Daniel Evans of Oxford, in the later style of English architecture. The oriel windows may be mentioned as well worthy of attention, particularly that over the gateway, constructed on the model of the remains of one in John of Gaunt's palace at Lincoln. The battlement of the tower and the chimnies is executed in a style corresponding with the other parts of the building. The hall, which has been considerably enlarged and improved, contains a bust of Dr. Johnson, by Bacon, presented to the college by the late Samuel Whitbread, Esq. The chapel is a small building of the Ionic order; the altar-piece is a copy from a picture of Rubens, at Antwerp, of our Saviour after his Resurrection, presented by Archdeacon Corbett. Among the eminent residents may be enumerated, the laborious Camden, who studied at the original hall, after he left Magdalene College; Judge Blackstone, previously to his removal to All Souls; Dr. Johnson, whose rooms were upon the second floor, over the gateway; George Whitefield, founder of the Calvinistic Methodists; Shenstone, the poet; Sir Thomas Brown, author of the "Medici;" Richard Graves, author of the "Spiritual Quixote;" and Dr.

Newman, Primate of Ireland, and author of the "Harmony of the Gospels." The members on the books are one hundred and ninety-five, of whom eighty-four are members of convocation.

Worcester College was founded, in 1714, by the trustees of Sir Thomas Cookes, Bart., of Bently Pauncefort, in the county of Worcester, by elevating Gloucester Hall, also named St. John the Baptist's Hall, to the rank of a college: the original foundation was for a provost, six fellows, and six scholars, the last eligible only from the grammar schools of Bromsgrove, Feckenham, Worcester, Hartlebury, and Kidderminster, or, in default of candidates, from any endowed school in the county of Worcester, such schools to have a priority of claim in the order in which they stand, and the candidates to have been at the schools for at least two years previously to the election, the founder's kin always to be preferred: the right of election is vested in the provost and three senior fellows of the foundation. In 1727, two fellowships and two scholarships were added, by James Finney, D.D., prebendary of Durham, for natives of Staffordshire; six fellowships and three scholarships were founded, in 1734, by George Clark, D.C.L., the scholars to be of English parents, born in the provinces of Canterbury and York, with preference to the orphans of clergymen: the election is vested in the provost and six senior fellows on this and Sir Thomas Cookes' foundation. In 1731, seven fellowships and five scholarships were founded by Sarah Eaton: candidates for the latter must produce testimonials that they are sons of clergymen, requiring assistance to support them at the university: the election is in the provost and five senior fellows of this foundation and that of Sir T. Cookes. The fellows are invariably elected from the scholars, and must take holy orders, except in cases specifically provided for. The society at present includes a provost, twenty-one fellows, sixteen scholars, and three exhibitioners. The Bishops of Oxford and Worcester, and the Vice-Chancellor of the university, are visitors. The livings in the patronage of the Provost and Fellows are, the vicarage of Denchworth, in the county of Berks; the rectory of Hogston, in the county of Buckingham; the rectory of Dinedor, in the county of Hereford; the rectory of Whitfield, in the county of Northampton; the rectory of Tadmarton, in the county of Oxford; the rectory of Neen-Sollars, in the county of Salop; and the rectories of High-Ham and Windford, in the county of Somerset. The college is pleasantly situated on an eminence, at the western extremity of the university, near the Isis: the buildings form three sides of a quadrangle, the eastern elevation being occupied by the library, hall, and chapel; on the north is an elegant pile, containing the provost's lodgings, and rooms for fellows and scholars, and on the south, the old buildings of Gloucester Hall. The chapel has a richly-ornamented stucco roof; the altar-piece is a fine old painting of a Magdalene. In the library is the large and curious collection of books bequeathed by Dr. Clarke, who also left £1000 towards the building: the room is one hundred and twenty feet in length, with an extensive gallery. The gardens, which are laid out with great taste, occupy three acres of ground, and are ornamented with a fine sheet of water. Thomas Allen, the mathematician, and Sir Kenelm Digby, studied here, previously to the conversion of Gloucester Hall into a college. The members on the books are two hundred and twenty-two, of whom ninety-one are members of convocation.

Besides the above colleges are five halls, enjoying the same privileges, and requiring the same terms and exercises for taking degrees in them as the colleges, but not incorporated, the estates and other property belonging to them being held in trust by the university. The Chancellor of the university is visitor, and appoints the principals, with the exception of St. Edmund Hall, the headship of which is vested in the Provost and Fellows of Queen's College. St. Alban Hall derives its name and foundation from Robert de Sancto Albano, a burgess of Oxford, who lived in the time of John: it now belongs to the Warden and Fellows of Merton College, to which it was united June 15th, 1549: the buildings are situated eastward of Merton College. The members on the books, including the principal and vice-principal, are forty-three, of whom eight are members of convocation. St. Edmund Hall is situated in Queen's-lane, and derives its name from St. Edmund, Archbishop of Canterbury in the reign of Henry III.: it is the most ancient of the halls now remaining, having been devoted to the purposes of academical instruction so early as the thirteenth century; in 1537 it had come into the possession of Queen's College, which society soon afterwards obtained from the university the right of nominating the principal. Sir William Jones, the celebrated lawyer; Oldham, the poet; and Hearne, the indefatigable antiquary, were educated here. The members on the books are one hundred and five, of whom fifty-two are members of convocation. St. Mary Hall, formerly the parsonage-house of the rectors of St. Mary's, was given to the Provost and Fellows of Oriel College, in 1325, and made academical in 1333. Four scholarships, for natives of the county of Somerset, were founded by Thomas Dyke, M.D., in 1677. The buildings, which are near Oriel College, are comprised in a quadrangle, in which are the hall, the chapel, the principal's lodgings, and rooms for members. Sir Thomas More, and Sandys, the poet, were educated here. The members on the books are eighty-six, of whom forty-one are members of convocation. New Inn Hall, formerly Trilleck's Inn, was originally inhabited by Bernardine monks, and subsequently by students of canon and civil law: it came into the possession of the Warden and Fellows of New College in 1392. During the civil war, from 1642 to 1646, it was used as a mint by Charles I., where the plate, sent by different colleges for his Majesty's use, was melted: after the Restoration it again became a place of study, but of late years has had no members; the only part of its buildings now remaining is a house for the principal, who is a member of convocation. The celebrated Blackstone was one of its principals. Magdalene Hall, originally erected by Waynfleet, for students previously to admission into his college, became an independent hall in 1602. The society was removed by act of parliament from its former house, adjoining Magdalene College, to Hertford College, in 1822, which, having lapsed to the crown and become decayed, was repaired and fitted up for their reception: there are twenty-three scholarships and exhibitions. The rectory of South Moreton, in the county of Berks, is in the patronage of the society. Among eminent persons educated here were, Warner the poet, Lord Clarendon, Sir Matthew Hale, and Dr. Plot. The members on the books are one hundred and eighty-four, of whom fifty-nine are members of convocation.

The principal public buildings connected with the university are, the Theatre, Schools (comprising the Bodleian Library and Picture Gallery), Clarendon Printing-House, New Printing-House, Ashmolean Museum, Radcliffe Library, Physic Garden, Astronomical Observatory, and Music Room. The Theatre is situated northward of Radcliffe-square, on the south side of Broad-street, and is appropriated to holding the acts denominated Comitia et Encænia, Lord Crewe's annual commemoration of benefactors, the recitation of prize compositions, the ceremony of conferring degrees on illustrious personages, and other public meetings of the university: it was constructed in 1664, by Sir Christopher Wren, at an expense of £12,470, which was defrayed by Archbishop Sheldon, who also gave £2000 towards keeping it in repair, directing the surplus to be applied in the erection of a printing-house: the plan of the building is that of the Theatre of Marcellus, at Rome, and it is capable of containing nearly four thousand persons: the first stone was laid in 1664; a new roof was constructed in 1802, the ceiling exhibiting a magnificent allegorical painting, by Streater, serjeant painter to Charles II., divided into compartments: the room is adorned with portraits of the founder, of George IV., by Sir Thomas Lawrence, and of the late Emperor of Russia, and the King of Prussia, presented by those respective sovereigns; the latter of whom, with other illustrious personages, received honorary degrees in this noble edifice, on their visit to the university in 1814. The Schools form a handsome quadrangle on the north side of Radcliffe-square, and were founded early in the fifteenth century, by Thomas Huskenorton, abbot of Oseney, and completed in the commencement of the seventeenth century: this range of building comprises schools for divinity, logic, moral philosophy, music, sculpture, &c., in which lectures are read by the professors of the different sciences, and candidates for degrees pass their respective examinations; the Bodleian Library is on the western side, and the Picture Gallery in the upper story of the other three sides: on the north is the Clarendon printing-office. The principal front, in Cat-street, is one hundred and seventy-five feet in length, and is divided by a tower gateway, adorned with pinnacles and mullioned windows, and exhibiting all the five orders of architecture: this part of the building is the repository for the muniments and registers of the university, and is surmounted by a statue of James I., enthroned, and presenting a copy of his works, with his right hand, to Fame, and with the left to the university; over the throne are the emblems of Justice, Peace, and Plenty: these devices were once doubly gilt, and presented a magnificent appearance. In the logic and moral philosophy school, at the south-east angle of the court, are the Pomfret statues, given to the university, in 1755, by the Countess Dowager of Pomfret. The Divinity school, which is opposite the principal gateway, and devoted to the exercises for the degrees of Bachelor and Doctor in Divinity, exhibits a beautiful specimen of later English architecture, with a roof consisting of bold four-centered arches, with fan tracery, in delicate workmanship of elegant design. The Bodleian Library was founded by Sir Thomas Bodley, of Dunscombe, near Crediton, in the county of Devon, Knt., on the remains of one by Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, and opened to the public, November 8th, 1602: it is entered at the south-west angle of the court, and consists of three principal, and several smaller rooms; one is devoted to topographical works and manuscripts, bequeathed to the university by Mr. Gough, the antiquary, in 1799; a second to foreign, and a third to domestic literature: on the entrance staircase is the Auctarium, for the reception of the choicest and most valuable books and manuscripts: the several rooms are decorated with many valuable portraits. In addition to the continual increase of books by donations and purchase, this institution claims, as a matter of right, in common with the British Museum and other national establishments, a copy of every book printed in this country. The library is open from nine o'clock till four in the afternoon, between Lady-day and Michaelmas, and from ten till three during the other half year, and, next to that of the Vatican, is considered to have the richest collection of books and manuscripts in Europe: the officers are a librarian, two sub-librarians, and two assistants. The Picture Gallery contains, in addition to numerous portraits, landscapes, and historical pieces, some fine busts, especially one near the entrance of John, Duke of Marlborough; casts of Apollo and Venus de Medicis; a superb brass statue of William, Earl of Pembroke, Chancellor of the university from 1616 to 1630, designed by Rubens, and executed by Hubert le Sœur; and many elegant models of ancient buildings. In an apartment on the north side of the quadrangle are the famous Arundelian marbles, collected by the Earl of Arundel, and presented to the university by his grandson, the Duke of Norfolk; here also are the antique marbles, presented by the executors of the learned Selden. The Clarendon printing-office was erected, in 1711, by Sir John Vanburgh, out of the profits arising from the sale of Lord Clarendon's History of the Rebellion, the copyright of which was presented by his son to the university; over the south entrance is a fine statue of Lord Clarendon, and the north entrance is by a flight of steps from Broadstreet; the summit is ornamented with the statues of the nine Muses. A New Printing-House has been recently erected westward of the Observatory, at the expense of the university, and under the direction of Mr. Daniel Robertson, architect, with a press-room of two hundred and one feet by twenty-eight, and other apartments and conveniences, which render it the most complete, and, with the exception of the royal printing-house at Paris, the largest, establishment of the kind in Europe: the buildings occupy an area of two acres and a half, and form a square, two sides of which are devoted to the Bible department, and the other two are appropriated to that of the classics, with their respective accommodations. This edifice is constructed of stone, procured in the neighbourhood, and faced with Bath stone: the principal front is decorated with a splendid entrance gateway into the quadrangle, designed after the model of the arch of Constantine at Rome. Nearly adjoining the theatre, on the western side, is the Ashmolean Museum, which was founded, in 1682, by Elias Ashmole, from whom it is named, and who gave to the university his own collection of coins, medals, and manuscripts, together with a valuable and curious collection made by the Tradescants, two eminent gardeners and botanists at Lambeth, on condition that the university should erect a building for their reception: at his death the museum was enlarged, by the addition of his valuable antiquarian library, and has been since greatly increased by various donations. On the first floor of this building the lectures on experimental philosophy and mineralogy are delivered, and in the lower one, those on chemistry, for which the apparatus is kept here.

The Radcliffe Library, esteemed one of the most splendid architectural ornaments of the university, and situated in the centre of Radcliffe-square, was completed by Gibbs, in 1749, at the expense of the celebrated and eccentric Dr. Radcliffe, who bequeathed £40,000 for the building, £150 per annum for the librarian, £100 per annum for the purchase of books, and legacies, to a great amount, for other purposes connected with this public establishment: this superb structure is circular in form, and consists of a rustic basement, in which are several arched entrances into an area, from which a flight of steps affords an ascent to the principal room, which contains a variety of casts and busts, and, by a recent determination of the trustees, is to become the repository of books in natural history and medicine; above the basement rises a series of duplicated columns of the Corinthian order, supporting an enriched frieze, entablature, and cornice, and surmounted by an open balustrade ornamented with urns; the building is crowned with a spacious and well-proportioned dome, which rises to the height of eighty feet from the floor. Over the door of the entrance from the principal staircase is a portrait of the founder, by Sir Godfrey Kneller, and within the library is his statue finely sculptured by Rysbrach. On the visit of the allied sovereigns, a magnificent dinner was provided by the university for the imperial, royal, and illustrious guests, of which they partook in this library, on the 14th of June, 1814.

The Botanic Garden, said to be the site of an ancient burial-ground belonging to the Jews, is situated opposite to the tower of Magdalene College, near the bridge, and was founded, in 1622, by Henry, Lord D'Anvers, Earl of Danby: it consists of about five acres of ground, divided into four parts, and containing a great variety of plants, arranged according to their respective classes: on the right and left of the entrance are green-houses, and eastward of the garden, without the walls, is an excellent hot-house: the entrance is by an elegant arched gateway, said to have been designed by Inigo Jones, the centre of which is ornamented by a bust of the founder, and the sides by statues of Charles I. and II.: it is fronted by a broad area next the High-street, and encompassed by a parapet surmounted with iron pallsades: the library attached to it was built, and furnished with a valuable collection of botanical works, by Dr. Sherard, Fellow of St. John's College: there is a handsome residence for the professor at a small distance from the garden. The Astronomical Observatory is situated at the northern extremity of Oxford, on the road to Woodstock, and was erected by trustees under the will of Dr. Radcliffe, who bequeathed £7000 for this object, the Duke of Marlborough having given ten acres of ground for the site: this beautiful pile of building comprises an excellent library, apartments for observation and lectures, a valuable apparatus of astronomical instruments, and a residence for the professor: the tower, which exhibits a general representation of the Temple of the Winds, at Athens, is surmounted by figures of Hercules and Atlas supporting the globe. In Holywell-street is the Music-room, built at an expense of £1263, and opened in 1748, the funds having been principally raised by means of subscription oratorios: concerts, under the direction of stewards from different colleges, are performed during term.

Oxford, on the removal of the see of Dorchester to Lincoln, was included within that diocese, from which it was separated in 1542, and erected into a see, by Henry VIII., who appointed the conventual chapel of the abbey of Osney the cathedral church, which distinction was subsequently transferred to the monastery of St. Frideswide, on the site of which Cardinal Wolsey had commenced the foundation of a splendid college, afterwards completed, but upon a scale of less magnificence, by the king; who having dedicated the chapel of the college to Christ, assigned it as the cathedral church of the diocese. The jurisdiction of the see comprehends the whole of the county, except seven parishes: the ecclesiastical establishment consists of a bishop, dean, archdeacon, eight canons, eight chaplains, one hundred and one students, eight clerks, eight choristers, and twenty-four almsmen. The cathedral is a spacious cruciform structure, in the Norman style of architecture, and of singular character, with a central tower surmounted by a spire of early English architecture: the exterior is concealed by the college buildings, with which it is surrounded; the interior contains many interesting portions of singular and beautiful design; the arches of the nave, part of which has been demolished, are in a double series, the tower springing from corbels on the piers; the roof of the choir is richly groined, and decorated with pendants: on the north of the choir are some chapels of later character than the rest of the building, and the Latin chapel has several windows in the decorated style; in the Dean's chapel are altar-tombs of considerable antiquity, a monument in the decorated style, with three canopied niches of great beauty, and the shrine of St. Frideswide, an elaborate and magnificent design, in the later style of English architecture, consisting of three tiers of tabernacle work, the upper tier of which is richly ornamented with canopied niches. Many of the windows were destroyed during the parliamentary war: in those that remain are several devices in painted glass; in the east window is a painting of the Nativity, from a design by Sir James Thornhill: the central west window is embellished with ancient painted glass, representing St. Frideswide, St. Catherine, and other saints; in the central part of the great window in the north transept is a representation of the murder of Becket, which appears to be of great antiquity: the pulpit is very antique and richly carved. There are numerous ancient and interesting monuments, among which are those of Lady Elizabeth Montacute; of Robert Burton, author of the Anatomy of Melancholy; and of several distinguished members of the university, and of other eminent persons who died at Oxford while Charles I. held his court at Christ Church; also a very fine statue of Dr. Cyril Jackson, by Chantrey, from his portrait in the hall. Part of the cloisters, in the later style of English architecture, is remaining; and the chapter-house is a beautiful and valuable specimen of the early English style.

The city comprises the parishes of St. Aldate, All Saints, Holywell, or St. Cross, St. Ebbe, St. Giles, St. John the Baptist, St. Martin, St. Mary Magdalene, St. Mary the Virgin, St. Michael, St. Peter le Bailey, St. Peter in the East, and St. Thomas. The living of St. Aldate's is a discharged rectory, rated in the king's books at £8. 13. 4., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Pembroke College: the church is a very ancient structure, with a tower, surmounted by an octagonal spire, and is said to have been restored in 1004. The living of All Saints' is a discharged perpetual curacy, rated in the king's books at £5. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Rector and Fellows of Lincoln College: the church is a handsome modern structure, in the Grecian style of architecture, with a tower, crowned with a circlet of Corinthian pillars, from within which rises an elegant spire: it was erected by subscription in 1708, on the site of the former edifice: the walls are ornamented by a handsome balustrade, the floors laid with variegated marble, and the ceiling adorned with curious fret-work, and with the arms of benefactors, painted in compartments. The living of the parish of St. Cross, or Holywell, is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Warden and Fellows of Merton College: the church is an ancient edifice, in the early style of English architecture, with some later insertions, having a tower, which was added to it in 1664. The living of St. Ebbe's is a discharged rectory, rated in the king's books at £3. 5., endowed with £400 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Crown: the church is said to have been founded by Athelmer, Earl of Cornwall, and annexed to the monastery of Eynesham, on the destruction of which by the Danes it was given to the monastery of Stow, which grant was confirmed by Henry I.; the ancient edifice was taken down in 1814, and the present, a plain neat building of English architecture, was erected in 1816. The living of St. Giles' is a discharged vicarage, rated in the king's books at £14. 12. 3½., endowed with £600 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the President and Fellows of St. John's College: the church, an ancient structure in the early style of English architecture, with lancet-shaped windows, and having a square embattled tower, is said to have been built in 1120. The living of St. John's the Baptist is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Warden and Fellows of Merton College. The living of St. Martin's is a discharged rectory, rated in the king's books at £8. 1. 5½., endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Crown: the church is an ancient structure, with a tower, which, in the reign of Edward III., was considerably lowered, on complaint of the scholars that the townsmen used to retire into it and annoy them with arrows, stones, and other missiles. The living of St. Mary Magdalene's is a discharged vicarage, rated in the king's books at £6, endowed with £600 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Dean and Canons of Christ Church: the church, an ancient structure, founded long prior to the Conquest, was given, by Robert D'Oilly, and annexed, to the college of St. George, within the castle, and, after the annexation of that college to Osney abbey, was, with that monastery, given to Christ Church by Henry VIII. The living of St. Mary's the Virgin is a discharged vicarage, rated in the king's books at £5. 4. 2., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Provost and Fellows of Oriel College: the church, which is the University church, though used by the parishioners at other times, is a spacious and elegant structure, in the later style of English architecture, with a tower on the north side, surmounted by a beautiful spire, rising to the height of one hundred and eighty feet, in the decorated style; the front of the church is in the best style of the period of Henry VII., but is rather disfigured by a porch of heavy twisted pillars, over which is a statue of the Virgin: the interior is very beautiful; the piers and arches are richly moulded, and above each pier are elegant niches, from which spring corbels, carrying the wooden arches of the finely-carved ceiling; the windows are enriched with good tracery: on the north of the chancel is the sepulchral chapel of Adam de Brome, founder of Oriel College: there are several ancient and interesting monuments. The living of St. Michael's is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Rector and Fellows of Lincoln College: the church is an ancient edifice, in the early style of English architecture, with a square embattled tower, and a handsome porch in the later style; the windows are in general of large dimensions and finely pointed. The living of St. Peter's le Bailey is a discharged rectory, rated in the king's books at £3. 14. 2., endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £1600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Crown: the church is a neat modern edifice, erected in 1740, on the site of the old structure, which fell down in 1726. The living of St. Peter's in the East is a discharged vicarage, rated in the king's books at £13. 2. 1., endowed with £200 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Warden and Fellows of Merton College: the church is a very ancient structure, said to have been originally built in the ninth century; the prevailing character, however, is decidedly Norman, and the details are very rich and elaborately wrought: it has undergone many alterations and repairs, and received several additions, in the later style of English architecture, which have materially altered its external appearance: at the west end of the north aisle is a square tower, which has vestiges of great antiquity; underneath the chancel is a fine Norman crypt, of which the roof is vaulted, and supported on four ranges of low massive pillars; several of the windows have remains of ancient painted glass, and there are many ancient monuments. Hearn, the antiquary, was interred in the churchyard, and, in 1754, Dr. Rawlinson repaired the monument erected to his memory. This was formerly the university church, and the university sermons preached there on the Sunday afternoons during Lent, and on Easter-Sunday, were discontinued about two years ago. The living of St. Thomas' is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £600 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Dean and Canons of Christ Church: the church was founded by the canons of Osney priory, in 1141; it is a neat and ancient structure, with a square embattled tower, and has recently undergone an extensive repair: the churchyard is tastefully laid out, and planted with trees, flowering shrubs, and evergreens. There are places of worship for Baptists, and Wesleyan Methodists, and a Roman Catholic chapel.

A charity school was founded, in 1658, by John Nixon, alderman, who bequeathed £600 for its endowment; and, in 1685, Mrs. Joan Nixon left eighteen acres of land, producing £35 per annum, for apprenticing two boys every year from the school; which funds have been consolidated. Christian Smith, in 1718, gave a rent-charge of £2 for teaching poor girls of the parish of St. Mary Magdalene. The Blue-coat school, supported by subscription, was instituted in 1710; thirty-five boys are clothed and educated in it, and a certain number of them apprenticed, with a premium of £10 each, and £2 for clothing: there are also thirty-five other boys, who are educated only. Mrs. Ann Alworth, in 1721, gave £400, to be laid out in lands, for the education of twenty children belonging to St. Michael's parish. Mr. John Coombe, in 1702, gave a house for a schoolmaster to teach ten boys gratuitously, in St. Thomas' parish. Mrs. Elizabeth Rowney gave the interest of £50 for teaching poor children of the parish of St. Giles. A school for thirty-six girls, who are instructed, clothed, and placed out to service, is supported by subscription among the ladies. A National school is supported by the university, in which three hundred and thirty boys are educated, including forty, called the Grey-coat boys, who are also clothed, and eight of them apprenticed annually, with a premium of £20 each. A Lancasterian school, for one hundred boys and fifty girls, is supported by voluntary contributions; and a charity school for two hundred girls, wholly by the lady of J. D. Macbride, D.C.L., Principal of Magdalene Hall. Considerable sums have been left by several individuals for apprenticing poor children, for distribution in loans without interest to young tradesmen, and for clothing and annual payments to aged and indigent persons: others have also been appropriated, by will, for the repair of the several churches, with the remainder for distribution among the poor, and for various other charitable uses. Edmund Boulter, Jun., of Hasely-Court, Esq., built and endowed an almshouse for an aged man from each of the parishes of Wimple in Cambridgeshire, Harwood in the county of York, Wherwell in Hampshire, Hasely in the county of Oxford, Barlings in Lincolnshire, and Deptford with Brockley, in Kent; the inmates receive an allowance of eight shillings each per week. The infirmary, an elegant and commodious building of stone, was erected and completely furnished by the trustees of Dr. Radcliffe, and was opened for the reception of patients in 1770: the buildings, to which are attached five acres of land given by Thomas Rowney, Esq., comprise a chapel, to which the late Duke of Marlborough presented a communion service of gilt plate: the institution is under the direction of a president and a committee of governors, and is attended by four physicians, who divide between them the interest of £2000, bequeathed to them by the late Dr. Frewin, of Christ Church; four surgeons, who officiate gratuitously; a chaplain, resident apothecary, secretary, matron, and assistants. The lunatic asylum at Headington, in the vicinity of the city, a spacious and handsome building of stone, was erected in 1813, at an expense of £20,000 raised by subscription, towards which the trustees of the Radcliffe Infirmary, with whom the design originated, contributed £2700: the institution, the interest of which was greatly promoted by the Rev. John Cooke, D.D., President of Corpus Christi College, is adapted to the reception of various classes of patients, who are admitted on terms varying according to their accommodations, from 12s. to £2. 2. per week and upwards, according to the rank and circumstances of the patient. The house of industry, a neat stone building, two hundred and thirty-seven feet in length, and two stories in height, was erected for the accommodation of eleven of the parishes, incorporated by act of parliament, in 1771, for the maintenance of their poor: it is under the direction of a governor, two deputy governors, weekly visitors, and a committee, who afford their services gratuitously: the parishes of St. Giles and St. John separately maintain their own poor.

Of the numerous monastic establishments which formerly flourished here, some have been incorporated in the buildings of the various colleges, in which only a few small memorials have been preserved, and of others there are still some remains in various parts of the city and neighbourhood. About a quarter of a mile from the church of St. Thomas are some trifling remains of Osney abbey, already noticed, consisting chiefly of an arched window and a small portion of a wall now belonging to a corn-mill, which occupies the site; the bells are now in the steeple of Christ Church. About half a mile to the east of the city was the hospital of St. Bartholomew, founded by Henry I., when he built the palace of Beaumont, and which was annexed to Oriel College by Edward III., in 1328. There are some slight remains of the convent for Benedictine nuns, founded at Godstow, in 1138, by Editha, and dedicated to the Virgin Mary and St. John the Baptist, in which Rosamond Clifford was interred, and to which Henry II. was a great benefactor; the revenue at the dissolution was £319. 18. 8. The hospital of St. John the Baptist, without the east gate, was founded previously to the reign of John, who was a great benefactor to the institution, and was rebuilt by Henry III.: in the reign of Henry VI. it was given to Waynfleet, Bishop of Winchester, who founded on its site his magnificent college of Magdalene, in the walls of which some vestiges of the ancient building may be traced. The house of Dominican friars was founded, in 1221, by Isabel de Bulbec, widow of Robert, Earl of Oxford, and subsequently removed to a small island near the Watergate, in the parish of St. Ebbe, given to that fraternity by Henry III., where it continued till the dissolution. The Franciscan priory was originally founded, in 1224, by Richard Le Mercier and others, and was afterwards refounded by Henry III.: the fine chapel and extensive enclosures of this establishment were alienated in the reign of Henry VI. The priory of Carmelite or White friars was founded in 1254, to whom King Edward II. assigned the palace of Beaumont, built by Henry I.: there are scarcely any vestiges of the buildings. The monastery of Augustine friars was founded by Henry III., in 1268, and continued till the foundation of Wadham College, which was built on part of the site. Rewley abbey, for monks of the Cistercian order, was founded in 1280, by Edmund, Earl of Cornwall, in pursuance of the will of his father, Richard, King of the Romans, on an island called North Osney, and dedicated to the Virgin Mary; at the dissolution, the revenue was estimated at £174. 3.: some arched windows and door-ways in an out-building remain, and some stones on which are inscriptions and armorial bearings. Oxford confers the title of earl on the family of Harley.

OXFORDSHIRE, an inland county, bounded on the south-west, south, and south-east by Berkshire; on the east by Buckinghamshire; on the north-east by Northamptonshire; on the north and north-west by Warwickshire; and on the west by Gloucestershire. It extends from 51° 28' to 52° 9' (N. Lat.), and, in its greatest breadth, which is a little north of the centre of the county, from 1° 2' to 1° 38' (W. Lon.), and comprises an area of seven hundred and fifty-two square miles, or about four hundred and eighty-one thousand two hundred and eighty acres. The population, in 1821, was 136,971. At the period of the Roman invasion, this county formed part of the territory of the Dobuni, who, desirous of releasing themselves from subjection to their eastern neighbours, the Cattieuchlani, offered no resistance to the Romans, who, on their first division of the island, included it in Britannia Prima. Its central situation retarded its final subjection to the Saxon dominion, until the latter part of the sixth century. It had been the scene of several sanguinary conflicts between the Saxons and the retiring Britons, and became that of several others between the sovereigns of Wessex and Mercia. In the year 778, this county, being ceded by Cynewulf, King of Wessex, to Offa, King of Mercia, the latter made a wide and deep trench, as a boundary between the two kingdoms, which may still be traced at Ardley, Middleton-Stoney, Northbrook, Heyford, and Kirtlington. In 917, the Anglo-Saxons were defeated with great slaughter by the Danes, at Hook-Norton, who burned the town of Oxford three several times, in the years 979, 1003, and 1009, and plundered that of Thame, in 1010. In the early progress of the Norman Conquest, Oxford was stormed and burned by the Conqueror. In 1142, the Empress Matilda was besieged in the castle of that place by King Stephen, for three months, until the river being frozen, and the ground covered with snow, she, accompanied by three knights, all dressed in white, passed the sentinels unobserved, crossed the river, and proceeded on foot to Abingdon, whence she took horse, and arrived safely at Wallingford. In 1264, Oxford was taken from the barons by Henry III. In 1387, at Radford bridge, between this county and Berkshire, Thomas de Vere, Marquis of Dublin and Earl of Oxford, was defeated by Thomas of Woodstock, Duke of Gloucester, and Henry, Earl of Derby, afterwards Henry IV., when the marquis with difficulty saved his life by swimming across the Isis. In 1469, at Danesmoor, near Banbury, on July 26th, the Yorkists, under the Earl of Pembroke, were defeated by Sir John Conyers, when six thousand five hundred men were slain, and the earl made prisoner.

One of the earliest transactions relating to the great civil war occurred on Chalgrove Field, in this county, on the 15th of August, 1642, when the celebrated John Hampden appeared in arms, to enforce the ordinance of the militia. Such of the other events connected with that memorable contest as relate especially to this county may be thus briefly recounted. On the 14th of September, 1642, Sir John Byron, having taken possession of Oxford for the king, was driven from it by Lord Say and Sele. On the 27th of October, four days after the battle of Edge-Hill, Banbury castle, in which was a garrison of eight hundred foot and a troop of horse, and Broughton castle, surrendered to the king, who the next day entered Oxford, whence he marched to Brentford, and after the battle there, returned with his prisoners to Oxford, on the 28th of November. At Oxford, in April 1643, the twelve commissioners from the parliament waited on the king with proposals of peace, which negotiation was broken off on the 15th of the same month; and on the 25th, at Caversham bridge, between this county and Berkshire, Ruthven, Earl of Forth, with the van of the king's army, was repulsed by Lord Robarts, in an attempt to relieve Reading, which surrendered on the following day to the Earl of Essex. In the night of June 17th, detachments from the army under the Earl of Essex were attacked at Wycombe and Postcombe, by Prince Rupert, who, on his return, with many prisoners and much booty, was overtaken the following morning on Chalgrove Field, but after a smart skirmish, the parliamentarians were repulsed, Colonel John Hampden was mortally wounded, and the prince returned in triumph to Oxford. On the 1st of August the king left Oxford for Bristol, but returned on the 16th; on the 18th he proceeded to the unsuccessful siege of Gloucester; and on September 23rd, three days after the battle of Newbury, he again returned to Oxford. That city having been now for some time the head-quarters of the royalists, to supply its garrison with provisions became a heavy burden upon the county: on the 15th of April, 1644, a royal proclamation was issued to the inhabitants of the counties of Oxford and Berks, requiring them to bring in supplies for the garrison, on pain of being visited with fire and sword: this produced a declaration from both houses of parliament, dated the 22nd of the same month, expressing their horror at the proclamation, and their determination to hazard their lives and fortunes to prevent its being carried into effect. Vigorous operations were accordingly commenced, with a view to the reduction of Oxford, and that city being nearly surrounded by two numerous detachments of the parliamentary army, under the Earl of Essex and Sir William Waller, the king, in the night of June 3rd, effected his escape, and proceeded to Worcester, upon which the enemy relinquished their intention of besieging Oxford. At Cropredy bridge, on the 30th of June, an indecisive action took place between the king and Sir William Waller. The garrison of Banbury, commanded by Sir William Compton, was besieged by the parliament's troops, under Colonel Fiennes, who, on October 25th, was compelled, by the Earl of Northampton, to raise the siege. November 27th, the king returned to Oxford. On the 24th of April, 1645, near Islip bridge, four regiments of the royal horse were routed by Cromwell, who on the same day took Blechingdon house without resistance, for which surrender its governor, Colonel Windebank, was shot at Oxford on the 3rd of May. The king left Oxford on May 7th, and Fairfax laid siege to it on the 22nd; but the siege was raised on the 7th of June, and the king again returned thither, on the 27th of August. On the 30th he departed for Hereford, and on November 6th he once more came to Oxford, where he passed the winter. April 26th, 1646, Woodstock manor-house, after a vigorous defence, surrendered to the parliamentary forces; and the next day the king left Oxford to surrender himself to the Scottish army besieging Newark. May 8th, the garrison in Banbury castle, after an heroic defence for ten weeks, capitulated on honourable terms to Colonel Whalley; and on the 24th of June, Oxford, which had been besieged by Fairfax since May 2nd, surrendered at the king's command. At the time of the rebellion of 1715, several partizans of the Stuart family were seized at Oxford.

This county lies in the diocese of Oxford, and in the province of Canterbury, and forms an archdeaconry, comprising, exclusively of Oxford, the deaneries of Aston, Burcester, Chipping-Norton, Cuddesden, Deddington, Henley, Witney, and Woodstock; and containing two hundred and twelve parishes, of which ninety-nine are rectories, seventy-two vicarages, and the remainder perpetual curacies. For purposes of civil government it is divided into the fourteen hundreds of Bampton, Banbury, Binfield, Bloxham, Bullington, Chadlington, Dorchester, Ewelme, Langtree, Lewknor, Pirton, Ploughley, Thame, and Wootton. It contains the city and university of Oxford, the borough and market towns of Banbury and Woodstock, and the market towns of Bampton, Bicester, Burford, Chipping-Norton, Henley upon Thames, Thame, Watlington, and Witney. Two knights are returned to parliament for the shire; two representatives for the city, and two for the university, of Oxford; two for the borough of Woodstock; and one for that of Banbury: the county members are elected at Oxford. This county is in the Oxford circuit: the assizes are held at Oxford, where is the county gaol; and the quarter sessions at the same city, on January 11th, April 19th, July 12th, and October 18th: there are fifty-nine acting magistrates. The rates raised in the county for the year ending March 25th, 1827, amounted to £139,005; the expenditure to £135,886, of which, £119,738. 19. was applied to the relief of the poor.

The shape of the county is extremely irregular: near the middle of it, at Oxford, it is not more than seven miles across, and though the northern part spreads out to the breadth of about thirty-eight miles, yet that lying to the south of Oxford is not in any part more than twelve miles broad: the latter is computed to contain one hundred and forty-one thousand acres; the former, three hundred and nine thousand. The southernmost part has a fine alternation of hill and dale, which produces much pleasing scenery; and the Chiltern elevations, more particularly, which are partly clothed with fine woods of beech, partly arable, and partly in open sheep downs, are beautifully varied. The more central district has little inequality of surface, but is adorned with numerous woods, which present a rich and pleasing aspect. In the northern and western districts of that portion of the county lying north of Oxford, the scenery is for the most part less agreeable, in consequence of the enclosures being formed by bare stone walls: in Whichwood Forest, however, are many grassy vales and woody glens, which afford much charming scenery. But the rivers of Oxfordshire are among its chief natural beauties, flowing through almost every part of it, and being always accompanied by luxuriant meadows, and varying prospects. In the vicinity of Oxford, the vale of the Isis expands into a spacious amphitheatre, bounded by some striking hills, in the centre of which rise the majestic towers, domes, and spires of that city, from behind the thick shade of venerable groves. Shillingford bridge occupies a romantic situation on the same river, soon after it has been joined by the Thame; and after having passed Wallingford, in Berkshire, the scenery upon its banks assumes an immense variety of fresh beauties, and forms an indented valley through the range of the Chiltern hills, which, gradually losing the appearance of downs, exhibited by some of their more naked summits in the distance, become adorned by numerous varied beauties of art and nature: thick woods clothe their sides and summits, while the slopes, in the more immediate vicinity of the river, consist of rich meadows. Towns and villages lie scattered along its banks, and magnificent seats adorn the declivities on each side. Having been joined by the Kennet and the Loddon, which it receives from the south, the Thames swells into a majestic river, navigated by numerous small craft, and glides onward through the plain, until it becomes engulfed amidst the fine hills around Henley, the scenery of which is among the most interesting on its banks. The climate of Oxfordshire, its situation and latitude considered, is cold, particularly in the western part of the northern division of the county, where the fences consist chiefly of stone walls, affording but little shelter. In the Chiltern district, at the southern extremity of the county, it is moist: it is also cold upon the Chiltern hills, and in their vicinity, more especially upon the poor white lands at the foot of them, where it is observed that the frosts always take effect sooner, and are of longer continuance, than on the other soils.

With regard to soil, this county comprises three different tracts, the limits of which are pretty clearly defined, and which may be distinguished as the red-land district, the stonebrash land, and the Chiltern hills. The red-land occupies the whole northern part, and may be separated from the rest of it by an irregular line drawn from Little Rollright, on the borders of Warwickshire, by Westcott-Barton and Somerton, to the vicinity of Mixbury, near the confines of Northamptonshire and Buckinghamshire: this district, which much exceeds in fertility any other of equal extent in Oxfordshire, and contains about seventy-nine thousand six hundred and thirty-five acres, consists of a rich sandy loam of a reddish colour, which is deep, sound, and friable, being well adapted to the production of every crop: the substratum is red grit-stone rock. The stonebrash district adjoins the former, and extends from the borders of Gloucestershire, on the west, nearly to those of Buckinghamshire, on the east, the southern border of it running from the boundary of the county, near Broughton-Poggs, in a north-easterly direction by Brize-Norton, Witney, North Leigh, Bladon, Kirtling-ton and Bicester, to Stratton-Audley, and thence northward, at a short distance from the borders of Buckinghamshire, to Mixbury: in so extensive a tract as this, which is computed to comprise one hundred and sixty-four thousand and twenty-three acres, a great variety is found, from poor loose sandy slopes, to deep and more heavy soils, approaching to clay; but that which predominates is a loose, dry, friable sand, or loam, apparently formed in a great measure of abraded limestone, of which it contains many fragments: in the vales various loams are found. The Chiltern district comprises the south-eastern extremity of Oxfordshire; its boundary from the rest of the county extending from Chinnor, in a south-westerly direction, near Watlington, to the vicinity of the Thames at Gatehampton: the basis of this tract, which contains sixty-four thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight acres, is chalk, in some places very white and pure, in others imperfect, which is covered to various depths with a clayey loam, generally sound and dry, and containing a considerable quantity of flints, mostly brown, rough, and honey-combed, frequently to perforation: many of these flints have also a sparry incrustation, and the best soils are often the most covered with them: on the banks of the Thames, and in some other places where the hills recede, the soil is an excellent sandy loam, which, as well as the flinty hills, forms a good turnip soil. The remaining large portion of the county, extending from this to the stonebrash district, and calculated to comprise one hundred and sixty-six thousand four hundred acres, includes all sorts of soils, from a loose sand to a heavy clay, and these are so intermixed, and the respective tracts of each so small, as to render it difficult to give a distinct account of them. Peat-earth is occasionally found; and it is considered as a mark of the general fertility of the county, that good crops of wheat grow on all its soils. Quarries of freestone are numerous; limestone is very plentiful; and slate, fit for roofing common buildings, is obtained in several parts: the ochre found at Shotover is esteemed of the very best quality.

On the arable lands, which occupy by far the greater part of the county, the courses of cropping are very irregular, even on soils that are alike. The corn crops commonly cultivated are wheat, barley, and oats: the general average produce of wheat is estimated at three quarters per acre; that of barley, at four quarters; and that of oats, at five quarters. Peas are occasionally cultivated; beans are sown on the heavier soils; and there exists likewise a practice of sowing what is here called poulse, namely beans and peas mixed, of which good crops are produced on the lighter lands. The common turnip and the Swedish turnip are both extensively cultivated. Tares are commonly grown; lentils to a small extent; rape, but little; cabbages, carrots, and potatoes occasionally as agricultural crops. Clover and trefoil are frequently cultivated; and sainfoin is grown to a great extent upon all the soils that are proper for it. Of the grass lands, the chief part is situated in the narrow flat tracts on the borders of the rivers, containing most of the open field meadows, which are extensive, and situated so low as to be frequently overflowed by sudden rains, and sometimes even during the hay-harvest, insomuch, that the crops are either spoiled or entirely swept away: this flooding, however, improves the soil, when the waters do not remain out long enough to injure the grass, which seldom receives any other manure than the sediment thus deposited. At Water-Eaton is the best grass land in the county, which is occupied for dairies; but it is very liable to summer floods: at North Weston, in the rich district near Thame, the meadows are mown twice a year. The enclosed pasture, or meadow land, is chiefly confined to the central part of the county, near Oxford, where there is a considerable tract of deep rich soil: besides the quantity of butter made here, which is considerable, numerous calves are suckled, to supply the London market with veal; in various parts of this district some cattle and sheep are also fattened: many of the pasture grounds, however, are full of ant-hills, and a great part of the herbage is consequently coarse. Much butter is sent to the London market from some other parts of Oxfordshire, particularly from the vicinity of Bicester; and in the district around Thame many calves are also fattened, to be sent as veal to the same market: little cheese is made: the produce of hay per acre is calculated to average nearly two tons. The best feeding-land lies on the banks of the rivers Thame, Isis, and Cherwell, but the lowest meadows are subject to floods, which sometimes do much damage to the herbage, when they occur late in the spring. Lime is extensively used as a manure, as are also peat and coal ashes; and great quantities of rags, purchased in London, are brought for the same purpose. Oxfordshire has no peculiar breed of cattle, nor does any particular sort prevail; those most frequently seen are of the short-horned Yorkshire, the long-horned Leicestershire, the Devon, and the Alderney breeds: oxen are frequently employed in agricultural labours, for which the Herefordshire breed is preferred. It is well stocked with sheep, of which the most common are the South Down, the Berkshire, the New Leicester, a cross between the Berkshire and the Leicester, a Spanish breed, which is sometimes found mingled with the South Down, and a mixed breed between the New Leicester and the Cotswold sheep. Of hogs, the Berkshire breed is the most common throughout the county: many boars are fed for the purpose of making brawn and sausages, which form considerable articles of trade at Oxford, and some other places in the county.

Oxfordshire may be considered a well-wooded county, excepting the northernmost part of it, but there is comparatively but very little oak. The woodlands may be classed as follows; first, groves on spring-woods; secondly, woods consisting of timber trees and underwood; and thirdly, coppices consisting of underwood only. Of the first class, the extensive natural beech-woods confined to the Chiltern district are the principal, consisting of large trees, among which is a succession of younger ones that have been produced by the falling of the beech mast: these woods are never all felled at once, except for the purpose of bringing the land under tillage, but are drawn occasionally. Of the second kind are the woods in the vicinity of Stanton St. John, called "the Quarters," the soil of which is a strong clay: there are also numerous spots of woodland of this description dispersed in various other parts of the county. Coppices are not very numerous, there being hardly any extensive ones, except those tracts of Whichwood Forest that are thus called, but which, containing timber trees, are more properly woods. There are extensive artificial plantations in several places, particularly at Blenheim. The waste lands, excepting the large tract of Whichwood Forest, is inconsiderable. This forest, situated towards the western confines of the county, and having a soil, in some places of reddish loam, and in others of the common stonebrash of the extensive district in which it is included, contains six thousand seven hundred and twenty acres, and is subject to a right of commonage for horses and sheep only. It comprises thirty-four coppices, eighteen of which belong to the king, twelve to the Duke of Marlborough, and four to different individuals; and contains some thriving young oak timber: next to oak, ash is the most abundant, and after that beech, with some elm. The coppices occupy three thousand and thirty-seven acres, the keepers' lodges and lawns one hundred and thirty-four, and the open forest (which produces nothing but brushwood and pasturage for the numerous deer and the cattle) two thousand four hundred and twenty-one acres. After having been cut, the coppices are fenced off for seven years against the cattle and sheep, but the deer are never excluded. Comprised within the forest are also the chase woods, occupying four hundred and eighty-eight acres; and Blandford park, containing six hundred and forty acres. Otmoor, near Islip, six miles north of Oxford, contains about four thousand acres, and, prior to its enclosure, under an act obtained in 1815, was commonable to eight adjoining townships: the soil is generally a good loam, but the whole tract is so extremely flat, and situated so low, that in wet seasons much of it lies under water for a long time, the consequence of which is that the cattle and sheep upon it become diseased. Formerly the number of cattle turned upon the moor by each householder was subject to no limitation: some large flocks of geese were also kept upon it. What are called flits upon this moor are the holes from which peat has been dug; pills are hills of quaking bog. The poor inhabitants of these townships, who had been deprived of their customary right of common by the enclosure bill, destroyed the fences repeatedly, and, in September 1830, assembled in a numerous body, and proceeded, in a riotous manner, to effect the removal of what they considered to be an encroachment on their ancient rights, insomuch that the military were called in, and some of the ringleaders taken into custody, but subsequently liberated by their companions on their way to prison, under a small escort. Most of the unenclosed parishes, which are rather numerous, have larger or smaller tracts of waste, or down land, which is appropriated chiefly to the pasturage of sheep: the range of the Chiltern hills, which crosses the southern end of the county, has much land of this description, being in many places too steep to admit of cultivation. In the more northern parts too are considerable tracts of downs, which are in many instances overrun with ant-hills and coarse herbage, and of little value, being chiefly appropriated to the pasturage of young cattle, and sometimes of oxen that are employed in the plough. At Kidlington is a large common, which feeds three hundred cows, from May 16th until Michaelmas; and at Campsfield, in the same parish, is an extensive common pastured by sheep.

The principal manufactures are, that of blankets, at Witney; and those of gloves and articles of polished steel, at Woodstock: the glove manufacture was established about the middle of the last century, and now furnishes employment to the poor for many miles around that town. A coarse kind of velvet, called Shag, is made at Banbury: the female poor in the southern part of the county are chiefly employed in lace-making.

The principal rivers are the Thames (or Isis), the Cherwell, the Thame, the Evenlode, and the Windrush. The first-mentioned river, which forms the entire southern boundary of the county, separating it from Berkshire, rises in Gloucestershire, and having been joined by different small streams near Lechlade, first touches this county at its south-western extremity, being then imperfectly navigable, and bearing the name of Isis: hence it pursues its course, for a considerable distance, through an undiversified plain, and in an easterly direction, until it has received the waters of the Windrush, when it takes a north-easterly course, and having been joined by the Evenlode, soon after suddenly turns southward to Oxford, a little above which city it divides into small channels, which traverse the meadows of Witham, and, leaving Oxford immediately on the left, pass under several stone bridges, connected by a grand causeway, which forms the principal approach to that city on the west: these streams soon re-uniting, the river winds round the city towards the north-east, and having been crossed by an ancient stone bridge, and joined by the Cherwell, becomes navigable, and pursues a very devious course, for the most part in a south-easterly direction, through an extensive tract of rich low meadows, to a short distance below Dorchester, where it is joined by the Thame: at this junction the river loses its assumed poetical name of Isis, and is first popularly called Thames, although in various old grants and charters, both of the period of the Saxon sway in England, and since the Norman Conquest, it is always denominated by the latter title in the higher parts of its course also. The Thames immediately passes under Shillingford bridge, and shortly after under that of Wallingford, below which the river continues a protracted southerly course, until it begins to make an extensive sweep round by the east to the north, enclosing the southern extremity of the county, which it wholly quits at a short distance below Henley, when it takes an easterly direction, and begins to form the boundary between Berkshire and Buckinghamshire. Though by no means a rapid river, it is far from being sluggish in its course, and has been poetically described as "without o'erflowing full:" its waters are here clear and silvery, except when disturbed by floods. The principal fish which it contains, in that part of its course bordering on Oxfordshire, are pike, chub, barbel, perch, eels, roach, dace, and gudgeons: salmon are also sometimes taken. The Cherwell, rising in Northamptonshire, enters this county at its northernmost extremity, and almost immediately, in the vicinity of Banbury, becomes its eastern boundary, separating it from Northamptonshire for the distance of seven or eight miles; it then finally enters Oxfordshire, and, receiving numerous smaller streams, continues its irregular southerly course through an extensive tract to the eastern side of Oxford, where it runs under Magdalene bridge, and soon after joins the Thames. The Thame, rising on the borders of Buckinghamshire and Oxfordshire, near Chinnor, takes a north-westerly course, forming the eastern boundary of the county, and passing by the town of Thame, until, in the vicinity of Waterstock, it enters it, and pursues a south-westerly, and afterwards a southerly, course, passing under the bridges of Wheatley and Dorchester, to the Isis, a little below the latter place, the united waters then taking the name of Thames. The Evenlode, rising on the north-western borders of the county, and descending by Whichwood Forest, pursues a very irregular south-easterly course by Charlbury, and having been augmented by the smaller stream of the Glyme, which flows past Woodstock, and forms the magnificent sheet of water in Blenheim park, joins the Thames a few miles above Oxford. The Windrush, rising at a short distance within the borders of Gloucestershire, soon enters this county, and pursues a nearly eastern course by Burford to Witney, to the manufactures of which latter town it is of great service, and whence it takes a direction about south-south-east, falling into the Thames near Northmoor. The smaller streams, all of which fall into some of the larger rivers before mentioned, are extremely numerous. The Oxford canal, which is of immense advantage to the county, by opening a communication, through other canals, with Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester, and the Wednesbury collieries, enters at its northern extremity, and soon approaching the Cherwell, runs nearly parallel with the course of that river, which it crosses, near Banbury, and a few miles to the east of Deddington and Woodstock, to the city of Oxford, where it communicates with the navigation of the Thames.

The turnpike roads are generally very good, especially in situations where gravel can be obtained: in the northern part of the county, the red grit-stone is used, but is not so good for the purpose. The road from London to Cheltenham, Gloucester, and Hereford, enters the county from Maidenhead, in Berkshire, and, passing through Henley, Nettlebed, Dorchester, Oxford, Witney, and Burford, leaves it a little beyond that town. The upper road from London to Oxford, Worcester, and Aberystwith, enters from High Wycombe in Buckinghamshire, and passes through Stokenchurch, Tetsworth, Wheatley, Oxford, Wolvercote, Woodstock, Over Kiddington, Chapel-House, and Little Rollright, and enters Gloucestershire at the Four Shire Stone: this is also the road from London to Holyhead, through Worcester. The road from London to Holyhead, through Buckingham and Shrewsbury, enters the county from Tingewick in Buckinghamshire, passes through Finmere and Mixbury, and, after crossing a part of Northamptonshire, re-enters it at Nell bridge, and passes through Adderbury, Banbury, Drayton, and Wroxton, to Upton in Warwickshire: this is also the road from London to Holyhead, through Birmingham, and from London to Chester, through the same town. The road from London to Aylesbury, Bicester, and Oxford, enters from Fleet-Marston in Buckinghamshire, and passes through Bicester to Oxford.

Several very curious British coins have been found in the county; and one of the most interesting remains of antiquity which it contains is the circle of high stones, called Rollrich stones, in the vicinity of Chipping-Norton. Few considerable remnants of Roman military works exist in Oxfordshire: at Alcester, or Aldchester, in the eastern part of the county, are the traces of a Roman station, the Alauna of the Itinerary, and it is probable that there was another at Dorchester. Various Roman coins and pavements have been discovered, at different periods, in almost every quarter of the county; and, in addition to these, may be noticed several sepulchral mounds, formed of rude grassy squares of turf, which, says Dr. Plot, the Roman soldiers were accustomed to raise over the ashes of any eminent warrior, and the most remarkable of which is termed Astal Barrow, in the vicinity of the Akeman-street: numerous urns and other funereal relics of the same people have also been dug up, at various periods, in different parts of the county. Only one of the four consular, or praetorian ways passed through Oxfordshire: this was the Iknield-street, which crossed the southern part of it, from north-east to south-west; and though its remains are not very conspicuous, in consequence of the dry soil over which it passes not having required it to be formed into a paved ridge, or with deep trenches, yet its course may be pretty accurately described: entering from Buckinghamshire, at the parish of Chinnor, it proceeds along the base of the Chiltern hills; leaves Lewknor, Shirburn, and Watlington to the north-west; crosses the vallum, or ridged bank, called Grime's Dyke; and, passing Ipsden, may be traced to an enclosure about three miles distant from the village of Goring, whence its course out of the county cannot be followed; but it is asserted by Dr. Plot, that it quitted it at Goring, and the name of the hamlet on the opposite bank of the Thames, viz., Streatley, seems to corroborate this opinion. Of the vicinal ways, the principal was the Akeman-street, which in different parts of its course seems to have been constructed either with or without a raised bank, according to the nature of the soil over which it passed: it enters from Buckinghamshire, in the parish of Ambrosden, whence it proceeds to the north of Gravenel, or Gravenhill, Wood, and Alchester, to Chesterton and Kirtlington, and, crossing the river Cherwell, near Tackley, passes through Blenheim park towards the village of Stonesfield, where it crosses the Evenlode, and then passes near Wilcote and Ramsden, to Asthall-Leigh and Asthall, and thence to Broadwell Grove, where its form is bold and perfect, and whence it proceeds nearly in a straight line towards Gloucestershire. Several minor roads, traces of which are still visible, diverged from this, or crossed it in different parts of its course through the county. Between Mongewell and Nuffield, towards the southern extremity of the county, is a vallum, or long earth-work, called Grime's Dyke: it is very high, and only single until it approaches the vicinity of Nuffield, where it is double, with a deep trench between the ramparts: it has been conjectured that the other part of it was once likewise double-banked, but that the trench was filled up by one of the banks being thrown into it in the progress of agricultural improvements. Marks of the sanguinary contests between the Saxons and the Danes are distinguishable in many parts of the county, consisting chiefly of military intrenchments, and sepulchral mounds, or barrows.

At the period of the general dissolution, the number of religious houses in the county, exclusively of the colleges at Oxford, was about forty, including hospitals, &c. The principal relic of the monastic buildings is St.

Frideswide's abbey church, now the cathedral church of Oxford. Amongst the parochial churches are some interesting specimens of Saxon, or early Norman, especially in that of Iffley, and many fine examples of English, architecture. In number, beauty, and magnificence of its public and private buildings, Oxfordshire at least rivals any other county in England. Blenheim House is well known as one of the most magnificent residences in the kingdom; and many other of the mansions of the resident nobility and gentry possess considerable beauty and grandeur, both of exterior appearance and interior decoration: among the principal are, Ditchley Park, the property and residence of Lord Viscount Dillon; Nuneham-Courtney, that of the late Earl of Harcourt; and Wroxton Priory, that of the Earl of Guildford. The facility with which building materials are procured causes the habitations of the middle and lower classes to be commodious, substantial, and neat in appearance: nearly every cottage has a good garden. The medicinal springs are very numerous, the greater number being of the various kinds of chalybeate. In the extensive bed of gravel on which Oxford stands, and which forms one of the geological features of England, are found many remarkable fossils, such as fragments of teeth, tusks, and bones of elephants; bones of the hippopotamus; horses' teeth; and horns of a species of stag; sometimes in a complete state of preservation.

OXHEY, a hamlet in the parish of WATFORD, hundred of CASHIO, or liberty of St. ALBAN'S, county of HERTFORD, containing 560 inhabitants. An earthen vessel, containing some Roman seals, was, a few years since, turned up here by the plough.

OXHILL, a parish in the Kington division of the hundred of KINGTON, county of WARWICK, 4 miles (S. S. W.) from Kington, containing 307 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, rated in the king's books at £14. 10., and in the patronage of the Rev. Devenport Bromley. The church is dedicated to St. Lawrence. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

OXNEAD, a parish in the southern division of the hundred of ERPINGHAM, county of NORFOLK, 4 miles (S. E.) from Aylsham, containing 53 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, united to that of Skeyton, and the vicarage of Buxton, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £9. 1. 5. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas.

OXNEY, formerly a parish, now annexed to that of St. Margaret at Cliffe, hundred of CORNILO, lathe of St. AUGUSTINE, county of KENT, 5½ miles (N. E.) from Dover, containing 11 inhabitants. The church has long been demolished.

OXSPRING, a township in the parish of PENISTONE, wapentake of STAINCROSS, West riding of the county of YORK, 2½ miles (E.) from Penistone, containing 247 inhabitants.

OXTED, a parish in the first division of the hundred of TANDRIDGE, county of SURREY, 2 miles (E. by N.) from Godstone, containing 777 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Surrey, and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £24. 6. 0½., and in the patronage of C. L. H. Master, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. A fair is held here on the 1st of May.

OXTON, a township in the parish of WOODCHURCH, lower division of the hundred of WIRRAL, county palatine of CHESTER, $7\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Great Neston, containing 169 inhabitants.

OXTON, a parish in the southern division of the wapentake of THURGARTON, county of NOTTINGHAM, 5 miles (W. by S.) from Southwell, containing 798 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Chapter of the Collegiate Church of Southwell, rated in the king's books at £6, endowed with £200 royal bounty. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Oxtun constitutes the endowment of two prebends, Prima et Secunda, in the Collegiate Church of Southwell. The small river Dove runs through the parish, which lies in the centre of the ancient Forest of Sherwood, though it is said never to have formed part of that district. In the village is a free school, founded by Mrs. Sherbrooke, and endowed with a rent-charge of £20, for teaching all the poor children of the parish. In 1789, a barrow was opened in the neighbourhood, and found to contain a curious urn of iron, a sword in a wooden scabbard, a dagger much corroded, and several glass beads.

OXTON, a township in that part of the parish of TADCASTER which is in the ainsty of the city, and East riding of the county, of YORK, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (E.) from Tadcaster, containing 66 inhabitants.

OXWICK, a parish in the hundred of LAUNDITCH, county of NORFOLK, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. by W.) from Fakenham, containing, with Pattesley, 79 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £6. 9. 2., and in the patronage of the Rev. Joseph Alderson. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

OZELWORTH, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of BERKELEY, county of GLOUCESTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by S.) from Wotton under Edge, containing 134 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £6. 10. 5., and in the patronage of Mrs. Fisher. The church, dedicated to St. Nicholas, has an octagonal central tower, rising from enriched Norman arches.

OZENDIKE, a township in that part of the parish of RYTH which is in the lower division of the wapentake of BARKSTONE-ASH, West riding of the county of YORK, 8 miles (N. W.) from Selby. The population is returned with the parish.

P.

PACKINGTON, a parish partly in the hundred of REPTON and GRESLEY, county of DERBY, but chiefly in the western division of the hundred of GOSCOTE, county of LEICESTER, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (S. by E.) from Ashby de la Zouch, containing, with the hamlet of Snibston, 702 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Leicester, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £5. 15. 10., and in the patronage of Sir Charles Abney Hastings, Bart. The church is dedicated to the Holy Rood.

PACKINGTON, a liberty in the parish of WEEFORD, southern division of the hundred of OFFLOW, county of STAFFORD, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Tamworth, containing 53 inhabitants.

PACKINGTON (GREAT), a parish in the Solihull division of the hundred of HEMLINGFORD, county of WARWICK, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E. by S.) from Coleshill, containing 351 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Coventry, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £7. 10. $2\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Earl of Aylesford. The church is dedicated to St. James.

PACKINGTON (LITTLE), a parish in the Solihull division of the hundred of HEMLINGFORD, county of WARWICK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Coleshill, containing 150 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Coventry, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £3, and in the patronage of the Earl of Aylesford. The church is dedicated to St. Bartholomew.

PACKWOOD, a parish in the Warwick division of the hundred of KINGTON, county of WARWICK, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Henley in Arden, containing 279 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Manorial Court of Packwood, endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Earl Cornwallis. The church is dedicated to St. Giles. The Stratford on Avon canal passes through the parish.

PADBURY, a parish in the hundred and county of BUCKINGHAM, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E. by S.) from Buckingham, containing 618 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., endowed with £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Padbury is situated on the river Ouse, over which is a substantial stone bridge, erected in 1742. In July 1643, a skirmish took place here between the king's troops under Sir Charles Lucas, and a detachment of the parliamentarians commanded by Colonel Middleton, in which the latter were defeated.

PADDINGTON, a parish in the Holborn division of the hundred of OSSULSTONE, county of MIDDLESEX, a suburb of the metropolis, containing 6476 inhabitants. The manor was given by King Edgar to the abbey of Westminster, and at the dissolution it was appropriated to the endowment of the then newly-founded bishoprick of Westminster, since the abolition of which, in the reign of Edward VI., it has belonged to the see of London. The hamlet consists principally of several modern streets and handsome detached houses: it is partially paved, and lighted with gas, under a local act; and the inhabitants are supplied with water from the West Middlesex water-works: the reservoir, originally constructed for the supply of Kensington palace, and now belonging to the Grand Junction water-works, is situated in this parish. It is within the jurisdiction of the magistrates acting for the metropolis, and under the superintendence of the New Police, established under Sir Robert Peel's act: debts under 40s. are recoverable at the county court held in Kingsgate-street, Holborn. A customary market is held on Friday, for poultry, butter, eggs, &c. The living is a perpetual curacy, or donative, in the jurisdiction of the Commissary of London, concurrently with the Consistorial

Court of the Bishop, and in the patronage of the Bishop of London. The church, which is dedicated to St. James, and was anciently a chapel of ease to St. Margaret's Westminster, was originally founded by Sir Joseph Sheldon, lessee of the manor, about the year 1700. The present edifice was begun in 1788, and consecrated April 27th, 1791: it stands on a piece of ground adjoining the old churchyard, and is a neat building, with a Doric portico on the south side, and a handsome cupola. In the church and adjacent cemetery lie the remains of John Bushnell, an eminent statuary, who died in 1701; Sir John Elliot, M.D., a popular writer, who became deranged in consequence of a disappointed attachment to a lady, whose life he attempted, by shooting at her in the public street, and shortly after destroyed himself, while in confinement, in 1787; Dr. Alexander Geddes, a very learned but eccentric Roman Catholic divine, interred in 1802; Thomas Banks, an ingenious sculptor; Lewis Schiavonetti, engraver; and John Henry Petty, late Marquis of Lansdowne. A handsome chapel of ease is now being erected, partly by means of a grant from the parliamentary commissioners, and partly by subscription. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyan Methodists. The Paddington canal, which communicates with all the principal canals in the kingdom, and on the banks of which are extensive wharfs and warehouses, was constructed in consequence of an act of parliament passed in 1795: it is joined by the Regent's canal, which unites it with the Thames at Limehouse. A National school, in which upwards of three hundred children are instructed, and fifty of them clothed, is supported by voluntary contributions: the school premises were built by subscription in 1822. There are some unendowed almshouses, built by Peps Cockerill, Esq., and others by the inhabitants, for the use of the aged poor, for whose relief funds amounting to about £250 per annum, arising from lands and tenements assigned for that purpose, are appropriated.

PADDLESWORTH, a joint parish with Snodland, in the hundred of LARKFIELD, lathe of AYLESFORD, county of KENT, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.W.) from Rochester. The population is returned with Snodland. The living is a rectory, united at an early period to that of Snodland, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Rochester, rated in the king's books at £8. 6. 8. The church has been destroyed, and the inhabitants have married, baptized, and buried at Snodland since the reign of Elizabeth.

PADDLESWORTH, a parish in the hundred of LONINGBOROUGH, lathe of SHEPWAY, county of KENT, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.W.) from Folkestone, containing 44 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, with that of Stamford, annexed to the vicarage of Lyminge, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The church, dedicated to St. Oswald, is in the early style of English architecture.

PADDOCKS, an extra-parochial district, in the wapentake of CORRINGTONHAM, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, containing 3 inhabitants.

PADFIELD, a township in the parish of GLOSSOP, hundred of HIGH PEAK, county of DERBY, $10\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Chapel en le Frith, containing 499 inhabitants.

PADIHAM, a chapelry in that part of the parish of WHALLEY which is in the higher division of the hundred of BLACKBURN, county palatine of LANCASTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Burnley, containing 3060 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, endowed with £400 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £900 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Le Gendre Pierce Starkie, Esq. The chapel, dedicated to St. Leonard, has lately received an addition of two hundred and twenty-nine free sittings, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £150 towards defraying the expense. There are places of worship for Wesleyan Methodists and Unitarians. The Leeds and Liverpool canal passes in the vicinity. Coal and stone abound here; and the cotton manufacture is carried on to a considerable extent. A fair is held on August 12th, chiefly for pedlary. A school was erected and endowed by subscription in 1698, in which from seventy to eighty children are instructed, each paying a trifling quarterage.

PADLEY (NETHER), a hamlet in the parish of HOPE, hundred of HIGH PEAK, county of DERBY, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.E. by N.) from Stony-Middleton, containing 36 inhabitants.

PADSIDE, a township in the parish of HAMPSHAW, lower division of the wapentake of CLARO, West riding of the county of YORK, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Ripley. The population is returned with the chapelry of Thornthwaite.

PADSTOW, a sea-port, market town, and parish, in the hundred of PYDER, county of CORNWALL, 14 miles (W. N. W.) from Bodmin, and 249 (W. S. W.) from London, containing, according to the last census, 1700 inhabitants, which number is estimated to have since increased to 2000. The town is of great antiquity, and was known, under the name of Lodenek at Heglemith, in the earliest annals of Cornish history. According to Borlase and others, the first religious house, called Laffenack, was established here in 432, by St. Patrick; about a century afterwards, he was succeeded by St. Petroc, and under the auspices of this popular saint a monastery was founded, in 513, which, having progressively increased in extent and holy reputation, was visited by Athelstan, on the occasion of his triumphant excursion into Cornwall, in 926. This sovereign conferred important privileges on both the monastery and the town, the latter of which he named after himself, Adelstow, or Aldestow. Whitaker has satisfactorily proved that at this time the localities of Bodmin presented little more than the solitary cell of St. Guron: the same authority, however, rejects the visit of St. Patrick in favour of his successor. In ancient records Patrickstowe and Petrocstowe are equally common; from the former of these Padestowe, or Padstow, is more naturally derived, and perhaps the continued influx of Irish at this port from the earliest times may have had some influence on the change of name. It was in the year 981, when the monastery was in the plenitude of its prosperity, that it was ravaged by Danish pirates, and burnt to the ground.

On this event it became necessary to find a situation less exposed for the new foundation, which was fixed at Bodmin, and the sacred ashes of St. Petroc were transferred to its sanctuary. It has been a subject of antiquarian dissertation, whether Padstow is described as Elhil or Lancuhoc in Domesday-book. In 1344, this place was one of the few ports in Devonshire and Cornwall that furnished ships for the siege of Calais. In 1645, the Prince, afterwards Charles II., was for some time resident here: the inhabitants were at that time zealous in their support of royalty; but about five years after, a singular change appears to have taken place in their political feelings. A vessel from Ireland, with troops and dispatches, having arrived, with the certainty of a favourable reception, was boarded by the townspeople, assisted by some parliamentary dragoons, and after a contest, in which many lives were lost, she was captured, and the troops made prisoners. As the only port on the coast for the exportation of large quantities of grain, Padstow was, in the last century, repeatedly exposed to the inroads of large parties of miners, from the districts in the west: they assembled to the number of upwards of one thousand men, armed with bludgeons. The high price of bread was the grievance complained of, and they generally returned home after having broken open the granaries, and distributed the corn. The interference of the military on these occasions was usually found necessary.

The town is beautifully situated on an æstuary, formed by the confluence of the river Camel and other subordinate streams, and opening into St. George's channel: it is embosomed in a richly cultivated vale, the eastern side of which opens on the harbour, a sheet of water which, being apparently enclosed by a bold range of hills, and singularly retaining its clear azure hue, presents the attractive beauties of lake scenery. The high land to the north and west of the town is occupied by the grounds of Place, an ancient seat of the Prideaux family. On the southern eminences and along the vale are the fine plantations of Saunders Hill, which command a varied and luxuriant prospect. In the immediate vicinity, however, nature assumes a severity and boldness of character seldom equalled: the cliffs of black granite on the coast, which are alike remarkable for their stupendous height and grotesque form, are frequently visited by the scientific traveller; they present curious specimens of geological strata peculiar to this part of the kingdom. The streets are roughly paved, but not lighted, and the town is plentifully supplied with water. The houses are all covered with the fine blue slate raised in the neighbourhood. Previously to the sixteenth century the harbour of Padstow was considered one of the finest on the western coast of England, but from the accumulation of sand, the driving of which was so violent as, in the course of one night, to cover several houses on the coast, it became of less importance: the trade was very considerable at the commencement of the present century, and it now carries on a large coasting trade, corn, malt, and other merchandise being sent to Liverpool, Bristol, London, Wales, and Ireland. The port was formerly noted for valuable importations of Russian produce, much of which was re-shipped to Bristol; and the exportation of pilchards; but the little foreign trade which it at present enjoys is chiefly with Norway and America.

The number of vessels that entered inwards from foreign ports in 1826, was five British and five foreign, and the number that cleared outwards, eighteen British and five foreign. In 1826 seven vessels were built and registered; and the number which belonged to the port in March, 1828, was three of more than one hundred tons' burthen, and sixty-nine of smaller size. One hundred and seventy-five vessels have been wrecked and stranded, and upwards of two hundred lives lost, in the last thirty-three years, within the limits of the port. Several important works have been constructed, for the assistance of ships entering the harbour, by a benevolent association, established in November 1829, which having been liberally supported by gentlemen of influence in the county, has already been attended with the most beneficial results. A life boat is attached to the apparatus. The Trinity House has recently brought the port under the regulation of branch pilots. Several persons are employed in ship-building, and sail and rope making. The market is held on Saturday, by prescription, for meat and provisions; but the fairs, on April 18th and September 31st, which were formerly well supplied with cattle and staple produce, are no longer continued.

In the 25th of Elizabeth the town was incorporated by royal charter, under the title of the "Mayor and Burgesses of the Borough of Padstow," when the executive government was vested in the mayor, steward, five aldermen, and two serjeants at mace, annually elected by the burgesses; a market was established on Friday, of which the mayor was constituted clerk; and two fairs were granted. The corporation were empowered to hold a weekly court, for the recovery of debts to the amount of £40: the charter likewise contained a clause reserving to the lord of the manor several important rights and privileges. About the middle of the seventeenth century, the municipal rights having been allowed to lapse by desuetude, the town was placed under the jurisdiction of the county magistrates, one of whom, Thomas Rawlings, Esq., was for a long period resident, but on his decease the magisterial business was transferred to the petty sessions at St. Columb. A portreeve, who formerly had the control of the harbour, and other officers, are still chosen at the manorial court leet, but their duties are little more than nominal.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Bishop of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £11. 3. 4., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and in the patronage of the Rev. C. Prideaux Brune. The church is a spacious light structure, in the decorated and later styles of English architecture, built at different periods, the earliest in the fourteenth century: the richly-sculptured font and curious piscina have attracted much attention. A commodious place of worship has been recently built for the Wesleyan Methodists. A National school for children of both sexes was established in 1819; the school-room was erected by the contributions of the resident gentry, assisted by the National Society. In 1640, £200 was laid out in land for the benefit of the poor, and vested in trustees by enfeoffment, called "Stock Money;" £10 per annum for a free school for ten boys, and £5 per annum from the Rev. St. John Eliot, are also similarly secured. The learned Dr. Humphrey Prideaux, Dean of Norwich, was born here in 1648.

With some slight exceptions, the remains of nine religious edifices in the town and its immediate vicinity have entirely disappeared. The old provincial festivities of Christmas and May-day are attended with many singular customs, traditionally connected with the early history of the place.

PADWORTH, a parish in the hundred of THEALE, county of BERKS, 9 miles (S. W. by W.) from Reading, containing 271 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Berks, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £6. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, is an ancient structure with a semi-circular chancel, the roof of which is supported by a well-proportioned Norman arch. The Kennet and Avon canal, and the old Roman vallum, or earthwork, called Grime's Dyke, pass through the parish. Elizabeth Brightwell, in 1750, gave £200 South Sea Annuities, for teaching poor children of both sexes.

PAGHAM, a parish in the hundred of ALDWICK, rape of CHICHESTER, county of SUSSEX, 6 miles (S. S. E.) from Chichester, containing 1009 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £9. 18. 9. The church, dedicated to St. Thomas à Becket, is in the early style of English architecture. The parish is bounded on the south by the English channel.

PAGLESHAM, a parish in the hundred of ROCHFORD, county of ESSEX, 4 miles (N. E. by E.) from Rochford, containing 396 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Essex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £26, and in the patronage of the Bishop of London. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. This parish includes the western part of Wallisea island: on the north runs the navigable river Crouch, and on the south the Bromhill river.

PAINGTON, a parish in the hundred of HAYTOR, county of DEVON, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E.) from Totness, containing 1796 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, to which the perpetual curacy of Marldon is annexed, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Bishop of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £52. 1. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Rev. John Templar. The church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, has an enriched Norman door, the upper part of the tower and the transept being in the later English style; there are also a screen of elegant tabernacle-work, and a stone pulpit, richly ornamented with foliage. There is a place of worship for Independents. Paington was anciently held in demesne by the Bishops of Exeter, who had here a palace, of which some fragments still remain. It is situated on Torbay, at its western extremity, and carries on a considerable trade in cider, for shipping which and discharging coal, &c., vessels come close up to the village. A small fair is held on Whit-Tuesday. John Kellond, in 1692, gave £100 for teaching, and Charles Kellond, in 1690, £50 for apprenticing, poor children. In 1800, Allan Balfield bequeathed £1000 three per cents. for the education of twenty poor children.

PAINSFORD, a chapelry in the parish of ASHFRINGTON, hundred of COLERIDGE, county of DEVON. The chapel, which was dedicated to St. David, is in ruins. Here is a mineral spring, the water of which is occasionally used for medicinal purposes.

PAINSHAW, a chapelry in the parish of HOUGHTON le SPRING, northern division of EASINGTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, 3 miles (N. by E.) from Houghton le Spring, containing 2090 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Durham, endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Rector of Houghton. The chapel was built in 1746. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Freestone, limestone, and firestone abound here, a considerable quantity of the latter being exported. At Low Lambton, within the township, are some coal-staiths.

PAINSWICK, a market town and parish, in the hundred of BISLEY, county of GLOUCESTER, 7 miles (S. S. E.) from Gloucester, and 100 (W. by N.) from London, comprising the tythings of Edge, Shepscomb, Spoonbed, and Stroudend, and containing 4044 inhabitants. The manor is noticed in Domesday-book under the name of Wiche, among the possessions of Roger de Lacy; its prefix is derived from one of its subsequent proprietors, Pain Fitz-John. The town is situated on the declivity of Spoonbed hill, at the foot of which runs a branch of the Stroud river, and the turnpike roads from Stroud to Gloucester, and from Cheltenham to Bath, pass through it. The streets are neither lighted nor paved; the inhabitants are supplied with water from wells. The manufacture of cloth is extensively carried on in the town and neighbourhood, although, by comparison with its former state, it may be considered on the decline: there are quarries of freestone and weather-stone in the vicinity. The market is on Tuesday, but it is very inconsiderable; there is a large market for sheep on the first Tuesday after All Saints' day (O. S.). Fairs are held, principally for cattle and sheep, on Whit-Tuesday and September 19th. A court leet for the manor is held annually, at which constables and tythingmen are chosen. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £14. 15. 2 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of J. Gardener, Esq., and others, as trustees for the inhabitants who pay poor rates. The church, which is dedicated to St. Mary, is a spacious edifice, with a very lofty spire, and a fine ring of twelve bells: it was erected at different periods, and is somewhat remarkable for the incongruous combination of the Grecian and English styles of architecture: the entrance is under a portico of the Ionic order; Doric columns appear in another part of the building, and, under the battlements on the north side, the spouts represent singularly grotesque heads of demons. In the chancel are monuments of the Jerningham family, to which the manor belonged in the reign of Elizabeth; and there is a handsome altar-piece, erected in 1743. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. A free school was founded, in 1707, for the education of ten boys, by Giles Smith, who bequeathed £200 for this purpose; and £200 more having been raised by voluntary contributions, lands were purchased, now producing about £30 per annum, for which twenty-six boys are educated: other benefactions have since been made, the most considerable of which is the sum of £500, the bequest of John Hillman, in 1808. A benevolent school was established here in 1809, and there is a National school, both supported by subscription. On the summit of Spoonbed hill is an ancient camp, with a double intrenchment, called Kimsbury Castle, King's barrow, or Castle Godwin: it comprehends a space of about three acres, is nearly quadrangular, and is supposed to have been a British fortress, afterwards occupied by the Romans, as many Roman coins, with a sword, and spear-heads greatly corroded, have been found at different periods. In the reign of Edward the Confessor, this camp was occupied by Earl Godwin, who headed an insurrection against the king, in 1052. During the siege of Gloucester by Charles I., his forces encamped on this hill, and it is related, that after raising the siege, the king being seated on a stone near the camp, with his two elder sons, one of them asked him when they should return home, "Alas! my Son," replied the unfortunate monarch, "I have no home to go to." During the insurrections in the west and other parts of the kingdom, in the reign of Edward VI., Sir Anthony Kingston, then Knight Marshall, being lord of the manor of Painswick, caused a gallows to be erected on Shepscombe Green, in this parish, for the execution of insurgents, and gave three plots of land in his lordship, since called Gallows' lands, for the purpose of keeping in readiness a gallows, two ladders, and halters; he likewise appointed the tythingman of Shepscombe to the office of executioner, with an acre of land in the tything, as a reward for his services; a field at Shepscombe, held by the tythingman for the time being, is still known by the appellation of Hangman's Acre.

PAITTON, a hamlet in the parish of MONKS' KIRBY, Kirby division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, county of WARWICK, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Rugby, containing 552 inhabitants.

PAKEFIELD, a parish in the hundred of MUTFORD and LOTHINGLAND, county of SUFFOLK, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Lowestoft, containing 349 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in mediety, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, both rated in the king's books at £14, and in the patronage of the Earl of Gosford. The church is dedicated to All Saints. Pakefield is a small fishing-village, lying on the coast of the North sea. The Rev. Francis Cunningham, rector, supports schools for the education of children.

PAKENHAM, a parish in the hundred of THEDWESTRY, county of SUFFOLK, 5 miles (E. N. E.) from Bury St. Edmund's, containing 928 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Sudbury, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £10. 3. 9., and in the patronage of Lord Calthorpe. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

PALGRAVE, a hamlet in the parish of SPORLE, southern division of the hundred of GREENHOE, county of NORFOLK, 4 miles (N. N. E.) from Swaffham. The population is returned with the parish. Here was formerly a chapel, which has been demolished.

PALGRAVE, a parish in the hundred of HARTIS-MERE, county of SUFFOLK, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (S.) from Diss, containing 654 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, annexed to the vicarage of Sporle, in the archdeaconry of Sudbury, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £19. 11. 3. The church, which was dedicated to St. Peter, has been destroyed. There is a place of worship for Unitarians.

PALLING, a parish in the hundred of HAPPING, county of NORFOLK, $11\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from North Walsham, containing 300 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, annexed to the rectory of Waxham, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £2. 6. 8., and endowed with £800 royal bounty. The church is dedicated to St. Margaret.

PAMBER, a parish in the hundred of BARTON-STACEY, Andover division, though locally in that of Basingstoke, Basingstoke division, of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Basingstoke, containing 409 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester, and in the patronage of the Provost and Fellows of Queen's College, Oxford.

PAMINGTON, a tything in the parish of ASHCURCH, hundred of TEWKESBURY, county of GLOUCESTER, 3 miles (E.) from Tewkesbury, containing 126 inhabitants.

PAMPISFORD, a parish in the hundred of CHILFORD, county of CAMBRIDGE, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Linton, containing 285 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Ely, rated in the king's books at £8, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Trustees of J. Mortlock, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, is principally in the Norman style of architecture.

PANBOROUGH, a hamlet in the parish of WEDMORE, hundred of BEMPSTONE, though locally in the hundred of Glaston-Twelve-Hides, county of SOMERSET, 5 miles (W.) from Wells. The population is returned with the parish.

PANCRAS (ST.), a parish in the Holborn division of the hundred of OSSULSTONE, county of MIDDLESEX, a suburb to London, containing 71,838 inhabitants. This parish exhibits, in an extraordinary degree, the vast increase which within the last half century, and particularly within the last ten years, has taken place in the numerous districts bordering upon the metropolis. In the year 1765, it was a remote and isolated spot, consisting of a few scattered dwellings, and containing only sixty inhabitants, and its ancient church, of diminutive size, suited to the smallness of the population, formed a romantic feature in the landscape. Since that period, large tracts of meadow land have been covered with buildings, and it is now one of the most extensive and populous parishes in the vicinity of London; Kentish-Town, Camden-Town, Somers-Town, and Battle-Bridge, each a thickly-inhabited district, forming only chapelries and hamlets within its limits. Among the principal additions are, the numerous spacious and regularly formed streets, leading from the north side of Holborn to the New-road, intersected by various handsome streets from Gray's-Inn-lane, and Regent, Mecklenburgh, Brunswick, Tavistock, Gordon, and Fitzroy squares, handsome ranges of modern houses, the areas of which are tastefully laid out; the numerous continuous lines of respectable buildings on both sides of the New-road, extending from Battle-Bridge to Albany-street; Cumberland market, an extensive quadrangular area, surrounded with neat brick houses, of which the centre will be appropriated to the hay market now about to be removed from St. James'; Clarence market, the continuation of Tottenham Court-road to Primrose-hill, Chalk-farm, and Haverstoke-hill, on the Hampstead road, comprising Mornington-crescent, and numerous handsome villas and pleasant cottages; and the eastern ranges of building in the Regent's Park, including part of the Zoological gardens. The streets are well paved, and lighted with gas, and the inhabitants are supplied with water by the West Middlesex and New River companies, the latter of which has a large reservoir in the Hampstead-road. Of the principal buildings on the south side of the New-road, the London University is the most conspicuous: it occupies an area of seven acres at the upper end of Gower-street, and was founded in 1827, for the purpose of affording to the youth of the metropolis, and to such as might object to the religious conformity required at the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, a liberal course of instruction, calculated to qualify them for professional pursuits. The institution is governed by a council of twenty-four, who appoint a warden, and the several professors in the various departments of literature, to whom a regular stipend is paid till the fees of the students form an income sufficient for their remuneration. According to the statutes, the funds of the institution are not to be less than £150,000, nor more than £300,000, advanced on shares of £100 each, every proprietor receiving a dividend of £4 per cent., and having the privilege of appointing one pupil. The course of studies comprehends the ancient, modern, and oriental languages and literature, the mathematics, natural, moral, and experimental philosophy, mechanics, astronomy, ancient and modern history, logic, political economy, botany, chemistry, medicine, and surgery. The buildings, of which the first stone was laid by the Duke of Sussex, in 1827, are not yet completed: the principal range has, in the centre, a lofty portico of ten Corinthian pillars, supporting a cornice and triangular pediment, surmounted by a handsome elliptical dome, and on each side a noble façade of the Doric order: it contains the lecture-rooms, libraries, the museum, and offices for the present use of the professors and students, projecting behind which are the different theatres, laboratory, &c.: the entire plan is intended to include two projecting wings in front also, of corresponding character with the central range, having in the centre of each a tetrastyle portico of the Corinthian order, surmounted by a pediment and dome, facing the interior of the quadrangle, and having the end fronts decorated with four Doric pilasters, supporting a cornice and triangular pediment.

The Colosseum, in the Regent's Park, erected in 1824, for the exhibition of the grand panoramic view of London, and of the environs for ten miles round, taken by Mr. Horner, from the cross of St. Paul's Cathedral, is a structure very much resembling the Pantheon at Rome, a stately polygonal building of stone, four hundred feet in circumference, with a massive and boldly projecting portico of six columns, of the Grecian Doric style, supporting a cornice and triangular pediment; from the main building rises a spacious and well-proportioned dome, crowned with a parapet, forming a circular gallery, from which an extensive and pleasing view of the surrounding country is obtained. A flight of steps leading from the entrance affords a descent to the saloon on the right hand, a circular apartment, fitted up as a tent, with festooned and flowing draperies, and containing a beautiful assemblage of statuary, sculptures, alto-relievos, bronzes, verds antique, and numerous specimens of beautiful design and exquisite art: in this interesting collection of marbles are full-length statues and busts of the principal public characters, the muses, personifications of the passions and virtues, and some composition pieces of striking beauty, several subjects from the pagan mythology, a fine sculpture in marble of Christ on the Cross, in alto-relievo, by Sievier, various models of buildings, and many objects of interest and attraction; among which is preserved the only perfect copy of the only three in Europe of the sacred code of the Burmese laws, from the collection of Lieut. Brand, R.N., taken from a niche in a pagoda by the brother of that gentleman, at the storming of Syriam, in 1825, only a few minutes before the destruction of the fort. In the central part of the saloon, exclusively of a spiral staircase on the outside, is a circular enclosure, containing a coved chamber, capable of holding twenty persons, which by machinery is raised to the platform of the gallery from which the panorama is viewed. The view of London is arranged in the interior of the dome, well lighted by a circular sky-light, which surrounds the upper section, and by which also the interior of the building is lighted: the view, extending over so wide a field, embraces an almost inconceivable multitude of objects, represented with complete effect, and with the utmost accuracy and precision, and which, from the truth of their relative proportions, the accuracy of the linear and aerial perspective, and the just distribution of light and shade, are powerfully delusive in their effect upon the sight; and those in the distance, which are almost undistinguishable by the eye, are, with the aid of the prospect-glass, brought into view in all the fulness of minute and faithful detail. The conservatories, abounding with choice specimens of exotic plants, and ornamented with jets d'eau, fountains, and grotto-work, afford a delightful promenade; and the Swiss cottage, containing several apartments, with windows in recesses, affording miniature views of the beautiful and romantic scenery peculiar to that country, are objects of high interest; a veranda surrounds the front of the building, which appears to be on an island in a lake, in which fish of various kinds are seen gliding in every direction, and numerous waterfowls sailing along the surface, or seated on the points of rock which rise above it; the distant view is a mass of rugged rocks, in the fissures of which are various waterfalls, and on the higher crags, which are interspersed with trees and mountain plants, are seen the eagle and other birds of prey. The whole of the apartments, promenades, galleries, and conservatories, are warmed to the temperature of summer, by hot water, conveyed in tubes by means of an excellent apparatus. The exterior of the building forms a grand and interesting object in the scenery of the Regent's Park, from many parts of which it is seen with beautiful effect, and the noble dome appears with striking grandeur from many of the higher grounds in various parts of the town.

Beyond the Colosseum, on that side of the Regent's Park which is in this parish are Cambridge-place, a range of plain substantial houses, undistinguished by any architectural features; Chester-terrace, an elegant pile of buildings, consisting of a centre decorated with a range of eight Corinthian pillars supporting an entablature and cornice, with similar arrangements of four columns at each extremity, and two handsome wings projecting at right angles, and connected by lofty arched portals with the main building; Cumberland-terrace, consisting of a centre and two continuous wings of the Ionic order, connected by arched portals; the tympana of the central pediment and of those in each wing being enriched with alto relievos, and surmounted on the apex and at each end with finely-sculptured statues; and Gloucester-terrace, a handsome range of building, having in the centre six Ionic pillars supporting a cornice surmounted by an open balustrade, and a similar arrangement of four pillars at each end.

At the north-western extremity of the park, are the gardens of the Zoological Society, recently laid out in walks and shrubberies, and divided into compartments, in which various buildings have been erected, for the reception and classification of animals of every description, from every part of the globe, of which there is a beautiful and extensive collection, consisting of more than six hundred species of mammalia, including feræ and pecora, four hundred birds, one thousand reptiles, one thousand testacea and crustacea, and thirty thousand insects, classed according to their respective genera, and secured within enclosures accommodated to their several habits, and well adapted to their complete exhibition. The entrance to the south garden is through a rustic lodge, leading to a broad terrace, at the extremity of which, on the right hand, is the bear pit, containing six varieties of that animal, with a rugged pole in the centre, on which they climb for exercise. Below the terrace, on the north side, is an enclosed lawn, with a piece of water for aquatic birds, among which are, the cormorant, the sea-pheasant, the gull, several black swans, and other varieties of water-fowl: nearly opposite is an aviary, in which are the Balearic, or crowned, the Numidian, or Denoiselle, and the African, or gigantic, crane; white and black storks; the tiger bittern; two white spoon-bills; and several varieties of the curassow, and the heron: to the west is an enclosure, in which are two pair of white pelicans. At the foot of the terrace is an octagonal cage, containing beautiful specimens of the red and yellow, blue and yellow, and red and blue, maccaw, and of the sulphur-crested cockatoo; and opposite to this is the lama-house and paddock, in which are several red and black specimens of that beautiful animal: in the roof of this building is a collection of pigeons. To the south, is a court-yard, in which are mastiffs from Cuba, wolf-dogs from Italy and Hungary; in a shed is a fine dromedary; in others are several varieties of deer; and in a den, a large sloth bear. On one side is a building, containing dens for feline quadrupeds, among which are, an African lion, a lioness, tigers, panthers, leopards, a jaguar, a puma, and chittahs, or hunting leopards; and on the opposite side, a range of building, in which are, American fallow deer, a gnu, zebras, two American tapirs, antelopes, nyghaus, two gazelles, a nine-banded armadillo, and some of the more delicate birds, among which is the scarlet ibis. In the adjoining grounds are aviaries, containing elegant varieties of the hybrid, gold, silver, and ring-necked Chinese pheasants; and near them is an enclosure with a pond, for the white, or polar bear. In this part of the gardens are aviaries for eagles, vultures, falcons, kites, and other birds of prey, with a variety of owls of every species; and enclosures for seals, otters, beavers, and land tortoises. To the north of these is a house for monkeys and baboons, of which there is an extensive variety from every part of the world. In the western division of the cattle sheds are two zebras, the zebu, the Brahmin bull, the bison, or American buffalo, and several other buffaloes. An archway, ornamented on the south side of the entrance, with a greyhound and a buffalo, well sculptured in stone, and surmounted by a balustrade, behind which is a handsome range of four Doric pillars, supporting a triangular pediment, leads under the road surrounding the park, from the south into the north garden, which has more recently been added, and is similarly laid out; and in which are various ranges of building, the principal of them containing several striped and spotted hyænas, leopards, a jaguar, several ocelots, civet cats, racoons, jackalls, coati mondi, agoutis, a harpy eagle, eagles from Africa and Chili, vultures, condors, and other birds. Adjoining this building is a kennel, in which are several dogs from different countries, and an Esquimaux dog of great beauty, brought over by Capt. Sir Edward Parry; and to the west of it are a shed and paddock, in which are four specimens of the ostrich, of remarkably fine growth. Nearly adjoining is the kangaroo hut, beyond which is a large building, not yet completed, for the reception of the Wapiti deer, from North America, given by the king, who has also presented to the society the collection of birds and beasts of his late Majesty, George IV. At the farthest extremity of the garden are some sties, in which are a wild boar, and several species of the peccary. The cavalry barracks in Albany-road are neatly built of brick, and occupy an area of eight acres and a half: the buildings comprise accommodation for four hundred men, with stabling for their horses, a riding-school, infirmary, magazine, and requisite offices for the establishment, and include an extensive ground for exercise. The city light-horse barracks, in Gray's-Inn-lane, are a neat range of substantial brick building, with a gateway entrance ornamented with sculpture. King's Cross, at Battle-Bridge, is a handsome pile of freestone building, having a square basement, and at each angle a projecting group of two Doric pillars, designed to support pedestals, on which it is intended to erect the statues of George I., II., III., and IV.; above this stage are to be four illuminated dials surmounted by a pedestal, on which is to be placed a statue of his present Majesty, King William IV. The Tottenham-street theatre is a plain building: the interior comprises a pit, two tiers of boxes, and a gallery, and is well arranged for the reception of about eight hundred persons: performances take place regularly during the season. The Panarmonion is a handsome small theatre, opened by Signior Lanza as a dramatic school: the exterior consists of a plain and neat façade, with a niche over the entrance, containing a statue; the interior is elegantly decorated and conveniently arranged. The bazaar, in Liverpool-street, to which the principal entrance is from Gray's-Inn-lane, is a handsome quadrangular building of stone, originally intended solely as a repository for horses, but lately adapted also to the purposes of a general bazaar; around the quadrangle are stabling and boxes for horses, above which are extensive galleries for carriages; the public room, of large dimensions, is appropriated to the sale of trinkets, millinery, perfumery, toys, and other similar wares. Bagnigge wells, noted for its chalybeate water, and still a place of resort as a tea-garden, St. Chadd's wells, and Pancras wells, are in this parish. Brookes' menagerie, in the New-road, has long been celebrated for an extensive collection of foreign birds, constantly on sale. Croggon's manufactory and shew-rooms of artificial stone, which, by a process of fire, is rendered proof against the injuries of the atmosphere, contains an elegant assortment of fonts, shrines, and statuary, with many beautiful devices in bas and alto relievo, Scagliola marbles, and busts. On the line of the New-road are numerous statuary and masons, and shew-rooms for ornamental marble chimney-pieces; there are also several organ-builders and piano-forte manufacturers, but there is no particular branch of trade peculiar to the parish: the Regent's canal passes through it, and there are several wharfs in various parts. In addition to the newly-formed Cumberland market, which is intended for hay, there is an extensive general market for butchers' meat and provisions, in a part of Somers-Town, called the Brill. The parish is within the jurisdiction of the stipendiary magistrates of the metropolis, and within the limits of the new police act: the jurisdiction of the county court, in Kingsgate-street, Holborn, for the recovery of debts under 40s., also extends to this parish.

The living is a vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's, rated in the king's books at £9. 5. The old parish church, now a chapel of ease, has undergone so many alterations and repairs, that it retains few vestiges of its original character: it is of great antiquity, and the churchyard has been long the burial-place of Roman Catholics; of many eminent foreigners, among whom were the Archbishop of Narbonne, and seven bishops expelled from France; General Paoli; several of the French marshals; the Chevalier D'Eon; and of the following distinguished persons; viz., Mary Wollstonecroft Godwin: John Walker, author of a treatise on Elocution, and compiler of the Pronouncing Dictionary; Tiberius Cavallo, a philosophical writer; Woollet, an eminent engraver; Webbe, the glee composer; Dr. J. E. Grabe, a learned divine; and Jeremiah Collier, a celebrated nonconformist preacher. The new parochial church in Euston-square is a splendid structure, begun in May 1819, and consecrated May 7th, 1822, having been built and furnished at an expense of upwards of £76,600: it is after the model of the temple of Erectheus at Athens, with a lofty tower of three stages, resembling the Temple of the Winds; at the west entrance is a stately portico of six fluted Ionic columns, supporting an entablature and cornice, surmounted by a triangular pediment; at the east end are two projecting wings forming the vestry and registry, the roofs of which, on the facia, are supported on caryatides: the interior is chastely decorated, and the altar-piece is ornamented with six verd antique columns of Scagliola marble. A new church, in Regent-square, was erected by grant of the parliamentary commissioners in 1824, at an expense of £16,025. 10. 2., and contains one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two sittings, of which seven hundred and seventy-four are free: it is a handsome edifice, in the Grecian style of architecture, with a portico of the Ionic order, and an octagonal tower of two stages. The living is a district incumbency, in the patronage of the Vicar. Churches have been built also at Camden-Town and Somers-Town, by parliamentary grant, and a chapel by subscription at Kentish-Town, in this parish, which are severally described in the account of those places. Fitzroy proprietary episcopal chapel is a neat building of brick. A chapel to the church of St. James', Piccadilly, with an extensive cemetery in Hampstead-road; the chapel and cemetery belonging to St. Giles' in the Fields; the burial-grounds of St. Andrew's, Holborn, St. George's, Bloomsbury, St. George's the Martyr, and St. Martin's in the Fields, are in this parish. There are places of worship for Baptists, Huntingdonians, Independents, and Calvinistic, Wesleyan, and other Methodists, a Scottish church, and a Roman Catholic chapel. Of these the Scotch church in Regent-square is an elegant structure in the later style of English architecture, with two lofty towers at the western entrance. The St. Pancras female charity school, in Hampstead-road, is supported by funds arising from donations, and by annual subscriptions: the premises are neatly built of brick, and accommodated to the reception of sixty-five girls, who are maintained, clothed, and instructed till fourteen years of age, when they are placed out to service. A National school, in which are more than four hundred children, is supported by subscription; and there is a school in connexion with the Roman Catholic chapel, for the maintenance, clothing, and instruction of Catholic children.

The Foundling hospital, situated on the north side of Guildford-street, between Brunswick and Mecklenburgh squares, was founded by charter of George II. in 1739, "for the maintenance and instruction of deserted infants, who are put under the care of nurses in the country till of a proper age to receive instruction: there are generally about four hundred children in the institution, who, after having received a suitable education, are placed out apprentices, or put to service, and, at the discretion of the committee, are supplied with money, clothes, or other necessaries, to the amount of £10 each. The income is about £14,000 per annum, arising from funded property, the produce of sums given for admission to the chapel, the children's work, and subscriptions. The premises consist of a spacious and elegant chapel, which occupies the centre, and two wings for the dormitories, schools, offices, and apartments for the conductors of the establishment. The chapel is decorated with a fine altar-piece, painted by West, and the organ was presented by Handel, who devoted to the use of the charity the profits arising from the performance of his oratorio of the Messiah. The Welch charity school, in Gray's-Inn-lane, was established in 1714, for the maintenance, clothing, and education of children, born of Welch parents resident in or near London. The premises, occupying three sides of a quadrangle, are handsomely built of brick, and contain school-rooms and dormitories for the children, and apartments for the master and mistress: in this institution are several interesting manuscripts illustrative of the history of the ancient Britons. St. Katherine's hospital was originally founded by Matilda, wife of Stephen, in 1148, and the endowment was augmented by Eleanor, queen dowager of Henry III., for a master, three clerical brethren, three sisters, ten bedeswomen, and six poor clerks: the institution was subsequently patronised by succeeding queens of England, and takes its name from Katherine, consort of Henry VIII. On the construction of St. Katherine's docks, near the Tower, the old buildings were taken down, in 1826, and the establishment removed to the Regent's Park, where the present buildings were erected. The premises, handsomely built of white brick, comprise two ranges, consisting of three separate houses, in the Elizabethan style, with an oriel window at the end front, for the residence of the brethren and sisters, between which is the chapel, an elegant structure in the later style of English architecture, with two angular turrets at the west end, crowned with bold pinnacles; the west front is ornamented with sculptures, and the entrance doorway and window above it are of elegant design; the windows of the chapel are of lofty dimensions and enriched with tracery, and the large east window is embellished with painted glass: adjoining the chapel is the school, in which twenty-five boys and twelve girls are instructed and clothed from the funds of the establishment. Opposite to the hospital, in the area of the park, is the elegant villa of Sir Herbert Taylor, who is master of the hospital. The small-pox hospital at Battle-Bridge was instituted by subscription, in 1746, and the present building erected in 1767; it consists of a centre and two wings, handsomely built of brick, and surmounted by a central cupola and dome: since the introduction of vaccination, the practice of inoculation has been abandoned, and not less than one hundred thousand patients have been vaccinated in this institution. Near the building is a fever hospital, of later erection, for the reception of patients afflicted with typhus and scarlet fever, and other contagious diseases.

PANCRASSWEEK, a parish in the hundred of BLACK TORRINGTON, county of DEVON, 4 miles (W. N. W.) from Holsworthy, containing 529 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, with the vicarage of Bradworthy, in the archdeaconry of Totness, and diocese of Exeter, endowed with £400 royal bounty. The church is dedicated to St. Pancras. The river Tamar, and the Bude and Launceston canal, pass through the parish. At Lana is the site of an ancient chapel.

PANFIELD, a parish in the hundred of HINCKFORD, county of ESSEX, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Braintree, containing 263 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Middlesex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £10. 10. The Rev. R. L. Page was patron in 1809. The church is dedicated to St. Mary and St. Christopher. Panfield hall, built in 1546, is a curious specimen of the domestic architecture of that period. An Alien priory of Benedictine monks, subordinate to the abbey of St. Stephen, at Caen in Normandy, was founded here in the reign of William the Conqueror; but in that of Henry V. it became parcel of the possessions of the prior and convent of Canterbury, and at the dissolution was granted to Sir Giles Capel.

PANGBOURN, a parish in the hundred of READING, county of BERKS, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Reading, containing 703 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Berks, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £10, and in the patronage of J. S. Breedon, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. James. There is a place of worship for Independents. A fine trout stream, called the Pang, runs through the parish, and flows into the Thames, which separates this from the parish of Whitchurch in Oxfordshire. A school for twelve boys was founded in 1685, by John Breedon, Esq., who endowed it with a rent-charge of £40, payable by the lord of the manor; the master's salary is £25 a year, and the remainder is applied in apprenticing the boys. Mrs. Dibble, in 1800, bequeathed £100 three per cents. towards repairing the school premises.

PANNALL, a parish in the lower division of the wapentake of CLARO, West riding of the county of YORK, 7 miles (W. N. W.) from Wetherby, containing, with a part of the township of Swindon, 1314 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Court of the Honour of Knaresborough, rated in the king's books at £5. 5., endowed with £323 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty. The Rev. R. B. Hunter was patron in 1816. The church is dedicated to St. Robert of Knaresborough. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Five poor children are educated for a trifling annuity, the gift of Richard Wright, in 1813.

PANTEAGUE, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of Usk, county of MONMOUTH, 4 miles (W. S. W.) from Usk, containing 1478 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaff, rated in the king's books at £7. 10. $2\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of Capel Hanbury Leigh, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

PANTON, a parish in the eastern division of the wapentake of WRAGGOE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. by N.) from Wragby, containing 83 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £12. Edmund Turnor, Esq. was patron in 1825. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew.

PANXWORTH, a parish in the hundred of WALSHAM, county of NORFOLK, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Acle. The population is returned with Ranworth. The living is a discharged rectory, with the vicarage of Woodbastwick annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich.

PAPCASTLE, a joint township with Goat, in the parish of BRIDEKIRK, ALLERDALE ward below Darwent, county of CUMBERLAND, 1 mile (N. W.) from Cockermouth, containing 384 inhabitants. It is finely situated on an eminence above the river Darwent, and occupies the site of a Roman castrum, where a great number of urns and coins, remains of baths, &c., have been discovered. After the Conquest, the castle becoming the property of Waldeof, Lord of Allerdale, he caused it to be demolished, and the materials to be used in the erection of Cockermouth castle, the seat of his descendants.

PAPERHAUGH, a township in the parish of ROTHBURY, western division of COQUETDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Rothbury, containing 80 inhabitants. The river Coquet runs through the township, parallel to which a fine road has been recently made from Rothbury to Weldon, at the expense of about £1400.

PAPPLEWICK, a parish in the northern division of the wapentake of BROXTOW, county of NOTTINGHAM, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Nottingham, containing, with Newstead Priory, 767 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Nottingham, and diocese of York, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Fontayne Wilson, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. James, was rebuilt in 1797, in the later style of English architecture. Here are extensive cotton-mills, affording employment to a great number of persons. In the side of a hill in the neighbourhood is a curious ancient excavation, with passages and doorways, traditionally called Robin Hood's Stable.

PAPWORTH (ST. AGNES), a parish partly in the hundred of TOSELAND, county of HUNTINGDON, but chiefly in the hundred of PAPWORTH, county of CAMBRIDGE, 5 miles (N. N. W.) from Caxton, containing 74 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Ely, rated in the king's books at £9. 16. 3., and in the patronage of Henry Piper Sperling, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, is in Cambridgeshire. From the extensive ruins scattered throughout the parish, Papworth appears to have been formerly a place of considerable importance, and the remains of the old manor-house, now a farm-house, still exhibit vestiges of decayed magnificence. There is a saline chalybeate spring in the parish, which at one time was in great repute.

PAPWORTH (ST. EVERARD), a parish in the hundred of PAPWORTH, county of CAMBRIDGE, 4 miles (N. N. W.) from Caxton, containing 117 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Ely, rated in the king's books at £9. 15. 10., and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Trinity College, Cambridge. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

PARACOMBE, a parish in the hundred of SHERWILL, county of DEVON, 11 miles (E. by S.) from Ilfracombe, containing 364 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Barnstable, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £13. 10. 10., and in the patronage of L. St. Albyn, Esq. There are vestiges of an ancient fortification in the neighbourhood.

PARBOLD, a township in the parish of ECCLESTON, hundred of LEYLAND, county palatine of LANCASTER, 5 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W.) from Wigan, containing 339 inhabitants.

PARDSEY, a joint township with Ullock and Dean-Scales, in the parish of DEAN, ALLERDALE ward above Darwent, county of CUMBERLAND, 4 miles (S. S. W.) from Cockermouth. The population is returned with Ullock.

PARHAM, a parish in the hundred of PLOMESGATE, county of SUFFOLK, 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Wickham-Market, containing 448 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, consolidated with that of Hacheston, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty. Mrs. White was patroness in 1818. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. Parham Hall is one of the curious remaining specimens of domestic architecture prevalent in the reign of Elizabeth. Richard Porter bequeathed a cottage for a school-house, and a rent-charge of £12 for teaching twelve poor boys of Parham and Hacheston.

PARHAM, a parish in the hundred of WEST EASWRITH, rape of ARUNDEL, county of SUSSEX, 6 miles (N. E. by N.) from Arundel, containing 77 inhabitants.

The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £10, and in the patronage of Lord de la Zouche. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, is in the later style of English architecture: it was repaired and the tower added in 1800, and has an ancient leaden font in good preservation. Here was formerly a cell to the abbey of Glastonbury.

PARK, a ward in the parish of ST. STEPHEN, hundred of CASHIO, or liberty of ST. ALBAN'S, county of HERTFORD, 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from St. Alban's. The population is returned with the parish.

PARK-END, a township in the parish of AUDLEY, northern division of the hundred of PIREHILL, county of STAFFORD, containing 88 inhabitants.

PARKGATE, a hamlet in the township of LEIGHTON, parish of NESTON, higher division of the hundred of WIRRAL, county palatine of CHESTER, 12 miles (N. W.) from Chester, and 192 (N. W.) from London. The importance of this place is derived from its being the resort of visitors during the bathing-season: it consists principally of one long and irregular range of houses built of brick, which front the æstuary of the Dee, over which is a commodious ferry to Flint: here is a custom-house for vessels loading from the contiguous collieries: formerly this place was a sea-port of considerable importance, and packets and other vessels were employed, especially in the trade with Ireland; but at present it is neglected as a packet station, vessels of burden being prevented from approaching the quay, owing to the formation of a large sand-bank, which greatly impedes the navigation of the channel.

PARKHAM, a parish in the hundred of SHEBBEAR, county of DEVON, 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W.) from Bideford, containing 967 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Barnstable, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £20. 6. 8. The Rev. Dr. Woodcock was patron in 1824. The church, dedicated to St. James, has an enriched Norman door. A school is supported by the united bequests of John Lovering, in 1671, and Wear Giffard. Bableigh, in this parish, was long held by the family of Risdon, of which the county historian was a member.

PARKHOLD, a township in the parish of LEDBURY, hundred of RADLOW, county of HEREFORD, 2 miles (S. by E.) from Ledbury, containing 55 inhabitants.

PARK-LEYS, an extra-parochial district, in the northern division of the wapentake of THURGARTON, county of NOTTINGHAM, containing 10 inhabitants.

PARK-QUARTER, a township in the parish of STANHOPE, north-western division of DARLINGTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, 3 miles (W.) from Stanhope, containing 1259 inhabitants.

PARKSTON, a chapelry in the parish of CANFORD MAGNA, hundred of COGDEAN, Shaston (East) division of the county of DORSET, 2 miles (E. by N.) from Poole, containing 385 inhabitants. The chapel contains four hundred free sittings, towards defraying the expense of which the Incorporated Society for building and enlarging churches and chapels contributed £500.

PARLEY (WEST), a parish in that part of the hundred of CRANBORNE which is in the Shaston (East) division of the county of DORSET, 6 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Wimborne Minster, containing 204 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £6. 17. 6. Thomas Deverell, Esq. and others were patrons in 1798. There is a place of worship for Independents. The navigable river Stour flows past the village.

PARLINGTON, a township in the parish of ABERFORD, lower division of the wapentake of SKYRACK, West riding of the county of YORK, 7 miles (S. W.) from Tadcaster, containing 229 inhabitants.

PARLY, a joint tything with Hurn, in the parish and hundred of CHRISTCHURCH, New Forest (West) division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON. The population is returned with the parish.

PARME, a joint township with Mooresbarrow, in that part of the parish of MIDDLEWICH which is in the hundred of NORTHWICH, county palatine of CHESTER, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by S.) from Middlewich. The population is returned with Mooresbarrow.

PARNDON (GREAT), a parish in the hundred of HARLOW, county of ESSEX, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Harlow, containing 396 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the jurisdiction of the Commissary of Essex and Herts, concurrently with the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of London, rated in the king's books at £16. 10. $7\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Hon. W. T. L. P. Wellesley.

PARNDON (LITTLE), a parish in the hundred of HARLOW, county of ESSEX, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Harlow, containing 103 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the jurisdiction of the Commissary of Essex and Herts, concurrently with the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of London, rated in the king's books at £6. William Smith, Esq. was patron in 1812. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

PARR, a township in the parish of PRESCOT, hundred of WEST DERBY, county palatine of LANCASTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Newton in Mackerfield, containing 1523 inhabitants. It adjoins the eastern part of the town of St. Helen's.

PARSON-DROVE, a chapelry in the parish of LEVERINGTON, hundred of WISBEACH, Isle of ELY, county of CAMBRIDGE, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Wisbeach, containing 675 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, with the rectory of Leverington, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Bishop of Ely. The chapel is dedicated to St. John the Baptist. A school is supported by annual subscriptions amounting to about £15.

PARTINGTON, a township in the parish of BOWDON, hundred of BUCKLOW, county palatine of CHESTER, 5 miles (N. W.) from Altrincham, containing 434 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Independents. The village is situated on the navigable river Mersey, where are extensive paper-mills, a mill-board manufactory, a large corn-mill, and two tan-yards.

PARTNEY, a parish in the Wold division of the wapentake of CANDLESHOE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (N. by E.) from Spilsby, containing 293 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £11. 10. $2\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of Lord Gwydir. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas. There is a place of worship for Baptists. So early as the seventh century, a monastery is said to have existed at Partney; and it is certain that, in the time of Henry I., there was an hospital dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene: Bede also mentions another religious establishment here, over which the abbess Edelhild presided.

PARTON, a township in the parish of MORESBY, ALLERDALE ward above Darwent, county of CUMBERLAND, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (N.) from Whitehaven, containing 496 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Independents. Several vessels were employed here in the coal trade until 1795, when the pier was washed away by an unusually high tide, since which the harbour has been resorted to by only a few fishing-boats: north of the village is an extensive iron-foundry. Some years ago a tunnel was constructed through Rednees point, in continuation of a railway from the neighbouring coal-works to Whitehaven. A free school was erected, in 1818, by Joseph Williamson, Esq., with an endowment of £42 per annum, to which Chilwell Williamson, Esq. has since bequeathed a house for the master, who teaches sixty children.

PARTON, a township in the parish of THURSBY, ward and county of CUMBERLAND, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Wigton, containing 95 inhabitants.

PARWICK, a parish in the hundred of WIRKSWORTH, county of DERBY, 6 miles (N. by E.) from Ashbourn, containing 551 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Derby, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, endowed with £400 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of William Evans, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, has some portions of Norman architecture. A railway from the Peak Forest canal to the Cromford canal crosses the northern part of the parish. William Beresford, in 1695, granted certain land, now producing about £8 per annum, for which ten poor children are instructed. Parwick is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s.

PASSENHAM, a parish in the hundred of CLELEY, county of NORTHAMPTON, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (S. by W.) from Stony-Stratford, containing, with the hamlet of Denshanger and part of that of Old Stratford, 753 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £20, and in the patronage of Lord Viscount Maynard. The church is dedicated to St. Guthlake. The Buckingham canal passes through the parish. Six poor children are educated for £2. 10. a year, arising from a rent-charge bequeathed by John Swannell, in 1707. This is mentioned in the Saxon Chronicle as the place where the army of Edward the Elder lay whilst he was fortifying Towcester against the Danes. Shroob Lodge, in this parish, was the seat of the learned and industrious antiquary, Browne Willis, Esq.

PASTON, a parish in the hundred of TUNSTEAD, county of NORFOLK, 4 miles (N. E.) from North Walsham, containing 238 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Lord Viscount Anson. The church is dedicated to St. Margaret. Near it are the ruins of the old hall and chapel belonging to the Paston family.

PASTON, a parish in the liberty of PETERBOROUGH, county of NORTHAMPTON, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Peterborough, containing, with the hamlets of Gunthorpe, Walton, and Werrington, 764 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £13. 7. 11., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Peterborough. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

PASTON, a township in the parish of KIRK-NEWTON, western division of GLENDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Wooler, containing 209 inhabitants. It is bounded on the north by the Beaumont river, and about a mile to the southward of the village is Pawston Tarn, a large lake of a circular form.

PATCHAM, a parish in the hundred of DEAN, rape of LEWES, county of SUSSEX, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Brighton, containing 403 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Lewes, and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £7. 1. $5\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to All Saints, is partly in the early English, and partly in the decorated, style of architecture.

PATCHING, a parish and hundred in the rape of BRAMBER, county of SUSSEX, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by S.) from Arundel, containing 222 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £11. 13. 4.

PATCHWAY, a joint tything with Hempton, in that part of the parish of ALMONDSBURY which is in the lower division of the hundred of LANGLEY and SWINEHEAD, county of GLOUCESTER, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by E.) from Bristol. The population is returned with Hempton.

PATELEY-BRIDGE, a market town and parochial chapelry in the lower division of the wapentake of CLARO, West riding of the county of YORK, 8 miles (W. N. W.) from Ripley, and 224 (N. N. W.) from London. The population is returned with the township of High and Low Bishopside, parish of Ripon, in which it is situated. This town is situated on the northern bank of the river Nidd, and is indebted for its importance to the adjacent lead mines. A weekly market, granted by Edward II., in 1324, is held on Saturday: fairs are on Easter and Whitsun eves, May 11th, September 17th (if on a Saturday, otherwise on the following Saturday), Monday after October 10th, and on Christmas-eve. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Archbishop of York, in the deanery of Ripon, endowed with £400 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £1900 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of the Collegiate Church of Ripon. The chapel, dedicated to St. Mary, has received three hundred and sixty-five additional sittings, of which two hundred are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having contributed £500 towards defraying the expense. A new church, in the English style of architecture, was commenced in October, 1825, and completed in 1827, the parliamentary commissioners having granted £2000 towards its erection; it contains eight hundred and three sittings, of which four hundred and thirty-two are free. There is a place of worship for Independents. An ancient foundation, called Rake's school, from the site of ground on which it stands, was augmented, in 1806, with a bequest of £1800 stock by Mrs. Alice Shepherd, the dividends to be applied to the education and clothing of twenty poor children.

PATMER, a hamlet partly in the parish of ALBURY, hundred of EDWINSTREE, and partly in the parish of BISHOP'S STORTFORD, hundred of BRAUGHIN, county of HERTFORD, adjacent to the town of Bishop's Stortford. It belongs to the Bishops of London, who here hold courts leet and baron, at which a constable and other officers are annually chosen, and misdemeanants punished.

PATNEY, a parish forming a distinct portion of the hundred of ELSTUB and EVERLEY, county of WILTS, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Devizes, containing 141 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £19. 8. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Winchester. The church is dedicated to St. Swithin.

PATRINGTON, a market town and parish in the southern division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESS, East riding of the county of YORK, 56 miles (E. S. E.) from York, and 189 (N. by E.) from London, containing 1244 inhabitants. This place, which is of great antiquity, is supposed by some antiquaries to be the Prætorium of Antoninus, and the point where the Roman road leading from the great Piets' wall terminates: about seventy years ago, a stone, which had formed part of a Roman altar, was dug up here. The town is pleasantly situated near a small river, which empties itself into the æstuary of the Humber, and although in a flat country, different points in the vicinity afford commanding views of the Humber and its fertile shores, as far as Spurn Point, about seven miles south-eastward, and also of the opposite coast of Lincolnshire: the houses are but indifferently built. The haven, about a mile distant, according to tradition, was formerly capable of admitting large vessels, but it has become so obstructed by the accumulation of silt, as only to afford access to small craft, which convey corn to Hull and London, and import lime and coal from the West riding. The market is on Saturday, principally for corn, the trade in which is considerable; and fairs are held on March 28th, July 18th, and December 6th, for shoes, linen-drapery, woollen cloth, copper and tin ware, toys, &c. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of the East riding, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £22, and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Clare Hall, Cambridge. The church, dedicated to St. Patrick, is a spacious and handsome cruciform edifice, combining the decorated and later styles of English architecture: it is surmounted by a fine lofty spire, visible at a great distance, and forming a land-mark for mariners approaching the mouth of the Humber. There are places of worship for Independents, and Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists.

PATRIXBOURNE, a parish in the hundred of BRIDGE and PETHAM, lathe of St. AUGUSTINE, county of KENT $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Canterbury, containing 268 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, with the curacy of Bridge annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £5. 7. $3\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of E. Taylor, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is principally in the Norman style, but there are some portions of later date. A priory of Augustine canons, a cell to the abbey of Beaulieu in Normandy, was founded here about 1200, and in 1399, or the year following, was made subject to the priory of Merton, in Surrey.

PATSHULL, a parish in the southern division of the hundred of SEISDON, county of STAFFORD, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E.) from Shiftnall, containing 144 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Stafford, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Sir George Pigot, Bart. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. Within the parish are two fine lakes, called Patshull-pool and Snowdon-pool.

PATTERDALE, a joint chapelry with Hartsop, in the parish of BARTON, WEST ward, county of WESTMORLAND, $7\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by E.) from Ambleside. The population is returned with Hartsop. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Carlisle, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £500 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Earl of Lonsdale. The church is dedicated to St. Patrick. There is a small school endowed with £6 per annum. Patterdale lies along the upper reach of Ullswater, amidst scenery of a most sublime character, the view being bounded by a vast amphitheatre of mountains, which surrounds the lake. It is intersected by numerous rills from the mountains, and by others flowing from the three tarns, Brotherwater, Hayswater, and Angle tarn, emptying themselves into lake Ullswater: at the head of the latter is an inn for the convenience of tourists, near which a large fair for sheep is held in October. There are several very productive quarries of fine blue slate in the neighbourhood.

PATTESLEY, a parish in the hundred of LAUNDITCH, county of NORFOLK, 4 miles (S. S. W.) from Fakenham. The population is returned with Oxwick. The living is a sinecure rectory, annexed to the vicarage of Mattishall, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £8. 18. 9., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty. The church, which has fallen into ruins, was dedicated to St. John the Baptist.

PATTINGHAM, a parish partly in the hundred of STOTTESDEN, county of SALOP, but chiefly in the southern division of the hundred of SEISDON, county of STAFFORD, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Wolverhampton, containing, with the township of Rudge, 935 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Stafford, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £8, and in the patronage of Sir George Pigot, Bart. The church is dedicated to St. Chad: in the cemetery is an old Roman cross. A school is endowed with about £12 per annum.

PATTISHALL, a parish in the hundred of TOWCESTER, county of NORTHAMPTON, 4 miles (N. N. W.) from Towcester, containing 695 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage in two portions, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, respectively rated in the king's books at £6. 11. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Crown and the Rev. T. C. Welch, alternately. The church is dedicated to the Holy Trinity. Thomas Young, in 1684, bequeathed houses and land, now producing an income of about £14 a year, for which six boys receive instruction, and four others are taught for an annuity of £5, paid from the funds of Foxley charity. The Roman Watling-street passes through the parish.

PATTISWICK, a parish in the Witham division of the hundred of LEXDEN, county of ESSEX, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Great Coggeshall, containing 320 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Colchester, and diocese of London, and in the patronage of the Bishop of London. The church is dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene.

PATTON, a township in that part of the parish of KENDAL which is in KENDAL ward, county of WESTMORLAND, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Kendal, containing 89 inhabitants.

PAUL, a parish in the hundred of PENWITH, county of CORNWALL, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. by W.) from Penzance, containing 3790 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £13. 11. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Crown. In this parish are the villages of Mousehole and Newlyn, both situated on the coast of Mount's bay, and numerous inhabited by fishermen. The pilchard and mackarel fisheries are carried on to a great extent. The various kinds of fish that frequent this part of the channel are sent in abundance to Penzance and several of the other Cornish towns; and the London market, in the early part of the season, is chiefly supplied with mackarel from this place, by way of Portsmouth. Mousehole, otherwise called Port Enys, was anciently a port of considerable importance, a new quay having been constructed so early as 1392: it was also a market town, but the market has been discontinued since that place and Newlyn were burned by the Spaniards in 1595: it is still defended by a battery. There is an almshouse for six poor men, founded in 1709, by Captain Stephen Hitchens, and endowed with land now producing about £70 per annum.

PAUL, a parish in the southern division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESS, East riding of the county of YORK, comprising the chapelry of Thorn-Grumbald, and the township of Paul, and containing 745 inhabitants, of which number, 486 are in the township of Paul, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W.) from Hedon. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of the East riding, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £10. 0. 5., and in the patronage of the Archbishop of York. The church, dedicated to St. Andrew and St. Mary, is a small cruciform structure in the later English style. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists, with a Sunday school attached. Here is an extensive dock-yard, in which several ships of the line were built during the late war.

PAULERS-PURY, a parish in the hundred of CLELEY, county of NORTHAMPTON, 3 miles (S. E. by S.) from Towcester, containing 1069 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £24. 4. 2., and in the patronage of the Warden and Fellows of New College, Oxford. The church, dedicated to St. James, contains a curious ancient font. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. William Marriott, in 1721, bequeathed certain land, directing the income to be applied in teaching six poor boys. The ancient Watling-street passes through the parish, in which coins of Constantine, Maximian, and other emperors have been found. Dr. Edward Bernard, a learned astronomer and Savilian professor at Oxford, was born here in 1638; he died in 1697.

PAULTON, a parish in the hundred of CHEWTON, county of SOMERSET, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.W.) from Bath, containing 1380 inhabitants. W.) from Wigan, containing 3679 inhabitants, who are chiefly employed in the coal mines, which are worked here to a considerable extent. The parliamentary commissioners for building new churches and chapels have given directions for the erection of a new chapel at this place. In the neighbourhood is Hawkey Hall, a very ancient building, the original proprietors of which came over with the Conqueror.

PEMBRIDGE, a parish and borough (formerly a market town), in the hundred of STRETFORD, county of HEREFORD, $15\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Hereford, containing 1203 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £36. 10. 2½., and in the patronage of the President and Fellows of Corpus Christi College, Oxford. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, is a large and lofty structure, with a detached steeple of singular construction, its wooden frame-work being particularly curious. The Wesleyan Methodists have places of worship here; and there is also a chapel belonging to the Home Missionary Society. The river Arrow passes through the town, which is governed by a high bailiff, chosen every two years by a majority of the householders. Courts leet and baron are held annually; and there are fairs, on May 13th for hiring servants, &c., and November 22nd for the sale of cattle; but the market, granted by Henry I., has long since declined. A free school, endowed by William Carpenter in 1650, is at present conducted on Dr. Bell's system. Here are almshouses, erected and endowed, in 1661, by Jeffry and Bishop Duppa, for six poor persons, each to receive £5 per annum.

PEMBURY, a parish in the hundred of WASHLINGSTONE, lathe of AYLESFORD, county of KENT, 3½ miles (S. E.) from Tunbridge, containing 891 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Rochester, rated in the king's books at £6. 8. 8., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Rev. S. S. Woodgate. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, has lately received an addition of sixty free sittings, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £30 towards defraying the expense. Several small streams, tributary to the Medway, run through the parish. An almshouse for six poor blind persons was erected, in 1716, by Charles Selby, in pursuance of the will of Charles Amherst, who previously, in 1702, bequeathed a rent-charge of £213 for its maintenance.

PENALTH, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of RAGLAND, county of MONMOUTH, 1¼ mile (S. E. by S.) from Monmouth, containing 464 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Trellack, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaff.

PENCOMBE, a parish in the hundred of BROXASH, county of HEREFORD, 4¼ miles (W. by S.) from Bromyard, containing, with the townships of Grendon-Warren and Marstone-Stannett, 453 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £13. 6. 8., and in the patronage of Richard Arkright, Esq. A court leet is held here once in three years; and, by ancient custom, the lord of the manor claims a pair of gilt spurs whenever a mayor of Hereford dies while in office.

PENCOYD, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of WORMELOW, county of HEREFORD, 6 miles (W. N. W.) from Ross, containing 161 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, united with that of Marston, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Rev. Francis Coke.

PENDEFORD, a township in that part of the parish of TETTENHALL which is in the southern division of the hundred of SEISDON, county of STAFFORD, 4¼ miles (N. N. W.) from Wolverhampton, containing 253 inhabitants.

PENDLEBURY, a township in the parish of Ec-

CLES, hundred of SALFORD, county palatine of LANCASTER, 4¼ miles (N. W. by W.) from Manchester, containing 1047 inhabitants, who are chiefly employed in the manufacture and printing of cotton. There is a place of worship for Independents. The Bolton and Bury canal runs through the township. Agecroft Hall is a fine ancient fabric, supposed to have been built before the time of Richard II.: it was the birthplace of Cardinal Langley, and a staining of the royal arms, still remaining in the window of its chapel, was presented by John of Gaunt to that family.

PENDLETON, a chapelry in that part of the parish of WHALLEY which is in the higher division of the hundred of BLACKBURN, county palatine of LANCASTER, 2¼ miles (S. S. E.) from Clitheroe, containing 1319 inhabitants, of whom about one thousand are employed at the extensive calico-printing establishment here.

PENDLETON, a chapelry in the parish of ECCLES, hundred of SALFORD, county palatine of LANCASTER, 2½ miles (W. by N.) from Manchester, containing 5948 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Eccles, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and £1800 parliamentary grant. The chapel, dedicated to St. Thomas, was built by Messrs. S. Brierly and John Fletcher, in 1777, and was purchased by subscription among the inhabitants shortly afterwards: it was originally used as a place of worship for Methodists, the celebrated John Wesley having first officiated in it. The first stone of a new church was laid in July 1829, in which it is intended to accommodate one thousand six hundred persons, the commissioners for building additional churches having granted £600, and the inhabitants having subscribed £1000, towards defraying the expense. The Independents, Wesleyans, and Methodists of the New Connexion, have each a place of worship here. The Liverpool and Edinburgh road, the Bolton and Bury canal, and the Manchester and Liverpool railroad, pass through the chapelry. There are several cotton-mills, with dyeing, printing, and bleaching establishments, also a flax-mill upon an improved principle, together affording employment to about two thousand five hundred persons, the remainder of the inhabitants being chiefly occupied in the manufacture of silk and cotton, in handicraft trades, and at the neighbouring collieries. A small library of useful works was established in 1829 at the village, adjacent to which are many pleasant genteel villas. A school is supported by subscription, in which about two hundred children are instructed.

PENDOCK, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of OSWALDSLOW, though locally in the lower division of that of Pershore, county of WORCESTER, 5½ miles (S. S. W.) from Upton upon Severn, containing 276 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, rated in the king's books at £11. 2. 11. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

PENDOMER, a parish in the hundred of HOUNDSBOROUGH, BERWICK, and COKER, county of SOMERSET, 4¾ miles (S. W. by S.) from Yeovil, containing 70 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £3. 4. 4½. William Helyar, Esq. was patron in 1810.

PENGE, a hamlet in that part of the parish of BATTERSEA which is in the eastern division of the hundred of BRIXTON, county of SURREY, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Croydon, containing 228 inhabitants.

PENHOW, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of CALDICOTT, county of MONMOUTH, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by S.) from Caerleon, containing 220 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaff, rated in the king's books at £5. 4. 9½., and in the patronage of John Cave, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. John the Baptist. There are still some remains of Penhow castle.

PENHURST, a parish in the hundred of NETHERFIELD, rape of HASTINGS, county of SUSSEX, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Battle, containing 106 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, with the vicarage of Ashburnham, in the archdeaconry of Lewes, and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £3. 18. 4., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty. The church is principally in the later style of English architecture.

PENISTONE, a parish in the wapentake of STAINCROSS, West riding of the county of YORK, comprising the market town of Penistone, the chapelry of Denby, and the townships of Gunthwaite, Hunshelf, Ingbirchworth, Langsett, Oxspring, and Thurstlestone, and containing 5042 inhabitants, of which number, 645 are in the town of Penistone, 8 miles (W. S. W.) from Barnesley, and 177 (N. N. W.) from London. The town is situated on the southern bank of the river Don, and consists of four streets, which intersect each other at right angles: it is in general well built. The only branch of manufacture is that of linen, which is not very extensive. The market is on Thursday, principally for cattle. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £16. 14. 2. Major-General G. Bosville was patron in 1809. The church is dedicated to St. John the Baptist. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists. A free grammar school was founded in 1604, and endowed by sundry persons with houses, lands, and rent-charges, now producing an income of about £110 per annum, which till lately was applied for teaching the classics, but at present the children are only taught English. There is also a free school for girls, erected in 1821 by subscription, to which the National School Society also contributed: it is endowed with £420 four per cents., producing £16. 16. per annum; one hundred and twenty are instructed: the mistress also receives £10 per annum, the bequest of Josias Wordsworth, for which twenty additional girls are taught. Dr. Nicholas Sanderson, the celebrated blind Professor of Mathematics in the University of Cambridge, was a native of this parish.

PENKETH, a township in the parish of PRESCOT, hundred of WEST DERBY, county palatine of LANCASTER, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W.) from Warrington, containing 477 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

PENKHUL, a joint township with Boothen, in the parish of STOKE UPON TRENT, northern division of the hundred of PIREHILL, county of STAFFORD, 1 mile (S. E. by E.) from Newcastle under Lyne, containing, with Boothen, 4915 inhabitants. It is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s.

PENKRIDGE, a parish partly in the western, but chiefly in the eastern, division of the hundred of CUTLESTONE, county of STAFFORD, comprising the town of Penkrige, the chapelries of Coppenhall and Dunston, and the townships of Lovedale with Drayton, Mitton, Otherton, Pileton, Water-Eaton, Rodbaston, and Whiston with Bickford, and containing 2641 inhabitants, of which number, 2299 are in the town of Penkrige, 6 miles (S.) from Stafford, and 128 (N. W.) from London. This place is of great antiquity, and is supposed by Camden to have been the Roman Pennocrucium; part of its modern name is evidently deduced from the river Penk, on which it stands, but whether the remainder denotes the bank of this stream, or is a corruption of bridge, is a matter of conjecture: there is a stone bridge over the river. This small town, from its low situation, is subject to frequent inundations: it consists principally of two streets. Here are some iron works; and the Staffordshire and Worcestershire canal passes eastward of the town. The market, formerly held on Tuesday, is now disused; fairs are held April 30th, the first Monday in September, and the 10th of October, the first of which is said to be one of the greatest marts for cattle in the kingdom, and the second is a noted horse fair. The petty sessions for the east and west divisions of the hundred are occasionally held here. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the jurisdiction of the royal peculiar court of Penkrige, endowed with £400 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of E. J. Littleton, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is principally in the later style of English architecture, but the east window is of the decorated character, with elegant tracery: it was made collegiate by King John, and given by him to the see of Dublin, the archbishop of which was dean, and under him were thirteen prebendaries, whose prebends, at the Reformation, were valued at £106. 15. 1. A school-house was erected by subscription in 1695; and in 1731, Francis Sherratt endowed it with land for the education of eight poor boys; the income, arising from this and other bequests, amounts to £36. 3. per annum; twelve boys and eight girls are now educated. In 1819, two school-rooms, and a residence for the master and mistress, were built by E. J. Littleton, Esq., in which two hundred children are instructed on Dr. Bell's system, at his sole expense. Congreve, a hamlet in this parish, was long the seat of an ancient family of the same name, and it is stated by some writers to have been the native place of Congreve, the poet, but it is most probable that he was born in Ireland: this hamlet is, however, the birthplace of the learned divine and critic, Dr. Richard Hurd, Bishop of Worcester, who died in 1808.

PENMAIN, a hamlet in the parish of MYNYDDYS LWYN, lower division of the hundred of WENTLLOOG, county of MONMOUTH, 12 miles (N. W.) from Newport, containing 1425 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Independents, established upwards of a century, in which service is performed in the Welch language.

PENN, a parish in the hundred of BURNHAM, county of BUCKINGHAM, 3 miles (N. W. by N.) from Beaconsfield, containing 1054 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £9. 13. 4., and in the patronage of Earl Howe. The church is dedicated to the Holy Trinity. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyan Methodists. A school was founded, in 1750, by Sir Nathaniel and Elinor Curzon, for teaching poor children.

PENN, a parish in the northern division of the hundred of SEISDON, county of STAFFORD, comprising the township of Lower Penn, and the liberty of Upper Penn, and containing 769 inhabitants, of which number, 539 are in the liberty of Upper Penn, 2 miles (S.W. by S.) from Wolverhampton. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Stafford, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £4. 5. 10., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry. The church is dedicated to St. Bartholomew. A manorial court is annually held by the Marquis of Stafford's agent, to decide upon encroachments on Penn-Wood common. Here are several small manufactories for locks, keys, coffee-mills, &c., from which the warehouses in Wolverhampton and Sedgeley are supplied: there is also a small nail-manufactory. The Rev. Charles Wynn, in 1669, gave a messuage, &c., and a rent-charge of £6, in support of a free school, in aid of which Dr. Sedgewick, in 1747, gave an annuity of £10; the total income is nearly £105 and the average number of children about fifty. An almshouse was founded, in 1761, by Ann Sedgewick, for five aged women.

PENN (LOWER), a township in the parish of PENN, northern division of the hundred of SEISDON, county of STAFFORD, 3 miles (W. S. W.) from Wolverhampton, containing 230 inhabitants.

PENNARD (EAST), a parish in the hundred of WHITESTONE, county of SOMERSET, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Shepton-Mallet, containing 755 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of West Bradley annexed, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £7. 4. 9½., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bath and Wells. The church is dedicated to All Saints. The old Roman Fosse-way bounds the parish on the south-east.

PENNARD (WEST), a parish in the hundred of GLASTON-TWELVE-HIDES, county of SOMERSET, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by S.) from Glastonbury, containing 890 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to that of St. John the Baptist in Glastonbury, and in the peculiar jurisdiction of Glastonbury, endowed with £1400 parliamentary grant. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

PENNINGTON, a parish in the hundred of LONSDALE, north of the sands, county palatine of LANCASTER, 2 miles (W. S. W.) from Ulverstone, containing 284 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the King, as Duke of Lancaster. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, has lately received an addition of one hundred and ten sittings, of which seventy-five are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £100 towards defraying the expense. James Fell, in 1733, gave £60, now producing £3 per annum, for teaching poor children. Iron-ore and blue slate abound in the parish.

PENNINGTON, a township in the parish of LEIGH, hundred of WEST DERBY, county palatine of LANCASTER, 1 mile (S. by W.) from Leigh, containing 2782 inhabitants. This township includes part of the market town of Leigh. The manufacture of cotton is extensively carried on; and the neighbourhood produces coal, and lime of a very superior quality. At Pennington Hall is a small chapel for Swedenborgians.

PENRITH, a parish in LEATH ward, county of CUMBERLAND, 18 miles (S. E. by S.) from Carlisle, and 283 (N. N. W.) from London, comprising the market town of Penrith, and the townships of Burrowgate, Dockray, Middlegate with Sandgate, Netherend-Bridge with Carleton, and Town with Plumpton-Head, and containing 5385 inhabitants. This is a place of considerable antiquity: its name is evidently of British origin, and, signifying "the red hill or summit," has reference either to the nature of the adjacent soil, or to the red free stone of which the town is built. Old Penrith, the Bremetenracum of the Romans, is situated about five miles north-by-west of the town. At the Conquest, the honour of Penrith was a royal franchise, which, after repeated changes, was assigned to Alexander III., King of Scotland, in consideration of his ceding all claim to the counties of Cumberland, Northumberland, and Westmorland, at that time subjects of frequent contests between the sovereigns of England and Scotland; from him it descended to John Balliol, on whose defection it was seized by Edward I., and given to Anthony Beck, Bishop of Durham: having repeatedly lapsed to the crown, in 1696 it was granted to William Bentinck, Earl of Portland, and was sold by the late duke, in 1783, to the Duke of Devonshire, its present proprietor. During the reigns of Edward III. and Richard II., this town suffered greatly from the incursions of the Scots, who, in the latter, having ravaged the country, fired towns and villages, and enslaved many of the inhabitants; but becoming infected by the plague, which then raged here, and conveying the contagion into Scotland, on their return, nearly one-third of the inhabitants of that country fell a sacrifice: a second visitation of this disease, in the years 1597 and 1598, swept away upwards of two thousand inhabitants of this town and parish.

The town is pleasantly situated in a fine fertile vale, which is enclosed by eminences of varied cultivation, and watered by three small rivers, the Eamont, the Lowther, and the Petteril, and on the west are the ruins of an ancient castle: it consists principally of one long street, situated at the junction of the main roads from Lancashire and London to Glasgow, and is well paved, and lighted with oil; the houses, many of which are modern, are built chiefly of red freestone, covered with plaster and whitewashed, and roofed with slate. About the year 1400, a water course was cut through the town from the river Petteril to the Eamont, at the expense of Wm. Strickland, Bishop of Carlisle. On Beacon Hill, so called from having been anciently crowned with a beacon, is a square stone edifice, erected in 1719, the windows of which command an extensive and diversified prospect, combining nearly all the varieties of landscape scenery; the principal objects being Lowther and Greystoke castles, with their magnificent parks; the ancient castles of Brougham and Penrith; a beautiful, though limited, view of Ullswater lake, with the finely-wooded hill of Dunmallet; the mountain scenery of the lakes, viz., Helvelyn, Saddleback, Skiddaw, &c.; also the Penine Alps, viz., Cross-fell, &c.; and the river and vale of Eden, including Eden Hall, with the park and forest scenery. Towards the north is an excellent enclosed race-course, with a handsome grand stand, where, on the four last days of the first week in October, horse races and stag hunts are numerous and respectably attended. An assembly-room, occasionally used as a theatre, a bowling-green, news-room, subscription and circulating libraries, in the town, and many picturesque and beautiful walks in its neighbourhood, contribute to furnish amusement and recreation to the inhabitants. The manufacture of checks, gingham, calico, and other cotton goods, was formerly carried on to a considerable extent, but is now on the decline: the mineral produce of the neighbourhood consists of red freestone, slate, and limestone. The principal market is held on Tuesday, at which a considerable quantity of corn is pitched, and there is a smaller one for butchers' meat on Saturday: fairs for cattle are held on the 1st of March, 24th and 25th of April, and the third Tuesday in October; two fairs for hiring servants are held annually on the Tuesdays at Whitsuntide and Martinmas. New shambles were erected, and the old market cross, shambles, and moot-hall, were removed from the market-place, in 1807. The market and fairs are under the regulation of the bailiff appointed by the Duke of Devonshire, whose steward presides at a court baron, every third Monday, the powers of which extend to the recovery of debts under 40s.: the county court is held here four or five times a year, and petty sessions every alternate Tuesday; also a quarter session for the county, on the Tuesday in the first week after October 11th. A house of correction was built in 1826, at an expense of £400, which was defrayed out of the county rate.

The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Carlisle, rated in the king's books at £12. 6. 3., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Carlisle. The church, which is dedicated to St. Andrew, was given by Henry I. to the see of Carlisle, then newly founded: it was rebuilt, with the exception of the tower, in 1722, and is a plain, neat, and spacious edifice, consisting of a centre and two side aisles; the choir and centre aisle are open, and from the lofty ceiling depend two gilt chandeliers, the gift of the Duke of Portland; the side aisles are covered with galleries uniting at the western end, and supported by twenty pillars of the Ionic order, each consisting of one entire stone, which, from its colour and high polish, looks like mahogany; the upper range of pillars from the gallery to the roof are of wood painted white, with gilt mouldings. The altar is placed in a semicircular recess adorned with appropriate paintings in very good style: the church contains many monuments preserved from the former building, and, among other inscriptions, a record of the devastation caused here by the plague. In the churchyard are two stone monuments, called the Giant's Grave, or more commonly the Giant's legs; they are about twelve feet high, and fifteen feet distant from each other, and are traditionally said to have been raised to commemorate the exploits of Sir Ewen Caesarius, an ancient hero, against the robbers and wild boars that infested Inglewood Forest. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends, Independents, Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists, and Scottish Seceders. The free grammar school was founded, in 1340, by Bishop Strickland, who, having established a chantry here, required his chantry priest to teach music and grammar, at a salary of £6 per annum: it was refounded by Queen Elizabeth, at the request of her secretary, Sir Thomas Smith, Dean of Carlisle, and endowed with the above salary, which was augmented, in 1661, with a rent-charge of £10, by Mr. William Robinson, and, in 1782, with another of £6, by Mr. William Bleamire; the whole endowment at present is nearly £30 per annum, and the school is on the decline: it is entitled to share, with other schools in the counties of Westmorland and Yorkshire, in five exhibitions of £50 per annum each at Queen's College, Oxford, the bequest of Lady Elizabeth Hastings, in 1739; and the above-mentioned Mr. William Bleamire gave an additional rent-charge for providing a silver medal for the best composition in Latin verse, a silver pen for the best writer, and a book on arithmetic for the best arithmetician, with the remainder, if any, to the master: there are thirty-four scholars, each of whom pays 10s. 6d. per quarter. Mr. William Robinson built a school for the education of girls, and in 1661 endowed it with £20 a year, to which the sum of £5 per annum was added by the Executors of Mrs. Joan Lascelles, for the instruction of the girls in knitting; these, with subsequent benefactions, yield an income of about £30 per annum, for which sixty poor girls are instructed in reading, writing, needlework, &c., and several of them in knitting. A school of industry for fifty poor girls was established in 1813; and there is a National school, erected in 1816, a commodious stone building, situated in Benson's Row: it is supported by voluntary contributions, and one hundred and seventy boys are instructed, exclusively of more than one hundred girls, who attend on Sundays.

The remains of the ancient castle are westward of the town: this fabric is supposed to have been erected as a protection from the incursions of the Scots; it was repaired and enlarged by Richard, Duke of Gloucester, who resided here, and was sheriff of Cumberland for five years in succession: the site favours the opinion of its having been a Roman encampment, being irregularly quadrilateral. It exhibits no indication of very ancient date, being built of red stone; and the ruins are remarkable, more for their extent than their magnificence: the chief objects of interest are the projecting corbels in the eastern front, which appear to have supported an open corridor; there are some large vaults, which were probably prisons: the walls, broken in many places, and intersected with remaining windows, assume, from different points of view, many striking varieties of perspective scenery. After the great civil war, the edifice was dismantled, and part of the materials was sold. About half a mile north of Penrith is a square mount, measuring twenty yards on each side, which is generally supposed to have been used, during the rebellion, as a place of execution for the Scotch rebels. Three miles east by south of the town, on the north side of the river Eamont, are two remarkable excavations in a perpendicular rock, called Giant's Caves, according to fabulous tradition, the residence of Isis, a giant. On the south bank of the same river is a circular intrenchment, called King Arthur's Round Table.

PENROSE, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of RAGLAND, county of MONMOUTH, 2 miles (N.) from Ragland, containing 385 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Lantilio-Grossenny, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaff. The church is dedicated to St. Cadocus. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

PENRUDDOCK, a hamlet in the parish of GREYSTOCK, LEATH ward, county of CUMBERLAND, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Penrith. The population is returned with the parish. The Independents have a place of worship here, which is endowed with land producing £11 per annum.

Corporate Seal.

PENRYN, a borough, market town, and chapel-ry, having separate jurisdiction, though locally in the parish of Gluvias, hundred of KERRIER, county of CORNWALL, 2 miles (N. W.) from Falmouth, and 266 (W. S. W.) from London, containing 2933 inhabitants. The manors of Penryn-Borough and Penryn-Foreign have belonged from time immemorial to the Bishops of Exeter, who had formerly a country-house at or near this place. In the thirteenth century, Bishop Stapleden founded a college here for twelve prebendaries, the revenue of which, at the dissolution, was valued at £205. 10. 6.: the building is said to have occupied an area of three acres, and to have been surrounded by embattled walls. During the great civil war, Penryn was garrisoned for the king, but was surrendered to Sir Thomas Fairfax, in March 1646. The town is large, and pleasantly situated on the declivity of a hill, at the head of an inlet communicating with Falmouth harbour, of which it commands a fine view. It consists principally of one street, from which others diverge at right angles, not lighted, and roughly paved; the inhabitants are supplied with water from streams which issue from the adjacent eminences, one of which forms a cascade, and the scene, diversified with mills and cottages, presents a scene of picturesque beauty. The adjacent country is highly cultivated, and interspersed with elegant mansions. In addition to the general trade of the town, great quantities of granite, supplied by the neighbouring quarries, are shipped here, for London and elsewhere. The manufactures consist of paper, woollen cloth, gunpowder, and arsenic, and paint is made in great quantities by the "Cornish Colour Company:" corn-mills and breweries afford employment to several persons; and there are spacious warehouses, generally well filled with flour and grain from the Isle of Wight and Hampshire, this being considered the granary for the south-eastern part of the county. A market and fair were granted, in 1258, by the Bishop of Exeter, and a fair on the festival of St. Vitalis, in 1312: the present market is on Saturday, for meat, fish, poultry, and vegetables; and cattle fairs are held on Wednesday after March 6th, May 12th, July 7th, October 8th, and December 21st.

Penryn is a borough by prescription, and was incorporated in the 18th of James I.: it is governed by a mayor, eleven more aldermen, and twelve common council-men, with a recorder, steward, town clerk, and inferior officers. The mayor, commonly styled portreeve, is chosen at the manorial court; the town clerk is appointed by the recorder; and the remaining officers are elected by a majority of that body. The mayor, recorder, deputy recorder, and justice (who is the mayor for the preceding year), are magistrates for the borough, exercising concurrent jurisdiction with the county magistrates, and holding a court of session quarterly. A court of record for the manor of Penryn-Foreign is held for pleas to any amount, at which the steward of the manor presides. The borough first regularly sent representatives to parliament in the reign of Mary, but is said to have returned once in the reign of Edward VI.: the right of election is in the inhabitants paying scot and lot, in number about one hundred and forty: the mayor is the returning officer; and the influence of Lord de Dunstanville is predominant. The living is a perpetual curacy, with the vicarage of Gluvias, within the peculiar jurisdiction of the Bishop of Exeter. The chapel, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene, has received an addition of one hundred and forty free sittings, to which the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels contributed £85. There are places of worship for Bryanites, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A grammar school was founded by Elizabeth for the education of three boys, and endowed with a rent-charge of £6. 13. 4., which is for the present discontinued. In 1758, John Verran bequeathed £1000, which sum was laid out in the three per cents., for the support of eight poor men, or women, who have never received public relief, and other purposes. James Humphry, Esq., in 1823, bequeathed £3000, directing the sum to be invested also in the three per cent. consols., and the dividends to be appropriated, first, to the payment of certain annuities, and, on the death of the annuitants, the whole to be given, in sums of £10 per annum each, to inhabitants in reduced circumstances, not receiving any other charitable relief.

PENSAX, a chapelry in the parish of LINDRIDGE, lower division of the hundred of OSWALDSLOW, but locally in the upper division of the hundred of Doddingtree, county of WORCESTER, 6 miles (S. W.) from Bewdley, containing 574 inhabitants. Coal is obtained in the neighbourhood.

PENSBY, a township in the parish of WOODCHURCH, lower division of the hundred of WIRRAL, county palatine of CHESTER, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Great Neston, containing 22 inhabitants.

PENSCCELLWOOD, a parish in the hundred of NORTON-FERRIS, county of SOMERSET, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Wincanton, containing 332 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £6. 14. 9½., and in the patronage of the Earl of Ilchester. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. On the site of an ancient Danish camp, in this parish, a tower, one hundred and twenty feet in height, was erected, by an ancestor of Sir R. C. Hoare, Bart., to commemorate the celebrated visit of Alfred the Great, in the disguise of a minstrel, to the tent of Guthrum, whom he afterwards defeated and converted to Christianity, himself being sponsor at the font.

PENSFORD (ST. THOMAS), a parish in the hundred of KEYNSHAM, county of SOMERSET, 27 miles (N. N. E.) from Somerton, containing 319 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Stanton-Drew, in the archdeaconry of Bath, and diocese of Bath and Wells. The church is dedicated to St. Thomas à Becket. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. The river Chew runs through the parish, and turns several considerable copper-mills, which, with the adjacent coal mines, afford employment to the greater portion of the inhabitants. A market, formerly held by charter at this place, has been disused for some years past; but there are still two fairs, on May 6th and November 8th.

PENSHAM, a hamlet in the parish of St. Andrew, PERSHORE, upper division of the hundred of PERSHORE, county of WORCESTER, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S. by W.) from Pershore, containing 95 inhabitants.

PENSHURST, a parish in the hundred of SOMERDEN, lathe of SUTTON at HONE, county of KENT, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Tunbridge, containing 1392 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £30. 6. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of Sir J. S. Sidney Bart. The church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, has a spire steeple and three chancels, and is rich in ancient monuments. There is a place of worship for Independents. The river Eden here meanders in divided streams, and unites with the Medway in its course to Tunbridge. Penshurst castle, adjoining the village, is a noble pile erected in the reign of Henry VIII., on the site of an ancient mansion, which, in the time of William the Conqueror, belonged to the Penchester family; but, since that of Edward IV., to the Sydneys, from whom Sir Philip Sydney was descended. A fair is held here on June 25th and 26th: on the evening of the latter day, as soon as it is dusk, the young peasants in the vicinity, and sometimes the gentry, have been accustomed, time immemorially, to resort to a flat wooden bridge over the river Medway, about a quarter of a mile off, and there dance all night; a public house, two or three cottages near the bridge, and the bridge itself, being illuminated. In the neighbourhood are remains of a Roman fortification. Penshurst gives the inferior title of baron to the family of Smythe, Viscounts Strangford.

PENSTHORPE, a parish in the hundred of GALLOW, county of NORFOLK, 2 miles (E. S. E.) from Fakenham, containing 26 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £10. A. Hamond, Esq. was patron in 1818. The church has been demolished.

PENTERRY, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of CALDICOTT, county of MONMOUTH, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Chepstow, containing 60 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaff, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Prebendary of Caire in the Cathedral Church of Llandaff.

PENTLOW, a parish in the hundred of HINCKFORD, county of ESSEX, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by N.) from Clare, containing 310 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the jurisdiction of the Commissary of Essex and Herts, concurrently with the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of London, rated in the king's books at £12. The Rev. John Bull was patron in 1816. The church is dedicated to St. George.

PENTNEY, a parish in the Lynn division of the hundred of FREEBRIDGE, county of NORFOLK, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Swaffham, containing 418 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and held by sequestration. The church is dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene. About a mile to the westward is the remaining gate-house of a priory of Black canons, founded in honour of the Holy Trinity, the Blessed Virgin Mary, and St. Mary Magdalene, by Robert de Vallibus, a follower of the Conqueror; at the dissolution here were twelve canons, whose revenue was estimated at £215. 18. 8.

PENTON-GRAFTON, a hamlet (formerly a parish) in the parish of WEYHILL, hundred of ANDOVER, Andover division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 3 miles (W. by N.) from Andover. The population is returned with Weyhill. An annuity of £9, the gift of John Read, in 1651, is applied for teaching poor children, and other charitable uses.

PENTON-MEWSEY, a parish in the hundred of ANDOVER, Andover division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Andover, containing 202 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £9. 12. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Rev. E. Fulham. The church is dedicated to the Holy Trinity. A school-room was erected in 1815, by subscription, to which £6 a year, the bequest of John Read, in 1651, has been added, in support of a school-mistress, who instructs about forty children.

PENTONVILLE, a chapelry in the parish of St. James, CLERKENWELL, Finsbury division of the hundred of OSSULSTONE, county of MIDDLESEX. The population is returned with the parish. The chapel, a neat edifice, was erected in 1791, since which period a considerable number of streets has been formed, and it now constitutes one of the most populous and respectable suburbs of the metropolis; a further description of which is given in the article on CLERKENWELL.

PENTRICH, a parish in the hundred of MORLESTON and LITCHURCH, county of DERBY, comprising the townships of Pentrich and Ripley, and containing 2143 inhabitants, of which number, 508 are in the township of Pentrich, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Alfreton. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Derby, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £6, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £1000 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Duke of Devonshire. The church is dedicated to St. Matthew. There are places of worship for Independents and Unitarians. The parish is bounded on the west by the river Amber. The population of the township of Pentrich has decreased one-third since the disturbances which broke out there in 1817, when the agents of the Duke of Devonshire razed many of the houses to the ground. It had anciently a market and two fairs; the latter are still held on the Wednesday in Easter-week and October 23rd. At Butterley are iron-works, established about 1793, underneath which the Cromford canal is conducted through a tunnel two thousand nine hundred and sixty-six yards in length; and in the neighbourhood is the reservoir of the Nottingham canal, covering an extent of many acres. There are also considerable coal and iron-stone works in the parish. A National school, erected by the Duke of Devonshire in 1819, is supported by voluntary contributions. The Romans had a camp on the adjoining common, near which passed the Ikniel-street.

PENTRIDGE, a parish in that part of the hundred of CRANBORNE which is in the Shaston (East) division of the county of DORSET, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.W. by N.) from Cranborne, containing 272 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £6. 15. 10., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Rumbold. On Penbury hill, which commands an extensive prospect, there was formerly a beacon.

PENWORTHAM, a parish in the hundred of LEYLAND, county palatine of LANCASTER, comprising the chapelry of Longton, and the townships of Farrington, Howick, Hutton, and Penwortham, and containing 4554 inhabitants, of which number, 1501 are in the township of Penwortham, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (S.W.) from Preston. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, endowed with £1600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of L. Rawstorne, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. A free grammar school was founded at Hutton, in 1552, by Christopher Walton, who endowed it with houses and lands now producing an annual income of about £675, for which a few boys are instructed in the rudiments of Latin, and about one hundred and forty children of both sexes are educated on the National system. The petty sessions for the hundred of Leyland are held here on Mondays, once in five weeks, alternately with Chorley, Cuerdon, Leyland, and Rufford. A Benedictine priory, in honour of the Virgin Mary, was founded here, on lands granted by Warine Bussel to the abbey of Evesham, in the time of the Conqueror, and several monks of that establishment placed therein, whose revenue at the dissolution was valued at £114. 16. 9.

PEN-Y-CLAWDD, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of RAGLAND, county of MONMOUTH, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S.W.) from Monmouth, containing 41 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to that of Llangoven in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaff, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Chapter of Llandaff.

Corporate Seal.

name, signifying "the head of the bay," is indicative of its situation, which is at the north-west side of Mount's bay. In the year 1595, it was set on fire

PENZANCE, a sea-port, market town, and chapelry, in the parish of MADRON, having exclusive jurisdiction, though locally in the hundred of Penwith, county of CORNWALL, 67 miles (S.W. by W.) from Launceston, and 282 (W. S. W.) from London, containing 5224 inhabitants. The former appellation of this town was Burriton; its present by a small party of Spaniards, who landed near Mousehole, a mile and a half distant, on the 23rd of July, and who, as observed by historians, were the only Spaniards that ever landed in the kingdom as enemies: on this occasion, Sir Francis Godolphin summoned the county to his assistance, and attempted to save Penzance from the threatened danger, but his followers being seized with a sudden panic, he was obliged to abandon it to its fate; the Cornish men having rallied the next day in greater numbers and better courage, the Spaniards, who had already set fire to Newlyn, Mousehole, and Penryn, quitted the coast without attempting further hostilities. During the great civil commotions, the town is said to have been plundered by the army of Sir Thomas Fairfax, in 1646, as a punishment for the kindness which the inhabitants had shewn to the troops under Lord Goring and Lord Hopton.

The town, which has of late years considerably increased in size and population, is situated on the north-west side and nearly at the bottom of Mount's bay, opposite to St. Michael's Mount, and Marazion on the east: the streets are lighted and paved; the houses in general modern, neat, and commodious; and the inhabitants are supplied with water from a reservoir. The fine situation of the town, its salubrious atmosphere, and the picturesque beauties of the vicinity, through which the walks and rides are particularly pleasant, have rendered it a place of resort for valetudinarians, and gained for it the well-deserved epithet of the Montpellier of England; the great variety of boats and shipping constantly lying in Mount's bay contributes much to the interest of the scenery, which, in its diversity and combinations, is considered to be unsurpassed by that of any other place in Great Britain. A battery pier, constructed in 1766, extended in 1782, and again in 1812, is now more than six hundred feet in length; and in 1816, a lighthouse was erected at its extremity, which is illuminated only when there are nine feet of water in the harbour. Among the scientific and literary institutions is "The Royal Geological Society of Cornwall," which was established here in 1814, under the patronage of his late Majesty, George IV., and has published three volumes of transactions, which were received in the most flattering manner by the various scientific institutions of Europe and America; attached to it is a most splendid museum of minerals, illustrative of geology and mineralogy: there is also a public library, established about ten years since, and now containing nearly three thousand volumes of standard works; besides which, several book clubs, subscription and commercial news-rooms, and commodious apartments for public assemblies, contribute to the instruction and recreation of the inhabitants. Here is a considerable export trade in tin, copper, china, clay, pilchards, and other fish: the imports are timber, iron, hemp, tallow, and groceries, with various other articles of merchandise. The pilchard fishery is chiefly carried on by the inhabitants of Newlyn and Mousehole, on the west side of the bay, and the fish are brought hither for exportation. About the period of the Restoration, Penzance was added as a fifth stannary town, and all the Cornish tin is now coined here and at Truro, and about two-thirds of it shipped at this port. A dry dock has been constructed, and the port regulations are efficient and well conducted. A packet sails weekly to the Scilly islands. The manufacture of yarn and coarse woollen cloth affords employment to several persons. A market and an annual fair for seven days were granted in 1332, and under the charter of incorporation, two markets and seven fairs, most of which have fallen into disuse. The present markets are on Thursday and Saturday; the former is well supplied with corn: fairs are held on May 28th, Thursday after Trinity-Sunday, and Thursday before Advent-Sunday. The annual income from the tolls of the market is about £600, and that from the pier dues about £1200, both being under the control of the corporation. A grant of anchorage, keelage, and bushellage, was made to the inhabitants by Henry VIII., which was confirmed in the charter of incorporation granted by James I., bearing date May 9th, 1614, under which the corporation consists of a mayor, eight aldermen, and twelve assistants, with a recorder, town clerk, and other officers: the mayor is elected from among the aldermen, by the corporation at large, on the Friday after Michaelmas; the retiring mayor is justice of the peace for the ensuing year: the aldermen are elected from among the assistants, and these from the inhabitants: the aldermen and assistants have an equal vote on all corporation affairs. The mayor, recorder, and justice, are magistrates for the borough, with exclusive jurisdiction, but have no power to appoint deputies (excepting the mayor in the court of record): the aldermen and assistants hold their situation for life, but the recorder and town clerk only during the pleasure of the corporation. A court of record is held every alternate Friday by the mayor and town clerk, who is steward of the court, for the recovery of debts under £50: after having been disused seventy years, this court was revived in 1826. Sessions for the borough are held quarterly, on the Friday following those for the county, by the officers of the corporation, whose power extends to transportation for seven years, and has been recently exercised for the first time. Petty sessions for the west division of the hundred are held here, on the first Friday in every month. A court for the hundred is held by the steward, as occasion requires.

The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Madron, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, endowed with £800 parliamentary grant. The chapel, dedicated to St. Mary, was erected prior to 1612, enlarged in 1671, and at its consecration, in 1680, was endowed with land which now lets for £20 per annum, by John Tremenhere, Esq.; a cemetery was then enclosed, and the limits of the town were defined to be those of the chapelry. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists, also a synagogue. The free school was endowed, in 1714, by John Buller, Esq., with £15 per annum: the poor children of the chapelry also receive instruction in a school at Madron, founded in 1704, by Mr. George Daniel. Northward of this town there are considerable earthworks, with a treble intrenchment, called Leseaddock, or Leseudjack, supposed to be of remote antiquity. An annual custom, the origin of which is unknown, prevails here on Midsummer-eve, when a great quantity and variety of fire-works, accompanied with bonfires, ignited tar barrels, and torches, are exhibited, and attended by young persons of both sexes; and on Midsummer-day, a fair is held on the pier, and a number of persons from the town and neighbourhood enjoy the gratification of water excursions: similar customs are observed on the 28th and 29th of June. Sir Humphrey Davy, the celebrated natural philosopher and chemist, and late President of the Royal Society, was a native of this town, and bequeathed £100 four per cents. to the master of the grammar school, to allow the boys a holiday annually on his birthday, the 17th of December.

PEOPLETON, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of PERSHORE, county of WORCESTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Pershore, containing 264 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, rated in the king's books at £11. 10., and in the patronage of — Dineley, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Michael.

PEOVER (LITTLE), a township in that part of the parish of GREAT BUDWORTH which is in the hundred of BUCKLOW, county palatine of CHESTER, 3 miles (S. by W.) from Nether Knutsford, containing 88 inhabitants. A school is supported by considerable donations for the education of poor children.

PEOVER (NETHER), a chapelry in that part of the parish of GREAT BUDWORTH which is in the hundred of NORTHWICH, county palatine of CHESTER, 3 miles (S. by W.) from Nether Knutsford, containing 250 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, endowed with £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Lord de Tabley. The chapel is dedicated to St. Oswald.

PEOVER (SUPERIOR), a chapelry in that part of the parish of ROSTHERN which is in the hundred of BUCKLOW, county palatine of CHESTER, 4 miles (S. S. E.) from Nether Knutsford, containing 543 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, and in the patronage of Sir H. Mainwaring, Bart. The church is dedicated to St. Lawrence. A school-house was built about 1730, in which four boys and four girls are taught and clothed for £10 a year, the proceeds of certain property bequeathed for the purpose by Charlotte Mainwaring, in 1728.

PEPPER-HARROW, a parish in the first division of the hundred of GODALMING, county of SURREY, 3 miles (W.) from Godalming, containing 130 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Surrey, and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £6. 7. 6., and in the patronage of Viscount Middleton. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas. The river Wey passes through the parish.

PERLETHORPE, a chapelry in the parish of EDWINSTOW, Hatfield division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, county of NOTTINGHAM, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Ollerton, containing 93 inhabitants. The chapel, though small, is a very handsome structure, erected by one of the Pierrepont family, upon the site of a former one: the windows exhibit both ancient and modern specimens of stained glass, and over the altar is a painting, by West, of Peter denying Christ.

PERRAN-ARWORTHAL, a parish in the hundred of KERRIER, county of CORNWALL, 4 miles (N.) from Penryn, containing 1362 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Stithians, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter. The church is dedicated to St. Piran. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. This parish includes part of Perran-Wharf, or Perran-Cove, in Falmouth harbour, to which there is a rail-road communicating with the Redruth and Gwennap mines. Here is a manufactory for arsenic.

PERRAN-UTHNOE, a parish in the hundred of PENWITH, county of CORNWALL, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (S. E.) from Marazion, containing 786 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £17. 11. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$, and in the patronage of Sir J. Trevelyan, Bart. The parish, which lies near the entrance to Mount's bay, is bounded on the south by the English channel. At Gold-Sithney is a large fair for cattle, coarse cloths, hardware, &c.

PERRANZABULOE, a parish in the hundred of PYDER, county of CORNWALL, 7 miles (W. N. W.) from St. Michael, containing 1702 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, to which is annexed the perpetual curacy of St. Agnes, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £24. The ancient church was collegiate, for a dean and canons, in the time of Edward the Confessor, and had the privilege of sanctuary, but having been overwhelmed with the sand, another church has been erected, near the village of Lambourn, which was consecrated in 1805. There are tin, copper, and lead mines in full operation within the parish. At Perran Porth is a fine sandy beach, frequented as a bathing-place, the visitors procuring lodgings in the cottages by the sea-side. The western part of the parish is very populous, being inhabited by miners, who live in detached cottages, thickly scattered over the commons. A fair is held on Easter-Tuesday, sometimes at Millingy, and at other times at Penhallow. St. Perran's well, near Lambourn, which is enclosed by an ancient stone building, is one of those to which the power of working miraculous cures was formerly ascribed. On the downs, about a mile and a half from the same place, is St. Perran's Round, one of the ancient Cornish amphitheatres: there are several other old earth-works within the parish.

PERRIVALE, a parish in the hundred of ELTHORNE, county of MIDDLESEX, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. by E.) from Harrow on the Hill, containing 25 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Middlesex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 4. John Lateward, Esq. was patron in 1812.

PERROT (NORTH), a parish in the hundred of HOUNDSBOROUGH, BERWICK, and COKER, county of SOMERSET, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E.) from Crewkerne, containing 387 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £9. 18. 1 $\frac{1}{2}$. Henry Hoskins, Esq. was patron in 1814. The church is dedicated to St. Martin.

PERROT (SOUTH), a parish in the hundred of BEAMINSTER-FORUM and REDHONE, Bridport division of the county of DORSET, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Beaminster, containing 317 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with the perpetual curacy of Mosterton annexed, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £17. 14. 2. Samuel Wills, Esq. was patron in 1809. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

PERRY (EAST), a hamlet in the parish of GRAFFHAM, hundred of LEIGHTONSTONE, county of HUNTINGDON, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by S.) from Kimbolton. The population is returned with the parish.

PERRY-HILL, a tything in the parish of WORPLESDON, first division of the hundred of WOKING, county of SURREY. The population is returned with the parish. The parish church stands in this tything.

PERSHALL, a township in the parish of ECCLESHALL, northern division of the hundred of PIREHILL, county of STAFFORD, 1 mile from Eccleshall, containing 80 inhabitants. It is within the peculiar jurisdiction of the Prebendary of Eccleshall in the Cathedral Church of Lincoln.

PERSHORE, a market town, partly in the parish of ST. ANDREW, and partly in that of HOLY CROSS, upper division of the hundred of PERSHORE, county of WORCESTER, 9 miles (S. E.) from Worcester, and 102 (N. W. by W.) from London, containing, exclusively of those portions of the parishes which are without the town, 2328 inhabitants. The name of this place, variously spelt Persore, Pearshore, and Pershore, is supposed by Camden to be derived from Periscoran, in allusion to the numerous pear-trees which grew in the vicinity: a convent was founded here, according to William of Malmesbury, by Egelward, Duke of Dorset, or, according to others, by Oswald, nephew of Etheldred, King of Mercia, about 689, for Secular clerks. It was remodelled by Edgar, as a monastery for Benedictine monks, about 984, and dedicated to the Virgin Mary, St. Peter, and St. Paul, and afterwards to Edburga, eighth daughter of Edward the Elder. The buildings suffered repeatedly from fire, especially in 1287, when a considerable part of the town was also destroyed: at the dissolution its revenue was valued at £666. 13. The only remains are the church of the Holy Cross, and the Abbey house, the latter having undergone such alterations that every vestige of its ancient character has been removed. The town is pleasantly situated on the lower road from Worcester to London, and on the western bank of the river Avon, which is here navigable, and is crossed by a bridge on the south. The principal street is about three quarters of a mile in length; it is well paved, and the houses are of respectable appearance. There is a manufactory for stockings, and two for watch mainsprings. The market is on Tuesday: fairs are held on Easter-Tuesday, June 26th, first Monday in August, and on the Tuesday before November 1st. This town returned two burgesses to parliament in the reign of Edward I., since which period the privilege has been discontinued. As to all civil jurisdiction the parishes of St. Andrew and Holy Cross are absolutely distinct, each having its own officers: the former includes the chapelries of Bricklehampton, Defford, Penvin, and Wick, and the hamlet of Pensham; and the latter the hamlets of Wadborough and Walcott.

The living of St. Andrew's is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, rated in the king's books at £8. 19. 2., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Westminster. The church consists of a choir and south transept, the remains of a noble cruciform church, and is partly in the Norman, but principally in the early English, style of architecture. The church of the Holy Cross is in the later English style, and was formerly conventual, having belonged to the abbey: the living is held as a curacy, with the vicarage of St. Andrew's: both are subject to the jurisdiction of the Archdeacon of Worcester. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

PERTENHALL, a parish in the hundred of STODDEN, county of BEDFORD, 2 miles (S.W. by S.) from Kimbolton, containing 324 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Bedford, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £18, and in the patronage of the Rev. J. R. Martyn. The church is dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul. Here was formerly a preceptory of the Knights Templars, of which only the site, surrounded with a moat, is now remaining. There is a chalybeate spring, called Chad-well.

PERTHOLEY, a parochial chapelry in the lower division of the hundred of Usk, county of MONMOUTH, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. by E.) from Usk. The population is returned with the parish of Llantrissant. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Llantrissant, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaff, endowed with £200 royal bounty. The chapel is dedicated to St. Bartholomew.

PERTWOOD (UPPER), a parish forming a distinct portion of the hundred of WARMINSTER, though locally in that of Dunworth, county of WILTS, 2 miles (N.W.) from Hindon, containing 23 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £3. 1. $5\frac{1}{2}$, endowed with £200 royal bounty. R. Rickwood, Esq. was patron in 1815. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

PETER (ST.), a parish and a member of the cinque-port liberty of Dover, though locally in the hundred of Ringslow, or Isle of Thanet, lathe of ST. AUGUSTINE, county of KENT, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Ramsgate, containing, with the hamlets of Broadstairs, Kingsgate, &c., 2101 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £9, and in the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The church, though small, is remarkable for its neatness. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. At Broadstairs, in this parish, a chapel of ease was erected by subscription in 1828. The village is much frequented by visitors from Margate; and there are public gardens, called Ranelagh Gardens, disposed with much taste, and at a considerable expense, and placed under the superintendence of the master of the ceremonies at Margate, during the season, when it is not unusual for seven hundred persons to assemble at one time, to partake of the amusements of the place. Elizabeth Lovejoy, in 1694, bequeathed her interest in certain tithes for the support of a schoolmaster to teach twenty boys; the income is £20 a year, and is applied as directed by the donor.

PETER (ST.) CHEESEHILL, a parish within the liberty of the soke, and adjacent to the city, of WINCHESTER, Fawley division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, containing 581 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £14. 9. $9\frac{1}{2}$, endowed with £600 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Crown.

PETER-CHURCH, a parish in the hundred of WEBTREE, county of HEREFORD, $11\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Hereford, containing 686 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £5. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Governors of Guy's Hospital, London. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

PETERBOROUGH, a city, and the seat of a diocese, having separate jurisdiction, and the head of the liberty of Nassaburgh, or Peterborough, county of NORTHAMPTON, 42 miles (N.E. by E.) from Northampton, and 79 (N. by W.) from London, containing, with the precinct of the Minster-close, and exclusively of the chapelries of Dogsthorpe, Eastfield with Newark, and Longthorpe, in that part of the parish which is within the liberty, 4598 inhabitants. The original name of this place, according to ancient records, was Medeswelhamsted, or Medeshamsted, from a whirlpool in that part of the river Aufona, now the Nene, near which the town was built. During the Saxon Octarchy, Peada, fifth king of Mercia, having embraced the Christian faith, laid the foundation of a monastery, about 655, which was completed by his brother Wulfhere, in atonement for having murdered his own sons, for their attachment to the Christian doctrine, prior to his own conversion to Christianity. From this monastery, which was dedicated to St. Peter, and soon became celebrated for the magnificence of its buildings and the richness of its endowments, the town derived the name Petriburgus, whence its present appellation. The monastery continued to flourish until about the middle of the ninth century, when the Danes having laid waste the neighbouring country, plundered the town, massacred the monks, and burnt the monastic buildings. In this state of desolation it remained for more than a century, till it was restored by Ethelwold, Bishop of Winchester, with the assistance of King Edgar, and of Adulph, the king's chancellor, who appropriated all his wealth to the rebuilding of the monastery, of which, after its restoration, he was made abbot. In the reign of William the Conqueror, Hereward, the last of the Anglo-Saxon warriors who distinguished themselves by their exploits, having heard that the Conqueror had given away his paternal lands to a Norman, set sail from Flanders, whither he had retired, and having landed in Lincolnshire, made an incursion into this city, and setting fire to the gates and outbuildings of the monastery, which he was unable to storm, opened for himself a passage through the flames, plundered the treasury, and having committed various outrages, retired to his ships with an immense booty. Against this invader, and for the protection of the abbey from similar attacks, Abbot Turolde erected a fort, or castle, which, from his name, is called Mont Turolde: this mound, or hill, is on the outside of the deanery garden, and is now called Tot-hill, or Toot-hill. In 1116, the monastery and town were greatly injured by fire, and to this accident may be attributed the existence of the present cathedral church, the building of which was commenced two years afterwards by Abbot Salisbury; and at this period the town, which had previously stood on the eastern side of the monastery, was re-erected on the situation it now occupies. The town suffered materially in the war between John and the confederate barons, many of whom took refuge in the monastery here and in Croyland abbey, from which sanctuaries they were forced by the king's soldiers, who plundered the religious houses and carried off a rich booty. This was a mitred abbey of the Benedictine order, the abbots having been summoned to parliament in the reign of Henry III.: at the dissolution, its revenue was estimated at £1972. 7. 0 $\frac{3}{4}$., and the conventual church, on the establishment of the see, became the cathedral of the diocese. During the civil war in the reign of Charles I., the parliamentary forces under the command of Cromwell, destined for the siege of Croyland, were stationed in this town, where they committed numerous depredations, defacing the cathedral, which they stripped of its plate and ornaments, and pulling down part of the cloisters, the chapter-house, and the episcopal palace, which were sold by order of the parliament.

The city is pleasantly situated on the north side of the river Nene, over which is a wooden bridge: it consists of several regular and well-formed streets; the houses are in general neatly built, and many of them have been modernised in the recent improvements of the city, which have been effected under the provisions of an act of parliament in 1790: the town is well paved, lighted with gas, and amply supplied with water. The environs are pleasant, and afford much agreeable and diversified scenery. A book society was established in 1730: there is a small theatre, which is opened generally in June, for six weeks; and assemblies are held at stated times, generally for the benefit of the dispensary and the National school. The trade is principally in corn, coal, timber, coke, lime, bricks, and stone, the produce of the neighbourhood. The river Nene is not navigable for shipping, but boats pass to Northampton, where it communicates with the Grand Junction canal; and in the opposite direction vessels proceed through Wisbeach to Lynn, to the former of which packets sail twice a week. The market is on Saturday: the fairs commence July 9th and October 1st, each for three days, for cattle, timber, and various kinds of merchandise: the former only is held in the city, and the latter, called "Bridge Fair," on the opposite side of the river, in the adjoining part of the county of Huntingdon. The liberty, or soke, of Peterborough, is co-extensive with the hundred, and comprises thirty-two townships and hamlets: the civil government is vested in the lord of the hundred, a custos rotulorum, and magistrates appointed by the crown, with powers equal to that of judges of assize, and in a high bailiff of the city, who is appointed by the dean and chapter, who are lords of the manor; constables and other officers are appointed at the court leet held annually. Courts of quarter session, for all offences committed within the soke, are held here, on the day preceding those for the county; also a court of record, for the recovery of debts to any amount, but in which debts above £5 are seldom sued for. The town hall, erected in 1671, is a neat building, under which is a covered area for the use of the market. There are two gaols; that for the liberty is a small building, containing three cells, being calculated to receive only seven prisoners: it is under the superintendence of the Marquis of Exeter, as lord of the hundred: the other, usually called the house of correction, is adapted to the reception of eleven prisoners. The city first sent members to parliament in the 1st of Edward VI., since which time it has regularly returned two: the right of election is vested, by a decision of the House of Commons, May 13th, 1728, in the inhabitants within the precincts of the Minster, being householders not receiving alms, and in the other inhabitants of the city paying scot and lot; the high bailiff is the returning officer, and the patronage belongs to Earl Fitzwilliam. The great borough fen between Peterborough and Crowland, containing nearly seven thousand acres, was, until the year 1815, subject to the pasturage of the cattle belonging to the inhabitants of the thirty-two townships which comprize the soke, it has since been enclosed, and a new parish, called Newborough, formed.

This city was anciently included in the diocese of Lincoln, from which, with the counties of Northampton and Rutland, it was separated by Henry VIII., in 1541, and erected into an episcopal see, of which the last abbot of Peterborough was made the first bishop, the conventual church of that monastery appropriated as the cathedral, and the abbot's house as the episcopal palace. The ecclesiastical establishment consists of a bishop, dean, sub-dean, six prebendaries, four minor canons, a master and eight choristers, six singers, an organist, two schoolmasters, twenty scholars, a steward, and six almsmen. The cathedral is a spacious and venerable structure, partly in the Norman, and partly in the early English, style of architecture, with a low lantern tower rising from the centre. An ancient gateway entrance of the Norman style, which has received some additions in the later English, leads into a small quadrangle, on one side of which are the conventual buildings, which retain much of their original character; and opposite the entrance is the magnificent west front of the cathedral, consisting of three lofty arches in the early English style, of unparalleled beauty, but the effect greatly diminished by a small porch (over which is the chapel of St. Thomas à Becket), which, though of elegant design, is not in accordance with the general character of this part of the building. Each of the three magnificent arches is surmounted by a decorated gable, pierced with Catherine-wheel windows: on each side is a highly-enriched turret, surmounted by a spire, and at the north-west angle of the nave is a square tower with angular turrets crowned with pinnacles, with which a similar tower at the south-west angle formerly corresponded. The nave, which is in the Norman style, is separated from the aisles by finely-clustered piers and arches, of lighter character than generally prevails in that style, and is a fine specimen of just proportion and elegant arrangement: the roof, which is of wood, is divided into compartments, panelled, and ornamented with paintings and with gilt fillets and mouldings: the choir has a groined roof of wood; on the south side is the shrine of St. Tibba, generally mistaken for the cenotaph of Mary, Queen of Scots, who was buried near the spot, but whose remains were afterwards removed to Westminster; and on the north was the tomb of Queen Catherine of Arragon, destroyed by the parliamentary troops under Cromwell, which has been replaced by a marble slab to the memory of that queen.

The east end is circular, and there are several chapels in the later English style, with fan tracery of elegant design; the windows generally appear to have been enriched with tracery, subsequently to their original formation, and many of them have been enlarged. To the south of the south transept are the remains of what was probably the refectory, and the infirmary of the convent, exhibiting a beautiful specimen of the early English style: the cloisters, of which part only remains, appear to have been singularly beautiful, and to have combined various styles of architecture, from the early Norman to the later English. The length of the cathedral, from east to west, is four hundred and seventy-one feet, and the breadth, along the transepts, one hundred and eighty feet: among the monuments are three for abbots of the twelfth century, and one for the abbot, and eighty-four of the monks, who were massacred by the Danes, in the year 870, of black and blue marble, formed like a shrine, and sculptured with figures of Christ and the Apostles, which is placed behind the altar. The Cathedral Close exhibits several interesting remains of English architecture, and it has a gateway communicating with the town, another leading to the Bishop's palace, and a third, of considerable beauty, to the deanery.

The city comprises only the parish of St. John the Baptist. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Peterborough. The church of St. John, a spacious structure, recently repaired and partly rebuilt, has a handsome altar-piece, painted by Sir Robert Ker Porter. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyan and other Methodists. The free grammar school was founded by Henry VIII., on the dissolution of the monastery, and placed under the control of the Dean and Chapter, being endowed for twenty scholars, nominated by them, who receive each £2. 13. 4. annually, and are instructed in the classics and in English literature: there are belonging to this school three exhibitions, of £6 per annum each, to St. John's College, Cambridge, founded by Edmund Munstevens, Esq., in the patronage of the Bishop and Dean of Peterborough, which, on failure of candidates from this school, are open to Oundle, or any other school in the county of Northampton; in the same college are one fellowship and two scholarships, founded by Francis Dee, Bishop of Peterborough, for boys of his kindred and name, who have been educated at this school, or at Merchant Taylors', London, also three exhibitions of seven shillings per week, with preference to boys educated here. A charity school was founded, in 1721, by Mr. Thomas Deacon, who endowed it with land for clothing, educating, and apprenticing poor children, for which purpose also Mr. Lowry, in 1707, had bequeathed £20, and Mrs. Ann Ireland, in 1712, £100. A National school for children of both sexes, upon an extensive plan, and a dispensary, with an infirmary, are supported by subscription; and there are various charitable bequests for distribution among the poor. — Wortley, Esq., formerly one of the representatives of the city, bequeathed a commodious dwelling and premises, as a workhouse for the parish. An ancient hospital, dedicated to St. Leonard, for lepers, dependent on St.

Peter's abbey, was founded in the reign of Stephen; and an hospital near the abbey gate was founded, in 1180, by Benedict, Abbot of Peterborough, to the honour of Thomas à Becket, whose life he wrote. Among the eminent natives of this place were, Abbot Benedict, just mentioned; and John of Peterborough, an English historian in the beginning of the fourteenth century, also abbot of the monastery; Archdeacon Paley, celebrated as a divine and moralist, who was born in 1743, and died in 1805; to whom may be added Sir John Hill, a popular writer, supposed to have been born in 1716. The title of Earl of Peterborough, now extinct, was bestowed on the family of Mordaunt by Charles I., and was held by Charles, Earl of Peterborough and Monmouth, a distinguished military officer and statesman, in the reigns of Anne and George I.

PETERSFIELD, a parish in the hundred of FINCH-DEAN, Alton (South) division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, comprising the borough town of Petersfield, and the tything of Sheet, and containing 1752 inhabitants, of which number, 1446 are in the borough of Petersfield, 24 miles (E. N. E.) from Southampton, and 54 (S. W.)

from London. This small town is situated on the road from London to Portsmouth; the streets are partly lighted by subscription, tolerably paved, and well supplied with water. In the centre of the market-place is a fine equestrian statue of William III., erected at the expense of the late William Jolliffe, Esq., one of the representatives for this borough; it was formerly gilt, but has been lately coloured to resemble stone. Great improvements have been recently made in the roads in the neighbourhood, and others are in progress. The market, which is also for corn and cattle, is every alternate Wednesday; and fairs are on July 10th, for toys, &c.; October 6th, established within the last ten years, for lean cattle; and December 11th, for sheep. The town, which was incorporated by charter of Elizabeth, is governed by a mayor and commonalty: the mayor, whose office is become merely titular, is appointed annually at the court leet of the lord of the manor, held in January, in the town hall, at which a constable and two tythingmen are also chosen. A court of requests, for the recovery of debts under 40s., formerly held here, has been disused for the last forty years. The town hall was rebuilt, about three years since, at the expense of Hylton Jolliffe, Esq. This borough made one return to parliament in the 35th of Edward I., and then discontinued until the reign of Edward VI., since which it has returned two members: the right of election was originally vested in the proprietors of houses, or shambles, built on ancient foundations, but is now in the freeholders generally: the number of voters is not precisely known; the mayor is the returning officer, and the influence of Hylton Jolliffe, Esq. is predominant.

The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Buriton, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester. The chapel is dedicated to St. Peter. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. Churcher's college was founded and endowed with £3000 by Richard Churcher, in 1722, for boarding, clothing, and educating from ten to twelve boys, who should be subsequently apprenticed to masters of ships voyaging to the East Indies: this institution was further regulated by act of parliament, obtained in 1744; the annual income is £568. 8. 8.; the master receives a salary of £40 per annum, and is allowed to take boarders and day scholars: there are twelve boys on the foundation. One poor child is eligible for apprenticeship from this town, every alternate year, by means of a benefaction from Bishop Lanney to the parish of Buriton. There is an unendowed almshouse, consisting of four tenements, for poor and aged persons, founded by Thomas Antrobus, in 1622.

PETERSHAM, a parish in the first division of the hundred of KINGSTON, county of SURREY, 7 miles (S. W. by W.) from London, containing 516 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Kew, in the archdeaconry of Surrey, and diocese of Winchester. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. Petersham gives the title of viscount to the family of Stanhope, Earls of Harrington.

PETERSTONE, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of WENTLLOOG, county of MONMOUTH, 6½ miles (S. S. W.) from Newport, containing 122 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaff, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of William Jones, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

PETERSTOW, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of WORMELOW, county of HEREFORD, 3 miles (W. by N.) from Ross, containing 277 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £7. 10. 10., and in the patronage of the Governors of Guy's Hospital, London. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

PETHAM, a parish in the hundred of BRIDGE and PETHAM, lathe of ST. AUGUSTINE, county of KENT, 6 miles (S. S. W.) from Canterbury, containing 536 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, with that of Waltham annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £8. 0. 2½., and in the alternate patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and Sir J. C. Honywood, Bart. The church, dedicated to All Saints, is principally in the early style of English architecture. The parish is bounded on the east by the ancient Stane-street.

PETHERICK (LITTLE), a parish in the hundred of PYDER, county of CORNWALL, 2 miles (S.) from Padstow, containing 217 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Bishop of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £6. 6. 8., and in the patronage of Sir W. Molesworth, Bart. The church is dedicated to St. Petrock. A noble bridge has been built by subscription across a small river that flows through the parish and into the Camel. A small hospital is endowed with funds under the superintendence of the rector.

PETHERTON (NORTH), a parish in the northern division of the hundred of PETHERTON, county of SOMERSET, 3¼ miles (S. by W.) from Bridg-water, containing 3091 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Taunton, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £27. 7. 11., and in the patronage of the Rev. W. George. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a fine structure with a lofty tower, in the later English style. The navigable river Parret, and the Bridg-water and Taunton canal, pass through the parish, which is one of the most extensive in the county. The village, which consists of one well-built street on the turnpike-road from Bridg-water to Taunton, had formerly a large market, principally for corn, which has long been disused; but two considerable fairs are still held for cattle and pedlary, on May 1st and the Monday before November 13th. The principal bequests for the education of children are a house and land, the gift of Dorothy Cheek, in 1687, for teaching six or more; the sum of £500, by Sir Thomas Wroth, in 1721, and a rent-charge of £2, by Thomas Bacon; the two latter produce an income of about £41 a year, for which twenty boys are clothed and instructed in a school-room erected by the late John Slade, Esq.

PETHERTON (SOUTH), a market town and parish in the southern division of the hundred of PETHERTON, county of SOMERSET, 5½ miles (N. by W.) from Crewkerne, and 130 (W. S. W.) from London, containing 2090 inhabitants. This town is ancient, and derives its name from the river Peder, or Parret, which passes it on the east, over which, on the old Roman Fosse-way, is a stone bridge of three arches; it was formerly of wood, but rebuilt in its present state by the parents of two children who were drowned in the river, and whose effigies are placed upon it to commemorate the event. It comprises three principal streets, which, by uniting, form a triangle. A few of the inhabitants are engaged in the manufacture of dowlas and sail-cloth; and on the river are several corn-mills. The markets, formerly considerable, but now on the decline, are on Thursday and Saturday; and a fair, principally for lambs, is held on the 6th of July. Courts leet for the manor and hundred are held annually in October. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Taunton, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £24, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Bristol. The church, which is dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul, is a spacious cruciform edifice, with an octangular tower surmounted by a spire. There are two places of worship for Independents, and one each for Baptists and Wesleyan Methodists. The free school was founded, about 1732, by William Glandfield, who bequeathed £60, augmented, in 1739, by Mary Prowse, who bequeathed £100, and by a further bequest from Thomas Musgrave, commuted for £100 in the four per cents., for educating and clothing poor children: twenty boys are instructed, and occasionally clothed by subscription: the salary of the master is £30 per annum. In 1720, a large earthen vessel, full of Roman coins, was dug up in a field near the bridge; and other Roman antiquities have at different times been discovered in the vicinity.

PETHERWIN (NORTH), a parish in the hundred of BLACK TORRINGTON, county of DEVON, 4½ miles (N. W.) from Launceston, containing 955 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £9. 10. 10., and in the patronage of the Duke of Bedford. The church is dedicated to St. Paternus.

PETHERWIN (SOUTH), a parish in the northern division of the hundred of EAST, county of CORNWALL, 3 miles (S. W. by S.) from Launceston, containing 914 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, with the curacy of Trewin annexed, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Bishop of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £9. 2. 6., and in the patronage of the Chancellor and Fellows of the University of Oxford. The church is dedicated to St. Paternus. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Fairs are held on the second Tuesdays in May and October.

PETROCKSTOW, a parish in the hundred of SHEBBEAR, county of DEVON, 4 miles (N. N. W.) from Hatherleigh, containing 571 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Barnstaple, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £17. 0. 2½., and in the patronage of Lord Clinton.

PETSOE, a hamlet in the parish of OKENEY, hundred of NEWPORT, county of BUCKINGHAM, 2½ miles (S. E. by S.) from Olney. The population is returned with Emberton, to the church of which parish the inhabitants resort. This was formerly a parish, but the church, dedicated to St. James, having been demolished, the living, a discharged rectory, was annexed to that of Okeney. Petsoe still maintains its own poor, excepting those of Petsoe-End, who are supported by the parishioners of Emberton.

PETT, a parish in the hundred of GUESTLING, rape of HASTINGS, county of SUSSEX, 3½ miles (S. W.) from Winchelsea, containing 300 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Lewes, and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £4. 15. 10., and in the patronage of Mrs. Wynch. The church is dedicated to St. Mary and St. Peter. The Royal Military canal passes through the parish.

PETTAUGH, a parish in the hundred of THREDLING, county of SUFFOLK, 2½ miles (S.) from Debenham, containing 254 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £9. 12. 1., and in the patronage of the Countess of Dysart. The church is dedicated to St. Catherine.

PETTERELL-CROOKS, a township in the parish of HESKET in the FOREST, LEATH ward, county of CUMBERLAND, 9 miles (N. N. W.) from Penrith, containing 513 inhabitants.

PETTISTREE, a parish in the hundred of WILFORD, county of SUFFOLK, ¾ of a mile (S. by W.) from Wickham-Market, containing 260 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, to which that of Lowdham has been annexed, the church of that parish having been demolished; it is in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul.

PETTON, a parish in the hundred of PIMHILL, county of SALOP, 6¼ miles (S. S. E.) from Ellesmere, containing 48 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £3. 4. 2., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Crown.

PETWORTH, a market town and parish, in the hundred of ROTHERBRIDGE, rape of ARUNDEL, county of SUSSEX, 14 miles (N. E. by N.) from Chichester, and 49 (S. W. by S.) from London, containing 2781 inhabitants.

VOL. III.

This ancient town, called in Domesday-book Peteorde, is situated on a small branch of the Arun, near the navigable river Rother, and on the high road from London to Arundel and Chichester. It is in general well built, and consists of several irregular streets: the inhabitants are supplied with water from a spring in the Earl of Egremont's park, and from wells, but principally from the Rother, by means of an engine at Coultershall-mill, whence it is conveyed through pipes: the Rother is navigable about a mile and a half south of the town, and joins the river Arun at Stopham, about five miles south-east, being crossed by a bridge at Coultershall in this parish. The market is on Saturday, for corn; and fairs are on Holy Thursday and November 20th, for cattle and corn. In the centre of the town is the market-house, a handsome edifice adorned at one end with a bust of William III.; the lower part consists of piazzas, with an open space for holding the market, and above is the court-room for transacting public business. A capital court baron for the honour and manor is holden annually, under the Earl of Egremont: formerly there was a court baron for pleas under 40s., but it has long since fallen into disuse. A court leet under the Duke of Norfolk, for the hundred of Rotherbridge, is held annually; the Epiphany and Easter quarter sessions for the western division of the county are held in the court-room; as is also a petty session of magistrates, every alternate Saturday. The bride-well, or house of correction, a brick building, was erected in 1787, on Howard's plan; it stands in a healthy situation, and contains a tread-mill: the prisoners are employed in manufacturing rugs, horse-cloths, and other coarse woollen articles.

The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £41. 10. 5., and in the patronage of the Earl of Egremont. The church, which is dedicated to St. Mary, and was erected apparently about the time of Henry VII., is in the decorated style, and has recently undergone reparation, having also received two hundred additional sittings, of which one hundred and twenty-six are free, and towards defraying the expense, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches contributed £70: the greater part of the tower has been rebuilt, with the addition of a beautiful spire, one hundred and eighty feet high, the whole having been executed, in a superior manner, under the direction of Mr. C. Barry, architect, and at the sole expense of the Earl of Egremont. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. The free school, called Taylor's charity, which was founded in 1753, by the Rev. John Taylor, who bequeathed the sum of £2400, for instructing and apprenticing twenty poor children, and for other purposes, and a further sum of £800 for clothing them, has merged into a large school on the National system, for children of both sexes, which is supported by voluntary contribution. Thompson's hospital, for twelve poor men and women, was founded in 1618, by Thomas Thompson, Gent., and originally endowed with land for the payment of £5 a year to each of the inmates; which sum, from the accumulation of the funds, has been increased to £20. Almshouses were founded, in 1746, by Charles, Duke of Somerset, for twenty-two widows, each of whom receives £20 per annum; in addition to which, several widows, as out-pensioners, receive annual sums varying from £5 to £20. Donations of £12 each per annum to two clergymen's widows of the neighbourhood, and of £6 each to two poor tradesmen, to assist them in business, were included in the bequests of the above-mentioned Rev. John Taylor, founder of the free school.

PEVENSEY, a parish and a member of the town and port of Hastings, locally in the lowey and rape of Pevensey, county of SUSSEX, 6 miles (S.E. by E.) from Hailsham, and 60 (S.E. by S.) from London, containing 292 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Lewes, and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £18. 7. 8½, and in the patronage of the Chancellor of the Cathedral Church of Chichester. The church, dedicated to St. Nicholas, is in the early style of English architecture. The manor of Pevensey is in ancient records styled the honour of Aquila, or the Eagle. Somner considers this to have been the Anderida of the Romans; it was by the Saxons called Peowensea, by the Normans Pevensel, and is now vulgarly pronounced Pemsey. It is known to have been anciently much resorted to as a sea-port, and various historical circumstances connected with it occur so early as the invasion of England by Sweyn, King of Denmark, and again, in the reign of Edward the Confessor, when Godwin, Earl of Kent, is stated to have taken several ships from it. It is distinguished as the place of landing of William the Conqueror, in 1066; who thence proceeded to, and fortified, Hastings castle, previously to the conflict which took place at Battle, eight miles distant. On ascending the throne, William gave Pevensey to his half-brother, Earl Robert, who fortified it with a noble castle, now in ruins. It subsequently reverted to the crown, and was, by Henry I., bestowed on Gilbert de Aquila, from whom it afterwards assumed the name of the Honour of the Eagle, the castle being esteemed the head of that honour. The lordship afterwards passed through several hands: John of Gaunt had a grant, in tail general, of the castle and leucata of Pevensey, from whom it descended to the king, in the person of his son and heir, Henry IV. It was, by the latter, given to Sir John Pelham, and continued in that family till disposed of by the late Lord Pelham to its present proprietor. It lies in the parishes of Pevensey, Halysham, Westham, and Boxhill. Pevensey is at present a small village, standing on a rivulet which runs into Pevensey bay. Its decline from the importance it once possessed has been, like several other places in this neighbourhood, principally owing to the receding of the sea, from which it is now a considerable distance, being only accessible to small boats, which crowd up the stream on which it is situated: it has still a corporation, consisting of a bailiff, jurats, and commonalty. A fair for live stock is held on the 5th of July. Here is a National school for children of both sexes. The remains of Pevensey castle, an interesting relic of antiquity, are situated on a craggy steep, commanding a beautiful view of the adjacent country. The external walls are circular, and enclose an area of seven acres, being, together with the towers, tolerably entire for the height of twenty-five feet: they display throughout abundance of Roman bricks, affording the strongest presumption of there having originally been a Roman fortress on the spot. Tradition informs us, that the rock on which the castle is built was once on a level with the sea; and, from fossils and shells of various sorts, occasionally met with about the base, the account is most probably true. The Duke of York, in the reign of Henry IV., was for some time confined within the walls of this castle. Andrew Borde, in Latin Perforatus, physician to Henry VIII., and, from his jocularities, thought to have given origin to the appellation of "Merry Andrew," was a native of this village.

PEVINGTON, a parish in the hundred of CALEHILL, lathe of SCRAY, county of KENT, 4 miles (S.W. by W.) from Charing. The population is returned with the parish of Pluckley. The living is a rectory, united to that of Pluckley, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £5. 13. 4. The church, now in ruins, was dedicated to St. Mary.

PEWSEY, or PUSEY, a parish in the hundred of GANFIELD, county of BERKS, 4½ miles (E. by N.) from Great Farringdon, containing 122 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Berks, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £8. 12. 11., endowed with £200 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £300 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Salisbury. The church, dedicated to All Saints, was rebuilt at the expense of Mr. Allen Pusey, who died in 1789, and to whose memory it contains a handsome marble monument. The Antiquarian Society has caused an engraving to be made of the celebrated Pusey Horn, by which the manor is held by the Pusey family. According to Dr. Hickes, the manor was possessed in his time by Charles Pusey, Esq., who had recovered it in Chancery before Lord Chancellor Jefferies, when the horn being produced in court, was proved to be the identical horn by which, under a charter, Canute the Great granted the manor to his ancestor, seven hundred years before. The horn is that of an ox, of a dark brown colour, and may have been used either as a hunting or a drinking horn, but more particularly the former.

PEWSEY, a parish in the hundred of KINWARDSTONE, county of WILTS, 6 miles (S.W.) from Great Bedwin, containing 1337 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Wilts, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £26. 16. 8., and in the patronage of the Earl of Radnor. The church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, has lately received an addition of one hundred and five sittings, of which ninety are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £25 towards defraying the expense. The petty sessions for the division are held here.

PEWSHAM, an extra-parochial liberty, in the hundred of CHIPPENHAM, county of WILTS, 1½ mile (S.E. by S.) from Chippenham, containing 322 inhabitants.

PEXALL, a joint township with Henbury, in the parish of PRESTBURY, hundred of MACCLESFIELD, county palatine of CHESTER, 3 miles (W. S. W.) from Macclesfield. The population is returned with Henbury.

PEYTON, a chapelry in the parish and hundred of BAMPTON, county of DEVON, 4 miles (N. E.) from Bampton, with which the population is returned.

PHILLACK, a parish in the hundred of PENWITH, county of CORNWALL, 7½ miles (N.E. by N.) from Marazion, containing 2529 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with that of Gwithian annexed, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £45. 10. 10., and in the patronage of the Rev. William Hockin. The church is dedicated to St. Felix. This parish includes the port of Hayle, also several villages, the principal of which, Hayle Copper House, carries on a considerable trade in coal, timber, iron, and limestone, imported from Wales; and earthenware, groceries, &c., from Bristol: the chief exports are copper-ore, in considerable quantities, from the western mines. Extensive improvements have been recently made in the harbour by canals, flood-gates, wharfs, &c.; and a grand causeway, one thousand and forty feet in length, across an arm of the sea, was finished in 1826, at the expense of £7200: a weekly market has been established, and a market-house erected. Here is the largest and most complete iron-foundry and factory in Cornwall, where apparatus for steam-engines of the greatest dimensions are made. The smelting and refining of copper were formerly carried on to a great extent, but within these last few years the works have ceased, owing to the great expense, and the arsenic smoke having been found destructive to the health of the workmen, and to vegetation in general. There is a smelting-house for tin at Argarrack. The great wheal Alfred, which formerly produced one thousand tons of copper-ore per month, and several other mines, are within this parish, though none are at present in operation. The north side of the parish is overwhelmed with sand, blown up from the coast of St. Ives bay. There was once a castle at Hayle Bar Riviere, and another at Castle Hayle, of which the moat still remains.

PHILLEIGH, or FILLEY, a parish in the western division of the hundred of POWDER, county of CORNWALL, 6 miles (S.W.) from Tregoney, containing 395 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £15. 6. 0½. The Trustees of T. Bedford, Esq. were patrons in 1804. The church is dedicated to St. Felix. The navigable river Mopus bounds the parish on the west, and Tregoney river runs on the north.

PHILLYHOLME, a tything in that part of the parish of HAWKCHURCH which is in the hundred of UGGSCOMBE, Dorchester division of the county of DORSET, containing 558 inhabitants.

PHOSIDE, a liberty in the parish of GLOSSOP, hundred of HIGH PEAK, county of DERBY, 4 miles (N. by W.) from Chapel en le Frith, containing 504 inhabitants. Mary Trickett, in 1712, and John Hague, in 1782, each bequeathed a small sum for teaching poor children.

PICKBURN, a joint township with Brodsworth, in the parish of BRODSWORTH, northern division of the wapentake of STRAFFORTH and TICKHILL, West riding of the county of YORK, 4½ miles (N.W.) from Doncaster. The population is returned with Brodsworth.

PICKENHAM (NORTH), a parish in the southern division of the hundred of GREENHOE, county of NORFOLK, 3½ miles (S.E. by E.) from Swaffham, containing 218 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, with that of Houghton on the Hill annexed, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £5. 14. 2., and in the patronage of the Rev. Henry Say. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew.

PICKENHAM (SOUTH), a parish in the southern division of the hundred of GREENHOE, county of NORFOLK, 4½ miles (S.E. by S.) from Swaffham, containing 146 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £8. 1. 5½., and in the patronage of C. W. Chute, Esq. The church is dedicated to All Saints. The north window of the chancel exhibits some fragments of ancient stained glass, which, when perfect, represented the Salutation. Attached to the north side was a chapel, erected by Henry, younger son of Sir Henry Hobart, Knt., Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, whose remains lie buried there; it has long been dilapidated and is overgrown with ivy.

PICKERING, a parish in PICKERING lythe, North riding of the county of YORK, comprising the market town of Pickering, the chapelry of Goadland, or Goathland, and the townships of Kingthorp, Marrishes, and Newton, and containing 3555 inhabitants, of which number, 2746 are in the town of Pickering, 26 miles (N.N.E.) from York, and 222 (N. by W.) from London. The origin of this town is of very remote antiquity, being dated two hundred and seventy years before the commencement of the Christian era, and ascribed to Peridurus, a British king, who was interred here, on the brow of a hill called Rawcliff. According to local tradition, its name is derived from the circumstance of a ring lost by the founder whilst washing in the river Costa, and subsequently found in the belly of a pike. An ancient castle, of great strength and extent, which occupied an eminence near the western extremity of the town, where some vestiges are still visible, was the prison of Richard II., after his deposition, and previously to his removal to Pontefract, where he was murdered: in one of the towers still remaining Queen Elizabeth is supposed to have been imprisoned, during the reign of Mary, and it still retains the name of Queen Elizabeth's tower. During the great civil war this fortress was besieged by the parliamentary forces, and sustained considerable injury. The town, which is long and straggling, is situated on a declivity, at the bottom of which, and through a part of the town, flows a small stream, called Pickering-beck: the castle hill commands a fine view of the fertile vale of Pickering, and on one side is a barren mountainous district, called Black, or Blake moor, which extends to a considerable distance, and furnishes materials for making brooms: on the river Costa, which rises at Kildhead, and upon the old Beck stream, are several flour-mills. The market is on Monday; and fairs are held on the Mondays before February 14th and May 13th, on September 25th, and on the Monday before November 23rd. Pickering was formerly of more importance than it is at present, having been the principal town in this district; in the 23rd of Edward I. it sent members to parliament. It is the head of an honour in the duchy of Lancaster, having jurisdiction throughout the lythe and wapentake, which are co-extensive, including two market towns and forty-six townships. A manorial court, for all actions under 40s. arising within the honour, is held on the second and third Mondays after Easter, and on the first and second Mondays after Michaelmas, in Queen Elizabeth's tower in the castle. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Dean of York, rated in the king's books at £8. 3. 9. The church, which is dedicated to St. Peter, is an ancient and spacious edifice, with a lofty spire. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists. The free school is supported by the interest of various endowments, and rent-charges, of unknown origin, amounting to about £80, with some subsequent small legacies, vested in trustees, and applied, under their direction, for the instruction of the children of poor inhabitants: the average number is one hundred and fifty. On Pickering moor are vestiges of two Roman encampments of great strength, and several others between the barrows and the town, as well as on the western moors.

PICKHILL, a parish comprising the township of Holme with Howgrave, in the wapentake of ALLERTON-SHIRE, and the townships of Ainderby-Quernhow, Howe, Pickhill with Roxby, Sinderby, and Swainby with Allarthorp, in the wapentake of HALLIKELD, North riding of the county of YORK, and containing 686 inhabitants, of which number, 334 are in the township of Pickhill with Roxby, 7 miles (W. by N.) from Thirsk. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £5. 13. 4., endowed with £400 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Trinity College, Cambridge. The church is dedicated to All Saints. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Sarah Eden, in 1742, bequeathed £200 for teaching twenty poor children. The river Swale forms the eastern boundary of the parish. Here was once a castle, and there are still some fields called the Roman fields.

PICKMERE, a township in that part of the parish of GREAT BUDWORTH which is in the hundred of BUCKLOW, county palatine of CHESTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.E.) from Northwich, containing 217 inhabitants.

PICKTON, a township in that part of the parish of PLEMONSTALL which is in the lower division of the hundred of BROXTON, county palatine of CHESTER, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N.E.) from Chester, containing 93 inhabitants.

PICKTON, a township in the parish of KIRK-LEAVINGTON, western division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, North riding of the county of YORK, 4 miles (S.) from Yarm, containing 94 inhabitants.

PICKWELL, a parish forming a detached portion of the hundred of GARTREE, being locally in that of Guthlaxton, county of LEICESTER, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. S.E.) from Melton-Mowbray, containing, with the hamlet of Leesthorpe, 167 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Leicester, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £16, and in the patronage of Sir G. Noel, Bart. The church is dedicated to All Saints. Dr. William Cave, an eminent church historian, was born here in 1637.

PICKWORTH, a parish in the wapentake of AVELAND, parts of KESTIVEN, county of LINCOLN, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W.) from Falkingham, containing 186 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £11. 12. $3\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Duke of St. Albans. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew.

PICKWORTH, a parish in EAST hundred, county of RUTLAND, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Stamford, containing 140 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, annexed to that of Great Casterton, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £4. Of the church, which was dedicated to All Saints, only the steeple is remaining.

PIDDINGHOE, a parish in the hundred of HOLMSTROW, rape of LEWES, county of SUSSEX, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by E.) from Lewes, containing 251 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Lewes, and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £7. 14. 2. Thomas Crewe, and J. Philpot, Esqrs., were patrons in 1825. The church, which is principally of flint, with a circular tower, is in the early style of English architecture. The parish is bounded on the east by the Ouse, or Lewes river, and on the south by the English channel.

PIDDINGTON, a parish in the hundred of WYMERSLEY, county of NORTHAMPTON, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E. by S.) from Northampton, containing, with the hamlet of Hackleton, 871 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, united to the vicarage of Horton, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. Limestone is obtained in the parish.

PIDDINGTON, a parish in the hundred of BULLINGTON, though locally in that of Ploughley, county of OXFORD, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Bicester, containing 359 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Oxford, and in the patronage of the Parishioners. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas.

PIDDLE (NORTH), a parish in the upper division of the hundred of PERSHORE, county of WORCESTER, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by S.) from Worcester, containing 133 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, rated in the king's books at £9. 1. 3., and in the patronage of Earl Somers. The church is dedicated to St. Michael.

PIDDLEHINTON, a parish in the liberty of PIDDLEHINTON, Dorchester division of the county of DORSET, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N.E.) from Dorchester, containing 853 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £17. 3. 9., and in the patronage of the Provost and Fellows of Eton College. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. The small river Piddle runs through the parish. A school is supported by annual donations averaging about £16.

PIDDLETOWN, a parish in the hundred of PIDDLETOWN, Dorchester division of the county of DORSET, 5 miles (N. E. by E.) from Dorchester, containing 961 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £31. 2. 11. The Rev. G. H. Templer was patron in 1822. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a large structure with an embattled tower, partly in the decorated, and partly in the later English, style: the font is curiously carved with trellice-work and foliage. This extensive parish is bounded on the north by the river Piddle, and had formerly a market, long since disused, and two fairs, which are still held on April 8th and October 29th, for horses, bullocks, hogs, and sheep.

PIDDLETRENTSHIDE, a parish in the liberty of PIDDLETRENTSHIDE, Cerne subdivision of the county of DORSET, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Dorchester, containing 590 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £19. 10. 5., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Winchester. The church is dedicated to All Saints. John Harding, in 1750, left the sum of £431. 13., the interest to be applied for teaching poor children.

PIDLEY, a parish in the hundred of HURSTINGSTONE, county of HUNTINGDON, 2 miles (W. N. W.) from Somersham, containing, with the hamlet of Fenton, 374 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, united to the rectory of Somersham, in the archdeaconry of Huntingdon, and diocese of Lincoln. The church is dedicated to All Saints. A school here is endowed with about £20 per annum, arising from the bequests of unknown benefactors.

PIECOMBE, a parish in the hundred of POYNINGS, rape of LEWES, county of SUSSEX, 3 miles (S.) from Hurst-Pierrepont, containing 218 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Lewes, and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £15. 8. 9., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is in the later style of English architecture.

PIERRE (ST.), a parish in the upper division of the hundred of CALDICOTT, county of MONMOUTH, 3 miles (S. W. by S.) from Chepstow, containing, with the hamlet of Runston, 81 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, annexed to that of Portscuett, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaff, rated in the king's books at £3. 12. $3\frac{1}{2}$., and endowed with £200 royal bounty.

PIERSE-BRIDGE, a township in that part of the parish of GAINFORD which is in the south-western division of DARLINGTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Darlington, containing 236 inhabitants. This place occupies the site of a considerable Roman station, the north and west sides of the vallum, and part of the south side, being still conspicuous. The Roman road, called Watling-street, passes a few yards to the east of it, and many coins and other antiquities, particularly a fine altar and several urns, have been found. There is a stone bridge over the river Tees at this place, said to have been built by two priests, who erected near it a chapel, of which there are still some remains. About two hundred yards below the present bridge, foundations of a more ancient one were visible a few years ago, but every vestige has been since swept away by the floods.

PIGDON, a township in that part of the parish of MITFORD which is in the western division of MORPETH ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Morpeth, containing 36 inhabitants.

PIGLESTHORNE, a parish in the hundred of COTESLOE, county of BUCKINGHAM, 1 mile (S. by W.) from Ivinghoe, containing, with the chapelry of Nettle-den with Friesden, 461 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Trustees of the late Earl of Bridgewater. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. The Grand Junction canal passes through the parish.

PILETON, a township in that part of the parish of PENKRIDGE which is in the eastern division of the hundred of CUTTLESTONE, county of STAFFORD, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (E. S. E.) from Penkridge, with which the population is returned.

PILHAM, a parish in the wapentake of CORRINGHAM, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Gainsborough, containing 102 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Stow, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £6. 3. 4., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

PILKINGTON, a township in the parish of OLDHAM cum PRESTWICH, hundred of SALFORD, county palatine of LANCASTER, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by W.) from Bury, containing 8976 inhabitants. The manufacture of silk and cotton is here carried on to a great extent. Henry Siddall, in 1688, devised a messuage and land towards the endowment of a free grammar school; the income is £30 a year, but the boys are not educated gratuitously, there being eleven day scholars, who pay £5. 5. per annum each.

PILL (ST. GEORGE'S), a chapelry in the parish of EASTON in GORDANO, hundred of PORTBURY, county of SOMERSET, 6 miles from Bristol, containing nearly 2000 inhabitants. The chapel contains six hundred free sittings, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having contributed £450 for that purpose. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists. This is a pilot station for the port of Bristol, being situated at the mouth of the river Avon. The Roman Fosseway passes through it, and Roman coins, urns, and fibulae, have been found here.

PILLATON, a parish in the middle division of EAST hundred, county of CORNWALL, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.) from Callington, containing 452 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £16. 15. $7\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of Edward Helyar, Esq. The parish is bounded on the west by the small river Lyner, and on the east by the river Tamar, which separates it from Devonshire. There is a mine of antimony, but not at present in operation. A fair is held on Whit-Tuesday.

PILLERTON-HERSEY, a parish in the Brails division of the hundred of KINGTON, county of WARWICK, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Kington, containing 268 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Pillerton-Priors, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, rated in the king's books at £8, endowed with £643 private benefaction, and £1200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Rev. Francis Mills. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, bears the architectural character of Queen Mary's time. The parish is situated to the westward of a lofty range of hills, called Edge Hills, of historical celebrity. Limestone exists here.

PILLERTON-PRIORS, a parish in the Brails division of the hundred of KINGTON, county of WARWICK, 4 miles (S. W. by W.) from Kington, containing 211 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Pillerton-Hersey, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester. The church, which was dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene, was burnt down in 1666. This place received the adjunct to its name from having formerly belonged to Kenilworth priory.

PILLING, a chapelry in the parish of GARSTANG, hundred of AMOUNDERNESS, county palatine of LANCASTER, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Garstang, containing 1043 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, endowed with £400 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £1100 parliamentary grant. G. Hornby, Esq. was patron in 1802. The chapel, consecrated in 1721, is dedicated to St. John the Baptist. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Robert Carter, in 1710, gave a house, land, and £60, towards the support of a school; the income is about £40 a year, for which sum from fifteen to thirty children are instructed.

PILSDON, a parish in the hundred of WHITCHURCH - CANONICORUM, Bridport division of the county of DORSET, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S) from Beaminster, containing 100 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £7. The Hon. Lady Damer was patroness in 1802. The church is small and very ancient.

PILSGATE, a hamlet in the parish of BARNACK, liberty of PETERBOROUGH, county of NORTHAMPTON, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Stamford, containing 153 inhabitants.

PILSLEY, a hamlet in the parish of EDENSOR, hundred of HIGH PEAK, county of DERBY, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Bakewell, containing 243 inhabitants. Pilsley is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Chapel en le Frith every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s.

PILSLEY, a hamlet in the parish of CHESTERFIELD, hundred of SCARSDALE, county of DERBY, 6 miles (S. S. E.) from Chesterfield, containing 284 inhabitants.

PILSWORTH, a township in the parish of MIDDLETON, hundred of SALFORD, county palatine of LANCASTER, 3 miles (S. E.) from Bury, containing 499 inhabitants.

PILTON, a parish in the hundred of BRAUNTON, county of DEVON, $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile (N.) from Barnstaple, containing 1230 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the jurisdiction of the Precentor of the Cathedral Church of Wells, endowed with £8 per annum and £200 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of — Basset, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Margaret, contains a wooden screen and a stone pulpit, also a handsome monument to Sir John Chichester, dated 1569. A Benedictine priory, a cell to the abbey of Malmesbury, was founded here by King Athelstan; it was dedicated to the Blessed Virgin Mary, and at the dissolution had a revenue of £56. 12. 8. The prior, in 1345, obtained for Pilton the grant of a weekly market and an annual fair. An ancient hermitage is said to have been established here; and an hospital, founded in honour of St. Margaret, before 1191, is still in existence; the inmates are a prior, brother, and sister. Pilton communicates with Barnstaple by a bridge over the river Yeo.

PILTON, a parish in the hundred of NAVISFORD, county of NORTHAMPTON, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Oundle, containing 116 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £11, and in the patronage of Sir G. Robinson, Bart. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is principally in the early style of English architecture, with a tower and spire.

PILTON, a parish in the hundred of WRANDIKE, county of RUTLAND, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Uppingham, containing 66 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £4. 17. $3\frac{1}{2}$, and in the patronage of Sir Gilbert Heathcote, Bart. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas. The small river Charter bounds the parish on the north: and limestone is obtained in the southern part of it.

PILTON, a parish in the hundred of WHITESTONE, county of SOMERSET, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W.) from Shepton-Mallet, containing, with the chapelry of North Wotton, and the hamlet of West Holm, which is in the hundred of Glaston-Twelve-Hides, 1100 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Precentor of the Cathedral Church of Wells, rated in the king's books at £7, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, has lately received an addition of one hundred and twelve sittings, of which seventy-six are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £40 towards defraying the expense. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The Roman Fosse-way passes through the parish. An old building, now used as a barn, formerly belonged to Glastonbury abbey.

PIMLICO, a parochial district, formerly a chapelry in the parish of ST. GEORGE, HANOVER-SQUARE, liberty of the city of WESTMINSTER, county of MIDDLESEX, 3 miles (S. W. by W.) from St. Paul's. The population is returned with the parish. The origin of this place is comparatively modern, but the name is of earlier date, though at what period, or on what occasion, it was appropriated to the suburb of the metropolis westward of St. James' and the Green Park, is uncertain. Most, if not all the present buildings are of a date subsequent to the erection of Buckingham House, in the beginning of the last century. The eastern part of Pimlico contains a range of handsome houses, called Grosvenor-place, extending southward from Hyde Park corner, and fronting the Green Park and the Royal gardens; and the ground to the west, between Knightsbridge and Chelsea, is partly occupied by many well-executed and several truly magnificent buildings, both public and private, which, when completed, will form various streets and squares, that may vie with the contemporary erections in the Regent's Park. To the north is Wilton-crescent, a semicircular range of buildings, with another along the diameter, the latter ornamented in front with Corinthian pilasters. Eaton-place and Wilton-place contain some handsome and much embellished mansions, especially the former. Belgrave-square, which perhaps may be fairly termed the finest square in the metropolis, includes in its plan four detached lines of buildings, respectively fronting the east, west, north, and south, with four isolated structures at the angles, of which last one only is yet completed, a mansion, with low wings and a good Ionic portico in the centre. The four lateral lines of houses are embellished with various architectural ornaments: the fronts of those on the eastern and western sides have corresponding decorations, and the central houses on each of the four sides are ornamented with columns and sculpture, as also in a less degree are those near the extremities; but the central edifice on the south side is the most remarkable, having in the lower story a colonnade with highly enriched capitals, and in the principal story Corinthian columns, the windows of the attic story, as well as the parapet, having sculptured ornaments: this edifice is from the design of G. Bassevi, architect. The opposite house, on the north side of the square, has a similar front, exclusively of the colonnade; and the corresponding edifices in general, being uniform in plan and decorations, afford a display of much architectural taste and elegance. From this square, Belgrave-street forms a noble avenue to Eaton-square, of which only the eastern part, including the new church of St. Peter, and some detached portions, is yet erected.

The royal palace, now almost completed, stands on the site of Buckingham House, so called, because it was erected, in 1703, by John Sheffield, Duke of Buckingham, on a piece of ground which had been a place of public entertainment, called the Mulberry Gardens. Buckingham House was purchased as a residence for the Queen, in 1761, by a grant from parliament of £21,000. The entrance to the new palace is through a triumphal arch, said to be the largest work of the kind executed in modern times, and equalling, in its dimensions and general effect, the Arch of Constantine at Rome. It consists of three gateways, that in the centre rising to the architrave; over those on the sides are tablets, containing on one side female representatives of England, Scotland, and Ireland; and on the other the Genius of England inciting youth: between the arches are columns twenty feet high, which will support groups of trophies and figures; and behind is a representation in bold relief of the battle of Waterloo. On the opposite side, fronting the palace, is a representation of the battle of Trafalgar; and this structure, which is about sixty feet high, will be adorned above with several figures, and surmounted by a bronze equestrian statue of His Majesty. The gates will be of Mosaic gold, and a handsome palisade will connect this building with the wings of the palace, enclosing a quadrangle, surrounded by a peristyle of Grecian Doric columns. The principal order of the palace is the Roman Corinthian, raised on a Doric basement. The central portion of the front is a porte cochere, superior portico of eight coupled columns, and corresponding towers, with four columns each at both extremities. The tympanum of the central portico is filled with sculpture, and the pediment crowned with statues. The projecting wings, or sides, of the quadrangle are less embellished, the centre compartments only (forming the entrances respectively to the Lord Steward's and Lord Chamberlain's apartments) are decorated with pilasters, and adorned, the one with a clock tower, and the other with a wind tower, both enriched with appropriate groups of sculpture: the ends of the wings towards the park display Corinthian porticos, with statues, and other sculptured ornaments. In the centre of the edifice is a cupola yet unfinished, which will be adorned with ribs and other decorations. The entrance under the portico leads into a handsome hall, beyond which is the guard-chamber; and from the hall the grand staircase, which is of white marble, and consists of a centre, with two returning flights, conducts to the state apartments, consisting of the saloon, throne chamber, picture gallery, state bed-chamber, and drawing-rooms, all which are of noble dimensions, and, when finished, will display the utmost splendour and magnificence of style and embellishment. To make room for the enlargement of this magnificent edifice, and for the arrangement of the grounds belonging to it, a considerable number of dwelling-houses will be taken down in its vicinity, and the entire neighbourhood laid out on an improved plan. The architect of the new palace is Mr. Nash, whose taste and professional skill are said to have been assisted by the suggestions of the late royal proprietor, George IV. The principal streets and squares of Pimlico are well paved and lighted with gas, under the direction of commissioners appointed by act of parliament; and water is supplied chiefly from the Chelsea water-works, which were constructed in 1724, when the proprietors were incorporated by act of parliament, and a canal was made from the Thames, near Ranelagh, to Pimlico, whence the water is conveyed by pipes to the reservoirs in Hyde Park and the Green Park. Here are saw-mills, a Roman cement manufactory, white lead works, and a distillery; and on the banks of the Grosvenor canal, extending from the Thames, and those of the basin in which it terminates, are coal, stone, and timber wharfs. In Grosvenor-place are Tattersall's well-known betting and auction rooms, and the large establishment connected with them for the sale of horses, and the arrangement of affairs belonging to the turf; and in Halkin-street is Fozard's riding-school.

Pimlico was constituted a district, by order of the king in council, in July 1830. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, is a Grecian edifice, with a grand Ionic portico of six fluted columns, supporting a plain pediment, behind which is a square tower, surmounted by a dome and cross. The building was commenced in September, 1824, and completed in 1827, at an expense of £5555. 11. 1., granted by the parliamentary commissioners; and it contains one thousand six hundred and fifty-seven sittings, of which six hundred and forty-one are free. The incumbency is in the patronage of the Rector of St. George's, Hanover-square. The episcopal chapels are Belgrave chapel, in Halkin-street, the front of which has a noble Ionic portico of four plain columns; Charlotte chapel, in Charlotte-street, erected as a chapel of ease to St. George's, Hanover-square; Ebury chapel, near Chelsea; and the Lock chapel, Grosvenor-place. In Palace-street, near the border of St. George's parish, is Buckingham chapel, a place of worship for Independents. The new grammar school, in Ebury-street, erected in 1830, is a handsome structure, in front of which is a well-executed portico of two Doric columns between pilasters, supporting a pediment decorated with triglyphs and dentils: this institution is supported by a proprietary subscription, for the classical education of youth on moderate terms. St. George's hospital, for the sick and wounded poor, was originally established in 1733, when an edifice, which had been the residence of a nobleman, was enlarged and appropriated to the purposes of the charity. A new and handsome structure in Grosvenor-place, on the site of the old hospital, has been recently erected, consisting of a central compartment and projecting wings. The hospital is supported by the interest of property in the funds and by annual subscriptions; and attached to it is a charity for convalescents. The Lock hospital, in Grosvenor-place, was instituted in 1746, for the relief of persons suffering under syphilitic diseases; the name is said to be derived from an old French term, les Loques, signifying a house for lepers. It is supported by subscription, and the interest of funded property; and connected with it is the Lock asylum, for the reception of indigent females who have been discharged from the hospital. Near Buckingham gate stood a building called Tart Hall, erected in 1638, by Nicholas Stone, an eminent architect, for the Countess Alatheia, wife of Thomas Howard, Earl of Arundel, who formed the celebrated collection of Arundelian marbles, a part of which was placed in it. After the death of the countess the mansion became the property of her second son, Lord Stafford, who fell a victim to the popular rage against Roman Catholics, in the reign of Charles II., and at that period the statues and sculptured marbles were buried, to preserve them from the mob, who, says Pennant, "would have mistaken the statues for Popish saints." They were sold in 1720, and the house pulled down.

PIMPERNE, a parish in the hundred of PIMPERNE, Blandford (North) division of the county of DORSET, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.E.) from Blandford-Forum, containing 426 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £19. 2. 6., and in the patronage of E. B. Portman, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, has several Norman portions, particularly an enriched doorway and an arch between the nave and chancel; the font is very ancient, and in the churchyard are several coffin-shaped stones, each having a cross carved on it. There is a trifling endowment for teaching six poor children. In this parish are some irregular earth-works, anciently forming a maze, which covered about an acre of ground, but, in 1730, it was almost obliterated by the plough.

PINCHBECK, a parish in the wapentake of ELLOE, parts of HOLLAND, county of LINCOLN, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Spalding, containing 2099 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £40. 6. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. The Rev. John Caparn was patron in 1821. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is principally in the later style of English architecture. There is a place of worship for Independents. Fourteen children are instructed for a trifling rent-charge, bequeathed by James Rawlett, aided by the gifts of other charitable persons, whose names are unknown. In the garden of the mansion-house, which is an ancient moated building, was found, in 1742, a large commodus of brass; on the reverse, a female sitting on a globe, the right hand extended, and in the left a victory: several pipes of baked earth were also met with in 1743.

PINCHINGTHORPE, a township in the parish of GUILSBROUGH, eastern division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, North riding of the county of YORK, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Guilsbrough, containing 80 inhabitants.

PINDLEY, a hamlet in the parish of CLAVERDON, Henley division of the hundred of BARLICHWAY, county of WARWICK, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Henley in Arden, containing 26 inhabitants. A Cistercian nunnery, in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary, was founded here, in the time of Henry I., by Robert de Pilardinton, which, at the dissolution, had a revenue valued at £27. 14. 7.

PINHOE, a parish in the hundred of WONFORD, county of DEVON, 3 miles (N.E. by E.) from Exeter, containing 477 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £14. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Exeter. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is furnished with a screen and pulpit of wood highly enriched. Twelve poor children are instructed for about £3 a year, the united bequests of Sir Edmond Elwill and John Sanders. Pinhoe is said to have been the scene of a bloody conflict between Ethelred and the Danes, in 1001.

PINNALS, an extra-parochial liberty, in the hundred of SPARKENHOE, county of LEICESTER, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N.) from Atherstone. The population is returned with Merevale.

PINNER, a parish in the hundred of GORE, county of MIDDLESEX, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.W. by W.) from Harrow on the Hill, containing 1076 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Canterbury, endowed with £1000 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £900 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Harrow. The church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, is a large edifice, chiefly of flints, erected in 1321; in it lies interred Sir Bartholomew Shower, an eminent lawyer in the time of James II. Pinner received a grant of a weekly market from Edward III., and two fairs, one on the nativity of John the Baptist, and the other on the decollation of the same saint. At this place died, in 1798, John Zephaniah Holwell, who had been Governor of Bengal, and who published a curious and interesting account of his confinement, with many other persons, in the Black Hole at Calcutta.

PINNOCK, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of KIFTSGATE, county of GLOUCESTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Winchcombe, containing 33 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, annexed to the vicarage of Didbrook, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £3. 13. 4. The church is demolished.

PINNOCK (ST.), a parish in WEST hundred, county of CORNWALL, 4 miles (W. S. W.) from Liskeard, containing 431 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £17. 13. 6 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Rev. Joseph Pomeroy, Tilly Corington, Esq., and Joseph Austen, Esq., alternately. A stream, called Herod's Foot, runs through the parish, and there is a lead mine of the same name. A school is supported here by subscription amounting to about £10 per annum.

PINVIN, a chapelry in the parish of ST. ANDREW, PERSHORE, upper division of the hundred of PERSHORE, county of WORCESTER, 2 miles (N.N.E.) from Pershore, containing 199 inhabitants.

PINXTON, a parish in the hundred of SCARSDALE, county of DERBY, 4 miles (E. by S.) from Alfreton, containing 681 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Derby, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £6. 0. 10., and in the patronage of D. Ewes Coke, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Helena. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The Erewash canal passes through the parish, and a railway leads hence to Mansfield.

PION (CANON), county of HEREFORD. — See CANON-PION.

PION (KING'S), a parish in the hundred of STRETFORD, county of HEREFORD, 3 miles (E. S. E.) from Weobley, containing 376 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, with that of Birley, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £5. 11. 8., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of S. Peploe, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. A court leet is occasionally held here. A charity school is supported by subscription.

PIPE, a parish in the hundred of GRIMSWORTH, county of HEREFORD, 3 miles (N.) from Hereford, containing, with the township of Lyde, 141 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Dean of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £7. 3. 1½., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Hereford. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

PIPE-HILL, a hamlet in that part of the parish of ST. MICHAEL, LICHFIELD, which is in the southern division of the hundred of OFFLOW, county of STAFFORD, 1¼ mile (S. W.) from Lichfield, containing 92 inhabitants.

PIPEWELL, a hamlet partly in the parishes of GREAT OAKLEY and WILBARSTON, hundred of CORBY, and partly in the parish of RUSHTON, hundred of ROTHWELL, county of NORTHAMPTON, 6¼ miles (N. N. W.) from Kettering. An abbey for Cistercian monks, in honour of the Blessed Virgin, was founded here, in 1143, by William de Boutevylein, which, at the dissolution, had a revenue of £347. 8.

PIRBRIGHT, county of SURREY. — See PURBRIGHT.

PIRTON, a parish in the hundred of HITCHIN and PIRTON, county of HERTFORD, 3½ miles (N. W.) from Hitchin, containing 630 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, united with the rectory of Ickleford, in the archdeaconry of Huntingdon, and diocese of Lincoln. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

PIRTON, a parish in the hundred of PIRTON, county of OXFORD, 5 miles (S.) from Tetsworth, containing, with the hamlets of Assendon, Clare, Golder, and Standhill, and the liberty of Christmas-Common, 622 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Oxford, rated in the king's books at £17. 9. 4½., and in the patronage of the Dean and Canons of Christ Church, Oxford. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

PIRTON, a joint hamlet with Trescott, in that part of the parish of TETTENHALL which is in the northern division of the hundred of SEISDON, county of STAFFORD, 3 miles (W.) from Wolverhampton, containing, with Trescott, 259 inhabitants. It is within the jurisdiction of the royal peculiar court of Tettenhall.

PIRTON, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of PERSHORE, county of WORCESTER, 4½ miles (N. N. W.) from Pershore, containing 214 inhabitants.

VOL. III.

The living is a rectory, united to that of Croom-D'Abitot, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, rated in the king's books at £8. 3., and in the patronage of the Earl of Coventry. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

PISFORD, a parish in the hundred of SPELHOE, county of NORTHAMPTON, 5 miles (N.) from Northampton, containing 506 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £17. 19. 7., and in the patronage of Colonel Vyse. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, has a mixture of various styles; the south doorway is a fine specimen of the Norman, and the font is very curious and ancient. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. A branch of the river Nene, and numerous smaller streams, run through the parish. Limestone and a peculiar white soft sand abound here. Near the London road is a sepulchral tumulus, called Lyman Hill; and on a neighbouring heath is a small ancient encampment, called Barrow, or Borough Dykes, nearly obliterated by the plough.

PISHILL, a parish in the hundred of PIRTON, county of OXFORD, 5½ miles (N. N. W.) from Henley, upon Thames, containing 155 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, united with that of Nettlebed, in the jurisdiction of the peculiar court of Dorchester.

PITCHCOMB, a parish in the middle division of the hundred of DUNSTONE and KING'S BARTON, county of GLOUCESTER, 1¾ mile (S. W. by W.) from Painswick, containing 187 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, united with that of Harescomb, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester. The church was erected about 1819, on the site of a more ancient structure, and exhibits a chaste specimen of the decorated style of English architecture. There is a place of worship for Independents.

PITCHCOTT, a parish in the hundred of ASHENDON, county of BUCKINGHAM, 5¾ miles (N. W. by N.) from Aylesbury, containing 44 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £10, and in the patronage of Thomas Saunders, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Giles.

PITCHFORD, a parish in the hundred of CONDORVER, county of SALOP, 6½ miles (S. S. E.) from Shrewsbury, containing 226 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £6. 5. 5., and in the patronage of the Earl of Liverpool. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is a very ancient fabric, and much admired for its neat appearance: in it are four curious and handsome alabaster monuments of the Otley family, also a very fine oaken figure of a Knight Templar, supposed to represent a Baron de Pitchford, a crusader, who was buried here. Pitchford derives its name from a stream issuing out of a rock, and forming a well near a brook or ford adjoining the village; the surface of the water being frequently covered with an oily substance, called Petrolcum, and having a strong pitchy smell, from which has been extracted a medicinal preparation, called British oil, for which a patent was a few years since obtained: it is considered efficacious for burns, bruises, &c. The petty sessions for the division are held here.

PITCHLEY, a parish in the hundred of ORLINGBURY, county of NORTHAMPTON, 2¾ miles (S. by W.)

from Kettering, containing 452 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry. The church is dedicated to All Saints. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. William Aylworth, in 1661, bequeathed a rent-charge of £18 for the support of a free school: there is also a small endowment in land, with a house for the master, by a person unknown, for a similar purpose.

PITCOMB, a parish in the hundred of BRUTON, county of SOMERSET, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (S. W.) from Bruton, containing, with the tythings of Cole and Hadspen, 431 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Bath, and diocese of Bath and Wells, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Sir R. C. Hoare, Bart. The church is dedicated to St. Leonard: in the churchyard is an ancient stone cross, the top of which is a cross patée perfect. In the neighbouring meadows, the banks of the fish ponds formerly belonging to Glastonbury abbey may still be traced.

PITMINSTER, a parish in the hundred of TAUNTON and TAUNTON-DEAN, county of SOMERSET, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. by W.) from Taunton, containing, with the tythings of Blagdon, Duddlestone, Fulford, Leigh, Poundisford, and Trendle, 1416 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Taunton, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £15. 10. 5., and in the patronage of F. Grey Cooper, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew and St. Mary. There is a place of worship for Independents.

PITNEY, a parish in the hundred of PITNEY, county of SOMERSET, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Somerton, containing 301 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £9. 14. 9½. Wm. Pyne, and J. Williams, Esqrs. were patrons in 1825. The church is dedicated to St. John the Baptist.

PITSEA, a parish in the hundred of BARSTABLE, county of ESSEX, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Rayleigh, containing 289 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Essex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £16. 13. 4., and in the patronage of Mrs. Heathcote and others. The church is dedicated to St. Michael.

PITTINGTON, a parish in the southern division of EASINGTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Durham, comprising the townships of Hall-Garth, Shadforth, and Sherburn, and containing 808 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Durham, rated in the king's books at £14. 14. 2., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Durham. The church, dedicated to St. Lawrence, is an ancient structure, principally in the Norman style, and had formerly two chantries, in honour of St. Mary and St. Katherine. In the churchyard, among other memorials, are the effigy of a cross-legged knight, and a stone in the shape of a coffin, with a Saxon inscription. Limestone and coal abound here; and a rail-road, eight miles long, extends from Hall-Garth colliery to the river Wear at Painshaw.

PITTLEWORTH, an extra-parochial district, consisting of only one farm, in the hundred of THORNGATE, Andover division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON. The population is returned with the parish of Broughton. There was formerly a chapel, now in ruins.

PITTON, a chapelry in the parish and hundred of ALDERBURY, county of WILTS, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from Salisbury, containing 308 inhabitants. This chapelry is in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Treasurer in the Cathedral Church of Salisbury. The chapel is dedicated to St. Peter. Sir Stephen Fox, in 1711, gave £188 in support of an hospital for twelve poor persons, and for clothing and teaching twenty poor children.

PIXLEY, a parish in the hundred of RADLOW, county of HEREFORD, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Ledbury, containing 132 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £4. 0. 2½., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Earl Somers. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew.

PLAINMELLOR, a township in the parish of HALTWHISTLE, western division of TINDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by E.) from Haltwhistle, containing 184 inhabitants. It is so named from a mountain within its limits, and is bounded on the north by the South Tyne, across which there is a wooden bridge.

PLAISTOW, a ward in the parish of WEST HAM, hundred of BEACONTREE, county of ESSEX, 5 miles (E. by N.) from London. The population is returned with the parish. It is bounded on the south by the Thames, and on the west by Bow creek. The living is a district incumbency, in the archdeaconry of Essex, and diocese of London, and in the patronage of the Vicar of West Ham. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, was completed in 1830, at an expense of £4800, towards which the parliamentary commissioners contributed £2300: it is a neat edifice, in the later style of English architecture. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists.

PLAITFORD, a parish forming a distinct portion of the hundred of ALDERBURY, locally in that of Frustfield, county of WILTS, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Romsey, containing 276 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of West Grimstead, in the archdeaconry of Wilts, and diocese of Salisbury.

PLASHETS, a township in the parish of FALSTONE, north-western division of TINDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $12\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Bellingham, containing 234 inhabitants. Coal is obtained here.

PLAWSWORTH, a township in that part of the parish of CHESTER le STREET which is in the middle division of CHESTER ward, county palatine of DURHAM, 4 miles (N.) from Durham, containing 227 inhabitants.

PLAXTOL, a chapelry in the parish and hundred of WROTHAM, lathe of AYLESFORD, county of KENT, 5 miles (S. by W.) from Wrotham. The population is returned with the parish. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Canterbury, endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Rector of Wrotham.

PLAYDEN, a parish in the hundred of GOLDSBUR, rape of HASTINGS, county of SUSSEX, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile (N.) from Rye, containing 317 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, annexed to that of East Guildford, in the archdeaconry of Lewes, and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £12. Thomas P. Lamb, Esq. was patron in 1807. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is in the early style of English architecture. The river Rother and the Royal Military canal pass through the parish. Foundations of old buildings are frequently met with, denoting the population to have been formerly greater than it is now. Here was also an hospital, founded in honour of St. Bartholomew, and placed under the government of the abbey of Westminster.

PLAYFORD, a parish in the hundred of CARLFORD, county of SUFFOLK, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Ipswich, containing 264 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Marquis of Bristol. The chapel is dedicated to St. Mary.

PLEASELEY, a parish in the hundred of SCARSDALE, county of DERBY, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Mansfield, containing 529 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Derby, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £11. 4. 7., and in the patronage of Bache Thornhill, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is an ancient stone edifice, remarkably long and narrow; there is a large chasm in the steeple, caused by the shock of an earthquake, which was felt over a great part of the midland counties, on March 17th, 1816. Limestone abounds in the parish, and there are some considerable manufactories for cotton thread, hosiery, &c., principally for the Nottingham market. Pleaseley had anciently a market on Monday, granted, in 1284, to Thomas Bec, Bishop of St. David's, with a fair for three days; the former has been long disused, but fairs are now held on May 6th and October 29th, for cattle, horses, and sheep. Seven children are instructed for £9 a year, the bequest of William Pearse, in 1818, by a schoolmistress, who also superintends a Sunday school, according to the will of the donor. In the park adjoining the cotton-mills is a large enclosure, with a double vallum and intrenchments, two sides of which are secured by natural precipices: it is two hundred and fifty feet in length, by one hundred and ninety-five in breadth, and is evidently a Saxon work, though not hitherto noticed by antiquaries.

PLEASINGTON, a township in the parish, and lower division of the hundred, of BLACKBURN, county palatine of LANCASTER, 3 miles (W. by S.) from Blackburn, containing 625 inhabitants. A handsome Roman Catholic chapel, called Pleasington Priory, was erected by the late J. F. Butler Esq.

PLEDGON, a hamlet in that part of the parish of HENHAM which is in the hundred of CLAVERING, county of ESSEX, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Stansted-Mountfitchet, containing 160 inhabitants.

PLEMONSTALL, a parish comprising the townships of Hoole, Pickton, and Mickle-Trafford, in the lower division of the hundred of BROXTON, and the township of Bridge-Trafford, in the second division of the hundred of EDDISBURY, county palatine of CHESTER, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Chester, and containing 710 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Earl of Bradford. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, stands in the township of Mickle-Trafford, a mile and a half north-east of the village of that name. There is a small endowed school, erected by subscription, more than a century ago. At Trafford, in this parish, a garrison was placed for the king, by Sir William Brereton, during the siege of Chester in the parliamentary war.

PLESHEY, a parish in the hundred of DUNMOW, county of ESSEX, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Chelmsford, containing 289 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the jurisdiction of the Commissary of Essex and Herts, concurrently with the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of London, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty. W. Tuffnell, Esq. was patron in 1811. The church, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, was rebuilt of brick in 1708, chiefly by the munificence of Bishop Compton; the tower, which rose from the intersection of the ancient cruciform structure, still remaining in decay, until renovated by the late Samuel Tuffnell, Esq., who also added a handsome chancel. To the southward of the church a college was founded, about 1394, in honour of the Holy Trinity, by Thomas of Woodstock, Duke of Gloucester, sixth son of Edward III., for a master, warden, eight chaplains, two clerks, and two choristers, whose revenue, at the dissolution, was estimated at £143. 12. 7. Pleshey, though now an obscure village, was once a place of considerable importance, having been the seat of the high constables of England, from the first institution of their office till nearly four centuries after the Norman Conquest. From discoveries made here it seems to have been the site either of a Roman station, or a villa. The village is surrounded by an intrenchment, enclosing also the keep mount of the Norman fortress, of which there only remains the stone bridge, of singular construction, across the moat to the keep. The treacherous arrest of the Duke of Gloucester by Richard II. was planned while the former lay at this castle, to which the king himself came, and decoyed him from it under the pretence of a friendly invitation to London.

PLESSEY, a joint township with Shotton, in the southern division of the parish of STANNINGTON, western division of CASTLE ward, county of NORTHUMBRLAND, 6 miles (S. by E.) from Morpeth, containing, with Shotton, 395 inhabitants.

PLOMPTON, a township in the parish of SPOLFORTH, upper division of the wapentake of CLARO, West riding of the county of YORK, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Knaresborough, containing 208 inhabitants. It is within the jurisdiction of the peculiar court of the honour of Knaresborough.

PLUCKLEY, a parish in the hundred of CALEHILL, lathe of SCRAY, county of KENT, 3 miles (S. W.) from Charing, containing, with Pevington, 663 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with that of Pevington united, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £20. 1. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas. A fair is held on Whit-Tuesday, for toys, and another on December 6th, for cattle and hogs, which are brought in great numbers, the prices they bear here generally regulating those at the neighbouring markets. A school is supported by voluntary subscriptions.

PLUMBLAND, a parish in ALLERDALE ward below Darwent, county of CUMBERLAND, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Cockermouth, containing 396 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Carlisle, rated in the king's books at £20. 14. 9½, and in the patronage of C. Curwen, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Cuthbert. Coal and limestone abound here, and much of the latter is burned into lime. Freestone of an inferior quality is also obtained. There is an excellent free school, founded in 1759, by Captain John Sibson, who endowed it with lands now producing an annual income of £87: the school-house was erected of freestone in 1800, and contains two very spacious rooms, one for teaching the classics, the other for English and the mathematics; also an entrance porch and clock tower.

PLUMLEY, a township in that part of the parish of GREAT BUDWORTH which is in the hundred of BUCKLOW, county palatine of CHESTER, 3 miles (S. W. by S.) from Nether Knutsford, containing 366 inhabitants. A school is supported by subscription amounting to about £10 per annum.

PLUMPTON, a joint township with Westby, in the parish of KIRKHAM, hundred of AMOUDERNESSE, county palatine of LANCASTER, 3 miles (W. by N.) from Kirkham. The population is returned with Westby. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. This place was celebrated, no less than five centuries ago, for its mines of iron, and a considerable quantity of ore is still obtained at Whitrigs, in the neighbourhood.

PLUMPTON, a parish in the hundred of GREENS-NORTON, county of NORTHAMPTON, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Towcester, containing 63 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £10, and in the patronage of the Rev. Benjamin Hill. The church is dedicated to St. John the Baptist.

PLUMPTON, a parish in the hundred of STREET, rape of LEWES, county of SUSSEX, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Lewes, containing 272 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Lewes, and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £10, and in the patronage of Mrs. Woodward. The church is a small mean building. There is a trifling sum, the bequest of Anthony Springet, in 1735, for teaching poor children and supplying them with books. On Plumpton plain, a considerable eminence between Ditchling and Lewes, Sir Simon de Montford drew up his army, previously to the battle of Lewes.

PLUMPTON (WOOD), a chapelry in the parish of ST. MICHAEL, hundred of AMOUDERNESSE, county palatine of LANCASTER, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Preston, containing 1635 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Vicar of St. Michael's.

PLUMPTON-STREET, a township in the parish of HESKET in the FOREST, LEATH ward, county of CUMBERLAND, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Penrith, containing 128 inhabitants.

PLUMPTON-WALL, a chapelry in the parish of LAZONBY, LEATH ward, county of CUMBERLAND, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Penrith, containing 268 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Carlisle, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Carlisle. The chapel, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, was built by subscription among the inhabitants. This was the ancient Voreda, where a Roman altar has been found; and at Castle Steads, in the neighbourhood, an inscribed stone, with a bust, was discovered.

PLUMSTEAD, a parish in the hundred of LESS-NESS, lathe of SUTTON at HONE, county of KENT, 10 miles (S. by E.) from London, containing 2386 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Rochester, rated in the king's books at £6. 18. 4., and in the patronage of B. Bowell, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas. The river Thames bounds the parish to the northward. Plumstead was formerly a market town, and possessed also a charter for fairs, now disused. John Budgen, Esq., in 1807, granted land whereon to build a school-room, which was afterwards erected by private subscription; in the same year William Cole bequeathed £1000, now producing upwards of £46 per annum, for the support of a day and a Sunday school, in which fifty-seven boys and fifty girls are educated, the additional expense being defrayed by contributions.

PLUMSTEAD, a parish in the northern division of the hundred of ERPINGHAM, county of NORFOLK, 5 miles (S. E. by E.) from Holt, containing 159 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £5. 3. 4., and in the patronage of the King, as Duke of Lancaster. The church is dedicated to St. Michael.

PLUMSTEAD (GREAT), a parish in the hundred of BLOFIELD, county of NORFOLK, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E.) from Norwich, containing 288 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Norwich, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

PLUMSTEAD (LITTLE), a parish in the hundred of BLOFIELD, county of NORFOLK, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by N.) from Norwich, containing 247 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, consolidated with those of Brundall and Witton, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £7. 12. 6., and in the patronage of the Rev. Charles Penrice. The church is dedicated to St. Gervase and St. Protasius.

PLUMTREE, a parish comprising the township of Clipston, in the southern division of the wapentake of BINGHAM, and the township of Normanton on the Wolds, in the northern division of the wapentake of RUSHCLIFFE, county of NOTTINGHAM, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Nottingham, and containing 579 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Nottingham, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £19. 19. 7. W. Elliott, Esq. and others were patrons in 1817. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is principally in the Norman style of architecture. The villages of Plumtree and Normanton adjoin each other; at the latter the Wesleyan Methodists have a place of worship, erected in 1827. A school is supported by voluntary contributions. There are considerable rocks of limestone in the parish. Courts leet are annually held here. Plumtree is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s.

PLUNGAR, a parish in the hundred of FRAMLAND, county of LEICESTER, 10½ miles (N. by E.) from Melton-Mowbray, containing 203 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Leicester, and diocese of Lincoln, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Duke of Rutland. The church is dedicated to St. Helen. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The Grantham and Nottingham canal passes through the parish.

PLUSH, a tything in the parish and hundred of BUCKLAND-NEWTON, Cerne subdivision of the county of DORSET, 3 miles (S. E.) from Buckland, containing 167 inhabitants. Here is a chapel of ease to the vicarage of Buckland.

Arms.

PLYMOUTH, a sea-port, borough, and market town, having separate jurisdiction, locally in the hundred of Roborough, county of DEVON, 44 miles (S. W.) from Exeter, and 215 (W. S. W.) from London, containing, exclusively of parts of the parishes of St. Andrew and Charles the Martyr, but including the towns of Devonport and Stonehouse, 61,212 inhabitants, of which about 35,000 are in Plymouth. This place, which is one of the principal naval and military stations in the kingdom, and, during war, the most important, as commanding the entrance of the English channel, and being the grand rendezvous of the channel fleet, is by some supposed to have been the Tameorwerthe of the Saxons. At the time of the Conquest, however, it was known only as a small fishing-town, which, under the appellation of Sutton, or South Town, was dependent on the abbey of Plympton, and which some time afterwards obtained the name of Plymouth, descriptive of its situation on the river Plym, near its influx into the bay called Plymouth Sound. Henry III., in the 37th of his reign, granted to the prior of Plympton a market and a fair, with the right of holding weekly courts, assize of bread and beer, and view of frankpledge. This port became at an early period the occasional rendezvous of the British navy; and here, in 1355, Edward the Black Prince embarked, on his expedition to France, and landed, on his return, with his royal prisoners. From the convenience of its harbour the town appears to have soon obtained a considerable degree of importance, and to have become extremely populous. The French effected a landing here in the course of this reign, and attempted to burn it, but were repulsed by the intrepidity of Courtenay, Earl of Devonshire, who, with the neighbouring gentry and their vassals, drove them back to their ships, with the loss of five hundred men. They made various other attempts, and, in the reign of Henry IV., landed with a party of troops from Bretagne, under the command of the Marshal of Bretagne and Monsieur De Castell, and, before any effectual resistance could be opposed to them, burnt six hundred houses in the town; but failing in their design to reduce the castle, and take possession of the higher part of the town, they retreated to their ships, and proceeded to Dartmouth, where De Castell and several hundred of his men were made prisoners. From this time the town declined into a mere fishing-village again, till the reign of Henry VI., during which it was improved greatly by the prior of Plympton, who rebuilt many of the houses, and, by granting liberal leases, encouraged persons to reside there, thus considerably promoting the increase of its population; its port became once more frequented by merchants, its trade revived, and its importance as a naval and military station became apparent. On a petition from the inhabitants, urging the necessity of fortifying the town and port against the future assaults of the enemy, the king granted them a toll on all merchandise entering the port. To these fortifications Leland alludes, in his description of the town, with which a chart, taken in the reign of Henry VIII., and now in the British Museum, exactly coincides. In 1439 the town was incorporated, under the designation of Plymouth; and the manor of Sutton-Prior, with all its rights and appurtenances, was settled on the corporation, with a reserved annual rent of £40 payable to the prior of Plympton, and an annuity of ten marks to the abbot of Bath. In 1512, an act was passed for enlarging and strengthening the fortifications, a grant of indulgences being issued by Bishop Lacy to all who contributed to that work; and, to prevent the accumulation of sand at the mouth of the harbour, the tin miners were prohibited working in the neighbourhood of any river communicating with the sea at Plymouth. In the 27th of Elizabeth, Sir Francis Drake obtained an act of parliament for supplying the town with fresh water, which he brought by a rivulet, called a leat, from the confines of Dartmoor, which, after a circuitous course of twenty-four miles, discharges itself into a reservoir in the town.

In 1588, the British fleet of one hundred and twenty sail, to which this port contributed seven ships, assembled in Plymouth Sound, under the command of Sir Francis Drake, Lord Howard, and Sir John Hawkins, to oppose the Spanish Armada, the admiral of which, confident of success, and delighted with the beauty of the place, had selected Mount-Edgcombe as his place of residence in England. The Armada, after appearing off Penlee point, the Hoe, and adjacent coast, advanced to the east, where it was attacked by the British fleet, which had sailed to Torbay, to join the Exeter squadron, and after having suffered severely from a storm, this formidable armament was annihilated. In 1595, a body of Spaniards effected a landing on the coast of Cornwall, but their progress was checked by the activity of Sir Francis Godolphin, and twenty-two chests, full of Papal bulls, dispensations, and pardons, which had been taken in that county, were brought into Plymouth and burnt in the market-place. In 1596, this port was the place of rendezvous for the British fleet destined for the expedition against Cadiz, under the command of the Earls of Essex and Nottingham, in which Lord Howard was Vice-Admiral, and Sir Walter Raleigh Rear-Admiral; and from it also the Earl of Essex embarked on his unfortunate expedition to Ireland. In 1625, Charles I., with one hundred and twenty ships, and six thousand troops, arrived from Portsmouth, and remained in this town for ten days, during which time he was, with his whole court, sumptuously entertained by the mayor and commonalty. At the commencement of the parliamentary war, the inhabitants, embracing the cause of the parliament, seized the town during the absence of the king's delegate; and, in 1643, the royalists under Prince Maurice and Colonel Digby, after having besieged it for more than three months without success, were compelled to withdraw their forces. After repeated attempts to obtain possession of the town, Sir R. Grenville endeavoured to blockade it, but was repulsed by the arrival of the Earl of Essex. Sir Robert, however, commenced a second blockade, which, after a continuance of nearly a year and a half, was found unavailing, and notwithstanding repeated assaults, the parliamentarians remained in quiet possession of the town: many of the fortifications and military works which were raised on this occasion are still perceptible on the heights in the vicinity. After the Restoration, the present citadel was erected, and the fortifications rendered more complete. On the appearance of the combined fleets in the channel, in 1779, the French prisoners of war were removed from this place to Exeter; and in 1814, the Bellerophon anchored in the Sound, on her voyage to St. Helena with the Emperor Napoleon. In 1828, the Russian fleet remained for some time in this harbour, while waiting for tidings of the Admiral's ship, which had parted from it in a storm; and in 1829, Don Miguel, Regent of Portugal, visited Plymouth, which subsequently afforded an hospitable asylum for several months to three thousand of the adherents of Don Pedro of Brazil.

The town is pleasantly situated at the mouth of the river Plym, on the north shore of the Sound: the eastern portion exhibits several irregularly-formed streets, which in some parts are inconveniently narrow; but the western part is more regularly built, and contains many ranges of handsome and substantial houses, among which are several fine specimens of architecture: it is lighted with gas, and amply supplied with excellent water. The surrounding scenery abounds with objects of intense interest and striking magnificence. From the summit of the Hoe, an eminence near the town, are seen on the south the spacious Sound, containing within the Breakwater an area of nearly five square miles, affording safe anchorage to ships of the largest burden, and bounded on the west by the richly-wooded heights of Mount-Edgecumbe, and on the east by Mount-Batten and the Wembury cliffs; the fortified summit of Drake island, near the shore, and the Breakwater, in the distance. The inland view is bounded by the lofty elevations of Cornwall, and the barren heights of Dartmoor; and in the foreground are seen the towns of Plymouth, Stonehouse, and Devonport, extending in a continued line. This place is chiefly distinguished for the capaciousness of its harbours, and for the importance of its maritime commerce; the naval arsenal, and yards for building ships of war, are noticed under the head of Devonport (which see). The principal harbours are the Sound, Sutton Pool, the Hamoaze, Stonehouse Pool, Barn Pool, the Catwater, and several smaller ones. The Sound, which is capable of holding two thousand vessels, has been rendered much more secure by the construction of the Breakwater, which may be regarded as the most gigantic work ever effected in England. It was commenced on the 12th of August, 1812, and has, during its progress, experienced two most severe trials, effectually proving its strength and utility. In January 1817, and November 1824, the southern coast of England was strewn with wrecks. The Breakwater, presenting an uneven and unfinished surface, was the more liable to be disturbed by the violence of the waters; but it was by no means seriously injured, and evidently served as a very great protection to the town of Plymouth. This immense barrier is composed of granite blocks of several tons' weight. It is in length at the base one thousand seven hundred and sixty yards; in breadth, one hundred and twenty. The slope facing the sea is much more gradual than the inclination toward the land. The flat surface on the top forms a fine promenade, approached by three flights of steps, leading to one common landing, near the centre of the work. On the eastern side of the Sound, at Staddon Point, is a quay for the accommodation of vessels taking in fresh water. Near it, in a hollow between two hills, a reservoir has been constructed, capable of containing twelve thousand tons of fresh water, for the use of the navy, which is constantly supplied by an excellent stream: the water is thence conveyed to the quay in iron pipes. Near the reservoir is the residence of the superintendent of the Breakwater establishment, and in the vicinity are numerous cottages for the convenience of those who visit this interesting spot.

The Eddystone Lighthouse, as a successful effort of art, is scarcely less extraordinary than the gigantic structure just described. It is built on a rock in the channel, about fifteen miles south-south-west from the citadel of Plymouth. In 1696, a wooden lighthouse was first erected on this rock by Mr. Winstanley, who was so convinced of its security, that he desired to be within it during "the greatest storm that might ever blow under the heavens." His wish was fatally fulfilled: in November 1703, he perished with the structure itself. A second lighthouse of stone and timber was completed by Mr. Rudyerd, in 1709, which was destroyed by an accidental fire, in December 1755. The present building was begun on the 1st of June, 1757, and completed in October 1759, according to the masterly design of Mr. Smeaton: it is one hundred feet high, and twenty-six feet in diameter. The outside and basement are formed of granite, the lantern on the summit being composed of cast-iron and copper: it is octagonal in plan. The Citadel is a most noble fortification, consisting of three regular and two irregular bastions, the curtains of the former being strengthened by ravelins, &c. This extensive building includes houses for the governor and officers, barracks, an hospital, chapel, magazine, and armoury. The ramparts are three quarters of a mile in circuit. Here are in general from four to five hundred men, a portion of whom relieve the garrison on St. Nicholas' Island every month. The Victualling-Office below the citadel, on the east, is a vast range of buildings, including the Navy cooperage, &c. The ovens are large and of remarkable construction: they are eight in number; and it is said, that in time of war a sufficient quantity of bread has been baked in one day for sixteen thousand men. The Mill Bay Prisons of War are capable of holding three thousand men; the building stands on an eminence near the sea, whereby it is rendered, not only more healthy, but more convenient for the landing of prisoners.

The Union Sea Baths, lately erected, comprise shower, vapour, private, plunging, and swimming baths, a reading-room, and another for refreshments, with all necessary appendages. The greatest architectural ornament in the town is the Royal hotel, assembly-room, and theatre, comprised in one design, covering nearly an acre of ground. The north-west front is nearly three hundred feet in length, the centre being decorated with a noble Ionic portico of eight columns, under which is the entrance to the assembly-room and the theatre; the former is a most elegant apartment, eighty feet in length, and forty feet wide, decorated with Corinthian columns. The theatre is sufficiently spacious, and appropriately decorated: it contains a good pit, and two tiers of boxes, with gallery and slips above: the proscenium is ornamented with Ionic columns, and the scenery is superior to what might be expected in a provincial town. The entrance to the inn is under a smaller portico at the eastern side of the building, which is in every respect a noble structure: it was commenced in September 1811, and completed at an expense of £60,000, defrayed by the corporation. Near this is the Athenæum, a structure of inferior magnitude, though of equal architectural merit: its front exhibits a Grecian Doric portico, and in the interior is a spacious lecture-room, decorated with casts from the Elgin marbles, &c. The foundation stone was laid in 1818, by the president of the Plymouth Institution for the promotion of the Arts, Science, and Literature, and the institution was opened February 4th, 1819: the society meet once a week during the season, when a paper is read, and the subject subsequently discussed; a volume of transactions is also published from time to time. The public library is another ornament to the town; simple, but classical: adjoining the library, which is a handsome vaulted apartment, are reading and committee rooms. The Freemasons' Hall is a well-designed edifice, including, besides the hall used by the brethren, an auction-room, &c. A mechanics' institute was opened in December 1827, when a most excellent introductory paper was read by Dr. Cookworthy: its members are numerous and respectable.

Plymouth Regatta usually takes place in the Sound, in July, when thousands assemble on the Hoe to witness the splendid exhibition. The races are held on Chelson meadow, containing one hundred and seventy-five acres, which have been recovered from the sea by an embankment two thousand nine hundred and ten feet in length: this great improvement was executed under the directions of the Earl of Morley, who received, in consequence, a gold medal from the Society of Arts. To this nobleman the inhabitants are also indebted for a magnificent iron bridge over the Lara, opened to the public on the 16th of July, 1827. It consists of five elliptical arches of cast-iron, the central arch being one hundred feet in span. As a design it is highly worthy of encomium; and its convenience is equally unquestionable; for, by following the new line of road to which it leads, the hills in the old route to Totness are avoided. Near this bridge is Saltram, the noble residence of the Earl of Morley.

A considerable trade in timber is now carried on with North America, the Baltic, the Mediterranean, &c.; and a direct intercourse has been established with the West Indies, highly advantageous to the port, inasmuch as the imports, coming immediately from the colonies, escape the agencies, duties, and port-charges of London and Bristol. The coasting trade is chiefly with London, Newcastle, Newport (in Wales), and Bristol. Great quantities of manganese are shipped to Scotland, wool to Hull, and lead to Bristol and the metropolis. In the foreign trade there are employed, besides numerous chartered vessels, thirty sail belonging to the port of Sutton, their burden varying from sixty to five hundred tons. Upwards of fifty coasting vessels also belong to Sutton Pool, which, in the year 1828, received within its piers one thousand one hundred and ninety-four ships, the cargoes of which amounted to seventy-five thousand and sixty-seven tons. Besides the Sutton harbour, there are others, viz., Hamoaze (see Devonport), Stonehouse Pool, Barn Pool, Catwater, with several smaller harbours. To the entire port of Plymouth it may be said, that three hundred merchant-vessels belong, the combined burden of which amounts to twenty-one thousand tons. The fishery is accounted excellent, whiting and hake being among the fish which more particularly abound. Fifty trolling, and twelve hooking, boats, employed in this fishery, belong to Sutton Pool. The harbour is held on lease under the duchy of Cornwall. The piers, through which it is entered, were erected by means of parliamentary grants, in 1791 and 1799. The quays surrounding it are numerous and convenient: here are also several yards for building and repairing merchant-ships. Catwater harbour, into which the river Plym falls, is capable of receiving a thousand sail of large merchant-vessels. The Custom House is a commodious and substantial structure, with a handsome granite front, and a well-designed long room. The exchange has no pretensions to elegance, though fully serving its intended purpose: it includes a Chamber of Commerce, Marine Insurance Office, Steam-Packet Office, &c.

The manufacture of serge is carried on to a small extent. The neighbourhood abounds with quarries of granite and slate, and the traffic in these articles has been greatly facilitated by a rail-road, the projection of which is mainly attributable to Sir Thomas Tyrwhitt: it is in length twenty-four miles, reaching from King's Tor on Dartmoor, to Jory-street, and communicating with Sutton Pool. Among its advantages may be enumerated the means it affords for conveying coal, lime, and, in particular, manure, from Plymouth into the interior. The Plymouth marble is justly esteemed, on account of its veining and susceptibility of polish. The principal quarry is at Oreston, near the Lara bridge, from which is obtained the material for the breakwater. It was opened in 1812, and in the progress of the work a cavity was discovered in the marble rock, about twenty-five feet long, and twelve feet square. Here were found, imbedded in clay, numerous bones of the rhinoceros, wolf, deer, cow, horse, &c., containing less animal matter in them than any fossil bones hitherto discovered, and unusually perfect. The market days are Monday, Thursday, and Saturday; the market-place, a spacious area comprising three acres, is enclosed with a wall, in which are three principal entrances. The fairs, in April and November, are not fixed to any particular day, but are regulated by those of Plympton; the latter, which is called the great market, is well attended.

The government, by successive charters of incorporation, is vested in a mayor, twelve aldermen, and twenty-four common council-men, assisted by a recorder, town clerk, chamberlain, coroner, sergeants at mace, and subordinate officers. The mayor is annually elected by the corporation on the 17th, and sworn into office on the 29th, of September, and, with the late mayor, recorder, and two senior aldermen, is a justice of the peace within the borough. The corporation hold courts of quarter session after the festivals of Lady-day, Midsummer, Michaelmas, and Christmas, for all offences not capital. A court of record, formerly held by prescription under the prior of Plympton, and confirmed by an act of the 18th of Henry VI., for the recovery of debts to an unlimited amount, is held every Monday, under the presidency of the mayor, assisted by the town clerk, who must be a barrister of three years' standing; and the mayor, chamberlain, and other officers, sit every Monday and Thursday at the guildhall, for determining minor offences. The borough exercised the elective franchise in the 26th and 33rd of Edward I., and in the 4th and 7th of Edward II., since which time it omitted till the 20th of Henry IV.; it has since regularly returned two members to parliament, the right of election being vested in the freemen generally: the mayor is the returning officer. The guildhall is an irregular structure, in a mixed style of architecture, comprising a hall for the transaction of the public business, jury and committee rooms, the central watch-house, and the town prison.

The town is included within the parishes of St. Andrew and King Charles the Martyr. The living of St. Andrew's is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Totness, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £12. 15. 5., endowed with £600 private benefaction, and £3000 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Mayor and Corporation: the church is a spacious structure of very ancient foundation, and has been recently repaired and improved, at an expense of £3000: it has a lofty square embattled tower; the interior is finely arranged, and coloured in imitation of granite, and has a handsome altar-piece. The living of the parish of King Charles the Martyr is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Totness, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £12. 15. 5., and in the patronage of the Mayor and Corporation: the church, begun a little before, and completed soon after, the parliamentary war, is a neat edifice in the later style of English architecture, with a square tower surmounted by a well-proportioned spire. St. Andrew's and St. Charles' chapels are neat edifices, of which the former, built at the expense of the Rev. Robert Lampen, and Messrs. Woolcombe, Gill, and Pridham, was consecrated in 1823, and the latter in 1829. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, Wesleyan Methodists, Presbyterians, and Unitarians, and a synagogue.

The grammar school, a substantial stone building, with a residence for the master, was founded, in 1572, by Queen Elizabeth, who granted to the corporation the arrears of a rent-charge upon the vicarage, on condition that they should find a curate, and pay £20 a year to a schoolmaster. The Red boys' school was established in pursuance of the will of E. Hele, Esq., of Wembury, dated 1632: eight poor boys are clothed, educated, and apprenticed. The Blue boys' school was founded by means of a bequest by Mr. J. Lanyon: it has the same advantages as the Red boys' school, and there are generally twelve children on the foundation. In 1625, Messrs. T. and N. Sherwill founded a school and asylum for orphans: this charity is managed by a committee, including four aldermen and two common council-men: there are now twelve boys on the foundation. In Vennel-street is the Household of Faith, in which near two hundred children are educated: it is supported by contributions. The Grey school was founded in 1713: it is supported by subscription, and affords instruction to one hundred boys, of whom forty are clothed; and sixty girls, of whom twenty are clothed. The public school, conducted on the plans of Mr. Lancaster and Dr. Bell, is supported by subscription, and affords instruction to three hundred boys and girls: the master has a salary of £70 per annum: the committee of management assemble monthly, and the school is open to public inspection twice a week. In Princes-square is the subscription classical school, a neat Doric building. In Dame Rogers' school forty-five girls are clothed, maintained, and educated. Here are also a school of industry, chiefly supported by the Society of Friends, and a Presbyterian school for fifty girls. A Misericordia Society was established in 1794. The Merchantmen's hospital is for the relief of maimed or disabled seamen, and for the widows and orphans of such as are killed or drowned in the merchants' service. St. Andrew's almshouses are for the reception of twelve poor widows, who receive two shillings and sixpence per week each: behind these are others belonging to the workhouse. Charles' almshouses, built in 1679, are capable of containing forty persons, who receive a weekly allowance from the parish. In 1703, Col. Jory erected a building for twelve sailors' widows, each of whom now receives a monthly allowance of twenty-five shillings. The public dispensary was erected, in 1807, in consequence of a bequest of £1000 by C. Yonge, Esq.: it is gratuitously attended by two physicians, surgeons, &c. Here is also an eye infirmary, supported by voluntary contributions. The workhouse was established by act of parliament in 1708: it is under the management of a body corporate, entitled "the Governor and Guardians of the poor's portion in Plymouth." The guardians are fifty-two in number, the mayor and recorder being among them; the remainder are chosen annually, six from the aldermen, six from the common council, twenty from the parish of St. Andrew, and eighteen from the parish of King Charles the Martyr. The right of voting is obtained by paying at the rate of sixpence per month to the poor, and the election takes place in May; the establishment includes, besides the wards for the paupers, school-rooms for boys and girls, a bridewell, infirmary, &c: the principal governor has the right of committing offenders to the bridewell for a period not exceeding seven days. The remaining charitable societies are, for lying-in women, for reclaiming dissolute females, and for the relief of the sick poor generally. This is the birthplace of Sir Thomas Edmondson, a distinguished statesman and political writer, born in 1563; of the gallant admiral, Sir John Hawkins, who died in 1590; and of Jacob Bryant, a learned antiquary, who was born in 1715, and died in 1804. Plymouth gives the title of earl to the family of Windsor.

PLYMPTON (EARL'S), a borough, market town, and parish, having separate jurisdiction, though locally in the hundred of Plympton, county of DEVON, 39 miles (S. W.) from Exeter, and 210 (W. S. W.) from London, containing 762 inhabitants. This place was the head of an ancient barony, and had a magnificent castle, supposed to have been erected by Rivers, Earl of Devon, to whom the barony was given by Henry I., about the year 1100, and delivered up to Stephen by certain knights who held it during the absence of Earl Baldwin, who had rebelled against that monarch: the lords of the barony were invested with the power of inflicting capital punishment.

The town is beautifully situated on an elevation rising out of a vale, south-eastward of the river Plym: it is small, but of respectable appearance, and the surrounding scenery is rich and picturesque. The market is on Friday; and fairs are held on February 25th, August 12th, eve of the Ascension, eve of the Annunciation (O. S.), and October 28th. The charter of incorporation, and for permission to hold a market, is said to have been obtained by Earl Baldwin, and subsequently confirmed by Edward III. and other sovereigns. The town is governed by a mayor, eight aldermen, and a recorder, who constitute the common council: the mayor, recorder, and the senior alderman, are magistrates. A court of record, for the recovery of debts to any amount, is occasionally held, under a charter of William and Mary, but it is used only to a trifling extent. The guildhall, which bears date 1696, is a neat and substantial edifice, supported on pillars and arches, and in the dining-room are some ancestral portraits of the Treby family, also one of Sir Joshua Reynolds, by himself. The borough first sent members to parliament in the 23rd of Edward I., and was constituted a stannary town in 1328; the right of election is vested in the mayor and freemen: the freedom is elective, and dependent on the common council; the number of voters is about forty: the mayor is the returning officer, and the influence of the Earl of Mount-Edgcombe, and of Paul Treby Treby, Esq., is predominant. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Totness, and diocese of Exeter, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Dean and Canons of Windsor. The church, which contains some interesting monuments, was anciently the chantry chapel of St. Maurice. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. A grammar school was founded and endowed, in 1658, by the trustees of Eliza Hele: the school-house, a spacious building in the ancient English style, with large antique windows, and a piazza of nine arches, supported on stone pillars, was erected in 1664: the master is appointed by the trustees, but there are no scholars on the foundation. Sir Joshua Reynolds, the celebrated portrait painter, who was born here in 1723, received the rudiments of his education at this school, under the tuition of his father, at that time master. Some of his earliest sketches were inscribed upon the walls, and preserved for many years, but were at length obliterated. A few vestiges of the ancient castle are still visible: the artificial mount on which it was erected is considered one of the most perfect specimens of the kind now in existence.

PLYMPTON (ST. MARY), a parish in the hundred of PLYMPTON, county of DEVON, 1 mile (N. W. by W.) from Earl's Plympton, containing 2044 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Totness, and diocese of Exeter, endowed with £15 per annum private benefaction, and £1300 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Dean and Canons of Windsor. The church is principally in the later style of English architecture, with a handsome tower: it contains three stone stalls, and, among various other monuments, an altar-tomb, much mutilated, with a recumbent figure of a knight in armour. The village is chiefly remarkable as having been the site of a priory, accounted the richest in the county. A college is said to have been founded here by one of the Saxon kings, for a dean and four prebendaries. This was suppressed by Bishop Warlewast, in 1121, in consequence of the obstinacy of the monks, who, notwithstanding the injunction of celibacy, passed twenty years before, still entertained their connubial inclinations. The bishop's newly-founded priory was for Black canons, and dedicated either to the Virgin Mary, or to St. Peter and St. Paul. The families of Baldwin and Valletort were considerable benefactors to it; and in 1534 the society consisted of a prior and twenty monks: at this time its yearly revenue was stated to be £912. 11. 8. The prior's pension, after the monastery was dissolved, amounted to £120 per annum. St. Anthony's abbey in Cornwall, and that of St. Mary de Marisco near Exeter, were subject to it. Among its possessions were included Plymouth and the Isle of St. Nicholas: it was also distinguished for the extent of its church patronage. The site was granted to James Coffin and Thomas Goodwin. The parish workhouse occupies the site of an ancient hospital, and is endowed with land yielding £50 per annum.

PLYMSTOCK, a parish in the hundred of PLYMPTON, county of DEVON, 3 miles (S. W. by S.) from Earl's Plympton, containing 2735 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Totness, and diocese of Exeter, endowed with £15 per annum private benefaction, and £1500 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Dean and Canons of Windsor. The church, dedicated to St. Mary and All Saints, was formerly attached to Plympton priory, and has lately received an addition of one hundred and forty sittings, of which one hundred and ten are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £120 for that purpose. At Hooe was formerly a chapel, dedicated to St. Catherine. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. A free school was endowed, in 1790, with £2000 three per cents., by the Rev. Vincent Warren, the interest of which is applied for teaching thirty children on the National system, and clothing twenty of them, viz., ten of each sex. An almshouse was founded, in 1600, by Sir Christopher Harris, for four poor persons. At Oreston, in this parish, is the great marble quarry from which the material was obtained for the construction of the Breakwater. There are wet docks at Turnchapel, belonging to the Earl of Morley, sufficiently capacious for the reception of frigates, and a yard adjoining, in which seventy-four gun ships have been built. Plymstock was an important post during the civil war between Charles and his parliament. Radford, in this parish, is said to have been the residence of Sir Walter Raleigh, after his arrival at Plymouth, in 1618; and Stoddescombe was the birthplace of Dr. Forster, the editor of Plato.

PLYMTREE, a parish in the hundred of HAYRIDGE, county of DEVON, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E. by S.) from Cullompton, containing 381 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £21. 18. $1\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Provost and Fellows of Oriel College, Oxford. The church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, has an elegant gilt wooden screen and an octagonal stone font.

POCKLEY, a township in the parish of HELMSLEY, wapentake of RYEDALE, North riding of the county of YORK, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Helmsley, containing 227 inhabitants. A neat chapel of ease was erected in 1822, by C. Duncombe, Esq.

POCKLINGTON, a parish in the Wilton-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, East riding of the county of YORK, comprising the market town of Pocklington, the chapelry of Yapham, and the townships of Meltonby and Owsthorpe, and containing 2163 inhabitants, of which number, 1962 are in the town of Pocklington, 13 miles (E. by S.) from York, and 195 (N. by W.) from London. This town is small, and pleasantly situated in a level country, about two miles from the western edge of the Wolds, on a small stream which falls into the river Derwent: it consists principally of two streets. Races are held annually on the 2nd of May. About a mile distant is a navigable canal, recently completed, which communicates with the river, and furnishes the means of supplying the town and neighbourhood with coal, lime, manure, and merchandise, and of conveying to different places corn, flour, timber, and other articles. The market is on Saturday; and fairs are held March 7th, May 6th, August 5th, and November 8th: on the 9th of November is a statute fair for hiring servants. Petty sessions for the Wilton-Beacon division are held here. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Dean of York, rated in the king's books at £10. 1. $10\frac{1}{2}$., endowed with £1400 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £300 parliamentary grant. The church is dedicated to All Saints. There are places of worship for Independents, Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists, and Roman Catholics. The free grammar school was founded, in the 6th of Henry VIII., by John Dowman, L.L.D. under writ of the privy seal, for the instruction in classical literature of all children resorting to this town, the government being vested in an ancient guild, established by the founder, in the parochial church here. In the 5th of Edward VI., the appointment of the master was vested in the Master and Fellows of St. John's College, Cambridge, and that of the usher, in the churchwardens of Pocklington; and the master and usher were incorporated, and authorised to receive all endowments of the said school, and also, with the vicar, curate, or churchwardens, to nominate to the vacancies in any of the five exhibitions established and endowed in St. John's College, Cambridge, by the founder, for scholars from this school: the endowments were augmented, in the 5th of Mary, by the conveyance of messuages, lands, and hereditaments from Thomas Dowman, the founder's nephew, and still further by a similar grant from the Rev. Thomas Mountfrith: the annual income is £1020. 9. 8., which sum the master retains for his own use, after deducting £200 for the salary of the usher: about seventeen boys are instructed on the foundation. The old school apartments and master's house were taken down in 1819, and new premises erected on the site by the master. A National school, in which about seventy-five boys and sixty girls are educated, was erected at the sole expense of Robert Dennison, Esq., and is supported by voluntary contributions. In 1763, four human skeletons, one of which was enclosed in a coffin, with an urn at the head, were dug up in Barnsley field, near this town: several ancient characters were inscribed on the urn.

PODEN, a hamlet in the parish of CHURCH-HONEYBOURNE, upper division of the hundred of BLACKENHURST, county of WORCESTER, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Chipping-Campden. The population is returned with the parish.

PODIMORE (MILTON), a parish forming one of five unconnected portions of the hundred of WHITLEY, being locally in that of Somerton, county of SOMERSET, 2 miles (N. E. by N.) from Ilchester, containing 176 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £12. 6. $5\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of T. S. Horner, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

PODMORE, a township in the parish of ECCLESHALL, northern division of the hundred of PIREHILL, county of STAFFORD, 3 miles from Eccleshall, containing 75 inhabitants: it is within the peculiar jurisdiction of the Prebendary of Eccleshall in the Cathedral Church of Lichfield.

POINTINGTON, a parish in the hundred of HORETHORNE, county of SOMERSET, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Sherborne, containing 162 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £13. 8. 4., and in the patronage of Lord Willoughby d. Broke. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

POINTON, a chapelry in the parish of SEMPERINGHAM, wapentake of AVELAND, parts of KESTIVEN county of LINCOLN, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Falkingham, containing 363 inhabitants.

POLEBROOK, a parish in the hundred of POLEBROOK, county of NORTHAMPTON, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Oundle, containing, with the hamlet of Armston, 339 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £29. 3. 6½., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Peterborough. The church, dedicated to All Saints, is partly Norman, but principally in the early English style, with a beautiful tower and spire at the western extremity of the south aisle: the font has a cylindrical base, and an octagonal top with trefoil panelling. There is a trifling endowment, the bequest of William Tawyer, in 1721, for teaching children.

POLESWORTH, a parish in the Tamworth division of the hundred of HEMLINGFORD, county of WARWICK, 4¼ miles (E. S. E.) from Tamworth, containing 1834 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Coventry, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £10, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Edith. The Independents have recently erected a place of worship here. A Benedictine nunnery, in honour of our Lady, was founded here about the beginning of the ninth century, by King Egbert, of which his daughter Editha was abbess, to whom, on her canonization, it was afterwards dedicated. Soon after the Conquest, the nuns were dispossessed of their lands, and retired to their cell at Oldbury; but, in the time of Stephen, they returned hither, and from Henry III. had the grant of a weekly market and an annual fair: at the dissolution this house possessed a revenue of £109. 6. 6.: there are still considerable remains of the conventual buildings. The Coventry canal passes through the parish. Francis Nethersole, in 1656, founded and liberally endowed a free school: the income is applied for teaching and apprenticing children of both sexes.

POLING, a parish in the hundred of POLING, rape of ARUNDEL, county of SUSSEX, 3 miles (S. E.) from Arundel, containing 191 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £10, and in the patronage of the Provost and Fellows of Eton College, on the nomination of the Bishop of Chichester. The church is principally in the later style of English architecture. John Tilly, in 1785, bequeathed a rent-charge of £3 for teaching poor children. The knights of St. John of Jerusalem had a preceptory here, which, at the dissolution, was granted to the college of Arundel.

POLLARDS-LANDS, a township in that part of the parish of ST. ANDREW AUCKLAND which is in the north-western division of DARLINGTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, containing 117 inhabitants.

POLLECOT, a hamlet in the parish and hundred of ASHENDON, county of BUCKINGHAM, 6 miles (N.) from Thame. The population is returned with the parish.

POLLINGTON, a township in that part of the parish of SNAITH which is in the lower division of the wapentake of OSGOLDCROSS, West riding of the county of YORK, 2¾ miles (S. W.) from Snaith, containing 483 inhabitants. It is within the jurisdiction of the peculiar court of Snaith. There is a place of worship for Independents.

POLPERRO, a sea-port and market town partly in the parish of LANSALLOES, and partly in that of TALLAND, hundred of WEST, county of CORNWALL,

5 miles (E.) from Fowey, and 3 (W. S. W.) from West Looe. The population is returned with the parishes. This is a small fishing-town, romantically situated, the houses being built on the sides of two steep rocky hills, and between them, through a very narrow valley, flows a small river which separates the parishes. Here is a harbour for vessels of one hundred and fifty tons' burden: the imports are chiefly coal, culm, and limestone, and grain is occasionally exported. A pilchard fishery and an extensive hook and line fishery are carried on, the latter of which supplies Bath, Plymouth, &c., with large quantities of fine whiting, pipers, dace, plaice, and turbot. A small market is held on Friday; and a pleasure fair on July 10th, which continues for several days, on which occasion a nominal mayor is elected by a mock council of aldermen. There was formerly a chapel at Polperro, dedicated to St. Peter, some remains of which, called the Chapel house, are on the brow of the western hill above the town. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists, in that part of the town which is in the parish of Talland. The interest of £200, the benefaction of Captain Charles Kendall, and of £100, the gift of Mrs. Mary Kendall, is paid to a master and a mistress, for the education of children of both sexes.

POLSTEAD, a parish in the hundred of BABERGH, county of SUFFOLK, 3¼ miles (N. N. E.) from Nayland, containing 900 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Sudbury, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £22, and in the patronage of F. R. Reynolds, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

POLTIMORE, a parish in the hundred of WONFORD, county of DEVON, 4 miles (N. E.) from Exeter, containing 270 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, annexed to that of Huxham, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £15. 15. 5., and in the patronage of Sir G. W. Bampfylde, Bart. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is principally in the decorated style of English architecture, with an elegant wooden screen: it was built by John Bampfylde, who died in 1390, and to whose memory it contains a slab. Near it is an almshouse for four poor persons, founded by Mrs. Bampfylde about 1595, and endowed at different times by Sir Amias Bampfylde and several of his descendants. Poltimore is situated on the river Clist, and there are mines of manganese within the parish.

PONDERS-END, a hamlet in the parish of ENFIELD, hundred of EDMONTON, county of MIDDLESEX, 9 miles (N. N. E.) from London. The population is returned with the parish. Here is an establishment for finishing crape, at which about one hundred and fifty persons are employed. The Lea navigation passes within a mile of the village. The Independents have a place of worship; and an infant school has recently been established.

PONSONBY, a parish in ALLERDALE ward above Darwent, county of CUMBERLAND, 4¾ miles (S. E. by S.) from Egremont, containing, with the hamlet of Newton, 150 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, endowed with £800 private benefaction, £1000 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of E. Stanley, Esq. The church is a neat structure, exhibiting in the windows some ancient stained glass brought from Dalegarth Hall. The river Calder bounds the parish on the north. Freestone is obtained here; and on an eminence at Infell are some remains of a Roman camp.

Arms.

PONTEFRACT, a parish in the upper division of the wapentake of OS-GOLDCROSS, West riding of the county of YORK, comprising the borough of Pontefract, which has a separate jurisdiction, the chapelry of Knottingly, and the townships of Carleton, East Hardwick, Monkhill, and Tanshelf, and containing 8824 inhabitants, of which number, 4447 are in the borough of Pontefract, 23 miles (S. S. W.) from York, and $177\frac{1}{2}$ (N. N. W.) from London. This place, which appears to have risen from the ruins of the ancient Legeolium, a Roman station in the vicinity, now Castleford, was by the Saxons called Kirkby, and after the Conquest obtained the name of Pontfract, from the breaking of a bridge over the river Aire, while William, Archbishop of York, and son of the sister of King Stephen, was passing over it, attended by an immense crowd, who escorted him on his return from Rome. Though not itself a Roman station, it was probably a place of inferior importance connected with Legeolium, as the Watling-street passed through the park, near the town, and vestiges of a Roman camp were distinctly traceable previously to the recent enclosure of waste lands. During the time of the Saxons, to whom some historians attribute the building of the town, Alric, a Saxon chief, erected a castle here, which having been demolished, or suffered to fall into decay, was repaired, or more probably rebuilt, by Hildebert de Lacy, to whom, at the time of the Conquest, William granted the honour and manor of Pontefract. In the reign of Edward II., the castle being then in the possession of Thomas, Earl of Lancaster, who had revolted against the king, on account of his partiality to Piers Gaveston, was besieged and taken; and the earl being soon after made prisoner, by Andrew de Hercla, at Boroughbridge, was brought to Pontefract, where, being condemned by the king, he was beheaded, and several of the barons who had joined his party were hanged. Having been canonized, a chapel was erected on the spot of his decapitation, and, in honour of his memory, dedicated to St. Thomas. His descendant, the renowned John of Gaunt, retired to this castle in the reign of Richard II., and fortified it against the king, but a reconciliation taking place, through the medium of Joan, the king's mother, no further hostilities ensued. Henry de Bolingbroke, Duke of Hereford, then an exile in France, exasperated by the king's attempt to deprive him of the duchy of Lancaster and honour of Pontefract, to which he had succeeded by the death of his father, and having received an invitation from some of the principal nobility, landed at Ravenspur in this county, and being joined by the Lords Willoughby, Ross, D'Arcy, Beaumont, and other persons of distinction, with an army of sixty thousand men, a battle ensued, which terminated in the deposition and imprisonment of the king, and the exaltation of the duke to the throne, by the title of Henry IV. Richard, after his deposition, was for some time confined in this castle, where he was inhumanly put to death. Henry frequently resided in it, where he held a parliament, after the battle of Shrewsbury, and, in 1404, signed the truce between England and Scotland. Scroop, Archbishop of York, having raised an insurrection, in which he was joined by the Earl of Northumberland, for the dethronement of the king, was by treachery made prisoner, and being brought hither, where Henry at that time resided, was sentenced to death and executed. Queen Margaret, during the absence of the king in Scotland, resided in this castle, and was delivered of her fifth son at Brotherton, in the immediate vicinity, having been taken ill while on a hunting excursion. After the battle of Agincourt, in the reign of Henry V., the Duke of Orleans and several French noblemen of the highest rank, whom that monarch had taken prisoners, were confined in the castle; and in the year following, the young king of Scotland, who had been taken prisoner on his voyage to France, was confined here till the commencement of the following reign.

During the war between the houses of York and Lancaster, this castle was the prison of numerous noblemen, of whom several were put to death within its walls. Earl Rivers, who had been kept a prisoner here by the Duke of Gloucester, whose designs he had ineffectually attempted to oppose, was put to death in the castle, together with Sir Richard Grey and Sir Thomas Vaughan. In 1461, Edward IV., with an army of forty thousand men, fixed his head-quarters here, whence he marched against the Lancastrians; the two armies met at Towton, where the battle took place, and nearly thirty-seven thousand men were left dead on the field. After the union of the houses of York and Lancaster, in the person of Henry VII., that monarch visited the castle, in the second year of his reign: it was honoured also by a visit from Henry VIII., in 1540; from James I., in 1603 and 1617, on his progress to Scotland; and from Charles I., in 1625. In the rebellion called the Pilgrimage of Grace, the castle was surrendered by Thomas, Lord D'Arcy, to the troops under the command of Aske. At the commencement of the parliamentary war, it was garrisoned for the king, and, in 1644, it was closely invested by Sir Thomas Fairfax, who had taken possession of the town for the parliament. The royalists maintained a spirited defence under a heavy cannonade, which continued several days, and held out till the arrival of Sir Marmaduke Langdale, with a detachment of two thousand men, who after a severe conflict with the parliamentarians in Chequer field, in which he was assisted by sallies from the castle, at length obliged them to raise the siege. On the departure of Sir Marmaduke, the parliamentarians again obtained possession of the town, and throwing up intrenchments for a blockade, renewed their efforts to reduce the castle. The garrison under Governor Lowther fought with obstinate intrepidity, and did considerable execution by frequent sallies, but being in want of provisions, and, owing to the blockade of the town, unable to obtain supplies, they capitulated on honourable terms, and surrendered the castle to the parliamentary forces. After it had been for a short time in their possession, it was retaken by Col. Morrice, and a small band of determined royalists, disguised as peasants carrying in provisions, who entered it without being suspected, and having a reinforcement at hand, secured Col. Cotterell, the governor, and his men in the dungeons, and kept possession of it till it was afterwards invested by Cromwell in person. The garrison, however, maintained their post, and it was not till after the execution of the king that they surrendered this fortress, which the parliament soon afterwards ordered to be dismantled, and the materials to be sold. Of this castle, so memorable for its connexion with the most interesting periods of English history, and which consisted of numerous massive towers, connected by walls of prodigious strength, and fortified by its situation on the summit of an isolated rock, only a small circular tower remains.

The town is pleasantly situated on dry and elevated ground, near the confluence of the rivers Aire and Calder: the streets are spacious and clean: the houses, mostly of brick, are commodious and well built: the town is paved, and lighted with oil, under an act of parliament for its general improvement, and abundantly supplied with excellent water from springs. Two subscription reading rooms have been established. The theatre, a small neat building, erected by subscription, is opened at Easter, and at the time of the races. The races, which commence in the first week of September, and continue three days, are well attended, and are annually growing into repute: the course, which is in the park, is one of the finest in the country, and the rising ground on the south-west side affords a commanding view of the whole: a grand stand was built in 1802, and is well adapted to the accommodation of the visitors. At a short distance from the town a neat monument was erected, in 1818, in commemoration of the battle of Waterloo. In the environs, which are pleasant, and abound with interesting and diversified scenery, are several noblemen's seats. The gardens and nursery grounds produce abundance of excellent fruit and vegetables for the supply of the neighbouring markets, and are famous for the superior quality of the liquorice, which is cultivated extensively; and the making of it into cakes forms the only article of manufacture carried on to any extent. The town has an excellent local trade, arising from the populousness and respectability of the surrounding neighbourhood. The market, which is well supplied with corn and provisions of every kind, is on Saturday: the market-place is a spacious area; in the centre of it was formerly a cross, dedicated to St. Oswald, around which, for a certain space, extended the privilege of freedom from arrest, which was for a considerable time kept unpaved, as a memorial of that right: the cross was removed in 1734, and a neat market-house, ornamented with pillars of the Doric order, erected in pursuance of the will of Mr. Solomon Dupier, by his widow. The fairs are, St. Andrew's, on the first Saturday in December; the twenty days' fair, on the first Saturday after the twentieth from Christmas; Candlemas fair, on the first Saturday after the 13th of February; St. Giles', on the first Saturday after the 12th of September; April 8th, and May 4th, for cattle and sheep, with the moveable fairs on the Saturdays preceding Palm-Sunday, Low Sunday, and Trinity Sunday: there are also fairs every fortnight, on the Saturday next after those of York. The Aire and Calder canal affords a conveyance by water from the ports of Hull and Goole, to Ferrybridge, from which place there is a direct land-carriage to Pontefract.

Corporate Seal.

The town, which had enjoyed various and extensive privileges under the charters of the lords of the honour and manor, was first incorporated by royal charter in the reign of Richard III., which was confirmed by James I., in the 4th year of his reign: the government is vested in a mayor and twelve aldermen, assisted by a recorder, town clerk, and subordinate officers. The mayor is elected by ballot of the burgesses, from the body of aldermen, and appoints the recorder and town clerk, subject to approval by the king. The mayor and aldermen are justices of the peace within the borough, and hold quarter sessions in the town hall, where all the business of the corporation is transacted; a court of record for the borough, every three weeks, for the recovery of debts to any amount; and a court baron for the honour, of which the power was extended, in the 17th of George III., to the recovery of debts not exceeding £5: the general quarter sessions for the West riding of the county are held here at Easter. The town hall is a neat building, erected at the joint expense of the county and the corporation: the lower part, surrounded by an open corridor, is used as a prison, and above is the hall, which is conveniently arranged for the borough courts, and occasionally used as an assembly-room: the front of the building is ornamented with pilasters of the Doric order, surmounted by a cornice. The court-house, erected at the expense of the county, is a handsome structure of freestone, in the Grecian style of architecture, and of the Ionic order, and is in every respect adapted to the business of the county. The borough exercised the elective franchise in the 23rd and 26th of Edward I., from which period it was discontinued till the privilege was revived by James I., in 1621, since which time it has regularly returned two members to parliament: the right of election is vested in the resident householders: the mayor is the returning officer.

The living is a discharged vicarage, with the curacy of St. Giles', in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £13. 6. 8., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the King, as Duke of Lancaster. The church, dedicated to All Saints, formerly the parish church, was nearly demolished in the parliamentary war, and is in ruins; and the church of St. Giles was, by an act of parliament passed in the 29th of George III., rendered parochial: it is a neat edifice, of which the old tower was taken down and rebuilt, in 1707, at the charge of Sir John Bland, of Kippax Park, Bart. The collegiate chapel, dedicated to St. Clement, within the precincts of the castle, and the free chapel of St. Thomas, erected on the spot where the Earl of Lancaster was beheaded, have long since disappeared. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends, Independents, Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists, and Roman Catholics. The free grammar school was founded and endowed in the second year of the reign of Edward VI., and the endowment was augmented in the reign of Elizabeth; but the institution having fallen into decay, was refounded, on petition of the inhabitants, in the 32nd of George III., and is open to all boys of the town. An exhibition of £10 per annum, with rooms, and one of £5 per annum, to two scholars from this school, were founded in University College, Oxford, by John Fries-ton, of Altofts, who also founded two scholarships in Emanuel College, Cambridge, for boys from Normanton school, and in failure of such, for boys from the schools of Pontefract, Leeds, Rotherham, and Wakefield. There are fourteen boys on the foundation, who are nominated by the mayor, recorder, aldermen, and the vicar: the master and usher are appointed by the Chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster. A charity school, which had an endowment of £95 per annum, including a share in Lady Elizabeth Hastings' charity, and was further supported by subscription, for the clothing and instruction of children of both sexes, has been incorporated with a National school, recently built, on an extensive scale, for children of both sexes; and there are Sunday schools in connexion with the established church and the dissenting congregations. The college and hospital of St. Nicholas was originally founded by an abbot of the monastery of St. Oswald, in the county of York, for a reader and thirteen poor persons, and endowed with an income of £23. 13. 4., payable out of the revenue of the duchy of Lancaster: it was vested in the corporation of the borough by James I., and was rebuilt, or materially repaired, by a legacy of £100, bequeathed for that purpose by Mr. Thomas Sayle, of Pontefract: the endowment, by subsequent donations, has been increased to £36 per annum: the premises comprise two separate houses, with a common room to each, and separate lodging-rooms for thirteen aged persons, who receive one shilling each per week, with a supply of coal. Knolles, or the Trinity, almshouse, was founded in the reign of Richard II., by Sir Robert Knolles, and endowed with an annual sum, payable from the revenue of the duchy of Lancaster, the moiety of an estate in Whitechapel, London, devised by Mr. John Mercer, and other property, producing an income of more than £108 per annum: the premises comprise a large common room, and sixteen lodging-rooms for seven aged men and nine women, between whom the revenue of the hospital is divided in equal weekly payments. Perfect's hospital was built at the joint expense of the corporation and the town, and endowed by Mr. William Perfect with land, which, with other donations, produces an income of £40 per annum: the premises comprise three separate dwellings, each for an aged man and his wife, who receive each five shillings per week. The Bede house, of which the origin is unknown, is maintained by the overseers, for the residence of the parish poor. Thwaite's hospital, comprising two cottages with gardens, was bequeathed for the residence of four aged unmarried women, by Mr. Richard Thwaites, in 1620: the inmates divide among them the rents of the gardens, producing, together with subsequent benefactions, about £7 per annum. Cowper's hospital was founded, in 1668, by Mr. Robert Cowper, who bequeathed two cottages, which have been rebuilt at the expense of the parish, and contain a kitchen and four sleeping-rooms, for four aged widows, who receive twenty shillings each per annum, and the interest of £100, bequeathed to them by Mr. Matthew Swinney, in 1765. Two hospitals, or almshouses, built respectively by Mr. Matthew and Mr. Robert Franks, in 1737, and containing each apartments for two aged widows, have an endowment of £11. 10., and £17. 10., per annum, which sums are divided among them, in equal shares weekly. Watkinson's hospital was founded, in 1765, by Edward Watkinson, M.D., who endowed it with personal estates producing £87. 14. 6.: the premises contain apartments for four aged men and four aged women, from the parishes of Pontefract and Ackworth, among whom the income, after paying the necessary repairs, is equally divided. George Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury, gave in trust to the mayor and corporation £200 per annum, to be distributed in loans to poor tradesmen; and there are numerous charitable bequests for distribution among the poor. Among the numerous monastic institutions formerly existing here, was a Cluniac priory, founded in the reign of William Rufus, by Robert de Lacy, and dedicated to St. John the Evangelist, the revenue of which, at the dissolution, was £472. 16. 1.: there are not any remains. During the erection of this priory, the monks inhabited a building which afterwards became the hospital of St. Nicholas, before noticed. A convent of Carmelites was founded, in 1257, by Edmund Lacey, Earl of Lincoln, of which not even the site can be traced. A convent of Dominican, or Black friars, was founded, in 1266, by Symon Pyper, in a place now called Friar-Wood, which at the dissolution consisted of a prior, seven brethren, and a novice. There was also an hospital for Lazars, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene, of uncertain foundation, to which, in 1286, Archbishop Romain was a benefactor; the site is supposed to be occupied by Frank's hospital; and an hospital for a chaplain and eight poor brethren was founded, in the reign of Edward III., by William la Tabourere, which is supposed to be identified with the Bede-house. On the 25th of March, 1822, as two labourers were trenching the land for liquorice, in a field, called Paper Mill Field, near St. Thomas' Hill, one of them struck his spade against a stone coffin, which weighed about a ton and a half, and, on examination, was found to contain the skeleton of a man, with the head between the legs, in good preservation, supposed to be the decapitated remains of Thomas, Earl of Lancaster, who suffered on the 22nd of March, 1322, exactly five hundred years previously: the coffin and its contents were removed into the grounds of Frystone Hall, where they now remain. Dr. Bramhall, who after the Restoration was made Primate of Ireland, was a native of this place. Thomas de Castleford, a monkish historian, was a brother of the Dominican convent; and Dr. Johnson, a physician and eminent antiquary, resided in the town. Pontefract gives the title of earl to the family of Fermor, who are styled Earls of Pomfret.

PONTEFRAC-T-PARK, an extra-parochial liberty, in the upper division of the wapentake of OSGOLDCROSS, West riding of the county of YORK, $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile (N. W. by N.) from Pontefract, containing 47 inhabitants.

PONTELAND, a parish in the western division of CASTLE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, comprising the townships of Berwick-Hill, Brenkley, High Callerton, Little Callerton, Coldcoats, Darras-Hall, Din-nington, Higham-Dykes, Horton-Grange, Kirkley (including Benridge and Cartermoor), Mason, Milburn, Milburn-Grange, Ponteland, and Prestwick, and containing 1524 inhabitants, of which number, 358 are in the township of Ponteland, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.W. by N.) from Newcastle upon Tyne. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Northumberland, and diocese of Durham, rated in the king's books at £13. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Warden and Fellows of Merton College, Oxford. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is partly in the Norman style of architecture, with a square tower surmounted by a low spire. It was formerly collegiate, and had a chantry, and was repaired in 1810, when the north wall was rebuilt. There is a place of worship for Scotch Presbyterians. A free school was founded, in 1719, by Richard Coates, Esq., who bequeathed property in Newcastle upon Tyne, producing, in 1828, about £70 a year for its support: the school-house was erected at the expense of his widow, in 1727; about twenty-five children are instructed in it. The rivers Blyth and Pont run through the parish: coal is obtained here; and there are some slight remains of a castle in the village of Ponteland. This place was built by Elius Hadrianus, and was garrisoned by the first cohort of the Cornavii. In 1244, Henry III. and the king of Scots concluded a peace here.

PONTESBURY, a parish in the hundred of FORD, county of SALOP, comprising the chapelry of Longdon, and the townships of Cruckton, Edge, and Pontesbury, and containing, with Little Hanwood, 2458 inhabitants, of which number, 1322 are in the township of Pontesbury, $7\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S.W. by W.) from Shrewsbury. The living is a rectory, in three portions: the first is rated in the king's books at £17. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Rev. Ham. Harrison; the second also at £17. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Provost and Fellows of Queen's College, Oxford; and the third at £8. 10., and in the patronage of W. E. Owen, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. George, was formerly collegiate, including a dean and three prebendaries: it has lately received an addition of three hundred and twenty sittings, of which three hundred are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £200 for that purpose. There is a place of worship for Baptists. Lead mines are worked here to a considerable extent.

PONTISBRIGHT, or CHAPEL, a parish in the Witham division of the hundred of LEXDEN, county of ESSEX, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.E.) from Great Coggeshall, containing 331 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Colchester, and diocese of London, and in the patronage of the Parishioners.

PONTON (GREAT), a parish in the soke of GRANTHAM, parts of KESTEVEN, county of LINCOLN, 4 miles (N.) from Colsterworth, containing 418 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £11. 9. 7., and in the patronage of the Prebendary of North Grantham in the Cathedral Church of Salisbury. The church, dedicated to the Holy Cross, has a tower and spire, erected in 1519, at the expense of Anthony Ellys, Esq., and much admired for their beauty. W. Archer, in 1713, liberally endowed with land and houses a free school for poor children. The river Witham runs through the village, which was the Ad Ponem of Antoninus. Here, and in the immediate vicinity, Roman coins, arched vaults, tessellated pavements, bricks, &c., have been discovered at different periods.

PONTON (LITTLE), a parish in the wapentake of WINNIBRIGGS and THREO, parts of KESTEVEN, county of LINCOLN, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.S.E.) from Grantham, containing 180 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £7. 10., and in the patronage of the Rev. Dr. Dewdeswell. The church is dedicated to St. Guthlake. A silver Trajan was found in digging near the high dyke in this parish.

PONTOP, a hamlet in that part of the parish of LANCHESTER which is in the western division of CHESTER ward, county palatine of DURHAM, 12 miles (N.W.) from Durham. The population is returned with the township of Collierly.

PONT-Y-POOL, a market town and chapelry in the parish of TREVETHAN, upper division of the hundred of ABERGAVENNY, county of MONMOUTH, 20 miles (S.W. by W.) from Monmouth, and 146 (W. by N.) from London. The population is returned with the parish. This town, the name of which is a corruption of Pont ap Howel, is situated on a declivity between the river Avon and the canal to Newport, near the base of the bold elevation of Mynydd-Maen. It appears to have arisen out of the village of Trevethin, and to have owed its present importance to the inventive genius of Thomas Allgood, a native of Northamptonshire, who made some discoveries here of considerable advantage to the manufactures of the country, in the art of imitating japan varnish, from which the articles were denominated Japan ware: in addition to which his son introduced and carried on here for a considerable time, a branch of art in cleansing and polishing iron, which produced articles of such excellent workmanship, as eventually to obtain for them the name of Pont-y-pool ware. The prosperity of the town was completed, about the close of the sixteenth century, by the establishment of iron-works, under the auspices of Capel Hanbury, to which the mineral productions of the county, with the numerous forges and furnaces, and the more modern accommodations of conveyance, both by land and water, have essentially contributed. The surrounding scenery is of a rugged character, the prospect from some points being exceedingly extensive. The town is situated on the great basin of coal and iron stone which extends westward through Wales to Pembrokeshire; it is irregularly built, and consists chiefly of two streets, which contain many neat, but detached, houses: the streets are partially Macadamized, lighted with gas, and well supplied with water from the small river Avon, and the adjacent springs: many good houses are in progress of erection, and the town is in a state of moderate improvement. In the vicinity is a great number of new buildings for the accommodation of agents to the different companies, also numerous cottages for workmen, the walls of which are invariably whitewashed. The extensive iron-works were begun in 1565, and enlarged by John Hanbury, Esq., who, in addition to various improvements in machinery, discovered the method of making sheet-iron by the compression of rollers, and of casting iron with tin. Numerous forges and iron-mills, for making tin plate, are continually at work. The furnaces of the British Mining Company are situated at the Varteage, about three miles distant from the town. A great part of the soil in this district is upon limestone, and the sheep fed here yield excellent mutton. About a mile south-west of the town, at the base of the mountain called Mynydd-Maen, a level and colliery have been lately opened, which drain ten veins of coal forty-two feet in thickness, with an equal number of iron-stone, one hundred feet thick, whence issues a stream of chalybeate water. The manufacture of the Japan and Pont-y-pool ware is still carried on, though it is now rivalled by that of Birmingham. The chief articles of trade are, iron of every description and quality, of which this parish is capable of sending thirty thousand tons annually to market; and coal, in which the neighbouring hills abound: these works, with the lime-kilns, afford employment to many thousand persons. There is also some business in the leather trade, and a good brewery. Facility of conveyance is supplied by several tram-roads, and, to the port of Newport, by the Monmouthshire and Brecon canals, which pass through Pont-y-pool, and form a junction at the village of Pent-y-Moel. The market is on Saturday, and, during the summer, there is an additional market on Wednesday: fairs are on April 2nd and 22nd, July 5th, and October 10th, for horses, cattle, sheep, cheese, &c. The government of the town is under the jurisdiction of the county magistrates, of whom one is resident; and petty sessions for the upper division of the hundred of Abergavenny are held here; as also an annual court leet for the lords of the manors of Wensland and Brynwyn, at which the stewards preside.

The living is a perpetual curacy, united to that of Trevelthan, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaff, endowed with £2200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Chapter of Llandaff. The chapel, dedicated to St. James, is a very ancient building, but it has recently undergone such considerable repairs as to make it a neat and commodious structure: it contains four hundred and fifty free sittings, the Incorporated Society for building and enlarging churches and chapels having contributed £350 towards defraying the expense. There are four places of worship for Baptists, four for Wesleyan Methodists, three for Independents, and one each for the Society of Friends, and Roman Catholics; some of these are situated on the adjacent hills.

POOL, a joint township with Byrome, in the parish of BROTHERTON, partly within the liberty of St. Peter of York, East riding, and partly in the lower division of the wapentake of BARKSTONE-ASH, West riding, of the county of YORK, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (N.N.E.) from Ferry-Bridge, containing 61 inhabitants.

POOL (NETHER), a township in the parish of EAST-HAM, higher division of the hundred of WIRRAL, county palatine of CHESTER, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Chester, containing 24 inhabitants.

POOL (OVER), a township in the parish of EAST-HAM, higher division of the hundred of WIRRAL, county palatine of CHESTER, 8 miles (N. by W.) from Chester, containing 74 inhabitants.

POOL (SOUTH), a parish in the hundred of COLERIDGE, county of DEVON, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E.) from Kingsbridge, containing 493 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £22. 16. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. T. H. Hayes, Esq. was patron in 1826. The church is dedicated to St. Cyriac.

POOLE, a township in the parish of ACTON, hundred of NANTWICH, county palatine of CHESTER, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Nantwich, containing 185 inhabitants. The Chester canal passes within its western boundary.

POOLE, a borough, sea-port, and market town, being a distinct county of itself, styled "the Town and County of the Town of Poole," though locally in the hundred of Cogdean, Shaston (East) division of the county of DORSET, 28 miles (E.) from Dorchester, and 104 (S.W. by W.) from London, containing 6390 inhabitants. This town appears to have risen from insignificance as a fishing hamlet, about the time of Edward III., at which period the port was much frequented; and it furnished that sovereign with four ships and ninety-four men in aid of the siege of Calais: after much fluctuation in its prosperity during the succeeding reigns, about the time of Henry VI. the population had considerably increased, and the immediate successors of that monarch granted various privileges to the inhabitants. Becoming the resort and residence of Spanish merchants, the trade improved greatly, until the commencement of the reign of Elizabeth, and the breaking out of the war with Spain, when a temporary failure in its commercial interests succeeded their departure; but various additional privileges and immunities having been granted, its rising importance was established on a solid and permanent basis. During the great civil war, Poole was fortified and garrisoned for the parliament, and became the scene of severe contests and extensive slaughter, and in the succeeding reign its fortifications, though inconsiderable, were destroyed.

The town is situated on a peninsula, which is connected by an isthmus with the main land, on the north side of the harbour, from which it derives its name, and consists of several good streets, paved under the general highway act, and lighted and watched, according to the provisions of a local act obtained in the 29th of George II.: the houses in general are of a respectable appearance, several of them being of a superior order: the inhabitants are supplied with water brought from a well at Tatnam, about a mile distant, and there are wells of good water belonging to most of the dwelling-houses. Different reading societies have been formed, and a public library has recently been established, for which a building is about to be erected in the High-street, at the expense of the Hon. W. F. S. Ponsonby, one of the representatives for the borough, on ground given by the other, B. L. Lester, Esq. The town-house, a neat structure on the quay, has been recently erected by subscription, and is used by the subscribers, who are chiefly merchants, as a news-room. The trade of the port is principally with Newfoundland, and was formerly more extensive than it is at present: the exports consist of provisions, wearing apparel, and commodities of all kinds useful for the residents there, which are exchanged for cod and salmon, the greater part of which is sent to foreign markets; and oil, seal skins, furs, and cranberries, for home consumption. Considerable quantities of corn are imported and exported. The manufactures of the town and neighbourhood consist principally of rope, twine, and sail-cloth; and in the yards for ship-building many workmen are engaged. The oyster-fishery employs a great number of boats; and, with the abundance of other fish taken in the harbour, especially plaice and herrings, which are remarkably fine, furnishes a large supply for the London market. By charter of Henry VI., who transferred the privileges of the port of Melcombe-Regis hither, a market and two fairs were granted; the former is held on Thursday, there being also another on Monday: one fair is held on the feast of St. Philip and St. James, the other on All Souls' day, each continuing seven days. The butchers' market is held under the guildhall, and there are two adjacent market-places for vegetables and poultry, one of them recently erected by the corporation.

The municipal government is vested in a mayor, recorder, sheriff, four justices of the peace, and an indefinite number of aldermen, with a town clerk, and other officers. The first charter, which is without date, is supposed to have been granted between the 1st and 9th of Richard I., by which William Longespee, lord of the manor of Canford, of which Poole then formed a part, granted to his burgesses of Poole certain privileges, and prescribed the form of government for the borough. This charter was confirmed by William de Montacute, in the 45th of Edward III., and subsequently by Thomas de Montacute, in the 12th of Henry IV., both Earls of Salisbury, and lords of the manor of Canford: these, with all former charters, were confirmed by Elizabeth, by charter dated February 18th, 1559: that sovereign also granted a new one, in the 10th of her reign, which is the governing charter, and re-incorporated the burgesses and inhabitants, by the style of "the Mayor, Bailiffs, Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Town of Poole," erecting it into a county of itself, entirely independent of the county of Dorset. Other charters, with an extension of former privileges, were granted by Charles II., in the 19th of his reign, and James II., in the 4th. The burgesses are chosen by the corporation at large, and the mayor is elected by the burgesses from their own body, on the Friday before St. Matthew's day; he is a justice of the peace, and the ensuing year is elected senior bailiff and a justice: the number of aldermen is unlimited, as every person who has served the office of mayor becomes an alderman: the recorder and town clerk are chosen by the corporation, subject to the approval of the king. On the day of election for mayor, the burgesses appoint from among their own number, a senior bailiff, four justices of the peace, a sheriff, water-bailiff, and two coroners: the two serjeants at mace are elected by the corporation. The county magistrates have no jurisdiction within the town. A weekly court of record is held under the charter of Elizabeth, in which the mayor and the senior bailiff preside as judges: the jurisdiction embraces pleas of any amount within the town and county of the town, with the same power of personal arrest and attachment of goods as that exercised by the superior courts.

VOL. III.

Admiralty Seal.

A court of admiralty, formerly annual, is now occasionally held by the mayor, as admiral within the liberties; a jury is empanelled, and a perambulation of the boundaries of the port made, and all nuisances and encroachments are presented. The sheriff holds his Tourn annually, at which presentments of illegal weights and measures are made. Quarter sessions are held before the recorder, mayor, and justices. The guildhall, in which the sessions and public meetings of the corporation are held, was erected, in 1761, at the joint expense of Joseph Gulston, jun., Esq., and Lieut. Col. Calcraft: the chandeliers and sconces with which it is ornamented were given by William Morton Pitt, Esq., formerly one of the representatives for Poole, and late member for the county of Dorset, who also gave a pair of handsome silver gilt maces, now in use. The first return made by this borough was to a council in the 14th of Edward III., and to two of his parliaments, there having been an intermission from that time until the 31st of Henry VI., since which it has regularly returned two members. The elective franchise is prescriptive: the right is vested in the corporation, the number of voters being two hundred and nine, of whom one hundred and forty-seven are resident, and sixty-two non-resident; thirty-two of the residents, however, are minors: the sheriff is the returning officer, and the interest of the Garland family predominates. The number of the electors having considerably decreased, and several being non-resident, the corporation, pursuant to a notice-given by William Jolliffe, Esq., then mayor, held a special meeting on the 16th of September, 1830, at which, on the nomination of forty-eight burgesses, ninety-six inhabitants were admitted to the freedom, each burgess being allowed to nominate two. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the jurisdiction of the peculiar court of Great Canford and Poole, and in the patronage of the Mayor and Corporation. The church, dedicated to St. James, is a new and elegant edifice of Purbeck stone, the old church having become dilapidated. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, Wesleyan Methodists, and Unitarians. A free school, on the National system, for poor children of both sexes, is conducted by a master, who receives £24 per annum, arising from a bequest of £300 by a Mr. Harbin, in trust to the corporation, and invested in the purchase of land at Corfe-Castle, now producing £60 a year, the residue being distributed among the poor at Christmas. Almshouses in West-street, for twelve poor persons, were founded and endowed, early in the seventeenth century, with an annuity of £18, chargeable on an estate near Longham, by Mr. Robert Rogers, of London. Other almshouses, for a similar number, situated at Hungerhill, were founded in 1812, by George Garland, Esq., who endowed them with £200 and the rent of property in Poole, amounting at present to £26 per annum, appointing the corporation trustees. There are also some almshouses in Church-street, of unknown foundation. Sir Peter Thompson, a Hamburgh merchant, and many years fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian Societies, collected all the known ancient records relating to this his native place, where he almost constantly resided, and where, at his death, he was buried. This was also the birth-place of John Lewis, a divine and antiquary.

POOLE, a chapelry in that part of the parish of OTLEY which is in the upper division of the wapentake of SKYRACK, West riding of the county of YORK, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Otley, containing 294 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Otley. There is a trifling annuity, the gift of Mr. Fleetham, for teaching six children.

POOLE-KEYNES, a parish in the hundred of MALMESBURY, county of WILTS, 7 miles (N. E. by N.) from Malmesbury, containing 146 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Wilts, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £7. 12. 6., and in the patronage of the King, as Duke of Lancaster. The church is dedicated to St. Michael.

POORSTOCK, a parish partly in the hundred of EGGERTON, but chiefly in the liberty of POORSTOCK, Bridport division of the county of DORSET, 4 miles (N. E. by E.) from Bridport, containing, with the tythings of West Milton, Nettlecombe, and South Poorton, 1010 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £16. 16. 8., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Salisbury. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. In the 7th of Edward III., a market on Thursdays, and a fair on the eve, day, and morrow, of St. Philip and James, and two days afterwards, were granted to John Wroxhale, to be held here. At Mappercombe are the remains of an ancient chapel.

POORTON (NORTH), a parish in the hundred of BEAMINSTER-FORUM and REDHONE, Bridport division of the county of DORSET, 5 miles (S. E.) from Beaminster, containing 89 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £5. 11. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. T. Banger, Esq. was patron in 1820. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

POORTON (SOUTH), a tything in that part of the parish of POORSTOCK which is in the hundred of EGGERTON, Bridport division of the county of DORSET. The population is returned with the parish.

POPHAM, a parish in the hundred of MITCHELDEVER, Basingstoke division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 7 miles (S. W.) from Basingstoke, containing 98 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester, and in the patronage of Sir Thomas Baring, Bart. The church is dedicated to St. Catherine.

POPLAR, formerly a joint hamlet with Blackwall, in the parish of STEPNEY, now a parish, in the Tower division of the hundred of OSSULSTONE, county of MIDDLESEX, 3 miles (E. by S.) from London, containing, at the time of the last census, 12,223 inhabitants, and at present (1830) nearly 16,000. This place, which was separated from Stepney, and erected into a parish, by act of parliament, in 1817, derived its name from the number of poplar trees with which it abounded, and for the growth of which its situation near the river was extremely favourable. It is situated at the south-east extremity of the county, and is bounded on the east, west, and south, by the river Thames, and on the north by the parishes of Bromley and Limehouse. It is inhabited chiefly by persons engaged in the shipping interest, by numerous artisans employed in the various yards for building and repairing ships, and by a multitude of labourers, who find employment in the docks. The West India docks, an extensive establishment for the accommodation of the homeward and outward bound fleets, were constructed in this parish, in 1802; and, from the peculiar advantages of its situation, the East India docks were also established here, in 1804: these magnificent undertakings, which are honourable to the commercial enterprise of the country, have been described under the head of BLACKWALL. The parish is partially paved, well lighted with gas, and amply supplied with water by the East London water-works. It is within the jurisdiction of the court of requests, for the Tower Hamlets, for the recovery of debts under the amount of 40s., and within the limits of the new police establishment. The town hall was erected in 1770, on the removal of an ancient edifice, which stood in the highway, and which was taken down in the preceding year. The management of the poor, and the superintendence of the watching, paving, and lighting of the parish, were, by act of parliament in 1813, vested in certain of the parishioners, who were subsequently appointed a vestry to regulate the parochial concerns.

The living is a rectory not in charge, in the jurisdiction of the Commissary of London, concurrently with the Consistorial Episcopal Court: the present incumbent was appointed by the inhabitants, but at his decease, the right of presentation will lapse to the Principal and Fellows of Brasenose College, Oxford. The church, dedicated to All Saints, was erected by the parishioners, at an expense of £37,000: it is a handsome structure in the Grecian style of architecture, with a lofty steeple of the Composite order: the interior, of which the central part is appropriated to the use of the poor, is conveniently arranged, and chastely ornamented, and ample accommodation is provided for the children of the numerous schools in the parish. It is situated on the south side of the East India road, in the centre of a spacious cemetery, on the west of which is a handsome house for the rector. A chapel of ease, dedicated to St. Mary, was built by subscription in 1654, at an expense of £2000, on a piece of ground given for that purpose by the East India Company, by whom it was almost entirely rebuilt in 1776; it is a neat building, and has a spacious burial-ground: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Hon. the East India Company, being attached to the hospital supported by them here. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists. The boys' school, established in 1711, in union with the parish of Limehouse, for thirty children, but now a separate institution, affords instruction on the National system to two hundred and thirty boys, of whom seventy are annually clothed. The free school, instituted in 1816 by subscription, for children of Poplar, Blackwall, and the neighbourhood, is liberally supported, and affords instruction to three hundred boys and two hundred girls, of whom, one hundred and fifty of each are clothed: a school-room for boys, and another for girls, with houses for the master and mistress, have been erected, at an expense of £3,037. 1. 11½., on a piece of ground given by the East India Company. This institution has an income of £240, arising from benefactions: the master's salary is £100 per annum, and that of the mistress £70, with an allowance of coal and candles: it is open to children of all religious denominations. A Roman Catholic school, for the children of the numerous Irish labourers employed in the docks, affords the means of instruction to upwards of one hundred and fifty; and in the Ladies' charity school, in union with the National Society, one hundred girls are taught and annually clothed, under the superintendence of a committee of ladies. An infant school has recently been erected, and is solely maintained by George Green, Esq., ship-builder, who has been a munificent benefactor to the parish, and a zealous promoter of the schools, to the establishment and support of which, and to other charitable uses, he has appropriated more than £10,000.

The East India hospital, in connexion with the chapel, which the inmates attend for divine service, was established for the maintenance of widows of officers and seamen in the Company's service: it is a spacious and substantial quadrangular structure, comprising twenty-two tenements, having been entirely rebuilt by the Company in 1802: the south front contains the chaplain's residence in the centre, and on each side dwellings for the hospitallers; and to the north of the chapel are superior dwellings for the widows of superior officers: the institution is maintained partly by contribution from the pay of seamen employed in the East India service, and by funds appropriated by the Company. Sir Henry Johnson, in 1683, bequeathed £300 for the purpose of building six almshouses for poor ship-carpenters, which design was not accomplished till 1756, when they were erected chiefly through the exertions of Dr. Gloster Ridley. Mrs. Esther Hawes founded an almshouse for six aged widows, and endowed it with £9 per annum; and Mr. John Till, by will, gave four almshouses at Blackwall for poor watermen. The workhouse is a substantial brick building, with a handsome front elevation, and is in every respect well adapted to the comforts of the poor. There are various charitable bequests for distribution among the necessitous and aged parishioners. George Stevens, the celebrated commentator and editor of Shakspeare's plays, was born here in 1736, and buried in the chapel in 1800, where is a monument to his memory, with a fine bas relief, in which he is represented contemplating the bust of his favourite author. In the cemetery are the tombs of Dr. Gloster Ridley, minister of Poplar, who died in 1774, and of his son, the Rev. James Ridley, author of the "Tales of the Genii:" he died in 1765. Among the eminent men who occasionally resided here were, Ainsworth, the compiler of the Latin Dictionary, who kept a school in the neighbourhood; and Sir Richard Steele, coadjutor with Addison in the Tatler and Spectator; he is said to have had a laboratory here, and to have expended large sums of money in the study of alchemy.

POPPLETON (NETHER), a parish in the ainsty of the city, and east riding of the county, of YORK, 4 miles (N.W.) from York, containing 254 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, and in the patronage of the Archbishop of York. The church, dedicated to All Saints, is a very ancient structure. A school was established, in 1799, by John Dodsworth, who endowed it with £10 per annum: it is conducted upon the National system, and is aided by voluntary subscriptions. The parish is situated on the river Ouse.

POPPLETON (UPPER), a chapelry in that part of the parish of ST. MARY BISHOPSHILL, JUNIOR, which is in the ainsty of the city, and East riding of the county, of YORK, 4½ miles (N.W. by W.) from York, containing 346 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Dean and Chapter of York. The chapel is a small edifice. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

PORCHESTER, or PORTCHESTER, a parish in the hundred of PORTSDOWN, Portsdown division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 2½ miles (E.S.E.) from Fareham, containing 757 inhabitants. This place, the ancient Caer Peris of the Britons, and the Portus Magnus of the Romans, was by the Saxons called Port ceastre, either from the castle which defended its spacious harbour, or from Port, a Saxon chief, who landed here with his two sons, Bieda and Maegla, and having obtained a settlement in this part of the island, assisted Cerdic in establishing the kingdom of the West Saxons. A castle of great strength was erected on the old Roman works, which was greatly enlarged, or more probably rebuilt, soon after the Conquest; and previously to the destruction of the harbour, on the retiring of the sea, this place was the principal station of the British navy, subsequently removed to Portsmouth. Porchester castle is situated on a neck of land projecting for a considerable way into the sea: the walls, which are from eight to twelve feet in thickness, and eighteen feet high, enclose a quadrangular area of nearly five acres, and are defended by numerous towers, and surrounded by a broad and deep moat: the keep is a strong square building, one hundred and fifteen feet in length, and sixty-five feet in breadth, with four towers, the largest of which forms the north-west angle; it contains many spacious rooms, of which some are vaulted with stone, and one appears to have been the chapel: the entrance to the outer area is through massive Norman towers on the east and west sides. The ancient parish church of St. Mary is within the outer area of the castle, of which several of the towers and a considerable portion of the walls are now in ruins: the castle, during the late war, was appropriated as a place of confinement for prisoners of war. The village of Porchester, called by way of distinction Porchester-street, extends for about a mile on the road to Fareham, and contains several neat houses: the publicans, by charter of Elizabeth, enjoy exemption from having soldiers billeted in their houses. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £6, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is an ancient and venerable cruciform structure, in the Norman style of architecture, with a low central tower; the south transept has been destroyed, and the chancel, which is small, is of later date, and has an east window of three lights, in the later style of English architecture; the west front is in good preservation, and exhibits a fine specimen of the Norman style.

PORINGLAND (GREAT, or EAST), a parish in the hundred of HENSTEAD, county of NORFOLK, 5 miles (S.S.E.) from Norwich, containing, with Little Poringland, 407 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 2½, and in the patronage of the Duke of Norfolk. The church, dedicated to All Saints, was founded before the Conquest, and the body of it rebuilt about 1432; the windows are decorated with stained glass, particularly one in the chancel, which is in fine preservation, and represents the Salutation.

PORINGLAND (LITTLE, or WEST), a parish in the hundred of HENSTEAD, county of NORFOLK, 5¼ miles (S.S.E.) from Norwich. The population is returned with Great Poringland. The living is a perpetual curacy, united, in 1728, to the rectory of Howe, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich. The church is dedicated to St. Michael.

PORLOCK, a parish (formerly a market town) and small port, in the hundred of CARHAMPTON, county of SOMERSET, 6 miles (W.) from Minehead, containing 769 inhabitants. The name is derived from the Saxon Portlocan, an enclosed harbour. The place is of considerable antiquity, having been a residence of the West Saxon kings, who also had an extensive chase here. About the year 918, a band of pirates entered this harbour, but the greater number were slain by the inhabitants, and the rest having escaped to the island of Steep-holmes, died of hunger. In 1052, Harold, the son of Earl Godwin, having sailed from Ireland with nine ships, entered Porlock bay, and having been unsuccessfully opposed by the inhabitants, he slew great numbers, set fire to the town, and carried off much booty. The town is romantically situated near the Bristol channel, being surrounded on all sides, except the sea, by lofty hills, winding valleys, and deep glens: it consists of two streets, composed of straggling houses of the meanest order. At the western corner of Porlock bay is a small harbour, to which three sloops and several fishing-boats belong, but they have little employment: the inhabitants were formerly occupied in spinning yarn of excellent quality, and which was carried to Dunster market, at that time the resort of dealers in that commodity: the trade at present consists in the importation of coal and lime from Wales. The market, which was held on Thursday, has been discontinued. Fairs are held on the Thursday before the 13th of September, October 11th, and November 12th, for cattle, and a small breed of sheep, called Porlocks. A manorial court is held annually. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Taunton, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £18. 11. 8., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Dubritius, is a fine structure in the ancient English style, and contains some old monumental effigies, supposed to be in memory of the early feudal lords. Eight poor persons living within the manor are maintained from the rents and profits of lands purchased with a bequest assigned, for the benefit of this and other places, by Henry Rogers, Esq., about 1672, who also bequeathed £600 towards a workhouse and a fund, for the maintenance of those poor inhabitants of the parish whose ancestors were born in it. In an adjacent wood are the remains of an imperfect oval encampment, supposed to have been constructed at the time of Harold's invasion, within the area of which swords and other warlike implements have been dug up. John Bridgewater, a controversial divine, and Matthew Hales, D.D., the companion and friend of Dr. Stukeley, and author of "Vegetable Statics," were once rectors of this parish; the former subsequently resigned all his preferment, and embraced the tenets of the church of Rome.

PORTBURY, a parish in the hundred of PORTBURY, county of SOMERSET, 6 miles (W. by N.) from Bristol, containing 594 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, with that of Tickenham annexed, in the archdeaconry of Bath, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £10. 11. 3., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bristol. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. Portbury is a very ancient place, and gives name to the hundred. It was occupied by the Romans, as is evident from the coins and foundations discovered here, as well as from traces of the Roman road being still visible through the parish to the sea at Portsmouth, whence there was a passage to Caerleon, anciently Isca Silurum. Here was formerly a cell to the Augustine priory of Breamore, Hants.

PORTCASSEGG, a hamlet in that part of the parish of ST. ARVANS which is in the upper division of the hundred of RAGLAND, county of MONMOUTH, containing 18 inhabitants.

PORTGATE, a township in the parish of ST. JOHN-LEE, southern division of TINDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 5 miles (N.E. by E.) from Hexham, containing 33 inhabitants. It was so called from a passage through the great Roman wall, the site of which at this place has been levelled by the plough. Here is an old border tower, near which the Devil's Causeway branches from Watling-street.

PORTINGSCALE, a joint township with Coledale, in that part of the parish of CROSTHWAITE which is in ALLERDALE ward above Darwent, county of CUMBERLAND, 1¼ mile (W. by N.) from Keswick. The population is returned with Coledale. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The village is situated on the margin of Derwentwater, of which and the lake Bassenthwaite, with the beautifully romantic tract from Swineshead to Skiddaw, there are fine prospects from the adjacent heights.

PORTINGTEN, a joint township with Cavil, in the parish of EASTINGTON, wapentake of HOWDENSHERE, East riding of the county of YORK, 3¼ miles (N.E.) from Howden, containing, with Cavil, 98 inhabitants.

PORTISHAM, a parish in the hundred of UGGS-COMBE, Dorchester division of the county of DORSET, 7¾ miles (S.W. by W.) from Dorchester, containing 600 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £8. 14. 2., endowed with £1000 parliamentary grant. Joseph Hardy, Esq. was patron in 1814. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, is a large ancient structure, having a lofty embattled tower crowned with pinnacles. Charles Masterman, in 1771, left £100 for teaching poor children. In this parish is the largest cromlech in the county; it consists of a flat stone, ten feet by six, resting horizontally on nine upright ones, and stands on a tumulus, having on the north-west an avenue leading to it: there is a small barrow to the eastward of this ancient monument.

PORTISHEAD, a parish in the hundred of PORTBURY, county of SOMERSET, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.N.W.) from Bristol, containing 506 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Bath, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £32. 15. $7\frac{1}{2}$, and in the patronage of the Mayor and Corporation of Bristol. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The parish is bounded on the north by the Bristol channel; and there is a battery at Portishead point for the defence of King Road, where ships of war on this station usually anchor. The Britons, Romans, and Danes, successively occupied this spot: the form of the camp approaches that of an irregular rhomboid, its longer diameter being four hundred, and its shorter about two hundred, yards; it was converted to similar purposes during the great civil war, for, according to the parliamentary records of that period, the royalists posted here surrendered to Sir Thomas Fairfax, who had been sent against them. The ancient boundary called Wansdyke terminates here. It is in contemplation to form a landing pier at this place, for the delivery of the Irish mails, to communicate with a suspension bridge, now about to be constructed over the Avon, at St. Vincent's rock.

PORTLAND, a parish, forming the liberty of the Isle of PORTLAND, in the Dorchester division of the county of DORSET, 4 miles (S.) from Weymouth, containing 2254 inhabitants. Though called an island, this parish is in reality a peninsula, connected with the main land by an extremely narrow isthmus, called Chesil Bank, a line of shingles thrown up by the sea, and extending for more than eight miles from Portland to Abbotsbury. The parish, which contains seven villages is bounded on the north by Portland road and Smallmouth, leading into the waters called the Fleets, behind Chesil Bank, across which is a ferry to Weymouth; on the east by Portland Race, the passage of which, even in the calmest weather, is rendered dangerous by an eddy of two opposing currents; and on the south and west by the channel. The island is about four miles and a half in length, and two miles in breadth, of an elliptical form, and nearly ten miles in circumference; the shores are steep and rugged, but the summit is smooth, and the soil produces wheat, peas, oats, and barley. At the southern extremity, called Portland Bill, are the higher and lower lighthouses, and a signal station called the "Lowes:" near the former is a remarkable cavern, from which the water rises as from a fountain. On the eastern side are Rufus and Pennsylvania castles; and on the northern side are Portland castle, and a signal station called Veru. The whole island is one vast rock of stone, of very superior quality, much esteemed, and generally used in the most magnificent buildings; it was first brought into repute in the reign of James I., and the digging of it constitutes the principal employment of the inhabitants. The quarries are in the western part of the island, and have proved an inexhaustible source of wealth to the proprietors. The village of Easton is nearly in the centre of the island, and, with the various other hamlets, is chiefly inhabited by the families of the men employed in the quarries. This is a royal manor, the lands being ancient demesne, and the king's steward holds two courts yearly, viz., at Lady-day and Michaelmas. The custom of gavelkind prevails in it; and the inhabitants have a curious practice of passing lands by sale, viz., by church gift: the seller and buyer go into the church, taking with them three or four persons, tenants of the island, and there make the church gift, which is very concise. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £18. 2. 1., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Winchester. The church is dedicated to St. George. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. In the southern part of the island are the remains of an ancient castle, and the ruins of the old church, which formerly was in the centre; and behind the Portland Arms Inn are traces of what is supposed to have been a Roman encampment. This place gives the title of duke to the family of Bentinck.

PORTLEMOUTH (EAST), a parish in the hundred of COLERIDGE, county of DEVON, 6 miles (S. by E.) from Kingsbridge, containing 391 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Totness, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £29. 18. 4., and in the patronage of the Duke of Bolton. The church, dedicated to St. Onolus, has a handsome wooden screen. Portlemouth commands one of the most beautiful sea-views in the county, including Kingsbridge, the æstuaries, and Salcombe harbour. Walter Jago and others, in 1679, left small sums towards the support of a schoolmaster for teaching Latin and arithmetic.

PORTON, a tything in the parish of IDMISTON, hundred of ALDERBURY, county of WILTS, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N.E. by N.) from Salisbury, containing 140 inhabitants.

PORTSCUETT, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of CALDICOTT, county of MONMOUTH, 5 miles (S. W. by S.) from Chepstow, containing 168 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory with that of St. Pierre, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaff, rated in the king's books at £7. 2. 1., and in the patronage of Charles Lewis, Esq. Near the bank of the Severn are vestiges of a Roman camp, part of which has been swept away by the river. The ancient road from this station to the great camp at Caerwent passes through the parish. From Black Rock there is a ferry over the Severn, called the New Passage, connecting the great road from London into South Wales.

PORTSEA, a parish, divided into the liberty part, which is within the jurisdiction of the borough of PORTSMOUTH, and the Guildable part, which is in the hundred of PORTSDOWN, Portsdown division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 17 miles (S.E. by E.) from Southampton, and $71\frac{1}{2}$ (S.W.) from London, and containing 38,379 inhabitants. This place, which is now the principal naval arsenal of Great Britain, takes its name from the island of Portsea, to which, on the retiring of the sea from the ancient Portchester, the inhabitants removed, and at the mouth of the harbour built the town of Portsmouth, to which it was originally a small suburb. The island is nearly sixteen miles in circumference, and is bounded on the south by Spithead, on the east by Langston harbour, on the west by Portsmouth harbour, and on the north by a channel uniting them, over which is a bridge, connecting it with the main land. It abounds with a great variety of animal and vegetable productions, but has nothing peculiar in its geological formation. Widgeons, wild ducks, teal, and curlew, are found in abundance; larks congregate in numerous flocks, and the snow-bunting, the cross-bill, and other scarce birds, are occasionally seen. More than two hundred different species of insects have been collected in the course of one summer, and a great variety of shells is found on the beach. The town, which is situated on the waste ground formerly called Portsmouth common, has rapidly increased within the last century, and its population is at present more than five times as great as that of Portsmouth, though the houses were originally permitted to be built on condition of their demolition in the event of an enemy landing. It contains many good and regularly-formed streets, several terraces, crescents, and handsome ranges of respectable houses, inhabited by the more opulent families connected with Portsmouth, and has very extensive suburbs, chiefly inhabited by artizans employed in the dock yards: it is well paved, lighted with gas, by a company incorporated by act of parliament in 1821, and amply supplied with water by the Portsea Island water-works. The Hampshire subscription library is well supported, and contains a valuable collection of volumes in the various departments of literature.

The fortifications, which were begun in 1770, are very complete, and are unrivalled for strength and beauty: the lines extend from north to south, presenting to the eastward several strong bastions and outworks, crowned with batteries of heavy ordnance; and the trenches, which are broad and deep, can be instantaneously filled with water up to the bridges, which connect it with Portsmouth, on the south. The Royal Dock-yard occupies an area of one hundred and ten acres, and comprises, on the grandest scale, and on the most scientific principles, the numerous arrangements for supplying the necessary equipments, and extensive depôts of naval and military stores. The entrance into the yard, which forms a town of itself, is through a lofty handsome gateway; and among the numerous buildings within the walls, the residence of the commissioner is conspicuous for its stateliness: in the centre of the building is a noble portico, and on each side are the various offices connected with the establishment. The great basin comprehends an area of thirty-three thousand square yards, communicating with four dry docks; and there is also a double dock for frigates. Ships of the line may at any time enter from the harbour into the dock-yard, where twelve men of war can be fitted up at the same time. The covered building-docks are very capacious: the rope house is of vast extent, being one thousand and ninety-four yards long, and four stories high; on the lower story, the floor of which is laid with iron and tin, is the immense machinery for making cables, of which some are thirty inches in circumference; the three upper stories are appropriated to the manufacture of twine and cordage. The anchor forge is an immense building, in which anchors weighing more than ninety hundred weight are made for the navy. Near the forge are the copper-foundry, and the admirable machinery for making blocks, invented by Mr. Brunel, who for many years superintended its operation: it is impelled by a steam-engine of extraordinary power, and the various processes, from the sawing of the wood to the completion of the block, are conducted by the aid of machinery alone, with a degree of precision and celerity difficult to describe. The rigging and the mast houses are upon the largest scale; and every department in this extensive and ably-conducted establishment exhibits a combination of skill, efficiency, and grandeur, in every respect characteristic of the arsenal of a great maritime state. The Dock chapel, appropriated to the officers of the dock-yard, the crews of the ships in ordinary, and the various classes of artizans, is a neat modern structure, with a cupola, in which hangs the bell originally belonging to the Royal George, which was sunk off Spithead. The principal officers are, a commissioner, clerk of the cheque, storekeeper, master-wright, chaplain, surgeon, and purveyor. During the war, nearly four thousand men were employed.

Within the walls are the Royal Naval College, founded, in 1720, for one hundred students in time of war, and for seventy during peace; of these, thirty, the sons of commissioned naval officers, pay £60 per annum, for board, clothing, and education; and the remainder, sons of noblemen, military, or civil officers, pay £100 per annum: the term of continuance in the college is two years, and no one can remain in it more than three, at the end of which, if qualified, the students are appointed midshipmen in the navy, from which if they retire before the expiration of the term requisite for obtaining a lieutenancy, a fine of £200 is imposed on those of the first class, and of £100 on those of the second. This institution is under the superintendence of a governor, who is first lord of the Admiralty, a lieutenant-governor, a post-captain, and professor, each of whom has a salary of £800 per annum, with apartments; four lieutenants, who have each £250 per annum, with board and lodging; a mathematical assistant, with a salary of £250; two other assistants, with £200 per annum, who have apartments rent-free; and French, drawing, and fencing masters, who have each a salary of £100 per annum. The buildings are extensive, and contain many noble apartments; over them is an Observatory, in which is a beautiful model of H. M. S. the Victory, of one hundred guns, which was wrecked off the French coast on her first voyage: a new Observatory has been recently erected over the central arch of the western storehouses, commanding a view of the whole coast, from the Needles to the coast of Sussex. A school of naval architecture was projected, in 1809, by Mr. Robinson, in the House of Commons, and, in 1816, incorporated with the Naval College, in which provision is made for the maintenance and education of twenty-four shipwrights' apprentices, who are required, previously to their admission, to write English grammatically, to speak French, and to be acquainted with the first six, and the eleventh and twelfth, books of Euclid, and with quadratic equations in Algebra. Their admission is dependent on examination before the commissioners, the professor, and the lieutenant-governor; they remain for seven years in the establishment, and, at the expiration of that term, they are appointed to some situation in the Royal Dock-yard: during their apprenticeship they are under the superintendence of a professional shipwright, and receive an annual salary, which increases gradually from £25 to £60. The Gun wharf, without the dock-yard, includes an area of fourteen acres, and consists of a spacious building of brick, ornamented with stone, occupying three sides of a quadrangle, with an arched entrance in the centre of the fourth side, surmounted by a lofty tower and cupola; it contains a vast number of guns and gun-carriages, and an immense quantity of ordnance stores: on the right of the entrance is the armoury, containing twenty-five thousand stand of small arms, arranged in the most exact order, a laboratory, and an extensive ordnance department, with residences for the principal officers; on the opposite side are the offices of the Royal Engineers, with stores adjoining, and a large depôt of ammunition. The dock-yard has suffered from several destructive fires, the last of which occurred in 1776; the incendiary, John Aitkin, more commonly known as Jack the Painter, was gibbeted on Block House heath. No other trade is carried on except what arises from, or is connected with, the dock-yard. In that part of the parish called the Guildable is a considerable number of market gardens, from which the towns of Portsea and Portsmouth are principally supplied with vegetables. The Portsmouth and Arun canal passes through the town: it was opened in 1823, and joins Langston harbour, across which barges are towed by steam-boats constructed for the purpose. The market days are Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday. That part of the parish which is not within the limits of the borough of Portsmouth, is within the jurisdiction of the county magistrates.

The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £12, and in the patronage of the Warden and Fellows of Winchester College. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, was erected in the reign of Edward III., and is surrounded by one of the largest cemeteries in the kingdom. St. George's church, a commodious brick structure, was erected for the additional accommodation of the increasing population in 1753: the living is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £900 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Portsea. St. John's church, a neat commodious edifice, of which the internal decorations are extremely rich, was consecrated in 1789: the living is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar. The church dedicated to St. Paul, in the suburb of Southsea, was erected in 1822, at an expense of £15,229. 18. 8., of which £600 was raised by subscription, and the rest by grant from the parliamentary commissioners; it is a handsome structure in the later style of English architecture, with four turrets at the angles, and contains one thousand eight hundred and twenty-one sittings, of which nine hundred and three are free: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Vicar. In this suburb is an excellent bathing establishment, which has contributed greatly to the attractions of Portsea, as a watering-place. The church dedicated to All Saints, in the suburb of Mile-End (including the Half-Way houses, Newtown, and several spacious streets, forming an extensive district, now called Southport), was erected, in 1827, by grant from the parliamentary commissioners, at an expense of £12,064: it is an elegant edifice, in the later style of English architecture, with a splendid western front, surmounted by a campanile turret, and contains one thousand seven hundred and thirty-nine sittings, of which one thousand one hundred and six are free; the interior is neatly arranged, and over the altar is a window of beautiful design. In Portsea and its suburbs are six places of worship for Baptists, and one each for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. St. Paul's school, a commodious building, near the church of that name, has been recently established by one hundred subscribers, for the education of their children. The National school, in which two hundred children are educated, is supported partly by subscription, and with funds arising from various benefactions. Mr. Edward Crafts bequeathed a house and premises, in 1780, which produced £28 per annum; Mr. Richard Wilmot, in 1805, bequeathed £500; and Major Ebenezer Vavasour, in 1808, left £100, towards the support of this institution. A dispensary, and an infirmary for diseases of the eye, are supported by subscription. Thomas Fitzherbert, Esq., in 1821, left £10,000 in the four per cents., in trust to the vicar and ministers of the chapels, for the maintenance of five aged men, ten aged widows, and five single women, of this parish: there are also various charitable bequests for distribution among the poor. The eastern part of the island, not included in the boundaries of Portsmouth and Portsea, is extra-parochial, and belongs chiefly to government; in this part are numerous salt-works.

PORTSLADE, a parish in the hundred of FISHERGATE, rape of LEWES, county of SUSSEX, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from New Shoreham, containing 421 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Lewes, and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £8. 18. 8., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Nicholas, is principally in the early style of English architecture.

PORTSMOUTH, a seaport, borough, market town, and parish, having separate jurisdiction, locally in the hundred of Portsdown, Portsdown division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 18 miles (S. E. by E.) from Southampton, and 72 (S. W.) from London, containing, exclusively of that part of the parish of Portsea which is within its jurisdiction, 7269 inhabitants. This place, which is one of the principal naval and military stations of the British empire, derives its name from its situation at the mouth of a capacious harbour on the southern coast. In 501, a body of Saxons, under the command of Port, a German chieftain, and his two sons Biedda and Maegla, landed on this part of the coast, and, after a severe conflict with the Britons, succeeded in gaining possession of the surrounding country. They are supposed to have founded the ancient town of Portchester, so called from the name of their leader, about three miles to the north-north-west, from which, on the contraction of the harbour by the retiring of the sea, the inhabitants removed to Portsea island, on the south-west side of which they erected the present town. Alfred having fitted out a fleet of nine ships at this port, after an obstinate engagement, defeated the Danes, who infested the coasts of

Hampshire and Dorsetshire, and caused many of them to be hanged along the coast, in order to deter their countrymen. Harold equipped a large fleet at this port, with a view of intercepting the armament of William, on its way from Normandy, for the conquest of the country; and after the death of William Rufus, Robert, Duke of Normandy, landed here with his forces, to take possession of the throne. Henry, who had raised an army to support his own claim to the crown, also assembled his forces here, where, after the two armies had lain for some time, an accommodation took place, and Robert returned to Normandy. At this place Henry III. collected a numerous army for the invasion of France, but the enterprize was abandoned, in consequence of the treachery of his ally, the Duke of Bretagne: the same monarch established a guild merchant here, in 1256. In 1377, the French attacked and burnt a considerable part of the town, but were compelled to retire to their ships with considerable loss. Edward IV., for the greater security of the harbour, erected two towers commanding the entrance, and made additions to the fortifications of the town, which consisted only of a single wall, strengthened at the angles with bastions. According to Leland, Henry VII. established seven extensive breweries for supplying the troops in the time of war; and Henry VIII. erected Southsea castle, at the south-west extremity of the Isle of Portsea. In 1544, a powerful French fleet anchored off St. Helen's, having on board a large military force for the invasion of England. The English army, under the command of the Duke of Suffolk, assembled at Portsmouth, and the British fleet, commanded by Viscount Lisle, the Lord High Admiral, after an obstinate engagement, repulsed the enemy with considerable loss: at the commencement of the action, the Mary Rose, the largest British ship next to the admiral's, by some unknown accident, foundered between the fleets, and sunk, when the commander, and his crew of six hundred men, perished. Edward VI. passed a night at Southsea castle, and reviewed the fortifications, ordering, for the greater security of the harbour, two towers to be erected, with an immense iron chain extending from one to the other, across the mouth of the harbour, which, on the French fleet in the American war appearing off Plymouth, was raised, so as to prevent the vessels entering. During the reign of Elizabeth the fortifications were greatly strengthened, and the signals now used on the approach of any vessels were established. In the reign of Charles I., John Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, who had arrived at Portsmouth to superintend the movements of the fleet and army assembled there for the invasion of France, was assassinated by Felton, a disappointed officer, who had served under him at the Isle of Rhé, and the spot, in the High-street, then an inn called the Spotted Dog, is still pointed out. Felton was soon after hanged at Tyburn, and gibbeted on Southsea common. Soon after the commencement of the parliamentary war, a party of Cromwell's soldiers surprised Southsea castle, of which they took possession, and the town itself subsequently fell into the hands of the parliamentarians. After the Restoration, the nuptials of Charles II. with Catherine of Portugal were solemnized in the chapel of the garrison; and James II., while Lord High Admiral, frequently visited Portsmouth, but previously to his abdication of the government, he imprisoned the officers of the garrison for refusing to admit his Irish troops. In 1782, the Royal George, of one hundred and ten guns, and one thousand two hundred men, commanded by Admiral Kempenfelt, while under the process of careening at Spithead, unfortunately sank, and the admiral, and more than two-thirds of the crew, perished: many of her guns, and a considerable portion of her stores, have, by the use of the diving-bell, been recovered, but all attempts to raise her have hitherto failed; the spot where she lies is marked by a red buoy attached to the wreck. George III. frequently visited this port, and, in 1814, the Prince Regent, afterwards George IV., remained here for several days with the allied sovereigns.

The town, which is about a mile and a half in circuit, is divided into two nearly equal parts, by the principal street, and intersected by numerous others in every direction: it is well paved, lighted with gas by a company established in 1821, and supplied by two companies, incorporated by act of parliament, with excellent water from Portsea isle, and from springs at the foot of Portsdown Hill. The house of the governor, at the upper end of the grand parade, originally the Domus Dei founded by Peter de Rupibus, Bishop of Winchester, retains but few vestiges of its monastic character; it has undergone repeated alterations, for adaptation to its present use, and is become a splendid modern mansion, having been the residence of his late Majesty, on his visit to the town. The residences of the port-admiral, and of the lieutenant-governor, are elegant and commodious buildings; the former, situated in the High-street, has been recently improved at the expense of government. A Philosophical Society was established in 1818: it has a convenient theatre, in which lectures are delivered weekly, from October till March, and a good museum, containing more than nine thousand specimens in natural history: a handsome building is now being erected for its use in St. Mary-street. A mechanics' institution was founded in 1825, and is, under good regulations, numerously attended. The theatre, a handsome and well-arranged building, is opened during the season; and concerts and assemblies are held in a suite of rooms elegantly fitted up, and well adapted to the purpose. The various gateways leading into the town, through its gigantic fortifications, which surround it in a semicircular form, are remarkable for the justness and variety of their architectural character; that erected by James II. is an elegant specimen of the Corinthian order, that of St. Thomas is Doric, and that of George III. in the rustic character. The ramparts, which are in parts ornamented with timber, afford extensive and beautiful prospects; and the view of the town from Portsdown hill, combining an infinite variety of objects of the deepest interest and stately grandeur, is strikingly magnificent. The fortifications, which are the most complete in Europe, combine beauty with strength, and, exclusively of those which immediately surround the town, consist of numerous and extensive outworks: the entrance to the harbour is defended by Brockhurst fort, on the one side, and the fortifications of the town on the other. Southsea castle having suffered considerable damage from an accidental explosion, was rebuilt in 1814, and contains a garrison of two hundred men, with well-mounted batteries of heavy ordnance. Fort Monkton is a regular fort, of prodigious strength, defended with thirty-two pieces of heavy ordnance, and numerous redoubts: these two forts, built by Edward VI., also serve to defend the mouth of the harbour; on the east and west sides of which, along the coast, are various strong fortifications, of which Cumberland fort, erected in 1820, and commanding the approach to Langston harbour, is mounted with one hundred pieces of heavy ordnance, and contains accommodations for four thousand troops. At Hilsea, about four miles on the London road, is a strong military fortress, with extensive outworks, and a double draw-bridge. Within the town are four guard-houses; and near the principal entrance gate are Coleworth barracks, being numerous extensive ranges of buildings, with a parade ground: the garrison includes three regiments of infantry, a division of the royal marines, with detachments of artillery and engineers: over the magazine a semaphore was erected, in 1823, by means of which signals may be transmitted to the Admiralty in London, in the space of three minutes. The naval department is under the control of the port-admiral, and the garrison is under the command of a lieutenant-governor.

The port extends from the opening of Southampton water, on the west, to the town of Emsworth on the east, including Langston, St. Helen's, and Portsmouth harbours, and Spithead. The custom-house, a neat and commodious building, was erected in 1785, and is under the direction of a collector, comptroller, surveyor, or searcher, and warehouse-keeper for bonded goods. In the port watchhouse are kept the boats of the revenue officers, and from this place all vessels entering the harbour are hailed: the preventive stations are at Southsea castle, Cumberland fort, Hayling island, Stokes bay, and Hill head. The harbour is unrivalled for capaciousness, security, and depth of water: it is about two hundred and fifty yards broad at the mouth, and expanding into an open and broad lake, extends for several miles to the north, affording secure and capacious shelter to ships of the largest burden: its security is greatly increased by the Isle of Wight, which forms a natural breakwater, and by the inland elevations, which afford additional protection. From the western side of the entrance is the sand bank called the Spit, at the head of which a ship of war is always stationed: this bank is about three miles in length, but is not perceptible above water; the roadstead, called from this circumstance Spithead, is marked out by buoys fixed at regular intervals. The foreign trade consists chiefly in the importation of timber from the Baltic, and eggs from France: the coasting trade is very extensive, and in time of war the influx of merchant ships is very great: the principal branch of manufacture carried on is rope-making. The port is the general rendezvous where all ships either homeward or outward bound take convoy, and frequently seven hundred merchantmen have sailed at one time from Spithead. Packet-boats sail daily for the Isle of Wight and Southampton, and steam-vessels ply regularly between this port and Plymouth and Havre. The ferry to Gosport is under the regulations of an act of parliament, the fares differing according to the state of the weather. The market days are Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday: the fairs are, July 10th, which, by charter of Richard I., continues fourteen days, and July 26th, a well-frequented fair on Portsdown Hill, which continues three days.

The civil government, by a succession of charters, of which the last was conferred by Charles I., is vested in a mayor, twelve aldermen, and an indefinite number of burgesses, assisted by a recorder, town clerk, chamberlain, harbour-master, serjeants at mace, and subordinate officers. The mayor is elected by the aldermen and burgesses; the former fill up vacancies in their own body, and elect the burgesses. The mayor, the late mayor, and three aldermen chosen for that purpose, are justices of the peace. The corporation hold courts of quarter-session for all offences not capital; a court of record, on Tuesday in every week, for the recovery of debts to any amount; and a court leet, at which the constables and other officers are appointed. The town hall is a large and commodious building in the centre of the High-street, with an open area underneath for the use of the market, the space for holding which, within the last five years, has been considerably curtailed: it was repaired and considerably enlarged in 1796. The borough gaol, completed in 1809, at an expense of £18,000, is a large range of building, including court-rooms for the business of the sessions, a council-chamber, and a bridewell, well arranged for the classification of prisoners: the prison is about to be enlarged. The borough first exercised the elective franchise in the 23rd of Edward I., since which time it has regularly returned two members to parliament: the right of election is vested in the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses, of whom the number is about forty-five, thirteen only being resident: the mayor is the returning officer; and the principal parliamentary influence belongs to the family of Carter.

The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Warden and Fellows of Winchester College. The church, dedicated to St. Thomas à Becket, is a venerable and spacious cruciform structure in the early English style of architecture, with a tower surmounted by a cupola, one hundred and twenty feet high, forming an excellent landmark: the interior is handsomely arranged; the cenotaph of the Duke of Buckingham, in which his heart is enshrined, forms the principal ornament of the altar-piece. The garrison chapel, once appertaining to the monastery of Domus Dei, has been thoroughly repaired, for the use of the officers and soldiers of the garrison: the communion cloth exhibits a view of Lisbon, and the plate was presented by Queen Anne. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, Wesleyan Methodists, and Unitarians, a Roman Catholic chapel, and a synagogue. The free grammar school was founded, in 1732, by Dr. Smith, a physician of the town, who bequeathed for its support the farm of East Standon, in the Isle of Wight: there are fifty boys, natives of Portsmouth, who receive a gratuitous education in the classics: the head master, who is allowed to take boarders, is appointed by the Dean and Canons of Christ Church, Oxford. The National and Lancasterian schools, in which, in conjunction with Portsea, not less than seven thousand children are instructed, are supported by subscription; and there are Sunday schools in connexion with the established church and the dissenting congregations. There are various charitable bequests for distribution among the poor. On the summit of Portsdown Hill, and fronting the harbour, is a beautiful stone pillar, erected to the memory of Lord Nelson, by those who fought under his command in the memorable battle of Trafalgar, which forms a most interesting object, whether viewed from the sea or the land. Jonas Hanway, the philanthropist, was born here in 1712; he died in 1786. Portsmouth gives the title of earl to the family of Wallop.

PORTSWOOD, a tything in that part of the parish of SOUTH STONEHAM which is within the jurisdiction of the borough of SOUTHAMPTON, 2 miles (N. by E.) from Southampton, containing 440 inhabitants.

POSENHALL, an extra-parochial district, within the liberties of the borough of WENLOCK, county of SALOP, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (W.) from Broseley, containing 14 inhabitants.

POSTLINFORD, a parish in the hundred of RISBRIDGE, county of SUFFOLK, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (N.) from Clare, containing, with Chipley, 295 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Sudbury, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £6. 10. The Rev. G. G. Golding was patron in 1804.

POSTCOMBE, a chapelry in that part of the parish of LEWKNOR which is in the hundred of LEWKNOR, county of OXFORD, 2 miles (S.E.) from Tetsworth. The population is returned with the parish.

POSTERN, a joint township with Shottle, in the parish of DUFFIELD, hundred of APPLETREE, county of DERBY. The population is returned with Shottle. It is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s.

POSTLING, a parish in the hundred of HAYNE, lathe of SHEPWAY, county of KENT, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Hythe, containing 175 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £6. 8. $1\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The church is in the early style of English architecture; in it is a stone bearing an inscription stating that it was consecrated to the Virgin Mary, 19th Kal. Sept., St. Eusebius' day. White Kennett, Bishop of Peterborough, tutor to the Duke of Gloucester, and author of the Roman Antiquities, &c., was vicar of this parish; he died in 1714.

POSTLIP, a hamlet in the parish of WINCHCOMBE, lower division of the hundred of KIFTSGATE, county of GLOUCESTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.W. by W.) from Winchcombe, with which the population is returned.

POSTWICK, a parish in the hundred of BLOFIELD, county of NORFOLK, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. by S.) from Norwich, containing 254 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £10, and in the patronage of the Earl of Rosebery. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

POTSGROVE, a parish in the hundred of MANSHEAD, county of BEDFORD, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. by E.) from Woburn, containing 183 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, united to that of Battlesden, in the archdeaconry of Bedford, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £10. 19. $4\frac{1}{2}$. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

POTT, a joint township with Ilton, in the parish of MASHAM, eastern division of the wapentake of HANG, North riding of the county of YORK, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W.S.W.) from Masham. The population is returned with Ilton.

POTT-SHRIGLEY, a chapelry in the parish of PRESTBURY, hundred of MACCLESFIELD, county palatine of CHESTER, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.N.E.) from Macclesfield, containing 331 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, endowed with £1200 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of William Turner, Esq. The chapel is a neat building of stone, with an embattled tower. The Macclesfield and Congleton canal passes through the parish. Freestone and coal abound in the neighbourhood. John Barlow, in 1684, founded a school for ten poor children, with an endowment of about £6 per annum, and £2 for apprenticing one every third year. There is another smaller sum, the bequest of William Lunt, in 1688, for teaching two children.

POTTER-HANWORTH, a parish in the second division of the wapentake of LANGOE, parts of KESTEVEN, county of LINCOLN, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.E. by E.) from Lincoln, containing 374 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £13. 16. 8., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew.

POTTERNE, a parish in the hundred of POTTERNE and CANNINGS, county of WILTS, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (S. by W.) from Devizes, comprising the tythings of Marston and Worton, and containing 1609 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Bishop of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £20. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Salisbury, as Prebendary of Potterne. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is an ancient cruciform structure: a new gallery has been lately erected in the north transept, at the expense of the present vicar, who has in other respects contributed to the embellishment of this venerable edifice. The Bishops of Salisbury had formerly a residence here, of which there are no traces, excepting a garden wall.

POTTERS-BAR, a hamlet in the parish of MONKEN-HADLEY, hundred of EDMONTON, county of MIDDLESEX, 3 miles (N.N.E.) from Chipping-Barnet. The population is returned with the parish. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

POTTERS-PURY, a parish in the hundred of CLELEY, county of NORTHAMPTON, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.W.) from Stony-Stratford, comprising the hamlet of Yardley-Gobion, and part of that of Old Stratford, and containing 1410 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £8. 6., endowed with £200 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Earl Bathurst. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas. There is a place of worship for Independents. The old Roman Watling-street, and the Grand Junction canal, pass through the parish, in which there is a large manufactory for coarse earthenware.

POTTERTON, a joint township with Kiddal, in the parish of BARWICK in ELMETT, lower division of the wapentake of SKYRACK, West riding of the county of YORK, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Tadcaster. The population is returned with Kiddal.

POTTO, a township in the parish of WHORLTON, western division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, North riding of the county of YORK, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W.) from Stokesley, containing 207 inhabitants.

POTTON, a market town and parish in the hundred of BIGGLESWADE, county of BEDFORD, $11\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Bedford, and 48 (N. by W.) from London, containing 1498 inhabitants. A great part of this town was destroyed by fire in 1783, on which occasion the damages were estimated at £25,000, exclusively of the expense of temporary erections in the adjacent fields, for the accommodation of the inhabitants, until their houses could be rebuilt. It is pleasantly situated at the foot of a hill, on the high road from London to Cambridge, and consists principally of one long street: the inhabitants are supplied with water by means of several small rivulets, and the adjacent neighbourhood is highly respectable, and contains some genteel and handsome mansions. The market is on Saturday, chiefly for corn and straw-plat, but the business done is very inconsiderable. In 1227, a fair was granted by charter of Henry III.: at present, fairs are held on the third Tuesday in January, the last Tuesday in April, first Tuesday in July, and the Tuesday before the 29th of October, all which are noted for the sale of horses and sheep. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Bedford, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £13. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a place of worship for Baptists. Three several bequests have been made for the instruction of children; in 1711, of £50, by Dame Constance Burgoyne; in 1712, of £30, by Alexander Atkinson; and in 1770, of £400, by John Caryer; which are vested in land, and, with the sum of £3. 16. 8. per annum, a proportion of the town land receipts, are applied to the instruction of about thirty of both sexes.

POUGHILL, a parish in the hundred of STRATTON, county of CORNWALL, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (N. W.) from Stratton, containing 378 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £6. 12. 1., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Olave. The Bude and Holsworthy canal passes through the parish. Here was fought, on May 16th, 1643, the celebrated battle of Stratton, in which the parliamentarian troops, under the Earl of Stamford, were signally defeated by the Cornish forces, under Sir Beville Granville.

POUGHILL, a parish in the western division of the hundred of BUDLEIGH, county of DEVON, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles

(N. by E.) from Crediton, containing 321 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £8. 17. $8\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. Here was formerly a chantry chapel, dedicated to St. John the Baptist. Gertrude Pyncombe, in 1730, bequeathed £5 a year, and, in 1725, Robert Gay gave £1 a year, for teaching poor children.

POULSHOT, a parish in the hundred of MELKSHAM, county of WILTS, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Devizes, containing 323 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £6. 5., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Salisbury. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, has lately received an addition of forty free sittings, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £20 towards defraying the expense.

POULTNEY, a hamlet in the parish of MISTER-TON, hundred of GUTHLAXTON, county of LEICESTER, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by N.) from Lutterworth. The population is returned with the parish.

POULTON, a township in the parish of PULFORD, lower division of the hundred of BROXTOW, county palatine of CHESTER, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by W.) from Chester, containing 132 inhabitants. A Cistercian abbey was founded here, in 1153, by Robert, who was butler to Ranulph, second Earl of Chester; but the monks, having suffered greatly from the frequent incursions of the Welch, were translated, in 1214, to Dieulacres in Staffordshire, and thenceforth, till the dissolution, Poulton continued parcel of the possessions of that monastery.

POULTON, a joint township with Spittle, in the parish of BEBBINGTON, lower division of the hundred of WIRRAL, county palatine of CHESTER, containing, with Spittle, 101 inhabitants.

POULTON, a joint township with Seacomb, in the parish of WALLAZEY, lower division of the hundred of WIRRAL, county palatine of CHESTER, 11 miles (N. by E.) from Great Neston, containing, with Seacomb, 380 inhabitants.

POULTON, a parish in the hundred of BEWSBOROUGH, lathe of ST. AUGUSTINE, county of KENT, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Dovor, containing 29 inhabitants. This parish comprises only three houses, and has no church. Here are the venerable ruins of Bradsole, or St. Radegund's abbey, said to have been founded, in 1191, by Richard I., for monks of the Premonstratensian order, the abbots of which were afterwards summoned to parliament, to sit as peers. It was dedicated to St. Mary and St. Radegund, and at the dissolution possessed a revenue of £142. 8.

POULTON, a chapelry in that part of the parish of LANCASTER which is in the hundred of LONSDALE, south of the sands, county palatine of LANCASTER, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W.) from Lancaster, containing 363 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, endowed with £400 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant. The chapel was consecrated in 1745. Poulton has of late years become a favourite bathing-place: it commands fine views of Morecambe bay and the Westmorland, Cumberland, and Yorkshire mountains. Francis Bowes, in 1732, demised, for the foundation of a free school, lands now producing an annual income of about £35, for which sixty children are instructed: the school-room was erected in 1745.

POULTON, a joint township with Fearnhead, in the parish of WARRINGTON, hundred of WEST DERBY, county palatine of LANCASTER, 2 miles (N.E. by E.) from Warrington, containing 631 inhabitants.

POULTON, a parish in the hundred of HIGHWORTH, CRICKLADE, and STAPLE, county of WILTS, 4 miles (W. by S.) from Fairford, containing 309 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Wilts, and diocese of Salisbury, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of T. Ingram, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. A Gilbertine priory, in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary, was founded here, about 1347, by Sir Thomas de Sancto Mauro, or Seymor, which, at the dissolution, was valued at £20. 3. 2. per annum.

POULTON in the FYLDE, a parish in the hundred of AMOUNDERNESS, county palatine of LANCASTER, comprising the market town of Poulton, the chapelry of Marton, and the townships of Carleton, Hardhorn with Newton, and Thornton, and containing 4031 inhabitants, of which number, 1011 are in the town of Poulton, 21 miles (S. W. by S.) from Lancaster, and 235 (N. W. by N.) from London. This is a small and very ancient port under Preston, situated near the mouth of the Wyre, in an extensive district called the Fylde, and much frequented in the bathing season. The inhabitants are chiefly employed in agriculture. The market is on Monday; and fairs for cattle, cloth, and other commodities, are held on February 6th, April 13th, and November 3rd. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £7. 16. 8., endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Peter Hesketh, Esq. The church, which is dedicated to St. Chad, occupies the site of an ancient structure, which, having stood for nearly seven centuries, was taken down in 1751, with the exception of the tower, which was rebuilt in the time of Charles I., and remains attached to the modern edifice. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends, Independents, Wesleyan Methodists, and Roman Catholics. A free school was founded, in 1717, by James Baines, who endowed it with land now producing an income of £69 per annum: a master and an usher are elected annually, and the number of children instructed varies from eighty to one hundred and twenty. The founder likewise bequeathed land, of the present value of £100 a year, for apprenticing poor children of this parish.

POUNDEN, a hamlet in the parish of TWYFORD, hundred and county of BUCKINGHAM, 6 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Buckingham, containing 91 inhabitants.

POUNDISFORD, a tything in the parish of PITMINSTER, hundred of TAUNTON and TAUNTON-DEAN, county of SOMERSET, 4 miles (S. by W.) from Taunton. The population is returned with the parish.

POUNDSTOCK, a parish in the hundred of LESNEWTH, county of CORNWALL, 4 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Stratton, containing 744 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £13. 6. 8., and in the patronage of John Dayman, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Neot. The parish is bounded on the west by Widemouth bay, in the Bristol channel. A fair is held on the Monday before Ascension-day.

POWDERHAM, a parish in the hundred of EXMINSTER, county of DEVON, 8 $\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. E. by S.) from Exeter, containing 216 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £27. 3. 6 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of Viscount Courtenay. The church, dedicated to St. Clement, has a wooden screen, and in a window of the north aisle is the stone effigy of a lady, probably one of the Courtenays. Powderham castle and grounds are delightfully situated on an acclivity rising from the western bank of the navigable river Exe. The former, now merely retaining its castellated appearance, was, in Leland's time, a strong fort, with a barbican for the protection of Exe haven. During the parliamentary war it was fortified with eighteen pieces of ordnance, and garrisoned with three hundred men: the present drawing-room was formerly a chapel. The Belvidere tower, occupying an elevated site above the castle, commands a noble terra-marine view. The Exeter canal joins the river near this place.

POWICK, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of PERSHORE, county of WORCESTER, 2 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Worcester, comprising the chapelry of Cliveload, and the hamlet of Woodfield, and containing, exclusively of a part of the chapelry of Bransford, which is in this parish, 1452 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the curacy of Mordeford annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, rated in the king's books at £10. 2. 7., and in the patronage of the Earl of Coventry. The church is dedicated to St. Peter and St. Lawrence. The river Teme is here crossed by an ancient bridge, a short distance below which it falls into the Severn. In December 1642, an action was fought near this place, between the parliamentary troops under Colonel Sandes, and the royalists under Prince Rupert and Prince Maurice, in which the former were defeated, and the colonel was mortally wounded.

POWNAL-FEE, a township in the parish of WILMSLOW, hundred of MACCLESFIELD, county palatine of CHESTER, 3 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. by W.) from Stockport, containing 1432 inhabitants.

POXWELL, a parish in the hundred of WINFRITH, Blandford (South) division of the county of DORSET, 6 miles (S. E. by S.) from Dorchester, containing 73 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, united, in 1749, to that of Warmwell, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £9. 5. 5. J. Trenchard, Esq. was patron in 1781.

POYNINGS, a parish in the hundred of POYNINGS, rape of LEWES, county of SUSSEX, 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Hurst - Pierrepont, containing 232 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Lewes, and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £10, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, is partly in the decorated, and partly in the later English, style of architecture. The Rev. George Beard, in 1786, gave £100, directing the interest to be applied for teaching eight poor children.

POYNTON, a chapelry in the parish of PRESTBURY, hundred of MACCLESFIELD, county palatine of CHESTER, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Stockport, containing 540 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Sir George Warren, Bart. The chapel, dedicated to St. Mary, was rebuilt, in 1789, by the late Sir George Warren, Bart., K. B., and some of the windows exhibit the arms of the Warren and Bulkeley families, in stained glass. A school-house was built by subscription in 1703. There are several collieries in the neighbourhood. A court baron is held twice a year.

PREEN (CHURCH), a parish in the hundred of CONDOVER, county of SALOP, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Much Wenlock, containing 73 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, with that of Longnor, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of W. Webster, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. John the Baptist. Here was a small Cluniac priory, a cell to that of Wenlock.

PREES, a parish in the Whitchurch division of the hundred of BRADFORD (North), county of SALOP, comprising the chapelries of Calverhall and Whixhall, and the townships of Prees with Steel, and Sandford, and containing 3190 inhabitants, of which number, 1525 are in the township of Prees with Steel, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Wem. The living is a vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Preston-Gubbals, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Prebendary of Prees, otherwise Pipa Minor, in the Cathedral Church of Lichfield, rated in the king's books at £10, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry. The church, dedicated to St. Chad, is an ancient cruciform structure, with a tower of modern erection: it contains two old figures of Moses and Aaron, and some pieces of tessellated pavement, also several monuments to the ancestors of General Lord Hill, who was born here in 1772. There is a place of worship for Independents. Prees had formerly a weekly market and an annual fair, the former of which has been long disused; two fairs are now held on the 2nd Mondays in April and October. Here are charity schools for about one hundred and sixty children, towards the support of which there are several small endowments. A considerable traffic in coal, lime, and slate, is carried on by means of Quise Brook canal, which runs through the parish.

PREESALL, a joint township with Hackersall, in that part of the parish of LANCASTER which is in the hundred of AMOUNDERNESS, county palatine of LANCASTER, 6 miles (N. by E.) from Poulton, containing 700 inhabitants. Richard Fleetwood, Esq., in 1687, built a school-house, and endowed it with an annuity of £13. 6. 8., for which the children of parishioners are taught to read.

PRENDICK, a township in the parish of ALNHAM, northern division of COQUETDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 10 miles (N. N. W.) from Rothbury, containing 68 inhabitants.

PRENTON, a township in the parish of WOODCHURCH, lower division of the hundred of WIRRAL, county palatine of CHESTER, 6 miles (N. by E.) from Great Neston, containing 99 inhabitants.

PRESCOT, an extra-parochial liberty, in the upper division of the hundred of TEWKESBURY, county of GLOUCESTER, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Cheltenham, containing 56 inhabitants.

PRESCOT, a parish in the hundred of WEST DERBY, county palatine of LANCASTER, comprising the market town of Prescott, the chapelries of Rainford and Great Sankey, and the townships of Bold, Cronton, Cuerdley, Ditton, Eccleston, Parr, Penketh, Rainhill, Sutton, Whiston, Widness with Appleton, and Windle, and containing 22,811 inhabitants, of which number, 4468 are in the town of Prescott, 51 miles (S.) from Lancaster, and 197 (N. W.) from London. This town, consisting chiefly of one long straggling street, on the high road from Liverpool to Manchester, lies principally on a substratum of coal, several mines of which are excavated to its very edge, and which not only furnish abundant employment to the labouring class, but supply fuel at a cheap rate to the inhabitants, and essentially promote the manufacturing interests of the district, which has long been noted for the superior construction of watch tools, and the more minute parts of that beautiful piece of mechanism comprised in what is termed motion-work. The drawing of pinion wire, extending to fifty different sizes, and remarkable for its exquisite adaptation to the requisite purposes, originated here; and small files, considered to be of unparalleled excellence, are made, and exported in large quantities. The manufacture of coarse earthenware, especially sugar moulds, has been established here for a very long period, the clay of the neighbourhood being peculiarly adapted to that purpose; and a few persons are employed in the cotton business. The Liverpool and Manchester railway passes about one mile south of the town. A charter for a market and a fair was granted in the 7th of Edward III.: there are now two markets, on Tuesday and Saturday; a fortnight fair for cattle, from Shrove-Tuesday to the first Tuesday in May, and annual fairs on Ash-Wednesday, the Wednesday after Corpus Christi, August 24th and 25th, October 21st, and November 1st. The inhabitants have, since the time of Henry VII., claimed exemption from serving on juries, except within the manor, also from the payment of all tolls to public markets, with divers other privileges. A court baron is held six times a year; a court leet annually, on the festival of Corpus Christi, when a coroner for the manor and liberty is appointed; and a court of requests, for the recovery of debts to any amount, at which last, the steward of the manor presides: petty sessions for the Prescott division of the hundred also are held once a month. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £24. 10., and in the patronage of the Provost and Fellows of King's College, Cambridge. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is an ancient edifice: in 1789, the old steeple was taken down, and replaced by an elegant tower and spire, one hundred and fifty-six feet high: in the interior are some modern monuments, particularly one of great elegance, by Chantrey, to the memory of William Atherton, Esq. There are places of worship for Independents, Wesleyan Methodists, and Unitarians. The free grammar school is of somewhat uncertain foundation: it has been endowed by various benefactors, and, in 1759, the present school-house was built by subscription: the entire income is estimated at £159. 17. 4.; the stipend of the master is £90 per annum : nearly fifty boys are instructed, but classical education has not of late been required. This school has a preference to seven fellowships in Brasenose College, Oxford, and two exhibitions to the same college, for boys being natives of Prescott, and educated in it ; several children not on the foundation are instructed for pay. In 1824, Mrs. Jane Chorley bequeathed to trustees the sum of £2000, for establishing and supporting a schoolmistress to educate poor girls. Almshouses were founded and endowed originally by Oliver Lyme, to which several additions have been made ; nineteen almspeople are eligible under the direction of the trustees, preference being given to inhabitants not receiving relief in Prescott and Whiston, and to widows. Among the numerous benefactions to the parish are funds for apprenticing poor children. The celebrated tragedian, John Philip Kemble, was born here, in 1757.

PRESCOTT, a hamlet in that part of the parish of CROPREY which is in the hundred of BANBURY, county of OXFORD, 5 miles (N. N. E.) from Banbury, containing 19 inhabitants.

PRESHUTE, a parish in the hundred of SELKLEY, county of WILTS, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (S. W. by W.) from Marlborough, containing, with the tything of Clatford, 693 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Bishop of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £8, and in the patronage of the Choristers in the Cathedral Church of Salisbury, on the nomination of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. George, is partly in the Norman style, and has a plain ancient font of dark grey marble.

PRESTBURY, a parish in the hundred of MACCLESFIELD, county palatine of CHESTER, comprising the market town of Macclesfield, the chapelries of Bosley, Capesthorpe, Chelford, Macclesfield - Forest, Marton, Poynton, Pott-Shrigley, Rainow, Siddington, and Winzell, and the townships of Adlington, Birtles, Bollington, Butley, Eaton, Fallybroom, Henbury with Pexall, Hurdsfield, Kettleshulme, Lyme-Handley, Mottram St. Andrew, Newton, Prestbury, North Rode, Sutton, Tytherington, Upton, Wildboar-Clough, Lower Withington, Old Withington, Woodford, and Worth, and containing 34,976 inhabitants, of which number, 440 are in the township of Prestbury, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Macclesfield. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £10, and in the patronage of Thomas Legh, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, is of great antiquity, and has portions in various styles : on the south side is an ancient low building of stone, now used as a parochial school-house, which is considered to be an ancient Norman church, and consists of a nave and chancel, with an enriched west entrance : in a private chapel, which terminates the south aisle of the church, is a piscina, together with a portion of a carved oak screen. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. A school-house was built in 1720, principally at the expense of John Legh, Esq., and endowed by Mrs. Ann Whittacres, with the interest of £100, for the instruction of ten of the poorest children in the township. In the parochial school belonging to the church, one hundred children are taught. Fairs for cattle are held on April 28th and October 22nd. A court leet and baron for the township is held in May and December, the jurisdiction of which comprehends all pleas under 40s. In the township of Butley, in this parish, several ancient tumuli, containing urns and other relics of antiquity, were discovered some years since ; in these vessels it is said that oak leaves, and shells of acorns, were found, retaining a freshness of appearance as if recently gathered : stones from several of the tumuli have been used for the repair of the roads in the neighbourhood.

PRESTBURY, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of DEERHURST, county of GLOUCESTER, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N. E.) from Cheltenham, containing 906 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £11, and in the patronage of W. J. Agg, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

PRESTON, a parish in the liberty of SUTTON-POINTZ, Dorchester division of the county of DORSET, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Melcombe-Regis, containing, with the tything of Sutton-Pointz, 508 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Prebendary of Preston in the Cathedral Church of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £8. 18. The church, dedicated to St. Andrew, is very ancient, and had formerly ten pensionary chapels belonging to it. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

PRESTON, a parish in the hundred of CROWTHORNE and MINETY, county of GLOUCESTER, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (E. S. E.) from Cirencester, containing 160 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £9. 10. $7\frac{1}{2}$, and in the patronage of Miss Master. The church, dedicated to All Saints, is an ancient and singular structure in the early style of English architecture. The river Churn runs through the parish.

PRESTON, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of DUDSTONE and KING'S BARTON, county of GLOUCESTER, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Ledbury, containing 87 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Hereford, and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £7. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Gloucester.

PRESTON, a hamlet in the parish of HITCHIN, hundred of HITCHIN and PIRTON, county of HERTFORD, 3 miles (S. by W.) from Hitchin. The population is returned with the parish.

PRESTON, a parish in the hundred of FAVERSHAM, lathe of SCRAY, county of KENT, $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile (S.) from Faversham, containing 351 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £8. 12. 6., and in the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The church, dedicated to St. Catherine, is principally in the early style of English architecture, with a tower and spire at the east end of the south aisle : on the north side of the chancel is a sumptuous altar-tomb of black and white marble, in memory of Roger Boyle, Esq., and his wife Joan, ancestors of the Earls of Cork ; there are also some sepulchral brasses of the fifteenth century. In a school, founded by Thomas Smith, in 1730, thirteen children are taught to read for about £10 per annum, arising from various bequests.

PRESTON, a parish in the hundred of PRESTON, lathe of ST. AUGUSTINE, county of KENT, 2 miles (N.) from Wingham, containing 504 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £9. 15., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury. The church is dedicated to St. Mildred.

Seal and Arms.

PRESTON, a parish in the hundred of AMOUNDERNESS, county palatine of LANCASTER, comprising the borough of Preston, which has a separate jurisdiction, the chapelries of Broughton, and Grimsargh with Brockholes, and the townships of Barton, Elston, Fishwick, Haighton, Lea (with Ashton, Ingol, and Cottam), and Ribbleton, and containing 27,300 inhabitants, of which number, 24,575 are in the borough of Preston, $21\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. by E.) from Lancaster, and 217 (N. W. by N.) from London. This place, which is supposed to have grown out of the ruins of the ancient Rerigonium, a Roman station, of which the site is now occupied by the town of Ribchester, is supposed, from its having belonged to the monks, to have obtained the appellation of Priest's town, of which its present name is a contraction. Though it may be difficult to ascertain its precise origin, it was unquestionably a place of considerable importance prior to the Conquest, soon after which it was granted to Tosti, fourth son of Godwin, Earl of Kent. In 1307, the town was burnt and nearly levelled with the ground by the Scottish army under Robert Bruce, and, in 1333, Edward III. passed through it, on his way to Halidown Hill, where he defeated the Scots, with the loss of twenty thousand men, and took Baliol, their king, prisoner. The same monarch, in recompense for the assistance he derived from the inhabitants, gave the corporation a common seal, and invested them with several valuable privileges. During the war between the houses of York and Lancaster, the Earl of Derby raised considerable supplies of troops in the town for the service of the Lancastrian cause. Soon after the commencement of the parliamentary war, a battle was fought on Ribbleton common, to the east of the town, in which the parliamentarians were commanded by General Fairfax; and in 1645, another battle took place, in which the mayor, and several of the principal inhabitants became the victims of their attachment to the royal cause. In 1648, a fierce engagement took place at the pass of Walton bridge, between the English and Scottish allied forces, commanded by the Duke of Hamilton and Sir Marmaduke Langdale, and a detachment of the parliamentary troops under the command of General Lambert, in which the former were defeated, and the duke and his officers, who had retired into the town, were compelled to effect their escape by crossing the river at the ford below Walton bridge. Throughout the whole of this contest the town of Preston suffered materially for its adherence to the royal cause, and the inhabitants were treated by the parliamentarians with the utmost severity. In 1715, the party in the interest of the Pretender obtained possession of the town, which they endeavoured to fortify against the assault of the king's forces; but being attacked suddenly by General Wills, aided by the subsequent arrival of General Carpenter, with a party of dragoons, they were compelled, after an obstinate resistance, to surrender at discretion. The town suffered severely also during this contest, a considerable part of it being burnt by the inhabitants, who were in the interest of the king, to assist the movements of the besiegers, and many of the houses of those who assisted the rebels having been given up to plunder after the town was taken. The Lords Widdrington, Derwentwater, and Nairn, were taken in the town, and sent prisoners to London, where they were condemned and executed; and sixteen of the rebels were hanged on Gallows' Hill for high treason. The rebels again made their appearance, in 1745, and attempted to intrench themselves in the town; but on the approach of the royal forces under the Duke of Cumberland, made their escape from Preston, only a few hours before the duke's arrival.

The town is pleasantly situated on an eminence rising from the north bank of the river Ribble, over which are Walton and Penwortham bridges: the former, a neat structure of three arches, leading from the London road, was erected in 1782; and the latter, a handsome bridge of five arches, leading from the Liverpool road, was built by act of parliament in 1759. The streets are spacious and well paved; the houses are neatly and substantially built of brick, and many of them are handsome and of large dimensions; the inhabitants are partially supplied with water conveyed by cast-iron pipes from a large reservoir, called the Folly, at the bottom of Mid Spit Wiend, into which it is raised by an engine constructed in 1729; and with spring-water by carts, at a moderate price. A company was established for lighting the town with gas in 1816, and considerable improvements are daily taking place. The environs, in which are many handsome villas, inhabited by opulent families, abound with richly-diversified scenery, and the high grounds afford extensive and interesting prospects. There are several pleasant and extensive promenades, of which the principal are, Avenham Walk, belonging to the corporation, by whom it is kept in order; Common Bank, from which are extensive views; and the Marsh, along the margin of the river, by which an ancestor of Sir Walter Scott, with his comrades, escaped to Liverpool, during the siege of Preston in 1715. The library was founded by R. Shepherd, Esq., M.D., twice mayor for the borough, who, in 1761, endowed it with £50 per annum for its augmentation, and with the interest of £200, as a salary to the librarian; it is open to the inhabitants under certain regulations. A botanical society was established in 1804, from which a smaller establishment has branched; and a Literary and Philosophical Society was instituted in 1810, of which the members hold their meetings in the town hall. A society for promoting the study of natural history was established in 1823, to which is annexed an appropriate library, and a museum is about to be added to it. There are also a law society, consisting principally of attorneys' clerks, a mechanics' institution, two principal news-rooms and several on a smaller scale, and various book societies. The theatre, a neat and well-arranged building, erected by a proprietary in 1802, is opened occasionally; and assemblies are held in a handsome suite of rooms, built at the sole expense of the Earl of Derby. A choral society was established in 1819, and a musical academy has been instituted, which is well supported, and ably conducted. Warm and cold baths have been constructed, which are arranged with every attention to the convenience of the visitors, and fitted up with the requisite accommodation; and races are annually held in July on Fulwood moor, which are well attended.

The trade of the town, till within the last half century, principally consisted of the manufacture and sale of linen cloth, which, from a petition of the mayor and corporation to parliament, for preventing the exportation of Irish linen to the colonies, and of Scotch linen into Ireland, appears to have been for ages the staple trade of the town and neighbourhood for twenty miles round. The manufacture of cotton goods was introduced, in 1791, by John Horrocks, Esq., to whose public-spirited enterprise the town is indebted for its present prosperity. There are at present numerous factories, many of which are upon a very large scale; that in the township of Fishwick is said to be the largest in England. Machinery impelled by steam has been introduced with great success into the factories, in which the raw material, supplied from Liverpool, is conducted, through every process, to the printing and dyeing of the manufactured article. The greater portion of the goods is sold to the Manchester merchants, and the remainder is sent to London, or into foreign markets: in connexion with the machinery employed in the factories, several iron-foundries have been established in the town. At spring tides, vessels of one hundred and fifty tons' burden can navigate the Ribble to Preston Marsh, where convenient quays have been constructed, and, by an act of parliament passed in the 46th of George III., commissioners were appointed for improving the navigation of the river; buoys have been placed to mark out these parts, which have been deepened by excavation. The river is supposed, by Dr. Whitaker, to have been formerly navigable to Ribchester, and the discovery in that neighbourhood of anchors, and of the hull of a larger vessel than could now be floated so far up the river, seems to confirm that opinion. The port of Preston includes Lytham, Freckleton, Hesketh, and Poulton; a few vessels sail annually to foreign parts, and a coasting trade is carried on to a moderate extent: there are forty-five vessels belonging to it, averaging a burden of seventy-one tons. The custom-house, a neat and commodious building in Fox-street, is under the management of the usual officers. The fishery on the river is of very ancient establishment, and forms part of the revenue of the borough: salmon, plaice, eels, and smelts, are found in abundance, and of good quality. In the years 1715 and 1774, the river is said to have ceased to flow, in the latter year for five hours, and for a length of three miles to have been dry, except in the deeper places; at the expiration of that time the water returned with a strong current. Common and cannel coal are brought to the town by the river Douglas, which, by an act of parliament obtained in 1727, was made navigable from the mouth of the Ribble to within one mile of Ormskirk, whence a short line, parallel with its course, by which the navigation is continued to Wigan, has been since constructed by the proprietors of the Leeds and Liverpool canal, who have purchased the right of the Douglas navigation. The Lancaster canal passes by the west side of the town, and, after being conducted through a tunnel about two miles in length, which crosses the river Ribble, joins the Leeds and Liverpool canal one mile north of Chorley, affording a communication with the principal navigable rivers in England. The market days are Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday, the last being principally for corn. The market-place is a spacious well-paved area, in the centre of which is an obelisk, supporting a gas-light; and the sides of the quadrangle contain several good buildings, and shops well stored with wares of every kind: the cattle market is held in the north road, and that for vegetables in Cheap-side. The fairs are the week before the first Sunday after Epiphany, which is a great horse fair; the spring fair, March 27th, which continues for three days; the summer fair, August 26th, which continues for eight days; and the winter fair, November 7th, which continues for five days: to all these fairs is attached a court of pie-powder.

The borough has received numerous charters from successive sovereigns, of which the first was granted by Henry II., and the last by George IV. The government is vested in a mayor, recorder, two bailiffs, seven aldermen, and seventeen common council-men, assisted by a town clerk, serjeants at mace, and subordinate officers. The mayor and other officers are elected by a jury of twenty-four guild burgesses, empannelled by two elisors, who are appointed for that purpose, on the Friday before the festival of St. Wilfred. The mayor, recorder, and aldermen, are justices of the peace, and have power to hold quarterly courts of session for all offences, but the prisoners are generally referred to the quarter sessions for the county. A court of record is held every third Friday, before the mayor and two or more of the aldermen, for the recovery of debts to any amount; and a court leet, twice in the year, for the examination of weights and measures, and for the presentation of nuisances. The Preston guild, or Gilda Mercatoria, a jubilee celebrated every twentieth year, is the tenure by which the freemen retain their privileges: it was originally granted by Henry II., and confirmed by the charters of Charles II. It commences in the last week of August, and is proclaimed to continue twenty-eight days; the festivities, however, have been limited to a fortnight: the last guild was held in 1822. The celebration of this jubilee is conducted under the superintendence of the mayor and three aldermen, appointed as stewards, who, with the other officers of the corporation, dressed in their robes of ceremony, and preceded by their insignia of office and the regalia of the borough, walk from the guildhall, attended by the several trading companies, with their banners and bands of music, and by the principal gentry resident in the neighbourhood, to the ancient cross, or obelisk, in the market-place, where a proclamation is read, calling upon all the burgesses, resident and non-resident, to appear before the stewards of the guild and three senior aldermen, in open court, and renew their freedom. During this festival, various processions of the municipal bodies take place; balls, concerts, dramatic representations, public banquets, and every species of amusement, are provided, and attract an immense concourse from the surrounding districts, to assist at the ceremony, and partake of the festivities. The quarter sessions for the hundreds of Amounderness, Blackburn, and Leyland, are held here, by adjournment from Lancaster; the hundred court for Amounderness, for the recovery of debts under 40s., is held every third Wednesday; and the county court, every fourth Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under the same sum, of which the jurisdiction extends through the whole county, with the exception only of Salford hundred: the quarter sessions for the county, the meetings of the deputy lieutenants, and other county meetings, are held here; and, from its central situation, the offices of the courts of chancery, common pleas, and other courts of the duchy of Lancaster, unless when the officers attend the assizes at Lancaster, are also held at Preston. The principal officers of the duchy court are, the vice-chancellor, the registrar, the cursitor, the clerk of the crown, the clerk of the peace, and the deputy prothonotary of the common pleas. The offices of the under sheriff and treasurer for the county are also in this town. The town hall is a neat brick building with quoins and cornices of stone, surmounted by a turret and dome; the interior comprises a court-room, in which the borough sessions are held, a council chamber, a news-room, and various offices: it was rebuilt on the site of the ancient moot-hall, which fell down in 1780, within a few hours after a party that had assembled there for a ball had departed. The sessions-house and house of correction is a capacious building, enclosed within a lofty boundary wall, including every requisite accommodation for the county sessions, the meeting of the county magistrates, a house for the governor, two hospitals, a chapel, and extensive workshops: the prison is on the radiating principle, and is well adapted to the classification of prisoners, including day-rooms, airing-yards, a tread-mill, and other things requisite for the employment of the prisoners. The borough, which made returns to parliament in the 23rd, 26th, 33rd, and 35th of the reign of Edward I., and in the 1st of Edward II., intermitted till the reign of Edward VI., since which time it has regularly returned two members: the right of election is vested in all the inhabitants having resided six months, and not receiving parochial relief within twelve months prior to the election, of whom the number is about five thousand: the mayor and bailiffs are the returning officers.

The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £15. 3. 11½., and in the patronage of the Trustees of the late Mr. Hulme, Manchester. The church, formerly dedicated to St. Wilfred, was a very ancient structure, repaired by Wilfred, Archbishop of York, in 700: it has been rebuilt, and dedicated to St. John, and has a handsome square embattled tower crowned with clustered pinnacles, which was erected in 1814; the whole style is a mixture of the later Norman and the early English: the interior contains some good stucco-work and some ancient monuments. St. George's church, built in 1723, is a cruciform structure of brick, with a square embattled tower crowned with pinnacles, and chiefly in a style resembling the Norman: the living is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £800 private benefaction, £800 royal bounty, and £1300 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Preston. The church of the Holy Trinity, a neat stone edifice in the later style of English architecture, with a square embattled tower crowned with pinnacles, was erected in 1814, at an expense of £9080. 9. 3., of which £4000 were donations, and the remainder was raised by subscription: the living is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £2200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Trustees and the Vicar alternately. St. Paul's, a handsome structure in the later style of English architecture, with four turrets, and containing one thousand two hundred and fifty-nine sittings, of which eight hundred and thirteen are free, was erected in 1825, by grant from the parliamentary commissioners, at an expense of £6063. 17. 10.; and St. Peter's in the Fylde road, a handsome edifice in the same style of architecture, with a small campanile turret, and containing one thousand two hundred and fifty sittings, of which eight hundred and sixty-one are free, was erected by the same means, at an expense of £6638. 10. 2.: the livings are both perpetual curacies, in the patronage of the Vicar. There are two places of worship for Independents, and one each for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists, and Unitarians, also two Roman Catholic chapels, one of which, dedicated to St. Wilfred, is a stately and elegant structure.

The free grammar school is of uncertain foundation: it is under the direction of the officers of the corporation, who appoint the master and usher, each having a salary of £45 per annum, arising from ground given by Mr. R. Worthington: it is open to all boys of the town. A National school, for children of both sexes, is supported by subscription; the school-house, a handsome and capacious brick building, was erected in 1814: the Blue-coat charity schools, founded in 1701, by Mr. Roger Sudell, have been incorporated with this institution. The Roman Catholic school was established in 1814; and a large day school is supported by the Wesleyan Methodists. The dispensary was instituted in 1809, and is well supported: a room in the building is appropriated to the use of a committee of ladies, who superintend the lying-in charity connected with this establishment; and a house of recovery from fever and other contagious diseases was opened in 1813. The corporation almshouses, built in 1790, in lieu of sixteen others, the site of which is now occupied by the house of correction, have no endowment, and afford only a rent-free residence to the inmates. Adjoining these are others rebuilt by the corporation, in lieu of some originally founded, in 1663, by Mr. Worthington, which, having neither endowment nor funds for their maintenance, fell into decay. There are also numerous benevolent and benefit societies, and various charitable bequests for distribution among the poor. There were anciently a convent of Grey friars on the north-west of the town, founded by Edward, Earl of Lancaster, son of Henry III., and an hospital, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene, of which there are no remains.

PRESTON, a township in the parish of ELLINGHAM, southern division of BAMBROUGH ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 8½ miles (N.) from Alnwick, containing 63 inhabitants. Here is an ancient lofty tower.

The living is a perpetual curacy, united to the vicarage of Prees, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty. The church is dedicated to St. Martin.

PRESTON-PATRICK, a chapelry in that part of the parish of BURTON KENDAL which is in KENDAL ward, county of WESTMORLAND, 6 miles (N. W. by W.) from Kirkby-Lonsdale, containing 398 inhabitants.

The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Inhabitants. The chapel, dedicated to St. Patrick, is a neat building, situated on the acclivity of a hill rising from the eastern bank of the Belo, which is here crossed by the Lancaster canal, in its course through the parish. A school, founded by subscription in 1780, is endowed with an allotment of land, awarded under the enclosure act, and now let for £12. 12. a year, for which ten children receive free instruction. There are marble works in the neighbourhood, where large blocks, raised at Dent in Yorkshire, and conveyed hither, are cut and polished for the trade. Challen, or Chanon hall, stands on the site of an abbey which existed here for a short time, but was ultimately removed to Shap.

PRESTON-QUARTER, a township in the parish of ST. BEES, ALLERDALE ward above Darwent, county of CUMBERLAND, on the south side of the town of Whitehaven, containing 4256 inhabitants. Here are very extensive collieries, the produce of which is shipped at Whitehaven. There is an endowed free school.

PRESTON-RICHARD, a township in the parish of HEVERSHAM, KENDAL ward, county of WESTMORLAND, 6 miles (W. N. W.) from Kirkby-Lonsdale, containing 348 inhabitants. The Kendal canal passes through the township, and on its banks are several coke ovens, and a large coal wharf. At Birkrigg is a burial-ground, termed "the Sepulchre," formerly belonging to the Society of Friends, but now disused. A school is supported by subscription, amounting to about £15 per annum. At End-Moor an antique hammer-head of stone was found in 1770.

PRESTON-WYNNE, a chapelry in the parish of WITHINGTON, hundred of BROXASH, county of HEREFORD, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Hereford, containing 167 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Dean of Hereford, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty. The chapel is dedicated to the Holy Trinity.

PRESTWICH, a parish with Oldham, in the hundred of SALFORD, county palatine of LANCASTER, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Manchester, containing 2724 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £46. 4. $9\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of Earl Grosvenor. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, has a lofty tower, forming a fine object in the general landscape. Here are manufactories to a very considerable extent. (See OLDHAM.)

PRESTWICK, a township in the parish of PONTELAND, western division of CASTLE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Newcastle upon Tyne, containing 155 inhabitants. Prestwick Carr, an extensive marsh, is, in wet seasons, so completely inundated by the river Pont, as to form one vast lake; but in summer, when the waters retire, it affords excellent pasturage common to the neighbouring townships.

PRESTWOOD, a township in the parish of ELLASTONE, southern division of the hundred of TOTMONSLOW, county of STAFFORD, 7 miles (N.) from Uttoxeter, containing 88 inhabitants. It is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s.

PRESTWOULD, a parish in the eastern division of the hundred of GOSCOTE, county of LEICESTER, 3 miles (E.N.E.) from Loughborough, containing, with the chapelry of Hoton, and the townships of Burton on the Wolds, and Coates, 974 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Leicester, and diocese of Lincoln, and in the patronage of C. Packe, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew.

PRIDDY, a parish in the hundred of WELLS-FORUM, county of SOMERSET, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N.N.W.) from Wells, containing 141 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Westbury, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Archidiaconal Court of Wells. One of the largest cattle fairs in the county is held here annually, on August 21st. In the neighbourhood are vestiges of a Roman encampment and nine barrows.

PRIESTCLIFFE, a township in the parish of BAKEWELL, hundred of HIGH PEAK, county of DERBY, 3 miles (S.S.W.) from Tideswell. The population is returned with the chapelry of Taddington. The Rev. Roger Wilkinson, late of this place, gave £400 for the endowment of a charity school, which, having been invested in land, produces £80 per annum.

PRIME-THORP, a township in the parish of BROUGHTON-ASTLEY, hundred of GUTHLAXTON, county of LEICESTER, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Lutterworth, containing 270 inhabitants.

PRINCETHORPE, a hamlet in the parish of STRETTON upon DUNSMOOR, Rugby division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, county of WARWICK, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Southam. The population is returned with the parish.

PRINKNASH-PARK, an extra-parochial district, in the middle division of the hundred of DUDSTONE and KING'S BARTON, county of GLOUCESTER, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. by E.) from Painswick, containing 9 inhabitants.

PRIORS-ASH, county of SOMERSET.—See ASH (PRIORS).

PRIORS-DEAN, county of SOUTHAMPTON.—See DEAN (PRIORS).

PRIORS-LEE, a chapelry in the parish of SHIFFNALL, Shiffnall division of the hundred of BRIMSTREE, county of SALOP, 3 miles (W. N. W.) from Shiffnall, containing, with Oakengale, 1851 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, endowed with £600 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £1400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Shiffnall.

PRISTON, a parish in the hundred of KEYNSHAM, county of SOMERSET, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Bath, containing 286 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Bath, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £12. 18. 4., and in the patronage of the Heir of the late William Vaughan, Esq., a minor. The church is dedicated to St. Luke. Six poor children are taught by a schoolmistress for £20 a year, paid out of the poor's estate.

PRITTLEWELL, a parish in the hundred of ROCHFORD, county of ESSEX, 19 miles (S. E.) from Chelmsford, containing, with Milton, 1922 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Essex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £18. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop of London. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a handsome structure in the later English style of architecture, with a fine pinnacled tower, which serves as an excellent sea-mark. The parish borders on the Thames, and includes Southend, a noted bathing-place, a short distance above which is Crow Stone, marking the extreme eastern boundary of the jurisdiction of the lord mayor of London, as conservator of the river. A Cluniac priory, in honour of St. Mary, and subordinate to the abbey of Lewes in Sussex, was founded here, in the reign of Henry II., by Robert Fitz-Swaine, which at the dissolution had a revenue of £194. 14. 3. Mrs. Scrattons and others gave a house and land in support of a free school for sixteen poor children.

PRIVETT, a parish in the hundred of FAWLEY, Fawley division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Petersfield, containing 229 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of West Meon, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Incumbent. This parish is within the jurisdiction of an ancient court, called the Cheyney Court, held at Winchester every Thursday, for the recovery of debts to any amount.

PROBUS, a parish in the western division of the hundred of POWDER, county of CORNWALL, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Grampound, containing, with part of the borough of Grampound, 1353 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, with the perpetual curacies of Cornelly and Merther, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £13. 16. 8., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Exeter. The church is remarkable for the beautiful simplicity of its architecture, and its stately tower, a fine specimen of the later English style, which, rising to the height of one hundred and eight feet, forms a striking contrast with the low thatched dwellings around. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. A market was formerly held weekly; and large fairs for horses and cattle are now held, on April 5th and 23rd, July 5th, and September 17th. A free school was founded, in 1688, by Mr. John Williams, who endowed it with about £10 per annum. There is also a trifling endowment in land by William Williams, in augmentation of the master's salary.

PRUDHOE, a township in the parish of Ovingham, eastern division of TINDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $12\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Newcastle upon Tyne, containing 293 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists, with a Sunday school attached: a school-room was erected in 1823.

PRUDHOE-CASTLE, a township in the parish of Ovingham, eastern division of TINDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $12\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W.) from Newcastle upon Tyne, containing 79 inhabitants. Here was formerly a chapel, dedicated to St. Thomas. On an eminence sloping to the southern bank of the Tyne stood the castle, once the chief baronial seat of the Umfravilles: it has been long in ruins, but its ivy-mantled towers and lofty keep still remain, venerable monuments of its ancient grandeur and importance. Its present possessors are the Percy family, of whom Algernon, the only brother of the Duke of Northumberland, was created Lord Prudhoe, Baron of Prudhoe castle, in 1816.

PUBLOW, a parish in the hundred of KEYNSHAM, county of SOMERSET, $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile (N.E.) from Pensford, containing 836 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Bath, and diocese of Bath and Wells, and in the patronage of — Cox, Esq.

PUCKINGTON, a parish in the hundred of ABDICK and BULSTONE, county of SOMERSET, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.N.E.) from Ilminster, containing 220 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Taunton, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £7. 13. $3\frac{1}{2}$. The Bishop of Bath and Wells presented by lapse in 1787.

PUCKLE-CHURCH, a parish in the hundred of PUCKLE-CHURCH, county of GLOUCESTER, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.W. by S.) from Chipping-Sodbury, containing 612 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, with the perpetual curacies of Abston and Westerleigh, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £14. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Wells. The church, dedicated to St. Thomas à Becket, is partly Norman and partly of later date. The Rev. Henry Berrow, in 1718, founded a free school for ten boys and ten girls: the annual income is £52. 10., of which one-fifth is paid towards the education of the poor of Abston and Wick. This was the site of a royal palace of the Saxon kings of England, in which Edmund received a stab from one Leof, that caused his death. A market was formerly held here, but it has been long disused.

PUDDINGTON, a parish in the hundred of WILLEY, county of BEDFORD, 5 miles (N. by W.) from Harrold, containing 581 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Bedford, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £7. 6. 8., endowed with £200 parliamentary grant. R. Orlebar, Esq. was patron in 1801. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, contains several ancient monuments, the principal of which is erected to the memory of General Livesay. The manufacture of thread-lace is carried on here. There is a petrifying spring in the parish; and small shells of the ostroites, belemnites, and turbinites species are found imbedded in the clay and gravel pits. Canary birds in a wild state are frequently met with in the neighbourhood.

PUDDINGTON, a township in the parish of BURTON, higher division of the hundred of WIRRAL, county palatine of CHESTER, 8 miles (N.W.) from Chester, containing 155 inhabitants.

PUDDINGTON, a parish in the hundred of WITHERIDGE, county of DEVON, 8 miles (W. by S.) from Tiverton, containing 176 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Barnstaple, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £6. 8. $1\frac{1}{2}$. Thomas Welman, Esq. was patron in 1826. Here is a Presbyterian place of worship, with an endowment in land yielding about £35 per annum. A charity school is partly supported by some small benefactions.

PUDDLESTONE, a parish in the hundred of WOLPHY, county of HEREFORD, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by N.) from Leominster, containing, with While and the township of Brockmanton, 316 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, with While, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £7. 17. $8\frac{1}{2}$. Thomas Rose, Esq. was patron in 1819. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

PUDLICOTT, a tything in that part of the parish of CHARLBURY which is in the hundred of CHADLINGTON, county of OXFORD, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by W.) from Chipping-Norton. The population is returned with the chapelry of Chilson.

PUDSEY, a chapelry in the parish of CALVERLEY, wapentake of MORLEY, West riding of the county of YORK, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E.) from Bradford, containing 6229 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the manorial court of Crossley, Bingley, and Pudsey, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Calverley. The chapel is dedicated to St. Lawrence. A new church, in the later style of English architecture, was erected in 1823, under the sanction of "His Majesty's Commissioners for building churches;" the amount of contract, including incidental expenses, was £13,362. 1. 10. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. The manufacture of woollen cloth is here carried on to a considerable extent. Jacob Simpson, in 1737, bequeathed £100 for the relief of decayed housekeepers, and for teaching poor children.

PULBOROUGH, a parish in the hundred of WEST EASWRITH, rape of ARUNDEL, county of SUSSEX, 9 miles (N.N.E.) from Arundel, containing 1901 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £19. 0. $7\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Earl of Egremont. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is principally in the early style of English architecture. The river Arun, and the Arun canal, pass through the parish.

PULFORD, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of BROXTON, county palatine of CHESTER, comprising the townships of Poulton and Pulford, and containing 318 inhabitants, of which number, 186 are in the township of Pulford, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Chester. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £6. 15. 10., and in the patronage of Earl Grosvenor. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. Earl and Countess Grosvenor support two schools in the parish, one for boys, and the other for girls. A Cistercian monastery, a cell to the abbey of Combermere, was founded in 1153, by Robert, the Earl of Chester's baker, the monks being placed in it to pray for the earl while a prisoner in the hands of King Stephen. This establishment, on account of the frequent incursions of the Welch, was removed, in 1214, to Dieulacres in Staffordshire. In a field, called the Castle Hill, are traces of a foss and other remains of an ancient fortification.

PULHAM (EAST), a parish in the hundred of BUCKLAND-NEWTON, Cerne subdivision of the county of DORSET, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Sherborne, containing, with the manor of West Pulham, 272 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £18. 17. 11. Joseph Haseley, Esq. was patron in 1813. The church is dedicated to St. Thomas à Becket. A school is partly supported by some trifling donations.

PULHAM (ST. MARY MAGDALENE), a parish in the hundred of EARSHAM, county of NORFOLK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W.) from Harleston, containing 1009 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Pulham St. Mary the Virgin, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich. The church, called Pulham Market church, is a neat building with a large square tower, and a handsome north porch. Pulham Market hall, formerly the seat of a junior branch of the Percies, is an ancient edifice, surrounded by an embattled brick wall; the greater part of it was built by William Brampton, a staunch royalist during Kett's rebellion.

PULHAM (ST. MARY the VIRGIN), a parish in the hundred of EARSHAM, county of NORFOLK, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W.) from Harleston, containing 797 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with the perpetual curacy of Pulham St. Mary Magdalene, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £33. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is adorned with numerous shields, also a great quantity of imagery of stone; and the east window exhibits emblems of the Trinity, &c., in stained glass. A rent-charge of £5, the bequest of William Pennoyer, in 1670, is applied for teaching poor children.

PULHAM (WEST), a manor in the parish of EAST PULHAM, hundred of BUCKLAND-NEWTON, Cerne subdivision of the county of DORSET, $9\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. E. by S.) from Sherborne. The population is returned with the parish.

PULLOXHILL, a parish in the hundred of FLITT, county of BEDFORD, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W.) from Silsoe, containing 475 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Bedford, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £9. 10., and in the patronage of the Countess de Grey. The church is dedicated to St. James. A vein of gold has been discovered here, but the produce is not sufficient to defray the expense of working it.

PULVERBATCH (CHURCH), a parish in the hundred of CONDOVER, county of SALOP, 8 miles (S. W. by S.) from Shrewsbury, containing 539 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £10. 13. 4., and in the patronage of Lord Kenyon. The church is dedicated to St. Edith. This parish was distinguished in ancient times for its extensive castle, which had within it a chapel, called the royal free chapel of Pullerbach. It had a charter for a weekly market and an annual fair, granted by Henry III. Courts leet and baron are held twice a year for the manor.

PUNCKNOWLE, a parish in the hundred of UGGS-COMBE, Dorchester division of the county of DORSET, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Bridport, containing 300 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with West Bexington, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £14. The Rev. Robert Frome was patron in 1825. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. This parish is bounded on the south by the English channel. A school is supported by subscription.

PURBRIGHT, a parish in the first division of the hundred of WOKING, county of SURREY, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Guildford, containing 472 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Surrey, and diocese of Winchester, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Henry Halsey, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. The Basingstoke canal passes through the parish.

PURFLEET, a township in the parish of WEST THURROCK, hundred of CHAFFORD, county of ESSEX, $16\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by S.) from London. The population is returned with the parish. It is situated at the mouth of a rivulet, which empties itself into the Thames. The village is chiefly inhabited by people employed in the extensive lime-works and chalk-pits. The walks among the vast caverns which have been excavated in the neighbourhood are romantic, and the views from the elevations remarkably fine. Here are considerable bomb-proof magazines for gunpowder, belonging to government.

PURITON, a parish in the hundred of HUNTSPELL and PURITON, county of SOMERSET, 4 miles (N. N. E.) from Bridg-water, containing, with Woollavington, 350 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, united with that of Woollavington, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £6. 15. 10. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. The navigable river Parret runs on the south-west of this parish. A small school is supported from the poor's estate.

PURLEIGH, a parish in the hundred of DENGIE, county of ESSEX, 4 miles (S. by W.) from Maldon, containing 967 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, annexed to the Provostship of Oriel College, Oxford, and holden without institution, in the archdeaconry of Essex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £25. The church, dedicated to All Saints, is large and handsome, with an embattled tower of flint and stone. The parish school is supported by subscription.

PURLEY, a parish in the hundred of THEALE, county of BERKS, 4 miles (N. W. by W.) from Reading, containing 196 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Berks, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £12. 17. $3\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a very neat structure.

PURSON, a hamlet in the parish and hundred of KING'S SUTTON, county of NORTHAMPTON, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Brackley. The population is returned with the parish.

PURTON, a parish in the hundred of HIGHWORTH, CRICKLADE, and STAPLE, county of WILTS, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Wootton-Bassett, containing, with the hamlet of Braydon, 1766 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Wilts, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £22. 17. 6., and in the patronage of the Earl of Shaftesbury. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a handsome structure, with a lofty tower and spire. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Fairs are held for cattle, on the Tuesday before May 6th, and the Friday after September 19th. Miriam Stevens, in 1723, bequeathed a rent-charge of £17. 10. for the support of a free school.

PUSEY, county of BERKS.—See PEWSEY.

PUTFORD (EAST), a parish in the hundred of SHEBBEAR, county of DEVON, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Great Torrington, containing 194 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Buckland-Brewer, in the archdeaconry of Barnstaple, and diocese of Exeter.

PUTFORD (WEST), a parish in the hundred of BLACK TORRINGTON, county of DEVON, 9 miles (W. S. W.)

from Great Torrington, containing 425 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Totness, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £9. 11. 0½., and in the patronage of Lord Clinton.

PUTLEY, a parish in the hundred of GREYTREE, county of HEREFORD, 5¾ miles (W.) from Ledbury, containing 163 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Dean of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £3. 18. 4., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Hereford. There are hop plantations in the neighbourhood.

PUTNEY, a parish in the western division of the hundred of BRIXTON, county of SURREY, 4 miles (S. W.) from London, containing 3394 inhabitants. In Domesday-book this place is styled Putelei, and it was subsequently called Puttenheath, or Pottenheath, since contracted into its present name. The village is situated on the southern bank of the Thames, opposite to Fulham, with which it is connected by a wooden bridge. Queen Elizabeth was a frequent visitor here at the house of Mr. Lacy, who also had the honour to entertain James I., a short time before his coronation. During the civil war in the reign of Charles I., a bridge of boats was constructed across the Thames, and forts were built on each side of the river, by order of the Earl of Essex, on the retreat of the royalists to Kingston, after the battle of Brentford; and in 1647, the headquarters of the army under Cromwell were fixed at Putney, while the king was a prisoner at Hampton Court. An ancient ferry over the Thames at this place is mentioned in Domesday-book, as yielding to the lord of the manor of Wimbledon a toll of twenty shillings per annum. In 1729, the bridge was erected in pursuance of an act of parliament, at the expense of £23,975, subscribed by thirty shareholders, who purchased the ferry for £8000. Here was a fishery at the time of the Norman Conquest, and smelts are now caught in great abundance. Putney is within the jurisdiction of the court of requests for the western division of the hundred of Brixton, for the recovery of debts under £5. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the deanery of Croydon, which is within the peculiar jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Canterbury, endowed with £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Worcester. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, was founded as a chapel of ease to Wimbledon, and was rebuilt about the reign of Henry VII.: it has a handsome stone tower at the west end, and at the east end of the south aisle is a small chantry chapel, erected by Nicholas West, Bishop of Ely, and having the roof adorned with rich tracery, interspersed with the arms of the founder, who was a native of Putney, and became a favourite of Henry VIII., by whom he was employed in various embassies. In 1684, Thomas Martyn bequeathed lands for the foundation and support of a charity school for twenty boys; and by a decree of the court of Chancery, in 1715, the property was vested in trustees: it produces about £270 per annum, from which the master receives £80 per annum, and the boys are boarded, clothed, and educated. An almshouse for twelve poor women, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, was erected by Sir Abraham Dawes, who, by will in 1639, endowed it with a rent-charge of £40, which, with subsequent benefactions, produces an income of £110 per annum. On Putney heath, to the south of the village, is an obelisk, erected by the corporation of London, with an inscription commemorating an experiment made, in 1776, by David Hartley, Esq., to prove the efficacy of a method of building houses fire-proof, which he had invented, and for which he obtained a grant from parliament of £2500. On the heath also is a semaphore station, forming part of the line of communication between the Admiralty office and Portsmouth. Putney was the birthplace of Bishop West, already mentioned; of Thomas Cromwell, who was made Earl of Essex by Henry VIII., but perished on the scaffold; and of Edward Gibbon, the celebrated author of the "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," born in 1737, and died in London, in 1794. John Toland, a noted freethinking writer, died at Putney in 1722, and was interred in the churchyard; and Robert Wood, Under Secretary of State, who published "The Ruins of Palmyra," and other curious archaeological works, was interred in the new burial-ground, in 1771.

PUTTENHAM, a parish in the hundred of DACORUM, county of HERTFORD, 3¾ miles (N. W.) from Tring, containing 112 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Huntingdon, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £10. 1. 0½., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Lincoln. The church is dedicated to St. Mary: the tower is built of flint and stone in square compartments, and the ceiling of the nave, which is of carved oak, is supported by figures representing some of the Apostles: there are on the cross beams other figures habited as ecclesiastics.

PUTTENHAM, a parish in the first division of the hundred of GODALMING, county of SURREY, 4¼ miles (W. by S.) from Guildford, containing 389 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with the perpetual curacy of Wanborough, in the archdeaconry of Surrey, and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £11. 17. 11., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. John the Baptist.

PUXTON, a parish in the hundred of WINTERSTOKE, county of SOMERSET, 6 miles (N. by W.) from Axbridge, containing 137 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the jurisdiction of the peculiar court of Banwell in the Cathedral Church of Wells, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Bristol.

PYLLE, a parish in the hundred of WHITESTONE, county of SOMERSET, 3½ miles (S. by W.) from Shepton-Mallet, containing 176 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £8. 19. 9½., and in the patronage of E. B. Portman, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Thomas à Becket. The old Roman Fosse-way passes through the parish.

PYRFORD, a parish in the first division of the hundred of GODLEY, county of SURREY, 1¾ mile (N. N. W.) from Ripley, containing 294 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, annexed to the rectory of Wisley, in the archdeaconry of Surrey, and diocese of Winchester. The Wey and Arun canal passes through the parish.

PYWORTHY, a parish in the hundred of BLACK TORRINGTON, county of DEVON, 2¼ miles (W. S. W.) from Holsworthy, containing 630 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Totness, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £27. 8. 4. The Rev. T. H. Kingdon was patron in 1826. The church is dedicated to St. Swithin. The Bude and Launceston canal passes through the parish.

Q.

QUADRING, a parish in the wapentake of KIRTON, parts of HOLLAND, county of LINCOLN, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Spalding, containing 704 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, united to that of Wigtoft, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £10. 1. 3. The church is dedicated to St. Margaret. There are several endowments for the education of children, the principal of which is a rent-charge of £10, the gift of Thomas Cowling, in 1701.

QUAINTON, a parish in the hundred of ASHEN-DON, county of BUCKINGHAM, 6 miles (N. W.) from Aylesbury, containing, with the hamlets of Denham, Doddershall, and Shipton-Lee, 1017 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £30. 12. 1., and in the patronage of the Rev. F. Ekins. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, has lately received an addition of one hundred and thirty free sittings, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £15 towards defraying the expense: it contains, among other interesting monuments, a memorial to the learned orientalist, Richard Brett, one of the translators of the Bible, and a Fellow of Chelsea College. There is a place of worship for Baptists. An almshouse was founded here, about 1688, for eight poor persons, pursuant to the will of Richard Winwood, Esq., who bequeathed £200 for its erection, and endowed it with lands which afford a weekly allowance of two shillings, and some clothing, to each inmate. There is a school with a small annual income.

QUANTOXHEAD (EAST), a parish in the hundred of WILLITON and FREEMANNERS, county of SOMERSET, $13\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Bridg-water, containing 276 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Taunton, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £9. 8. 4. J. F. Luttrell, Esq. and others were patrons in 1818. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

QUANTOXHEAD (WEST), a parish in the hundred of WILLITON and FREEMANNERS, county of SOMERSET, $15\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Bridg-water, containing 225 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Taunton, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £11. 8. 8. Miss Balch was patroness in 1814. The church is dedicated to St. Ethelred.

QUARLES, an extra-parochial district, in the northern division of the hundred of GREENHOE, county of NORFOLK, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from New Walsingham, containing 23 inhabitants.

QUARLEY, a parish in the hundred of ANDOVER, Andover division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 7 miles (W. by S.) from Andover, containing 213 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £15. 12. 1., and in the patronage of the Master and Brethren of St. Katherine's Hospital, London. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. The Rev. Thomas Sheppard, D.D., and Richard Cox, Esq., in 1802, endowed a free school for poor children; the income is about £16 a year; the school-house was erected by Mrs. Sheppard. On the summit of Quarley Mount, five miles north-west from Danebury Hill, is a considerable ancient camp with quadruple intrenchments still visible, on the south side; those on the east have been nearly obliterated by the plough: various tumuli are scattered over the adjacent downs.

QUARLTON, a township in the parish of BOLTON, hundred of SALFORD, county palatine of LANCASTER, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Bolton, containing 320 inhabitants.

QUARNDON, a parish in the hundred of MORLESTON and LITCHURCH, county of DERBY, 3 miles (N. N. W.) from Derby, containing 438 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Derby, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Lord Scarsdale. Sir John Curzon, in 1725, bequeathed an annuity of £20 for the support of a free school for twenty poor children of Kedleston, Quarndon, Weston, and Ravensdale park. Near this place is a chalybeate spring, which was considerably resorted to upwards of a century ago, and is still visited in the summer, the water being highly beneficial in cases of debility.

QUARNFORD, a chapelry in the parish of ALLSTONEFIELD, northern division of the hundred of TOTMONSLOW, county of STAFFORD, 8 miles (N. by E.) from Leek, containing 695 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Stafford, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Freeholders.

QUARRENDON, a parish in the hundred of ASHEN-DON, county of BUCKINGHAM, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Aylesbury, containing 68 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Bier-ton, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Dean and Chapter of Lincoln. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, is fast hastening to decay; it was founded by John Farnham, about 1392, and rebuilt in the reign of Elizabeth, by Sir Henry Lee, to some of the deceased members of whose family it contains some handsome monuments. A great storm happened here in 1570, which did considerable damage to property of different kinds.

QUARRINGTON, a township in the parish of KELLOE, southern division of EASINGTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Durham, containing 177 inhabitants. It was anciently the chief town of a district called Queringdonshire. There are two collieries in the neighbourhood.

QUARRINGTON, a parish in the wapentake of ASWARDHURN, parts of KESTIVEN, county of LINCOLN, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S. W. by S.) from Sleaford, containing 132 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £7. 2. $3\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Marquis of Bristol. The church, dedicated to St. Botolph, is partly in the early, and partly in the decorated, style of English architecture: the font is of later date and curiously shaped.

QUATFORD, a parish partly in the borough of BRIDGENORTH, but chiefly in the hundred of STOTTESDEN, county of SALOP, 2 miles (S. E.) from Bridgenorth, containing, with the township of Eardington, 411 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the jurisdiction of the royal peculiar court of Bridgenorth, endowed with £14 per annum private benefaction, £800 royal bounty, and £1000 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of W. Whitmore, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene.

QUATT-MALVERN, a parish partly within the liberties of the borough of BRIDGENORTH, but chiefly in the hundred of STOTTESDEN, county of SALOP, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Bridgenorth, containing 342 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £14. 5., and in the patronage of W. Whitmore, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Andrew, was rebuilt in 1763, when representations of the Seven Charities, the Day of Judgment, &c., were discovered painted on the walls.

QUEDGLEY, a parish partly in the middle division of the hundred of DUDSTONE and KING'S BARTON, but chiefly in the upper division of the hundred of WHITSTONE, county of GLOUCESTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W.) from Gloucester, containing, with the hamlet of Woolstrop, 263 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, and in the patronage of the Duke of Manchester. The church is dedicated to St. James. The navigable river Severn runs on the north, and the Gloucester and Berkeley canal passes through the parish.

Seal and Arms.

QUEENBOROUGH, a borough and parish (formerly a market town) having exclusive jurisdiction, though locally in the liberty of the Isle of Sheppy, lathe of SCRAY, county of KENT, 15 miles (N. E.) from Maidstone, and 45 (E. by S.) from London, containing 881 inhabitants. This place, then called Cyning-burgh, was a residence of the Anglo-Saxon kings; their castle was near the entrance of the Swale, and afterwards received the name of the castle of Sheppy: in the reign of Edward III., it was entirely rebuilt, on a magnificent scale, from a plan by William of Wykeham, afterwards Bishop of Winchester. That king, on visiting it for a few days, made the place a free borough, and, in honour of his Queen Philippa, conferred its present name: in 1366, he incorporated it by charter, and three years afterwards gave it the staple of wool. The castle was repaired by Henry VIII., in 1536, at which time he erected several others for the defence of the coasts; but, on a survey made by order of parliament, in 1650, being found unserviceable as a fortress in modern warfare, it was soon afterwards demolished. The town is situated near the West Swale, which is here navigable, and consists principally of one wide street; the houses in general are modern; and the inhabitants are supplied with water from the Castle well. The chief source of employment is fishing and oyster-dredging, and the lobster trade, large supplies being brought from Norway and Sweden and sent to the London market: there is also a copperas manufactory. Two weekly markets and two annual fairs were granted by Edward III., but at present only one fair is held, on the 5th of August. The first charter of incorporation was granted by the same monarch, and that now in force by Charles I., under which the corporation consists of a mayor, four jurats, and two bailiffs, with a recorder, chamberlain, town clerk, and other officers. The mayor and senior jurat are justices of the peace, and have exclusive jurisdiction within the borough: a court of session, half-yearly, is held before the recorder and magistrates. The mayor and the steward, who are elected by the select body of mayor, jurats, and bailiffs, are empowered under their charter to hold a court of record "on Monday, from three weeks to three weeks," for pleas to an unlimited amount, but it has fallen into disuse. The guildhall is a neat edifice near the centre of the town. The freedom is obtained by the eldest son of a freeman, being a native of the borough, and by servitude under freemen residing within it. This borough first sent representatives to parliament in the 13th of Elizabeth, since which it has continued to return two: the right of election is vested in the mayor, jurats, bailiffs, and burgesses: the number of voters is about four hundred: the mayor is the returning officer.

The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, endowed with £600 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £1600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Mayor and Corporation. The church, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, has an ancient tower at the west end. There is a place of worship for Independents. A school for the education of one hundred children of freemen is principally supported by the voluntary contributions of the corporation and the representatives of the borough: the schoolmaster receives £2 per annum, out of the dividends of £1000 three per cent. consols., bequeathed to the corporation for this and other purposes, in 1813, by Mr. Richard Webb. The only remains of the old castle are the moat and a very deep well, which latter was cleared out by order of the commissioners of the Navy, on account of the want of water at Sheerness. Here was anciently an hospital, dedicated to St. John.

QUEENHILL, a chapelry in that part of the parish of RIPPLE which is in the lower division of the hundred of PERSHORE, county of WORCESTER, 3 miles (S. S. E.) from Upton upon Severn, containing 94 inhabitants.

QUEENIBOROUGH, a parish in the eastern division of the hundred of GOSCOTE, county of LEICESTER, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Leicester, containing 469 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Leicester, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £8, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty. E. L. Loveden, Esq. was patron in 1802. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

QUENBY, a hamlet in that part of the parish of HUNGERTON which is in the eastern division of the hundred of GOSCOTE, county of LEICESTER, 7 miles (E. by N.) from Leicester, containing 30 inhabitants. The manor-house is a large and curious specimen of ancient domestic architecture.

4 E

QUENDON, a parish in the hundred of UTTLESFORD, county of ESSEX, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Stansted-Mountfitchet, containing 156 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the jurisdiction of the Commissary of Essex and Herts, concurrently with the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of London, rated in the king's books at £9, and in the patronage of Henry Cranmer, Esq.

QUENNINGTON, a parish in the hundred of BRIGHTWELLS-BARROW, county of GLOUCESTER, 2 miles (N.) from Fairford, containing 345 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £7. 18. 4. M. H. Beach, Esq. was patron in 1822. The church, dedicated to St. Swithin, has enriched Norman doors, and has lately received an addition of sixty-four free sittings, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £60 towards defraying the expense. Here was formerly a preceptory of Knights Hospitallers of St. John of Jerusalem, founded before the reign of John, the revenue of which, at the dissolution, was valued at £137. 7. 1.

QUERNMOOR, a township in that part of the parish of LANCASTER which is in the hundred of LONSDALE, south of the sands, county palatine of LANCASTER, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E.) from Lancaster, containing 672 inhabitants.

QUETHIOCK, a parish in the middle division of the hundred of EAST, county of CORNWALL, 4 miles (E.) from Liskeard, containing 684 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £15. 11. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Exeter. The church is a building of the eleventh century. The parish is bounded on the east by the river Lynher, and on the west by the Tide.

QUIDDENHAM, a parish in the hundred of GUILT-CROSS, county of NORFOLK, 2 miles (E. by N.) from East Harling, containing 121 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £8. 4. 6 $\frac{1}{2}$, and in the patronage of the Earl of Albe-marle. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew.

QUINTON, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of KIFTSGATE, county of GLOUCESTER, 7 miles (N. N. E.) from Chipping-Campden, containing, with the hamlet of Admington, 598 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £18. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Worcester. The church, dedicated to St. Swithin, is a large handsome structure, in the Norman style, supposed to have been erected by the Laceys, soon after the Conquest.

QUINTON, a parish in the hundred of WYMERSLEY, county of NORTHAMPTON, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Northampton, containing 115 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £11. 3. 9., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. John the Baptist.

QUOISLEY, a joint township with Marbury, in the parish of MARBURY, hundred of NANTWICH, county palatine of CHESTER, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. by E.) from Whitchurch. The population is returned with Marbury.

QUORNDON, a chapelry in the parish of BARROW upon SOAR, western division of the hundred of GOS-COTE, county of LEICESTER, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N. W.) from Mountsorrel, containing 1503 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Leicester, and diocese of Lincoln, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Barrow. The church is dedicated to St. Bartholomew. Baptists and Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists have each a place of worship here. Stocking weaving and the manufacture of warp and bobbin twist lace afford employment to a great portion of the inhabitants. The Loughborough canal passes through the northern part of the parish, and joins the river Soar. Thomas Rawlins, in 1691, gave a rent-charge of £45. 10. for apprenticing poor boys, and to a schoolmaster for teaching six boys.

QUY, a chapelry in the parish of STOW, hundred of STAINED, county of CAMBRIDGE, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by N.) from Cambridge. The population is returned with the parish.

R.

RABY, a township in the parish of NESTON, higher division of the hundred of WIRRAL, county palatine of CHESTER, 2 miles (N. E.) from Great Neston, containing 145 inhabitants.

RABY, a joint township with Keverstone, in the parish of STAINEDROP, south-western division of DARLINGTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Barnard-Castle, containing 203 inhabitants. Raby castle, situated on an eminence commanding a vast prospect, is a noble and extensive pile, surrounded with ramparts and a deep fosse, enclosing an area of two acres; from its stately exterior, which retains most of its original appearance, a good idea may be formed of the grandeur of a baronial mansion in ancient times; the style of the south front, with the elegant symmetry of its windows, have at once a pleasing and sublime effect; the interior has been much modernised, and comprises numerous convenient apartments, furnished with great elegance. A carriage-road now passes over the site of the great hall, or ancient place of rendezvous, which was a truly magnificent apartment, having two rows of octagonal piers and a beautiful groined roof.

RACKENFORD, a parish in the hundred of WITHERIDGE, county of DEVON, $8\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Tiverton, containing 395 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Barnstaple, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £19. 17. 3 $\frac{1}{2}$. Thomas Comins, Esq. was patron in 1822. The church is dedicated to All Saints. A weekly market and an annual fair were granted in 1235; the former has been long disused, but a small cattle fair is still held on the Wednesday before September 19th. Courts leet and baron are held here. Charles Kempe, a blacksmith, gave £13 a year, which Mary Ayre, in 1695, augmented to £15, for the education of poor children.

RACKHEATH, a parish in the hundred of TAVERHAM, county of NORFOLK, 5 miles (N. E. by N.) from Norwich, containing 260 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., and in the patronage of Edward Stracey, Esq. The church is dedicated to All Saints. Rackheath formerly comprised two villages and parishes, Rackheath Magna and Rackheath Parva, but the church of the latter, which was dedicated to the Holy Trinity, no longer exists, and the livings have been consolidated. Here was anciently a small priory, the revenue of which was valued, in 1428, at £2. 1. 3.

RACTON, a parish in the hundred of WESTBOURN and SINGLETON, rape of CHICHESTER, county of SUSSEX, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.W. by W.) from Chichester, containing 100 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with Lordington, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £5. 19. 2., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Chichester. The church is principally in the early style of English architecture.

RADBOURN, a parish in the hundred of APPLETREE, county of DERBY, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Derby, containing 260 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Derby, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £8. 3. 4., and in the patronage of E. J. Chandos Pole, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew: near it are slight remains of the ancient hall. A school was founded, in 1683, by German Pole, Esq., the present annual income of which is £15. 10., besides a moiety of the profits of a lime-kiln, lately let for upwards of £100 per annum. Radbourn is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s.

RADBOURN (LOWER), an extra-parochial district, in the Southam division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, county of WARWICK, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S.S.E.) from Southam, containing 30 inhabitants.

RADBOURN (UPPER), an extra-parochial district, in the Southam division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, county of WARWICK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.S.E.) from Southam, containing 14 inhabitants.

RADCLIFFE, a parish in the hundred of SALFORD, county palatine of LANCASTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.S.W.) from Bury, containing 3089 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £21. 0. 5., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £1900 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Earl of Wilton. Besides the parish church, a neat chapel of ease has been recently erected, at the expense of £5000, defrayed by Countess Grosvenor. The cotton manufacture is here carried on to a considerable extent; and several coal mines are worked in the neighbourhood. The Bolton and Bury canal passes near the village.

RADCLIFFE upon SOAR, county of NOTTINGHAM.—See RATCLIFFE upon SOAR.

RADCLIFFE on TRENT, county of NOTTINGHAM.—See RATCLIFFE on TRENT.

RADCLIVE, a parish in the hundred and county of BUCKINGHAM, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (W.) from Buckingham, containing, with the hamlet of Chackmore, 296 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £8. 1. 3., and in the patronage of the Warden and Fellows of New College, Oxford. The church is dedicated to St. John the Evangelist. The river Ouse runs through the parish. Here was formerly a chantry, but there are no remains of it. The old manor-house has been converted into a farm-house.

RADCUTT, a hamlet in that part of the parish of LANGFORD which is in the hundred of BAMPTON, county of OXFORD, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from Lechlade, containing 30 inhabitants.

RADDINGTON, a parish in the hundred of WILLINGTON and FREEMANNERS, county of SOMERSET, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Wiveliscombe, containing 101 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Taunton, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £8. 7. $8\frac{1}{2}$. Richard Darch, Esq. was patron in 1807. The church is dedicated to St. Michael.

RADFORD, a hamlet in that part of the parish of ST. MICHAEL which is in the county of the city of COVENTRY, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (N. N. W.) from Coventry, containing 206 inhabitants.

RADFORD, a parish in the southern division of the wapentake of BROXTOW, county of NOTTINGHAM, 1 mile (W. by N.) from Nottingham, containing 4806 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Nottingham, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £3. 9. $4\frac{1}{2}$., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, has lately received an addition of one hundred sittings, of which fifty are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £100 towards defraying the expense. Various branches of manufacture, similar to those at Nottingham, are carried on here to a considerable extent. A priory of Black canons, was founded here, about 1102, by William de Luvitot, which, at the dissolution, had a revenue of £302. 6. 10.

RADFORD, a hamlet in the parish of CHURCH-ENSTONE, hundred of CHADLINGTON, county of OXFORD, containing 74 inhabitants.

RADFORD-SEMELE, a parish in the Kenilworth division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, county of WARWICK, 4 miles (E.) from Warwick, containing 472 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Coventry, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £5. 16. $0\frac{1}{2}$., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of H. G. Lewis, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas. The Warwick and Napton canal passes through the parish.

RADIPOLE, a parish in the hundred of CULLIFORD-TREE, Dorchester division of the county of DORSET, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.N.W.) from Melcombe-Regis, containing 226 inhabitants. The living was formerly a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £11. 5. 5., but the church at Melcombe-Regis having been made parochial, in the 1st of James I., this church was declared to be the chapel of ease: it is dedicated to St. Mary. The parish is situated at the upper end of Weymouth harbour.

RADLEY, a parish in the hundred of HORMER, county of BERKS, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.E. by E.) from Abingdon, containing, with part of the chapelry of Kennington, and the liberty of Thruppwick, 500 inhabitants. The living is a donative, in the patronage of Sir George Bower, Bart. The church is dedicated to St. James.

RADNAGE, a parish in the hundred of DESBOURGH, county of BUCKINGHAM, 6 miles (N. W. by W.) from High Wycombe, containing 366 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 11½, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

RADNOR, a township in that part of the parish of ASTBURY which is in the hundred of NORTHWICH, county palatine of CHESTER, 1¼ mile (N. W.) from Congleton, containing 14 inhabitants.

RADSTOCK, a parish in the hundred of KILMERSDON, county of SOMERSET, 7½ miles (N. W.) from Frome, containing 902 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £6. 11. 0½, and in the patronage of Earl Waldegrave. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Coal mines are in operation in the vicinity. A railway runs through the village, and the old Fosse-road passes through the parish. Radstock gives title of baron to a branch of the family of Waldegrave.

RADSTON, a parish in the hundred of KING'S SUTTON, county of NORTHAMPTON, 2½ miles (N.) from Brackley, containing 212 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £800 royal bounty. W. Holbech, Esq. was patron in 1812. The church is dedicated to St. Lawrence.

RADWAY, a parish in the Kington division of the hundred of KINGTON, county of WARWICK, 3¼ miles (S. E. by E.) from Kington, containing 346 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Coventry, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £5. 12., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

The church is dedicated to All Saints.

RADWINTER, a parish in the hundred of FRESHWELL, county of ESSEX, 4½ miles (N.) from Thaxted, containing 773 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the jurisdiction of the Commissary of Essex and Herts, concurrently with the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of London, rated in the king's books at £21. 12. 11. John Bullock, Esq. was patron in 1806. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

RAGDALE, a parish in the eastern division of the hundred of GOSCOTE, county of LEICESTER, 7 miles (W. by N.) from Melton-Mowbray, containing 98 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Queeniborough, in the archdeaconry of Leicester, and diocese of Lincoln. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

RAGLAND, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of RAGLAND, county of MONMOUTH, 7½ miles (S. W. by W.) from Monmouth, containing 633 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, annexed to Llandenny, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaff, rated in the king's books at £4. 6. 3., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Duke of Beaufort. The church is dedicated to St. Cadocus. There is a place of worship for Baptists. Ragland Castle, said to have been mostly built by one of the Lords Herbert, is one of the finest remains of the kind in this part of the kingdom. It was gallantly defended for three months by the Earl of Worcester, against General Fairfax, after the entire reduction of Wales, and until the king's imprisonment at Holmby, when he surrendered, upon conditions honourable to the garrison. Charles I. was entertained here by the earl with great magnificence for three weeks, in 1645.

RAGLEY, a hamlet in that part of the parish of ARROW which is in the Alcester division of the hundred of BARLICHWAY, county of WARWICK, 1¼ mile (S. W. by S.) from Alcester. The population is returned with the parish.

RAGNALL, a chapelry in the parish of DUNHAM, South-clay division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, county of NOTTINGHAM, 4¾ miles (E. N. E.) from Tuxford, containing 146 inhabitants. This chapelry is within the peculiar jurisdiction of the Chapter of the Collegiate Church of Southwell.

RAINFORD, a chapelry in the parish of PRESCOT, hundred of WEST DERBY, county palatine of LANCASTER, 5¼ miles (N. by E.) from Prescott, containing 1375 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, endowed with £400 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Prescott. There is a place of worship for Independents.

RAINHAM, county of ESSEX.—See RAYNHAM.

RAINHAM, a parish in the hundred of MILTON, lathe of SCRAY, county of KENT, 4 miles (E. S. E.) from Chatham, containing 1030 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £14. 4. 7., and in the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The church, dedicated to St. Margaret, is in the early style of English architecture: it has a lofty beacon tower, and contains several costly monuments to the Tuftons, Earls of Thanet. The parish is bounded on the north by the Medway; and the village, situated on the great London and Dover road, contained, in the reign of Elizabeth, eight houses, and there were then three quays, with thirteen small vessels, the largest not exceeding thirty-five tons, belonging to the place. Cherries and apples formerly abounded here, but at present they are not cultivated to any great extent.

RAINHAM (EAST), a parish in the hundred of GALLOW, county of NORFOLK, 4 miles (S. W.) from Fakenham, containing 130 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with West Rainham, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £18. 13. 4., and in the patronage of William Ainge, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

RAINHAM (SOUTH), a parish in the hundred of GALLOW, county of NORFOLK, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Fakenham, containing 101 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, with Helloughton, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £6, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of William Ainge, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Martin. A Cluniac priory, in honour of St. Mary and St. John, a cell to that of Castle-Acre, was founded here, about 1160, by William de Lisewis.

RAINHAM (WEST), a parish in the hundred of GALLOW, county of NORFOLK, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Fakenham, containing 341 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with East Rainham, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £13. 6. 8. The church is dedicated to St. Margaret.

RAINHILL, a township in the parish of PRESCOT, hundred of WEST DERBY, county palatine of LANCASTER, 3 miles (S. E. by E.) from Prescot, containing 640 inhabitants.

RAINOW, a chapelry in the parish of PRESTBURY, hundred of MACCLESFIELD, county palatine of CHESTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Macclesfield, containing 1530 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £800 royal bounty, and £1800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Prestbury. The chapel, called Jenkin, or Salterford chapel, was built by the inhabitants, in 1739. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists, with a Sunday school attached; and there are several trifling endowments for the education of children. The Roman road from Buxton to Manchester crossed the township, within the limits of which it is supposed there was once a Roman station. The manufacture of silk and cotton is carried on here, though the former has been in a declining state for some time. Near Kerridge hill are extensive quarries of flag-stone and slate.

RAINSCLIFF, a township in the parish of WOLSTANTON, northern division of the hundred of PIREHILL, county of STAFFORD, containing 679 inhabitants.

RAINSTHORPE, county of NORFOLK.—See TASEBURGH.

RAINTON, a joint township with Newby, in that part of the parish of TOPCLIFFE which is in the wapentake of HALLIKELD, North riding of the county of YORK, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Boroughbridge, containing, with Newby, 347 inhabitants. The Wesleyan Methodists have a place of worship here. There are various small endowments, producing about £3. 10. per annum, for the instruction of poor children.

RAINTON (EAST), a township in the parish of HOUGHTON le SPRING, northern division of EASINGTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Durham, containing 671 inhabitants, many of whom are employed in the neighbouring coal mines, of which, Plain pit, in 1817, and again in 1823, exploded, and destroyed about eighty human beings. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

RAINTON (WEST), a chapelry in the parish of HOUGHTON le SPRING, northern division of EASINGTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E.)

from Durham, containing 1160 inhabitants. A chapel, dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, formerly existed here, but there are now no traces of it: a chapel of ease, however, was erected in 1825, and contains four hundred sittings, of which three hundred are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £200 towards defraying the expense. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Two Sunday schools are attended by about three hundred children. The population of this place has increased of late years, in proportion to the great extension of the neighbouring collieries.

RAISTHORPE, a joint township with Birdall, in the parish of WHARRAM-PERCY, wapentake of BUCKROSE, East riding of the county of YORK, 9 miles (S. E. by S.) from New Malton, containing 47 inhabitants.

RAITHBY, a parish in the eastern division of the soke of BOLINGBROKE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Spilsby, containing 180 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £6. 14. 7., and in the alternate patronage of the Crown, and Charles Chaplin, Esq. The church is dedicated to the Holy Trinity. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

RAITHBY, a parish in the Wold division of the hundred of LOUTH-ESKE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 2 miles (S. W.) from Louth, containing, with Maltby, 120 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, united to Hallington, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

RAMBOTTOM, a hamlet in the chapelry of LOWER TOTTINGTON, in that part of the parish of BURY which is in the hundred of SALFORD, county palatine of LANCASTER, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Bury. The population is returned with Tottington. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. At this place are very extensive cotton-spinning and printing establishments, affording employment to about three thousand persons.

RAME, a parish in the southern division of the hundred of EAST, county of CORNWALL, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Devonport, containing 807 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £12. 7. 6., and in the patronage of the Earl of Mount-Edgumbe. The church is dedicated to St. German. In this parish is the noted promontory on the shore of the English channel, called Rame Head, the nearest point of land to the Eddystone lighthouse, and on which are slight remains of the ancient chapel of St. Michael. Cawsand bay is partly in this parish, at the entrance of which is a beacon, on Penlee point.

RAMPISHAM, a parish in the hundred of TOLLERFORD, Dorchester division of the county of DORSET, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Beaminster, containing 368 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with that of Wraxhall united, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, and diocese of Bristol, rated in the king's books at £11. 17. 8½., and in the patronage of W. White, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

RAMPSIDE, county palatine of LANCASTER.—See RAMSYDE.

RAMPTON, a parish in the hundred of NORTHSTOW, county of CAMBRIDGE, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Cambridge, containing 217 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Ely, rated in the king's books at £9. 10., and in the patronage of the Heirs of William Strode, Esq. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

RAMPTON, a parish in the South-clay division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, county of NOTTINGHAM, $6\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E.S.E.) from East Retford, containing 391 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Prebendary of Rampton in the Collegiate Church of Southwell, rated in the king's books at £10. 0. 3., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty. The church is dedicated to All Saints. Thirteen children are educated free for £6. 5., and the occupation of land worth £1. 10., per annum, given by some persons unknown. Here is a curious ancient gateway, which formerly belonged to a mansion-house erected in the reign of Henry VIII., and taken down about a century ago.

RAMSBURY, a parish in the hundred of RAMSBURY, county of WILTS, comprising the tythings of Axford, Eastridge, and the Town tything, and containing 2335 inhabitants, of which number, 1653 are in the town of Ramsbury, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.W. by W.) from Hungerford. The living is a vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Dean of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £9. 13. $1\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to the Holy Cross, is a large ancient structure, with a massive tower supported by strong buttresses, and is considered the mother church to Salisbury cathedral; for, when Pleymund, Archbishop of Canterbury, about 909, constituted Wiltshire a distinct bishoprick, the two first bishops of that see fixed their seats here, but the third removed it to Wilton. Ramsbury church, however, is thought to have continued to be the cathedral of the diocese after the Conquest, and until the union of the bishopricks of Wiltshire and Sherborne, and the establishment of the seat of the new diocese at Sarum. The Wesleyan Methodists have a place of worship here.

RAMSDEN, a chapelry in the parish of SHIPTON under WHICHWOOD, hundred of CHADLINGTON, county of OXFORD, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Witney, containing 391 inhabitants.

RAMSDON-BELLHOUSE, a parish in the hundred of BARSTABLE, county of ESSEX, 4 miles (E.) from Billericay, containing 415 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with Stock, in the archdeaconry of Essex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £14. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

RAMSDON-CRAYS, a parish in the hundred of BARSTABLE, county of ESSEX, 3 miles (E.S.E.) from Billericay, containing 276 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Essex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £20, and in the patronage of Vicesimus Knox, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. The navigable river Crouch runs through the parish.

RAMSEY, a parish in the hundred of TENDRING, county of ESSEX, 3 miles (W.S.W.) from Harwich, containing 676 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Colchester, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £15, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The river Stour is navigable here for vessels of two hundred and fifty tons' burden. At the lower part of Ramsey creek, which is crossed by a bridge on the London and Harwich road, an embankment has been made, to check the encroachments of the tide, upon five hundred acres of marsh land, gained from the sea within the last twenty years. Thomas Darall, in 1771, founded a free school, the annual income of which is about £14.

RAMSEY, a market town and parish in the hundred of HURSTINGSTONE, county of HUNTINGDON, 11 miles (N.N.E.) from Huntingdon, and $68\frac{1}{2}$ (N. by W.) from London, containing 2814 inhabitants. The only feature of importance in the ancient history of this place is a mitred abbey of Benedictine monks, of great wealth and magnificence, founded here, in 969, by Ailwine, Alderman of all England, and Duke or Earl of the East Angles, and dedicated to St. Mary and St. Benedict, the revenue of which, at the dissolution, was valued at £1983. 15. 3.: the site is now occupied by a private residence, partially consisting of the remains of the ancient fabric, and still exhibiting the gateway in a fine state of preservation. The town is situated at the bottom of a hill on Bury brook, and on the verge of the fens. The market is on Wednesday; and a fair is held on July 22nd, for cattle and toys. A manorial court leet, at which a constable is appointed, is held annually in May or June. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Huntingdon, and diocese of Lincoln, and in the patronage of William Henry Fellowes, Esq. The church, which is dedicated to St. Thomas à Becket, is partly Norman, and partly in the early style of English architecture. There is a place of worship for Independents. Various benefactions in land have been made for the support of a free school and a spinning school, but, owing to frequent inundations, the school-house became ruinous, and the institution declined.

RAMSGATE, a sea-port, market town, and parish, in the cinque-port liberty of SANDWICH, of which it is a member, though locally in the hundred of Ringslow, or Isle of Thanet, lathe of St. Augustine, county of KENT, 4 miles (S.) from Margate, 17 (E.N.E.) from Canterbury, and 72 (E.) from London, containing 6031 inhabitants. It was originally a small fishing hamlet in the parish of St. Lawrence, until the 21st of June, 1827, at which period it was constituted a distinct parish, by an act passed in the 7th and 8th of George IV. It is stated, in the maritime survey of Kent in the reign of Elizabeth, to have contained only twenty-five houses, and when Leland wrote his itinerary, was only protected from the sea by a small wooden pier: in this state of obscurity it remained until 1688, when the inhabitants commenced trading with Russia, which trade has long since been discontinued: from this period its buildings increased, and it is now a town of importance, celebrated as a watering-place of considerable resort, and particularly distinguished for its harbour, which was commenced in 1749, under an act passed in the 22nd of George II., being designed to afford protection on the east coast to shipping in distress, especially those driven by gales from the Downs. Mr. Smeaton was the engineer first employed on this work, and after his death, the late Mr. Rennie, and subsequently his son and successor. The pier, which forms the harbour on the sea side, is built principally of Purbeck and Portland stone, and latterly of Cornish granite, and for extent is unequalled by any in the kingdom. It projects eight hundred feet into the sea, before making an angle, and, including the parapet, is twenty-six feet broad at the top; the front presents a polygon, each side of which is four hundred and fifty feet long. The eastern pier extends two thousand feet, and the western one thousand five hundred and fifty. The harbour covers an area of forty-eight acres, and is two hundred feet wide at the mouth, across which the tide was found to run so rapidly in tempestuous weather, as to render it dangerous for vessels entering the harbour, and the eastern pier was in consequence lengthened four hundred feet to the south-west. In the upper part of the harbour a basin has been constructed, capable of containing two hundred vessels, the gates of which being shut at high and opened at low water, the stream carries away any drifted mud or sand, and keeps open a channel under the curve of the eastern pier, sufficiently wide to admit two vessels abreast, with a depth of water of from fifteen to sixteen feet at neap tides, and from twenty to twenty-two feet at spring tides, enabling vessels of three hundred tons' burden to enter at all times, and much larger ones at spring tides; and vessels of six hundred tons can ride safely in the harbour, which affords shelter on an average to one thousand one hundred vessels annually, the greater part of which are blown, or run, from the Downs in bad weather: the continued ravages of the sea have hitherto prevented the works from being completely finished, and a considerable expense is annually incurred in repairing the damages occasioned by its inroads. On the western pier-head is a stone lighthouse, with argand lamps and red reflectors, which, when lighted at night, denote that there is ten feet of water at the entrance, the same intimation being conveyed in the day time by a red flag hoisted on the cliff. On the eastern pier-head, in time of war, are four sixty-eight pound carronades, for the defence of the town and harbour; and on the inner pier is a neat stone building, in which the trustees and directors transact their business. There is also a dwelling-house for the harbour-master, and several watch-houses, and other buildings connected with this great work. A life-boat is suspended from the parapet, about the middle of the eastern pier, which has often been effectually employed in saving life. To defray the expenses of this establishment, certain dues are collected from British vessels passing the harbour to or from foreign parts, and coasters, which do not contribute to similar establishments in the ports to which they belong, viz., Dover, Lyme-Regis, Melcombe-Regis, Weymouth, and Great Yarmouth, pay an annual rate; foreign vessels also, if entering or passing the harbour, and bound to, or touching at, an English port, are liable to the payment of dues. All legal proceedings are carried on in the name of the Deputy Master of the Trinity House. A handsome stone staircase has been constructed up the side of the cliffs contiguous to the harbour, at each end of the town, by the trustees; that on the western side is particularly beautiful, as cending at right angles in a treble range of steps to the summit, and is named "Curtis' stairs." The harbour affords great convenience to the different steam-packets which arrive at this port in the summer, the inner landing being accessible to them at all times of the tide. There is also a dry dock, which is public property.

The town is beautifully situated on the declivity of a hill, opening south to the sea, and commands from many points very extensive marine and land views, the former embracing in clear weather the French coast. The recent buildings are generally handsome edifices, and amongst those which add more particularly to the beauty of the town may be mentioned, Albion Place, three crescents, and numerous detached villas. The streets are Macadamized and lighted with gas: the town is very indifferently supplied with water. Ramsgate, being a member of the port of Sandwich, the mayor of that place appoints his deputy, who acts here as constable, but the town is under the jurisdiction of magistrates appointed, under an act obtained in 1812, to act for the liberties of the cinque-ports; two of them are resident, but prisoners are committed to Sandwich gaol. A court of requests is held for the recovery of debts not exceeding £5, the jurisdiction of which extends over the parish of St. Lawrence. To the eastward of the harbour, in front of a range of chalk cliffs, and on a beach of soft reddish sand, are the bathing machines, every convenience being provided for sea-bathing. At the bath-house are four warm salt-water baths, and a plunging and shower bath, for either warm or cold water. The Isabella warm sea-water baths, which stand on the west cliff, one hundred and ten feet above the level of the sea, the water for which is raised through an aperture in the rock, by pumps worked by horses, are constructed of white marble; the vapour baths are upon the plan of the Hon. Mr. Cochrane, being heated by steam, which is conducted from the outside of the building, into a handsome vase in each dressing-room, and the temperature of which is varied at pleasure: there are well-conducted assemblies, and two good public libraries, and the boarding and lodging houses are generally of a superior character.

The rides and walks in the vicinity are pleasant and diversified, but the principal and most attractive promenade is the pier, which is not surpassed by any thing of the kind in the country. Pegwell bay, which abounds with shell and flat fish, is about one mile and a half west of the town. On the 25th of September, 1821, his late Majesty, George IV., embarked here for Calais, in his progress to Hanover, having been entertained the previous night at the residence of the late Sir William Curtis; and he also landed here on the following 8th of November, on his return, to commemorate which event the inhabitants, trustees of the harbour, and visitors, erected an obelisk at the entrance of the pier on the land side, on which is an appropriate inscription. The trade, which has been greatly improved by the erection of the harbour, consists of a large coasting trade, particularly in coal. Timber from the Baltic was formerly imported, but this branch of commerce has been discontinued. A considerable fishery is carried on off this coast, by large vessels from the westward, the choice fish being principally sent to the London market. Several small vessels belonging to the port are also similarly engaged, and are often efficaciously employed in rendering assistance to vessels in distress, particularly to those wrecked on the Goodwin sands, which lie about three miles and a half south-east by east from this place. Here are two spacious yards for ship-building, rope-walks, and warehouses furnishing every description of stores for the shipping. The market is on Wednesday and Saturday, and is frequently attended by French people bringing over eggs, fruit, and other articles. The living is a vicarage not in charge, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, and in the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The church, dedicated to St. George, is a handsome edifice, lately built, at an expense of £27,000, towards defraying which the parliamentary commissioners granted £9000. There is also a chapel of ease. Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists, have each a place of worship.

RAMSGRAVE, a township in the parish of BLACKBURN, lower division of the hundred of BLACKBURN, county palatine of LANCASTER, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Blackburn, containing 534 inhabitants.

RAMSHOLT, a parish in the hundred of WILFORD, county of SUFFOLK, 7 miles (S. S. E.) from Woodbridge, containing 174 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, endowed with a rent-charge of £16 per ann. private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty. J. Pennington, Esq. was patron in 1813. The church is dedicated to All Saints. The navigable river Deben runs on the west, where there is a dock.

RAMSHOPE, an extra-parochial district, in the southern division of COQUETDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $16\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Bellingham, containing 7 inhabitants. This wild region is separated from Scotland by Carter-fell, a mountainous ridge rising one thousand six hundred and two feet above the level of the sea. The Reedswire, a less stupendous barrier, extending from the former to Houndlaw, was, in 1575, the scene of a warm conflict between the English and the Scottish wardens, in which the former, who was the aggressor, being defeated and taken prisoner, was conveyed, with several of the border chieftains, to Dalkeith: the old ballad, called "The Battle of Reid Squair," was founded upon this affray.

RAMSHORN, a township in the parish of ELLASTONE, southern division of the hundred of TOTMONSLOW, county of STAFFORD, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Cheadle, containing 152 inhabitants.

RAMSYDE, or RAMPSIDE, a chapelry in the parish of DALTON in FURNESS, hundred of LONSDALE, north of the sands, county palatine of LANCASTER, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. by E.) from Dalton, with which the population is returned. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £1400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Dalton.

RANBY, a parish in the northern division of the wapentake of GARTREE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from Wragby, containing 121 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £4. 13. 4., endowed with £200 private benefaction, £1000 royal bounty, and £300 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Miss A. Otter. The church is dedicated to St. German.

RAND, a parish in the western division of the wapentake of WRAGGOE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Wragby, containing 102 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with Fulnetby, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £8. 5., and in the patronage of H. Hudson, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Oswald.

RANDS-GRANGE, a hamlet in that part of the parish of BEDALE which is in the eastern division of the wapentake of HANG, North riding of the county of YORK, 1 mile (N. W.) from Bedale. The population is returned with the township of Crakehall.

RANDWICK, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of WHITSTONE, county of GLOUCESTER, 2 miles (N. W. by W.) from Stroud, containing 984 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Standish. The church, dedicated to St. John, has recently undergone considerable improvement, a new chancel having been built by Lord Sherborne, and one hundred and seventy-nine sittings, of which one hundred and thirty-four are free, added to the original number, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having contributed £125 towards defraying the expense. There are places of worship for Wesleyan Methodists, and those in the connexion of the late Countess of Huntingdon. The Thames and Severn canal passes through the parish, in which the manufacture of woollen cloth is carried on. A school is endowed for forty poor children, who are taught by the parish clerk, to which a National school has been lately appended. There are also a school of industry for poor girls, and a small parochial library for the use of the poor. On a hill called "The Castles" are traces of an ancient settlement, supposed, from the discovery of a burial vault of stone, containing human remains, to be of Saxon origin; and in many parts of the parish have been found small balls of stone, rudely turned, indicative of some battle having been fought in the neighbourhood. A petrification, termed by geologists "calcareous taphur," abounds here; of this stone the ancient porch of the church is constructed. An annual festival is kept on Low-Monday: it is attended with a ridiculous custom, and is said to have originated in the dedication of the church.

RANGEWORTHY, a chapelry in the parish of THORNBURY, lower division of the hundred of THORNBURY, county of GLOUCESTER, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Wickwar, containing 296 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Thornbury. The chapel, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, is a small edifice, with a Norman south door. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

RANSKILL, a township in that part of the parish of BLYTH which is in the liberty of SOUTHWELL and SCROOBY, county of NOTTINGHAM, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S.) from Bawtry, containing 317 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Independents.

RANWORTH, a parish in the hundred of WALSHAM, county of NORFOLK, 4 miles (N. W.) from Acle, containing, with Panxworth, 352 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, with that of Upton united, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £4, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Ely. The church is dedicated to St. Helen.

RASEN (MARKET), a market town and parish in the southern division of the hundred of WALSHCROFT, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 12 miles (N. E.) from Lincoln, and 144 (N.) from London, containing 1166 inhabitants. This town is situated near the source of the river Ancholme, on a small stream, called the Rase, whence it derives its name, and has a very neat appearance: the surrounding country is beautiful and fertile. The market is on Tuesday; and a fair is held on the 25th of September. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £10, and in the patronage of the Crown: the incumbent is entitled to the tythe on ale brewed in this parish. The church, dedicated to St. Thomas, is a commodious edifice, with an embattled tower, the upper windows of which are of a curious form, having a pointed arch, divided into two pointed lights, and a quatrefoil head; a strong mullion runs up the centre, crossed by a transom, terminating at the impost. On the south side of the tower is a representation of Adam and Eve under a fruit tree, on the trunk of which is the dart of death. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists, also a Roman Catholic chapel. A National school was erected in 1822, at which period the revenue of the free grammar school, of unknown foundation, amounting to £25 per annum, was appropriated towards its support. Sir George St. Paul, of Snarford, having bequeathed £40 per annum, arising out of lands, for the support of eight poor bachelors or widowers, three of whom must be of this parish, and £100 towards the erection of an almshouse for them, the design was carried into effect by his widow, afterwards Countess of Warwick, who, at her own cost, furnished eight apartments, besides a chamber for the sick.

RASEN (MIDDLE), a parish in the southern division of the wapentake of WALSHCROFT, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 1½ mile (W. by N.) from Market-Rasen, containing, with Drakes, 508 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £7. 10. 10., endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Earl Brownlow. The church is dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

RASEN (WEST), a parish in the northern division of the wapentake of WALSHCROFT, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 3¼ miles (W.) from Market-Rasen, containing 210 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £19. 10. 10. The Rev. W. Cooper was patron in 1809. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

RASKELF, a chapelry in the parish of EASINGWOLD, wapentake of BULMER, North riding of the county of YORK, 2 miles (W. N. W.) from Easingwold, containing 440 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cleveland, and diocese of York, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Chester. The chapel is dedicated to St. Mary. There are two trifling endowments, applied for teaching six poor children.

RASTRICK, a chapelry in the parish of HALIFAX, wapentake of MORLEY, West riding of the county of YORK, 4½ miles (N.) from Huddersfield, containing 2796 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, endowed with £800 private benefaction, £800 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Halifax. The ancient chapel was taken down about forty years ago, and the present one, a handsome structure, erected upon its site. There is a place of worship for Independents. The manufacture of woollen cord and fancy goods is extensive. A free school, founded in 1741, by Mary Bedford, has been endowed by her and subsequent donors, with about £50 per annum.

RATBY, a parish in the hundred of SPARKENHOE, county of LEICESTER, 5 miles (W. by N.) from Leicester, containing, with the township of Botcheston with Newton, and the hamlet of Grooby, 1025 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Lord of the Manor of Grooby, rated in the king's books at £5. 5. 10., endowed with £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Earl of Stamford. The church is dedicated to St. Philip. On an eminence near the village are the remains of a large Roman encampment.

RATCHWOOD, a township in the parish of BAMBROUGH, northern division of BAMBROUGH ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 4½ miles (S. E. by S.) from Belford, containing 10 inhabitants.

RATCLIFFE, a hamlet in the parish of STEPNEY, Tower division of the hundred of OSSULSTONE, county of MIDDLESEX, 1 mile (E.) from London, containing 6973 inhabitants. The present name appears to be a corruption of Redcliff, an appellation derived from the red cliff, or bank of the river Thames, which flows southward of the parish. In Camden's time this was a village inhabited principally by seafaring men, but it is now much increased in size and population. "The Highway," a broad street formerly planted on each side with elm-trees, now consists of lines of houses, and extends to Limehouse. For a particular account of this place see the article on STEPNEY.

RATCLIFFE upon SOAR, a parish in the northern division of the wapentake of RUSHCLIFFE, county of NOTTINGHAM, 1½ mile (N. by E.) from Kegworth, containing 168 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Nottingham, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £10. 11. 3., endowed with £400 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £300 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Earl Howe. The church is dedicated to the Holy Trinity. The navigable river Soar runs through the parish, in which there is a mine of alabaster. Ratcliffe is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s.

RATCLIFFE on TRENT, a parish in the southern division of the wapentake of BINGHAM, county of NOTTINGHAM, 5½ miles (E. by S.) from Nottingham, containing 993 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Nottingham, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £4. 12. 6., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Earl Manvers. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, was rebuilt about 1793, prior to which the spire that surmounted the tower fell down, and has not been replaced. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The river Trent runs through the parish, and is fordable in two places. There is a wharf belonging to Earl Manvers, chiefly used for coal, at which the freeholders of Ratcliffe are allowed to land their goods wharfage free: the manufacture of hosiery is carried on here. Near the village is a perpendicular cliff of red clay, from which the parish took its name.

RATCLIFFE on the WREAK, a parish in the eastern division of the hundred of GOSCOTE, county of LEICESTER, $6\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Leicester, containing 124 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Leicester, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £7. 16. 8., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Botolph. The Fosse-road passes through the parish, and the Leicester and Melton-Mowbray canal touches upon its eastern boundary.

RATCLIFFE-CULEY, a chapelry in the parish of SHEEPY MAGNA, hundred of SPARKENHOE, county of LEICESTER, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N. E.) from Atherstone, containing 211 inhabitants.

RATHMILL, a township in the parish of GIGGLESWICK, western division of the wapentake of STAINCLIFFE and EWCROSS, West riding of the county of YORK, 4 miles (S. W. by S.) from Settle, containing 328 inhabitants. George Clarke, in 1716, devised the profits of an estate in support of a school, and, in 1725, Stephen Carr bequeathed £80 in augmentation of the master's salary: the annual income is about £23, for which all children who apply are taught to read, but pay for further instruction.

RATLEY, a parish in the Burton-Dassett division of the hundred of KINGTON, county of WARWICK, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. E.) from Kington, containing, with Upton, 402 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Coventry, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £6. 12., endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. About sixty poor children are educated at the vicarage-house, which is occupied by a schoolmaster rent-free, who receives £15 a year from the revenue of the poor's land. On the brow of Edge Hill, within this parish, is a large triangular fortification, called Nadbury Camp, supposed to be of Roman construction. This hill commands a delightful prospect of a fertile country in a high state of cultivation, including the Vale of Red Horse, which skirts its base: it is further celebrated, in the annals of history, as the scene of a sanguinary battle, between the royalists and the parliamentary forces, September 2nd, 1642, in which, though several hundreds were slain on both sides, and among them many of the nobility, both armies kept the field: numerous fragments of skeletons have been found in the vicinity.

RATLINGHOPE, a parish in the hundred of PURSLOW, county of SALOP, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Church-Stretton, comprising the townships of Gatton and Ratlinghope, and containing 277 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £3. 6. 8., endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Rev. J. Hawkins. The church is dedicated to St. Margaret. A priory of Augustine canons was founded here, under the auspices of Llewellyn, Prince of North Wales, by his kinsman, Walter Corbet, one of that order.

RATTERY, a parish in the hundred of STANBOROUGH, county of DEVON, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Totness, containing 559 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Totness, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £14. 10., and in the patronage of Sir H. Carew, Bart. The church has an elegant wooden screen, and a Norman font. A vein of lead-ore has been discovered in this parish.

RATTLES DEN, a parish in the hundred of THEDWESTRY, county of SUFFOLK, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W.) from Stow-Market, containing 1032 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Sudbury, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £20. 0. $2\frac{1}{2}$. James Oakes, Esq. was patron in 1808. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

RAUCEBY (NORTH), a parish in the wapentake of FLAXWELL, parts of KESTEVEN, county of LINCOLN, 4 miles (W.) from Sleaford, containing 252 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £5. 1. $0\frac{1}{2}$., endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Sir J. H. Thorold, Bart. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

RAUCEBY (SOUTH), a joint parish with North Rauceby, in the wapentake of FLAXWELL, parts of KESTEVEN, county of LINCOLN, 4 miles (W. by S.) from Sleaford, containing 255 inhabitants.

RAUGHTON, a joint township with Gatesgill, in the parish of DALSTON, ward and county of CUMBERLAND, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by W.) from Carlisle, containing 294 inhabitants.

RAUGHTON-HEAD, a chapelry in the parish of CASTLE-SOWERBY, LEATH ward, county of CUMBERLAND, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by W.) from Carlisle. The population is returned with the parish. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Carlisle, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Castle-Sowerby and twelve Trustees. The chapel was rebuilt in 1678, and enlarged in 1760. A school-house was erected, in 1744, by John Head, and rebuilt in 1806, but it is not endowed.

RAUNDS, a parish in the hundred of HIGHAM-FERRERS, county of NORTHAMPTON, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Higham-Ferrers, containing 1301 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £11. 9. 7., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, is a large and handsome edifice, with a lofty tower and spire, considered the finest specimen of the early English style in the county; similar characteristics predominate in the rest of the building, though there are some decorated windows and others of later date: in the churchyard is the base of an ancient cross. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyan Methodists.

RAVELEY (GREAT), a parish in the hundred of HURSTINGSTONE, county of HUNTINGDON, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W.) from Ramsey, containing 222 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, with Upwood, in the archdeaconry of Huntingdon, and diocese of Lincoln, and in the patronage of Earl Sandwich. The church is demolished. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

RAVELEY (LITTLE), a parish in the hundred of HURSTINGSTONE, county of HUNTINGDON, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Ramsey, containing 68 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Huntingdon, and diocese of Lincoln, endowed with £1200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Earl of Sandwich. The church is dedicated to St. James. Within the last few years several skeletons were dug up here in a gravel pit, and a Roman urn of blue earth.

RAVENDALE (EAST), a parish in the wapentake of BRADLEY-HAVERSTOE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 7 miles (S. S. W.) from Great Grimsby, containing, with the chapelry of West Ravendale, 95 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £5, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Trinity College, Cambridge. The church is dedicated to St. Martin.

RAVENDALE (WEST), a chapelry in the parish of EAST RAVENDALE, wapentake of BRADLEY-HAVERSTOE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Great Grimsby, containing 32 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Chapter of the Collegiate Church of Southwell.

RAVENFIELD, a parish in the southern division of the wapentake of STRAFFORTH and TICKHILL, West riding of the county of YORK, 4 miles (N. E. by E.) from Rotherham, containing 187 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Archdeacon of York, endowed with £31 per annum and £900 private benefaction, £800 royal bounty, and £900 parliamentary grant. The church is dedicated to St. James.

RAVENGLASS, a small sea-port and market town, in the parish of MUNCASTER, ALLERDALE ward above Darwent, county of CUMBERLAND, 54 miles (S. S. W.) from Carlisle, and 282 (N. W. by N.) from London. The population is returned with the parish. This town is pleasantly situated along the sea-shore, near the confluence of the rivers Eske, Mite, and Irt, which form a commodious and safe harbour for shipping, particularly in tempestuous weather. It consists of a long range of irregularly, though well, built houses, and is sheltered in the back ground by the mountains of Black Combe, between which and the town are some fine meadow lands; the Eske has its source near the foot of a rugged eminence, called Hard Knot. The trade of the place is inconsiderable, a few vessels being engaged in bringing coal from Whitehaven, for the lime-kilns, and in taking back oysters, which abound here, and are considered to be the finest found upon this part of the coast; a little corn and timber is also exported: some small vessels are constructed here. The market was formerly on Wednesday and Friday, but it is now held only on the former day, and is in very little repute: a fair for cattle is held on the 6th of May, and others of ancient date, for horses and cattle, on June 8th and August 5th; the latter, which terminates with horse races and other diversions, is proclaimed by the steward and tenantry of the Earl of Egremont, attended by a band of music and some halberdiers, in memory, probably, of the armed retinue which in former times attended to preserve from theft the goods exposed for sale. A small free school for poor children was endowed by Sir William Pennington, and Richard Brooksbank, his cook, with £12 per annum. Near the ruins of Walls castle, about one mile distant, where is now the mansion-house and residence of Lord Muncaster, a lineal descendant of the Penningtons, who have held this manor since the Conquest, many relics of antiquity, consisting of battle-axes made of flint, heads of arrows, and Roman and Saxon coins, have been discovered. About a mile and a half eastward from Muncaster House, on the opposite side of the river Eske, may be traced the ruins of an ancient city, called "the city of Barnscar," the origin of which is traditionally ascribed to the Danes, but of its history no records have been found. The site is an oblong square, about three hundred yards long from east to west, and one hundred long from north to south; it was intersected by one long street, and several transverse ones: the city was defended by a wall, except at the east end, and, with its suburbs, was nearly three miles in circumference: an ancient road led through it from Ulpha to Ravenglass. About 1730, a great quantity of silver coins was found in the ruins of one of the houses. On an eminence called Hard Knot are the ruins of an ancient church and castle, also the remains of a round tower on one of the adjacent mounts.

RAVENINGHAM, a parish in the hundred of CLAVERING, county of NORFOLK, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Beccles, containing 261 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Sir Edmund Bacon, Bart. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew. A college of eight Secular priests was founded here, in 1343, by Sir John de Norwich, which was afterwards removed to Norton-Subcourse, and, in 1393, to Castle-Mettingham in Suffolk.

RAVENSCROFT, a township in that part of the parish of MIDDLEWICH which is in the hundred of NORTHWICH, county palatine of CHESTER, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (N. by W.) from Middlewich, containing 26 inhabitants.

RAVENSDALE-PARK, a hamlet in the parish of MUGGINTON, hundred of APPLETREE, county of DERBY, containing 51 inhabitants.

RAVENSDEN, a parish in the hundred of BARFORD, county of BEDFORD, 4 miles (N. N. E.) from Bedford, containing 263 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Bedford, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £7, and in the patronage of the Duke of Bedford. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

RAVENSTHORPE, a parish partly in the hundred of GUILSBOROUGH, but chiefly in that of NOBOTTLE-GROVE, county of NORTHAMPTON, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W.)

by N.) from Northampton, containing, with the hamlets of Coaton and Teeton, 710 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £11. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Dean and Canons of Christ Church, Oxford. The church is dedicated to St. Denis. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

RAVENSTONE, a parish in the hundred of NEWPORT, county of BUCKINGHAM, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Olney, containing 418 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, endowed with the fee-farm rent of the manor of Ravenstone, amounting to about £84 per annum, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Earl of Winchilsea and Nottingham. The church, dedicated to All Saints, contains a splendid monument to the memory of Heneage Finch, Earl of Nottingham, and Lord High Chancellor of England, who died in 1682. Besides the gift of the above endowment, and another of £10 per annum towards ornamenting the church, his lordship founded an hospital for six men and six women, with a weekly allowance of three shillings and sixpence each, and a gown every year. A charity school was founded by the Rev. Mr. Chapman, a former vicar, for all the poor children of the parish: the income is £12 per annum. A small monastery of Black canons, in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary, was founded here by Henry III., about the thirty-ninth year of his reign, which, in the 16th of Henry VIII., was valued at £66. 13. 4., and given to Cardinal Wolsey, towards the endowment of his intended colleges.

RAVENSTONE, a parish partly in the hundred of REPTON and GRESLEY, county of DERBY, but chiefly in the western division of the hundred of GOSCOTE, county of LEICESTER, 4 miles (S. E. by E.) from Ashby de la Zouch, containing 444 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Derby, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £5. 1. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is a very ancient structure. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. An hospital for thirty-two aged widows of the parishes of Ravenstone, Swannington, and Coleorton, was built and endowed by John Wilkins, Esq. and Rebecca his wife, in 1712: the endowment consists of about eight hundred acres of land, producing an annual income of £940: each of the inmates receives four shillings and sixpence per week, besides a liberal allowance of coal; the master, or chaplain, has a salary of £60, and a good house, built in 1784, when the present chapel was erected, the expense having been defrayed from the accumulated funds of the charity. A National school is supported by voluntary contributions.

RAVENSTONEDALE, a parish in EAST ward, county of WESTMORLAND, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W.) from Kirkby-Stephen, containing 1059 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Earl of Lonsdale, as lord of the manor; it is endowed with £600 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £500 parliamentary grant. The church, dedicated to St. Oswald, was rebuilt in 1744. There is a place of worship for Independents. This manor formerly belonged to the priory of Watton in Yorkshire, and, in common with the other possessions of that monastery, afforded the privilege of sanctuary. The lord of the manor, by his steward, administers the oath of office to the churchwardens of the parish. The steward and jury of the manor anciently held their court, for the trial of felons and other offenders, in the church, near which there was an arched vault, in which malefactors were confined: Gallow Hill, a short distance hence, appears to have been the spot where capital punishment was inflicted. The parish is composed of numerous vallies and fells, among which rise several streams, forming the source of the river Lune. The town appears to have been formerly much larger than at present: a small market is held on Tuesdays, and a fair on the Thursday after Whitsunday. The free grammar school was founded, about 1688, by Thomas Fothergill, B. D., Master of St. John's College, Cambridge, aided by other members of his family, all natives of the parish: a good school-house was built by contribution in 1758. The salary and emoluments of the master amount to about £70 per annum: he has a commodious dwelling-house, and is allowed to receive boarders. Boys whose parents reside in the parish are instructed gratuitously in Latin and Greek, but pay a small quarterage for tuition in other branches. At a place called Rasate there are two tumuli, in which, on being opened, human bones were found; and near Rother bridge there is a circle of stones, supposed to have been a place of Druidical worship. The family of Fothergill has produced several distinguished members, among whom were, George Fothergill, D. D., principal of St. Edmund Hall, and Thomas Fothergill, D. D., Provost of Queen's College, Oxford.

RAVENSWORTH, a township in that part of the parish of CHESTER le STREET which is in the middle division of CHESTER ward, county palatine of DURHAM, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Gateshead, containing 161 inhabitants, who are chiefly employed in the adjacent coal mines. The total rebuilding of the castle commenced in 1808, after a design by Nash; the work is constructed of excellent white freestone, raised near the spot, and when finished will be a most imposing edifice in the ancient baronial style. In the neighbourhood is a cross, to which, during the prevalence of the plague at Newcastle, in 1645, the country people brought their market goods for sale. Ravensworth gives the title of baron to the family of Liddel.

RAVENSWORTH, a township in the parish of KIRKBY-RAVENSWORTH, western division of the wapentake of GILLING, North riding of the county of YORK, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Richmond, containing 317 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

RAVENSWORTH (KIRKBY), North riding of the county of YORK.—See KIRKBY-RAVENSWORTH.

RAW, a township in the parish of ROTHBURY, western division of COQUETDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Rothbury, containing 51 inhabitants.

RAWCLIFF, a chapelry in that part of the parish of SNAITH which is in the lower division of the wapentake of OSGOLDCROSS, West riding of the county of YORK, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. by N.) from Snaith, containing 1496 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, with that of Snaith, in the jurisdiction of the peculiar court of Snaith, endowed with £600 parliamentary grant. The chapel is dedicated to St. James. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The free school here is supposed to have been founded by a Mr. Boynton, for the education of eight children; the master's income is £27 a year, with a house and garden.

RAWCLIFFE, a township partly in the parish of St. Michael le Belfrey, city of York, and partly in the parish of St. Olave, Mary-Gate, wapentake of Bulmer, North riding of the county of York, 3 miles (N. W. by N.) from York. That part which is in the parish of St. Olave contains 57 inhabitants, the remainder being returned with the parish of St. Michael.

RAWCLIFFE (OUT), a township in the parish of St. Michael, hundred of Amonderness, county palatine of Lancaster, 4½ miles (N. E. by E.) from Poulton, containing 598 inhabitants.

RAWCLIFFE (UPPER), a joint township with Tarnicar, in the parish of St. Michael, hundred of Amonderness, county palatine of Lancaster, 6 miles (S. W. by W.) from Garstang, containing, with Tarnicar, 643 inhabitants.

RAWDEN, or RAWDON, a chapelry in the parish of Guisley, upper division of the wapentake of Sky-rack, West riding of the county of York, 7 miles (N. E. by N.) from Bradford, containing 1759 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, endowed with £400 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Lord of the Manor. The chapel, erected in 1721, has lately received an addition of three hundred and fifty sittings, of which one hundred and seventy-five are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £500 towards defraying the expense. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyan Methodists; the latter have a seminary at Woodhouse Grove. The manufacture of woollen goods is carried on to a considerable extent. A school-house was built, in 1746, by Thomas Layton, Esq., at which period £200, raised by subscription for its support, was invested in land, now producing an annual income of £10, which is paid to a master for teaching sixteen children. Rawdon gives the inferior title of baron to the Marquis of Hastings.

RAWLEIGH, a tything partly in the parishes of Bicton and Rockbear, eastern division of the hundred of Budleigh, and partly in the parish of Whimble, hundred of Clifton, county of Devon. The population is returned with the parishes.

RAWLEIGH (COLYTON), county of Devon. — See COLYTON-RAWLEIGH.

RAWMARSH, a parish in the northern division of the wapentake of Strafforth and Tickhill, West riding of the county of York, 2½ miles (N. by E.) from Rotherham, containing 1259 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £8. 7. 3½, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. Here is a manufacture of coarse earthenware. Thomas Wilson, in 1653, enfeoffed a school-house, messuage, and land, for the free education of poor children; the annual income, arising from this and various other gifts and bequests, is now about £62, for which from forty to fifty receive instruction.

RAWRETH, a parish in the hundred of Rochford, county of Essex, 3 miles (N. W.) from Rayleigh, containing 327 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Essex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £20. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Pembroke College, Cambridge. The church, dedicated to St. Nicholas, has lately received an addition of sixty free sittings, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £50 towards defraying the expense. A charity school is partly supported by contributions, averaging about £10 per annum.

RAYDON, a parish in the hundred of Samford, county of Suffolk, 3¼ miles (S. E. by S.) from Hadleigh, containing 501 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £14. The Rev. Thomas Reeve was patron in 1817. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

RAYLEIGH, a parish (formerly a market town) in the hundred of Rochford, county of Essex, 14 miles (S. E. by S.) from Chelmsford, and 34 (E. by N.) from London, containing 1203 inhabitants. This place, formerly the head of an honour, or barony, was at the Conquest in the possession of a Dane, named Sweyn, or Swene, who built a stupendous and magnificent castle, some ruins of which, with earth-works and ditches, yet remain, and from the eminence which they occupy is an extensive prospect of the surrounding country. The town is situated upon the shore of Hadley bay, and had formerly a market on Saturday: a cattle fair is held on Trinity-Monday. At King's hill is occasionally held what is termed the "Lawless Court." On the Wednesday morning next after Michaelmas-day, the tenants, or their agents, are bound to appear at the first cock-crowing, and, kneeling, offer their homage of suit and service. The steward of the court, at this dark hour of the night, in a low tone of voice, and without any previous notice, calls over the names of all who are bound to appear, and he who answers not, forfeits to the lord of the manor double his rent for every hour of his absence. All the business is transacted in whispers, and the use of pens and ink not being allowed, the deficiency is supplied by a coal. Some years ago, a tenant forfeited his land from non-attendance, but it was restored to him in consideration of a reasonable amercement. The penalties are said to have been originally imposed upon certain tenants of the adjacent manors, for having conspired in this place to raise a commotion. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Essex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £17. 17. 6., and in the patronage of R. Bristow, Esq. The church, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, has a tower with a low spire, and is principally in the later style of English architecture. There is a place of worship for Baptists. A small sum, arising from land bequeathed, in 1640, by Isaac Gilbert, and from £200 South Sea stock, left by Dr. Sykes, in 1756, is applied, according to the directions of the respective testators, to the instruction of twenty poor children.

RAYNE, a parish in the hundred of Hinckford, county of Essex, 1¾ mile (W.) from Braintree, containing 343 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Middlesex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £14. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Earl of Essex. The church is dedicated to All Saints; the nave is extremely ancient.

RAYNHAM, a parish in the hundred of CHAFFORD, county of ESSEX, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Purfleet, containing 573 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Essex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £10. J. C. G. Crosse, Esq. was patron in 1826. The church, dedicated to St. Helen and St. Giles, has some Norman remains, particularly the arch between the nave and the chancel, and an enriched semicircular doorway. The parish is bounded on the west and south by extensive marshes and the Thames. The Rev. Lewis Bruce, D.D., in 1779, left £2. 10. per annum for teaching poor children to read.

REACH, a joint chapelry with Heath, in the parish of LEIGHTON-BUZZARD, hundred of MANSHEAD, county of BEDFORD, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Leighton-Buzzard. The population is returned with Heath. It is within the peculiar ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the Prebendary of Leighton-Buzzard in the Cathedral Church of Lincoln.

REACH, a hamlet partly in the parish of BURWELL, hundred of STAPLOE, and partly in that of SWAFFHAM-PRIOR, hundred of STAINE, county of CAMBRIDGE, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Newmarket. The population is returned with the parishes. This was anciently a market town, to which ships of considerable burden had access before the draining of the fens: it had a church, which has long been demolished. A large fair for horses, granted to the corporation of Cambridge by charter of King John, is still held here on Rogation Monday.

READ, a township in that part of the parish of WHALLEY which is in the higher division of the hundred of BLACKBURN, county palatine of LANCASTER, 5 miles (S. S. E.) from Clitheroe, containing 510 inhabitants. Edmund Dickenson, in 1743, bequeathed £60 towards the support of a schoolmaster; and in 1798, James Hilton demised land, and a house to be used as a school; the income is about £6 a year, for which five poor children are taught free.

Arms.

READING, a borough and market town, having separate jurisdiction, locally in the hundred of Reading, county of BERKS, 26 miles (S. E. by S.) from Abingdon, and 39 (W. by S.) from London, on the road to Bath, containing, according to the last census, 13,264 inhabitants, since which period the population has increased to upwards of 16,000. This place, which is unquestionably of very great antiquity, is supposed to have derived its name either from the British word Redin, signifying fern, with which the soil abounded, or from Rhyd, a ford, and Ing, a meadow, which, from its situation on a tract of land intersected by the river Kennet, appears to be the more probable. It is noticed, in 871, by Asser, the biographer of Alfred, as a fortified town taken from the Saxons by the Danes, to which, after their defeat at Englefield, by Earl Ethelwolf, they retired, and were pursued by that Saxon nobleman, who was killed in attempting to take the town, in a sally of the besieged inhabitants. During the reign of Alfred, and occasionally in that of his successors, the Danes appear to have held possession of the town, which, on the invasion of Sweyn, King of Denmark, to revenge the massacre of his countrymen, in the reign of Ethelred, was burnt to the ground, in 1006, together with the nunnery founded there by Elfrida, in expiation of the murder of her step-son, Edward the Martyr. From this calamity it appears to have recovered prior to the Conquest, for in the Norman survey it is noticed as forming part of the royal demesne. In 1121, Henry I. founded a magnificent monastery, for monks of the Benedictine order, which he endowed with an ample revenue, and dedicated to the Holy Trinity, the Virgin Mary, and St. John the Evangelist. He invested it with the dignity of a mitred abbey, bestowed on the abbots the privilege of coining money, of conferring the honour of knighthood, and many other important privileges. Henry was a frequent visitor at the abbey during his life, and after his death was interred in the abbey church, as was also his consort, Adeliza. Stephen, his successor, erected a strong castle here, which, after having been one of his garrisons during his contest with Matilda, was, in 1153, given up to her son Henry, who, on his accession to the throne, ordered it, together with several other fortresses which had been erected in the preceding reign, to be demolished. This monarch, in 1163, presided at a judicial combat which took place here, on an island to the east of Caversham bridge, between Henry de Essex, the royal standard-bearer, and Robert de Montfort, who accused his antagonist of treasonable cowardice in a battle with the Welch near Chester. Essex being vanquished, his estates were forfeited to the crown, but his life being spared, he became a monk in this abbey. Henry II. visited the town on several other occasions, and in 1185 had an interview here with Herodius, patriarch of Jerusalem, who presented to him the keys of the holy sepulchre, and the royal banner of Jerusalem, and endeavoured, but without success, to induce him to undertake an expedition to recover Palestine from the Saracens. In 1209, the professors and students of Oxford, disgusted with the severity with which they had been treated by the king's officer, in a dispute with the townspeople, retired hither, where they continued to prosecute their studies, till, on expiation being made, they returned to their ancient seats. In 1212, a council was held by the legate of the Pope, for the purpose of effecting a reconciliation between King John and the bishops, whom he had driven into exile; and various civil and ecclesiastical councils were also held here in this and the following reign. Edward III. held a grand tournament here in 1346, and in 1359, his son, John of Gaunt, was married, in the abbey church, to Blanche, daughter and co-heiress of Henry Plantagenet, Duke of Lancaster. In 1389, a reconciliation was effected between Richard II. and his barons, through the mediation of John of Gaunt, who assembled here a great council for that purpose: in 1440, and 1451, parliaments were held in this town; and in 1452, and 1466, the grand parliament adjourned to this place from Westminster, on account of the plague. Henry VIII. frequently visited Reading, and in 1541 took up his residence for some time at the abbey. Edward VI., and the queens Mary and Elizabeth, were frequent visitors, and the latter had a canopied pew appropriated to her use in the parish church of St. Lawrence. In the beginning of the reign of Charles I., the courts of Chancery, King's Bench, and Common Pleas, with the court of Exchequer, and the courts of Wards and Liveries, were held at Reading, in Michaelmas term, in the year 1625, and again in 1635, in consequence of the prevalence of the plague, which was then raging in the metropolis, and a commission under the great seal, for putting in force the laws against the Popish recusants, was read in the courts here. At the commencement of the parliamentary war in this reign, the town was garrisoned for the parliament, but was abandoned by the governor on the approach of the royal forces in 1642; after which it was held by the king's troops, till taken for the parliament by the Earl of Essex, in the following year, after a siege of eight days. After the battle of Newbury, Essex marched to Reading, where he remained for two days; on his departure, it was again garrisoned for the king, who, on his visit in 1644, ordered the military works which had been erected, to be demolished: there are still many extensive remains of the outworks in the Forbury. The inhabitants suffered severely from the contributions levied by both parties, who had alternate possession of the town. In 1688, some Irish and Scottish troops belonging to the army of James II. were posted at Reading, from which they fled on the approach of the Dutch troops under the Prince of Orange; but returning soon after, a skirmish took place in the town, in which the only officer in the prince's army who lost his life in the expedition, was killed: the anniversary of this battle, which was called "Reading Fight," was annually commemorated till about the year 1788, when it was discontinued.

The town is pleasantly situated on the banks of the river Kennet, which, after passing through it, divides into two branches, uniting again previously to its confluence with the Thames. It is in the form of an equilateral triangle, and consists of four principal streets intersected by several smaller: the houses are in general well built of brick, and many of them are spacious and handsome; but there are several constructed of lath and plaster, with high gables, most of which are of the date of the fifteenth century, and were formerly roofed with thatch. The town is well paved, and lighted with gas by a company established by an act obtained in 1825, and amply supplied with water by a joint stock company, originally established in 1694, for the distribution of the water from the Kennet, by machinery, which has been greatly improved since the beginning of the present century, when a lofty brick tower was erected on the bank of the Kennet, and a large reservoir constructed at the upper end of Castle-street, for supplying that part of the town. In addition to the bridges over the different branches of the river, a handsome stone bridge of one arch, ornamented with balustrades, has been erected over the main stream in Duke-street, at the expense of the corporation; and at a small distance to the north-east of the town is another, called Blake's bridge. A public library is supported by subscription among the inhabitants of the town and neighbourhood, under the designation of the Reading Institution, comprising a library, reading-rooms, and a residence for the librarian: there is also a subscription news-room in High-street; and a Philosophical Institution is about to be established: there are commodious baths in London-street. The theatre, a small inconvenient building, erected a few years since, is open for a month or six weeks, annually, but is not well supported.

From its situation near the confluence of two navigable rivers, Reading has from an early period been a place of commercial importance. The manufacture of woollen cloth was introduced in the reign of Edward I.; and in the legendary history of the town, Thomas Cole, called Thomas of Reading, a rich clothier, is said to have obtained from that monarch a standard measure for cloth, the yard being fixed to the precise length of his Majesty's arm. Mr. John Kendrick, alias John à Larder, another eminent clothier in the town, to which he was a great benefactor, in 1624, bequeathed £7500 in trust to the mayor and burgesses, for building a house for the employment of the poor, which was soon afterwards carried into effect, at an expense of £2000: it forms a quadrangle, with a handsome gateway entrance, and the whole edifice, which was a great ornament to the town, obtained from some unknown cause the appellation of the "Oracle." In this establishment the woollen manufacture was carried on, for a considerable period, with success; but during the parliamentary war the building was converted into a dépôt for military stores, and the property was lost, with the exception of £500, which Mr. Kendrick had appropriated to be distributed in loans, without interest, to young tradesmen beginning business. After the manufacture of woollen cloth had declined, various other branches were carried on at the Oracle; among these were pin-making, the weaving of sheeting, sail-cloth, and sacking, and the manufacture of floor-cloth. The weaving of coarse linen is carried on here to a small extent; and there are manufactories for silk ribands and galloons, which afford employment to from two to three hundred persons, and for floor and sail-cloth: there are also iron-foundries, breweries, and several yards for building boats. The trade of the town, however, is principally in flour, of which twenty thousand sacks are annually sent to London; wheat, oats, beans, peas, and various kinds of seeds; malt, the business in which has been for some time declining; and oak-bark, timber, hoops, wool, cheese, and beer, &c. The river is navigable for barges of one hundred and twenty tons' burden, and on its banks are wharfs for landing goods, &c. A new wharf and dock were constructed in 1828, on the bank of the Kennet; over which river, in 1830, an iron bridge was completed, on the line of the great western road. The river Kennet, and the Kennet and Avon canal, open a navigable communication with the principal parts of the kingdom. In 1800, a canal was designed by Mr. Rennie, in consequence of the difficult navigation of the Kennet, in part of its course, to the west of the town; but it has not been yet so far completed as to afford all the advantages anticipated. The market days are Wednesday and Saturday, the former for fruit, vegetables, butter, and poultry, and the latter for corn and provisions, which is very numerously attended. The corn market is held in the market-place, a convenient area, of which three sides are occupied by shops, and the fourth by the church of St. Lawrence: these shops are kept in repair by the corporation, who are entitled to the toll of one pint out of each sack of corn sold in the market. The market for provisions is held in a quadrangular building, with a portico, including shambles, shops, and stalls, and a residence for the clerk of the market, who is generally one of the serjeants at mace: there is also, on Saturday, a market for cattle and store pigs; and a market every Monday for fat cattle, at Loddon bridge, about four miles distant, on the road to Wokingham. The fairs are on February 2nd, May 1st, July 25th, and September 21st; the three first, principally for horses and cows, and the last, which is also a statute fair, for cattle and cheese, the latter chiefly from Gloucestershire and North Wiltshire, of which, at the fair in 1830, seven hundred tons were pitched for sale; the cheese fair is held in that part of the Forbury which faces the grammar school.

The town, which is a borough by prescription, has received a succession of charters, from the reign of Henry III. to that of Charles I., the whole of which are in excellent preservation, and the seals nearly perfect: the charter of Henry VII. is splendidly illuminated and emblazoned, the initial letter containing a portrait of that monarch. Under the last of these charters, as modified in the last year of the reign of George IV., the government is vested in a mayor, high steward, recorder, and thirteen aldermen, including the mayor and common council, consisting of nine capital and sixteen inferior burgesses, assisted by a town clerk, two chamberlains, three serjeants at mace, and subordinate officers. The mayor is elected annually, on the first Monday after St. Bartholomew's day, by the aldermen and burgesses, from three candidates nominated by the former body: the mayor, his deputy, the senior alderman, the Bishop of Salisbury, and his chancellor, are justices of the peace for the borough. The corporation formerly held quarterly courts of session for the trial of all but capital offenders; they at present hold a court of record every Wednesday, under the charter of Charles I., for the recovery of debts under £10. The inhabitants are exempt from serving on juries at the assizes and sessions for the county, and from the payment of county rates. The borough has continued to return two members to parliament from the 23rd of Edward I. to the present time: the right of election is vested in the freemen paying scot and lot, and in the inhabitants not receiving alms, of whom the number is about one thousand two hundred and fifty: the mayor is the returning officer. The old town hall was taken down in 1786, and a handsome building erected over part of the free grammar school: adjoining it is the council-chamber, a handsome room in which the borough courts are held, and which is decorated with a portrait of Queen Elizabeth, a bust of Archbishop Laud, finely painted, and portraits of Sir Thomas White and Mr. Kendrick. The portrait of Elizabeth is considered, by Mr. Hanshall, who is now preparing a History of Reading for the press, to be by Hans Holbein, and the painting of Laud is esteemed an admirable production; but these, and indeed all the portraits, are in a very dirty state. The petty sessions for the division are held here every Saturday; the spring assizes and the Epiphany sessions for the county are regularly held in the town; and the Michaelmas sessions are held alternately here and at Abingdon, at the discretion of the magistrates. The gaol and house of correction for the county, adapted to the reception of one hundred and sixty prisoners, contains a good house for the keeper, a room for the meeting of the magistrates, a chapel, and an infirmary, and comprises five day-rooms and airing-yards for male prisoners in the gaol and bridewell, and five day-rooms and airing-yards for females; a tread-mill with four wheels, and a large shop for employing prisoners not committed to hard labour, who receive on their discharge one-fifth of their earnings: prisoners committed for offences within the borough are now confined in this gaol.

The town comprises the parishes of St. Giles, St. Lawrence, and St. Mary, in the archdeaconry of Berks, and diocese of Salisbury. The living of St. Giles' is a vicarage, rated in the king's books at £14. 17. 3½., and in the patronage of the Crown: the church, an ancient structure, having been much damaged during the parliamentary war, was subsequently repaired, and the tower, which had been destroyed, was rebuilt, with the addition of a slender spire of wood cased with copper: in 1829 it underwent a thorough repair, and received an addition of six hundred and eighty-five sittings, of which four hundred and twenty-four are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £500 towards defraying the expense. The living of St. Lawrence's is a vicarage, rated in the king's books at £10, and in the patronage of the President and Fellows of St. John's College, Oxford: the church, which was rebuilt in the fifteenth century, is a spacious structure, in the later style of English architecture, with a beautiful tower of chequered flints: the interior, which is well arranged, contains a mural monument with a bust of John Blagrave, an eminent mathematician, who died in 1611. The living of St. Mary's is a vicarage, rated in the king's books at £11. 12. 3½., and in the patronage of the Crown: the church was rebuilt about the year 1550, chiefly with the materials of the abbey, which was demolished about that time; it is a plain massive structure, in the later style of English architecture, with a square tessellated tower of flint and stone: two hundred and ten additional sittings have been erected, of which one hundred are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having contributed £60 towards defraying the expense. In the parish of St. Lawrence was formerly a chapel, founded and endowed, in 1284, by Lawrence Burgess, bailiff of the borough, and dedicated to St. Edmund; having been desecrated previously to the year 1479, it was used as a barn, and during the parliamentary war turned into a fort; in 1750, it was taken down, and rebuilt at Battle farm, but was destroyed by fire within about twenty years since. A chapel of ease to the vicarage of St. Mary's has been erected, by the Rev. George Hulme, on the north side of the road to Oxford. There are three places of worship for Baptists, two for Independents, and one each for the Society of Friends and Wesleyan Methodists, also a Roman Catholic chapel; and in Castle-street is a chapel, erected, in 1798, by the congregation formerly under the pastoral care of the Hon. and Rev. Bromley Cadogan, now supplied by a minister in the Connexion of the late Countess of Huntingdon. The free grammar school was founded by Abbot Thorne, in the reign of Henry VII., and endowed with the revenue of the decayed hospital of St. John, from which, at the dissolution, a grant of £10 per annum was given for the support of the school, which, since the charter of Elizabeth, has been paid by the corporation. Archbishop Laud gave £20 per annum for augmenting the master's salary, and a house for his residence was, in 1785, purchased by subscription: two fellowships in St. John's College, Oxford, were founded and endowed by Sir Thomas White, for persons educated in this school. The Blue-coat school, for the maintenance, clothing, and education of boys, was founded, in 1646, by Richard Aldworth, Esq., who endowed it with £4000; in addition to which, Sir Thomas Rich, Bart. gave £1000, in 1666, for six additional boys, of which three were to be from the parish of Sonning. Mr. John Hall gave lands for the instruction of three boys; John West, Esq. gave £1000, in 1720, for educating and apprenticing two boys; W. Malthus, Esq., a rent-charge of £91, for eleven boys; and Mr. John Pottenger, £15 per annum, for two boys: the whole income at present exceeds £1000 per annum: there are forty-seven boys on the foundation, who, with the exception of the three under Sir Thomas Rich's endowment, who are appointed by the landholders in the parish of Sonning, are nominated by the corporation, who appoint the master, with a salary of £50 per annum, and maintenance for himself, his wife, and one servant, for whose wages he is allowed £6 more. The girls' green school, in the parish of St. Lawrence, was founded, and is supported, by subscription, for the maintenance, clothing, and education of girls, of whom twenty-one are now in the school: this establishment has an income of £132 per annum, arising from property in the funds: the mistress has a salary of £63. 10. per annum. A school for teaching very young children to read was founded, in 1714, by Mr. Joseph Neale, who endowed it with £11 per annum. A Sunday school, founded in 1810, by Edward Simeon, Esq., who endowed it with £2500, is under the control of the corporation: in this establishment one hundred and fifty-one boys and one hundred and ninety-seven girls are instructed, and partly clothed every alternate year. A school of industry was instituted under the patronage of Mrs. Cadogan; a National school, held in what was formerly the great hall of the abbey, in which is preserved part of a sarcophagus, supposed to be that of the founder, Henry I.; and a Lancasterian school, in Southampton-street, are supported by subscription: in the former, three hundred and eighty boys and one hundred and eighty girls; and in the latter, one hundred and sixty boys and one hundred and twenty girls, receive instruction.

Alms-houses in St. Mary's Butts were founded, in 1477, by John à Larder, by whom they were endowed for eight aged persons, who receive each one shilling and eightpence per week: they were rebuilt by the corporation in 1775. The alms-houses in St. Giles' parish, founded in 1617, by Mr. Barnard Harrison, and lately rebuilt by the corporation, have a trifling endowment. An alms-house was founded, in 1634, by Mr. William Kendrick, for four aged men and one woman, of the parishes of St. Lawrence and St. Giles; the former have an allowance of one shilling and sixpence, and the latter of one shilling, per week, with some gratuities. Alms-houses founded in the same year, by Sir Thomas Vachell, for six aged unmarried men, have an endowment of £40 per annum: those in St. Mary's parish were founded, in 1647, by Mr. Richard Jeys, who endowed them, for four aged women, with lands producing about £5 per annum: an alms-house for four aged widows of the parish of St. Lawrence was founded, in 1653, by Mr. John Webb, who endowed it with funds producing a small weekly stipend: alms-houses founded by Mr. John Hall, in 1696, for five aged and unmarried women, are endowed with a rent-charge of £25; and, in 1624, Mr. Griffith Jenkins gave five houses, as rent-free dwellings, for poor persons of the parishes of St. Lawrence and St. Mary. Archbishop Laud bequeathed £100 per annum to be appropriated for two successive years to the apprenticing of ten poor boys, and every third year to be divided in marriage portions among five poor maidens, natives of Reading: there are various other bequests of a similar nature, and for other charitable uses. The dispensary was established in 1802, and is liberally supported by subscription. Of the ancient castle erected by Henry I. there is not the slightest vestige, nor can the site of it be traced; the only memorial is preserved in the name of Castle-street, near which it is supposed to have stood. Of the magnificent abbey, erected by the same founder, and which, with the conventual buildings, extended nearly half a mile in circuit, there remain only the abbey gate, a fine specimen of the early Norman style of architecture, and in tolerable preservation, and some vestiges in the abbey mill; the walls, which were eight feet in thickness, have been stripped of their casings, and present only a mass of ruins, with the exception of that part of the hall in which the National school is held: a considerable portion of the materials of the conventual church was used in building the parish church of St. Mary; the principal ornaments were removed for the decoration of Field Marshal Conway's seat, Park Place, near Henley; and a great part of the remaining materials was employed in constructing the great arch over which the Walgrave road is carried. A convent of Franciscan friars was anciently established here, of which there are no remains; and, previously to the year 1400, a convent of Grey friars was founded, on the north side of Castle-street, of which part of the church, with its beautiful west window, is still remaining, and the lavatory is preserved in the pleasure grounds of a house erected on the conventual lands, by Mr. Austwick, the late mayor. An hospital, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene, for twelve leprous persons and a chaplain, was founded here, in 1134, by Aucherius, second abbot of Reading; and in 1190, Hugh, the eighth abbot, founded an hospital for twenty-six poor brethren, and for the entertainment of pilgrims and travellers, for the maintenance of which he appropriated the church of St. Lawrence. Among the eminent natives of this town were, William of Reading, Archbishop of Bourdeaux in the reign of Henry III.; and Archbishop Laud, the principal minister of Charles I., and one of the earliest victims of that period: he was beheaded on Tower Hill, in 1644.

REAGILL, a hamlet (formerly a chapelry) in the parish of CROSBY-RAVENSWORTH, WEST ward, county of WESTMORLAND, 3 miles (N. E.) from Shap. The population is returned with the parish. There are no vestiges of the chapel, except in the names of certain enclosures, such as Chapel-Garth, Chapel-Lands, &c. The Rev. Randal Sanderson, in 1733, left £120 for the erection of a free school here, to which the commissioners, on the enclosure of waste lands in 1803, awarded an allotment now let for £25 per annum, for the support of the master, who also receives an annuity of £5, the donation of William Twaytes, Esq.: thirty children are instructed.

REARSBY, a parish in the eastern division of the hundred of GOSCOTE, county of LEICESTER, $7\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Leicester, containing 451 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Leicester, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £17. 9. 7., and in the patronage of the Rev. N. Morgan. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Two trifling bequests by the Rev. John Orton and Mrs. Faunt are applied for teaching poor children.

REAVELEY, a township in the parish of INGRAM, northern division of COQUETDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $7\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. by E.) from Wooler, containing 74 inhabitants.

RECULVER, a parish in the hundred of BLEANGATE, lathe of ST. AUGUSTINE, county of KENT, 10 miles (N. E. by N.) from Canterbury, containing 266 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Hoath annexed, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £9. 12. $3\frac{1}{2}$. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a handsome structure in the early style of English architecture, with two towers at the west end, each surmounted by a spire; it has received considerable damage from encroachments of the sea: it was founded some time in the seventh century, together with a monastery for Black canons, by one Basse, upon land granted to him by Egbert, King of Kent; in 949, King Eadred annexed it to Christ Church in Canterbury; yet it seems to have been afterwards of some note, being under the government of a dean, in 1030. There are considerable remains of Regulbium, a Roman fort, within the walls of which the royal palace of Ethelbert and the monastery before mentioned were erected. Roman coins, tessellated pavements, cellars, cisterns, fibulæ, and a variety of trinkets, with some British and Saxon coins, have been discovered. By the fall of the cliff at different times, lumps of metal have been met with, seeming to indicate the destruction of the place by fire.

REDBOURN, a parish in the hundred of CASHIO, or liberty of ST. ALBAN'S, county of HERTFORD, 17 miles (W.) from Hertford, containing 1784 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of St. Alban's, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £16. 5., and in the patronage of the Earl of Verulam. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, stands about a mile west from the village, and is approached by a fine avenue of elms. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists. Here was a cell of Benedictine monks from St. Alban's, dedicated to St. Amphibalus the Martyr and his companions. Fairs are held on the Wednesday after New Year's day, Wednesday in Easter-week, and Wednesday at Whitsuntide.

REDBOURN, a parish in the eastern division of the wapentake of MANLEY, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Kirton, containing 270 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Stow, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £5. 10., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Duke of St. Albans. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew; part of the tower is ancient, and the rest of the building modern.

REDBRIDGE, a hamlet in the parish of MILLBROOK, hundred of BUDDLESGATE, Fawley division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Southampton. The population is returned with the parish. This is an extensive and populous village of very remote origin; according to Bede's ecclesiastical history, its original name was Reodford, afterwards changed to Rodbridge, now by corruption Redbridge, probably from an ancient bridge which here crosses the Test. Here was a monastery in the infancy of the Saxon church; and, in 687, Cynbreth, at that time abbot, converted and baptized the two brothers of Arvandus, Prince of the Isle of Wight, preparatory to their execution by command of Ceadwalla, King of Essex. The village is situated at the head of the Southampton water, and the Andover canal terminates at it. There is a considerable trade in the importation of coal, and in exporting timber and corn. Ship-building affords employment to several persons, and there is a large brewery.

REDCAR, a chapelry in the parish of MARSK, eastern division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, North riding of the county of YORK, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N.) from Guilsbrough, containing 673 inhabitants. The chapel, which has been recently erected, contains seven hundred sittings, of which three hundred and fifty are free, the Incorporated Society for promoting the building of additional churches, &c., having granted £500 towards defraying the expense. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Redcar is bounded on the north-east by the North sea, the coast of which is extremely rocky and dangerous to mariners, but the number of lives lost by shipwreck has greatly diminished since the establishment of a life-boat here in 1802. Formerly the place contained only a few fishermen's huts, but of late years it has become the resort of many genteel families, for the purpose of sea-bathing, and the fisheries are now prosecuted with ardour and success. The village contains some excellent inns, and good private lodging-houses, for the accommodation of visitors during the summer months, but in winter it exhibits a somewhat dreary aspect, from the vast quantity of sand which the wind drifts from the beach into the streets.

REDDENHALL, a parish in the hundred of EARSHAM, county of NORFOLK, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (E. N. E.) from Harleston, containing, with Harleston, 1641 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £20, and in the patronage of the Duke of Norfolk, on the nomination of the Bishop of Norwich. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is in the later style of English architecture: at the end of the north aisle is a sepulchral chapel of the family of Gawdy, dedicated to the Assumption of the Virgin Mary, and containing many ancient monuments. Wm. Sancroft, in 1688, gave £900 for founding a public school, to which John Dove, in 1712, bequeathed £200.

REDDISH, a township in the parish of MANCHESTER, hundred of SALFORD, county palatine of LANCAS-TER, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by S.) from Manchester, containing 574 inhabitants.

REDDITCH, a chapelry in that part of the parish of TARDEBIGG which is in the upper division of the hundred of HALFSHIRE, county of WORCESTER, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Bromsgrove. The population is returned with the parish. This flourishing village, which has the appearance of a small market town, is pleasantly situated on a commanding eminence near the Warwickshire border, on the new line of road from London to Birmingham, and contains, besides a neat modern chapel of ease, places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. The principal articles of manufacture, for which it has long been famous, are needles and fish-hooks, which have been brought to perfection, and afford employment to about four thousand persons in the village and neighbourhood. There are fairs for cattle, on the first Monday in August, and third Monday in September, and it is in contemplation to petition the legislature for the privilege of holding a weekly market. A National school is attended by about ninety boys, and supported by the Earl of Plymouth, who has an elegant mansion in the vicinity, and holds a court leet annually in October, as lord of the manor, at which a constable and other officers are appointed. A Cistercian abbey of considerable note formerly existed at Bordesley, near this place, some slight remains of which may still be traced: it was founded, in 1138, by the Empress Matilda, in honour of the Blessed Virgin, and was valued at the dissolution at £392. 8. 6., when it was granted to Lord Windsor, one of the ancestors of the present Earl of Plymouth.

REDGRAVE, a parish in the hundred of HARTISMERE, county of SUFFOLK, 2 miles (N. E. by N.) from Botesdale, containing 713 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, with Botesdale, in the archdeaconry of Sudbury, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £25. 7. 1. G. St. Vincent Wilson, Esq. was patron in 1802. The church, dedicated to St. Botolph, has a steeple of white brick, recently erected, and is adorned with several fine monuments of considerable beauty of design and execution, particularly that of the celebrated Lord Keeper, Sir Nicholas Bacon, and another to the eminent Lord Chief Justice, Sir John Holt, both of whom resided here. A free grammar school for six boys was founded, in 1651, by Sir Nicholas Bacon, who endowed it with a rent-charge of £30, and a dwelling-house for the master, whose salary is £20, and the usher's £8; the residue being appropriated for repairs. There is also a trifling sum for the education of children, left by Mary Foster in 1686. Cardinal Wolsey was rector of this parish.

REDISHAM, a parish in the hundred of WANGFORD, county of SUFFOLK, 5 miles (N. N. E.) from Halesworth, containing 156 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Earl of Gosford. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

REDISHAM (LITTLE), county of SUFFOLK.—See RINGFIELD.

REDLINGFIELD, a parish in the hundred of HARTISMERE, county of SUFFOLK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Eye, containing 222 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Sudbury, and diocese of Norwich, endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £800 royal bounty. A. Adair, Esq. was patron in 1825. A Benedictine nunnery, in honour of St. Andrew, was founded here, in 1120, by Manasses, Earl of Ghisness, and Emma his wife, the revenue of which, at the dissolution, was valued at £81. 2. 5.

REDLYNCH, a chapelry in the parish and hundred of BRUTON, county of SOMERSET, 2 miles (S. E. by S.) from Bruton, containing 93 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to that of Bruton, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant. The chapel is dedicated to St. Peter. Redlynch gives the inferior title of baron to the Earl of Ilchester.

REDMAIN, a joint township with Blindcrake and Isall, in the parish of ISALL, ALLERDALE ward below Darwent, county of CUMBERLAND, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Cockermouth. The population is returned with Isall.

REDMARLEY-D'ABITOT, a parish in a detached portion of the lower division of the hundred of OSWALDSLOW, county of WORCESTER, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by S.) from Ledbury, containing 955 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, rated in the king's books at £16. 10. $7\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of Mrs. Nillet. The church, dedicated to St. Bartholomew, has been much modernised; the font is circular and very ancient. There is a trifling sum, the bequest of William Church, in 1727, for teaching poor children.

RED-MARSHALL, a parish in the south-western division of STOCKTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, comprising the chapelries of Carleton and Stillington, and the township of Red-Marshall, and containing 264 inhabitants, of which number, 75 are in the township of Red-Marshall, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Stockton upon Tees. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Durham, rated in the king's books at £17. 18. $1\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Durham. The church, dedicated to St. Cuthbert, has a massive western tower, a Norman arch leading into the chancel, and on the south side of it three stone stalls, opposite to which is an arched recess. The rectory-house appears to have been once fortified, an embattled tower still remaining.

REDMILE, a parish in the hundred of FRAMLAND, county of LEICESTER, $12\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. by E.) from Melton-Mowbray, containing 411 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Leicester, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £12. 9. 2., and in the patronage of the Duke of Rutland. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. The Grantham canal crosses the parish on the north-west side.

REDMIRE, a chapelry in the parish of WENSLEY, western division of the wapentake of HANG, North riding of the county of YORK, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Middleham, containing 399 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to that of Bolton, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Rector of Wensley. The chapel is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The Rev. Thomas Baynes, in 1725, founded a free school and endowed it with lands and tenements now producing an annual income of about £19, for which fourteen children are instructed. The lead mines formerly in operation here have been almost exhausted, but calamine is got in abundance. Coal also is obtained in the neighbourhood; and there is a fine spring strongly impregnated with sulphur, with convenient well for bathing, the water having been found efficacious in the cure of rheumatism, scurvy, and weakness of sight.

REDRUTH, a market town and parish in the hundred of PENWITH, county of CORNWALL, 49 miles (S. W. by W.) from Launceston, and $262\frac{3}{4}$ (W. S. W.) from London, containing 6607 inhabitants. This ancient town, originally called Uny, subsequently received the appellation of Dre druth, or "Druids' town," of which its present name is evidently an abbreviation. It appears to have existed previously to the division of the kingdom into parishes, and to have been a central point for the exercise of the religious rites of the ancient Britons, of which the adjacent rocks, basins, circles, and erect stones, with numerous remains of cromlechs, cairns, and other objects of superstitious veneration, are standing memorials; especially one rock, formerly the scene of human sacrifices, and therefore called "the Sacrificing Rock." The town is situated on the brow of a hill in the midst of the mining district, and consists chiefly of one long street, which is indifferently paved, lighted with gas, and supplied with water from a spring near Trefula. A small theatre is open occasionally, and there is a subscription reading-room. A savings bank has been recently erected; it is a handsome edifice, with a colonnade in front. The prosperity of this place, and the rapid increase of its population, have been eminently promoted by the discovery of extensive tin and copper mines in its neighbourhood, the produce of which is said to realize nearly a million sterling per annum. Sales of copper-ore are held weekly by ticket, and there are several very extensive stores of gunpowder, tools, and other articles, for the use of the miners; some hats are manufactured here. A railroad, about nine miles in length, recently constructed, under the provisions of an act obtained in 1824, from Point quay, in Restrongeth creek, to this town, and also communicating with a branch of the river Fal, facilitates the exportation of ore, and the conveyance of timber and coal, for the supply of the mines, and for general purposes. A market and two annual fairs were granted by charter of Charles II., and a third fair by Henry VII. Markets are now held on Tuesday and Friday, the latter of which is a great corn market, especially for oats. Fairs are on Easter-Tuesday, May 2nd, August 3rd, and October 12th, chiefly for cattle; the tolls and dues of the markets, and of the fairs in May and August, also those of a fair commonly called Roast Goose fair, belong to Lord De Dunstanville, who, as lord of the manor, appoints examiners of weights and measures. A market-house, shambles, and other buildings, have been recently erected, at the expense of his lordship. At the entrance to the market-place is a handsome square stone tower, built on arches, and ornamented with a clock, having four dial plates, which is lighted with gas, on the east and west sides.

The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £20, and in the patronage of Lord De Dunstanville. The church, which is dedicated to St. Uny, and situated about half a mile from the town, near the foot of Carn-Brea Hill, was rebuilt about 1770, and consists of a nave, with a flat ceiling supported by pillars. A chapel of ease, in the ancient style of English architecture, has been erected by subscription, aided by a grant from the commissioners for building churches and chapels; but is yet in an unfinished state. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, and Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists. A free grammar school was built by subscription in 1803, and supported for some time by voluntary contributions, but is now used only for pay-scholars. On the eastern side of Carn-Brea Hill are the ruins of a castle, parts of which are of great antiquity. At the village of Plain an Quarry, in this parish, are the remains of one of those circles in which the ancient plays were performed. The application of gas to the purposes of domestic light, as a substitute for candles and oil, was first made here, by Mr. Murdock, and afterwards successfully introduced by him into the Soho foundry at Birmingham.

REDWICK, a tything in that part of the parish of HENBURY which is in the lower division of the hundred of HENBURY, county of GLOUCESTER, 6 miles (S. W. by W.) from Thornbury, containing, with the chapelry of Northwick, 257 inhabitants. It is within the peculiar jurisdiction of the Bishop of Bristol.

REDWICK, a chapelry in the parish of MAGOR, lower division of the hundred of CALDICOTT, county of MONMOUTH, 8 miles (E. by S.) from Newport, containing 238 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Magor, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaff, endowed with £400 royal bounty. The chapel is dedicated to St. Thomas.

REDWORTH, a township in the parish of HEIGHINGTON, south-eastern division of DARLINGTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, 7 miles (N. N. W.) from Darlington, containing 307 inhabitants. Here are the remains of a Danish fortification, called Shackleton, surrounded with triple embankments.

REED, a parish in the hundred of ODSEY, county of HERTFORD, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (W. by N.) from Barkway, containing 214 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, consolidated, in 1800, with the vicarage of Barkway, in the archdeaconry of Middlesex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £13.6.8. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, has a square embattled tower of flint.

REED, a parish in the hundred of THINGOE, county of SUFFOLK, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Bury-St. Edmunds, containing 239 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Sudbury, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £2.18.1 $\frac{1}{2}$, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to All Saints. A National school, recently established here, is supported by a bequest from Thomas Sparke, in 1721, producing an annual income of £12, with some other smaller benefactions: about twenty-six children are instructed by a schoolmistress, who also superintends a Sunday school.

REEDHAM, a parish in the hundred of WALSHAM, county of NORFOLK, 6 miles (S. by E.) from Acle, containing 437 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with the vicarage of Freethorpe annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £18. The Rev. John Love was patron in 1801. The church is dedicated to St. John the Baptist. The Danish king Lothbroc, when driven by stress of weather upon the coast of East Anglia, landed at this place.

REEDLY-HALLOWS, a joint township with Filly-Close and New Laund-Booth, in that part of the parish of WHALLEY which is in the higher division of the hundred of BLACKBURN, county palatine of LANCASTER, 2 miles (N. N. E.) from Burnley, containing, with Filly-Close and New Laund-Booth, 422 inhabitants.

REEDNESS, a township in the parish of WHITGIFT, lower division of the wapentake of OSGOLDCROSS, West riding of the county of YORK, 6 miles (S. E. by S.) from Howden, containing 683 inhabitants. John Wressel, in 1795, bequeathed a rent-charge of £15, for teaching twelve children of this and the neighbouring townships. Reedness is within the jurisdiction of the peculiar court of Snaith.

REEPHAM, a parish in the wapentake of LAWRESS, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Lincoln, containing 247 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Stow, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Master and Wardens of the Mercers' Company, London. The church is dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul.

REEPHAM, a market town and parish in the hundred of EYNSFORD, county of NORFOLK, 12 miles (N. W. by N.) from Norwich, and 116 (N. E. by N.) from London, containing 345 inhabitants. This town is situated on an elevation near the small river Eyne, and is neat and well built; in the market-place are several good houses, which are fronted by a row of evergreens. The chief trade is in malt, and there is an extensive brewery. The market, obtained by charter of Edward I., is on Wednesday; and there is a fair for horses and toys on June 29th; both, for the sake of convenience, are held at Hackford. The living is a discharged rectory, with Kerdeston, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £18. 1. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Rev. John Mathew. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, contains some ancient monuments, and, formerly, a celebrated image of the Virgin, which became an object of general attraction, and was much enriched by the offerings of religious votaries; there were formerly three fine churches within one enclosure, one for the town, and two for the lordships of Whitwell and Hackford; that belonging to Hackford was burnt down in 1600, the steeple only remaining, which was taken down about thirty-two years ago. The living of Whitwell is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, and in the patronage of George Hunt Holley, Esq. The church contains a few marble tablets to the memory of the Bircham family. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyan Methodists. A National school for girls is supported by voluntary contributions.

REETH, a market town in that part of the parish of GRINTON which is in the western division of the wapentake of GILLING, North riding of the county of YORK, $9\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Richmond, containing 1460 inhabitants. This town is situated on an elevated spot of ground, at a short distance from the confluence of the rivers Arkle and Swale, and commands a beautiful and picturesque view of the adjacent country. It is nearly quadrangular, and is irregularly built. The knitting of stockings is extensively carried on, and in the neighbourhood are lead mines in operation. A market, granted by charter in the 6th of William and Mary, is held on Friday; and fairs are on the Friday before Good Friday, Old May-day, Old Midsummer-day, the festival of St. Bartholomew, Old Martinmas-day, and St. Thomas' day. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. The Friends' school was erected at the expense of George and John Raw, the former of whom, in 1814, bequeathed £1500 for its support, and the latter, in 1815, left £500 for a similar purpose; the interest of these benefactions, amounting to £72 per annum, is paid in support of a master, who educates thirty-three poor children. Opposite to Healaugh, in this township, on Harker-hill, are the remains of an intrenchment, one hundred feet square, called Maiden's Castle; on the east side of the hill and in the dale are others, in one of which some pieces of armour have been found: they are supposed to be of Roman origin.

REIGATE, a borough, market town, and parish, in the first division of the hundred of REIGATE, county of SURREY, 19 miles (E.) from Guildford, and 21 (S. by W.) from London, containing 2961 inhabitants: the parish is divided into two precincts, each of which supports its own poor, viz., the borough, which contains 1328 inhabitants, and the foreign, including the districts of Santon, Woodhatch, Howleigh, Linkfield, and Colley, in which are 1633. This place, which is of considerable antiquity, was called in Domesday-book Cherche felle, and afterwards Church-field, in Reigate, by which name the church was given by Hamelin, Earl of Surrey, to the priory of St. Mary Overy, Southwark, in the reign of King John. The origin of its present name is uncertain: Camden says that, if borrowed from the ancient language, it signifies the course of the stream; while Mr. Bray and others consider it to be derived, and with great probability, from the Saxon words rige, or ridge, and gate, from a gate, or bar, placed across the road which runs by the high ridge of hill, now called Reigate hill. He is also inclined to think that the gate existed so early as the formation of the Saxon Stane-street; and there are many other places in the vicinity the names of which terminate in a similar way, all seemingly derived from a like circumstance. The inhabitants are recorded to have routed the Danes, when they were ravaging the kingdom, on more than one occasion; and Camden has preserved a distich commemorating their courageous conduct in these conflicts. The next historical circumstance connected with Reigate is the assault and capture of its castle by Louis the Dauphin, in the reign of John, in revenge for the adherence of its then owner, William de Warren, to the cause of that monarch, in his quarrel with the barons. The manor of Reigate was originally of great extent: it belonged in the Confessor's time to his Queen Edith, at which period it was rated at three thousand seven hundred and fifty-six acres, and is thought to have included, besides the parish of that name, the present parishes also of Leigh, Newdigate, Churchwell, Horley, and Brostow. The town is beautifully situated on a branch of the river Mole, in the valley of Holmesdale, on the high road from London to Brighton, and stands upon a rock of white sand, which, for purity and colour, is said to be unequalled by any in the kingdom: it consists of two principal streets and several smaller ones, which are only partially paved, and indifferently lighted: water of very good quality is procured from the rock on which it stands. The High-street, which is the main street, extends in a direction nearly from east to west, having at its eastern extremity the church: the other chief street, called Bell-street, runs north and south, containing some respectable houses, and is terminated at its southern extremity by the priory. A considerable quantity of oatmeal was formerly made here, nearly twenty mills having been employed, but the number is now reduced to one; some pits of fullers' earth have been opened of late years. A weekly market on Tuesday was granted by Edward III., and, in 1679, Charles II. granted a second market, on the first Wednesday in every month, which afterwards fell into disuse, but has lately been revived, and is held for cattle, the market on Tuesday being for corn and provisions: the market-house, built by Sir Joseph Jekyll, is an appropriate and convenient edifice. The fairs are on Whit-Monday and Tuesday, September 14th, and December 9th, chiefly for horses, cattle, &c. A court leet and baron is held here, at which a bailiff and subordinate officers are elected, by whom the local affairs of the town are managed. The town hall is in the market-place, and was built as a prison for felons brought to be tried at the sessions, which were formerly held here. This borough sent two members to parliament so early as the reign of Edward I., and has continued to do so since that period: the right of election is vested in the freeholders of messuages, or burgage tenements, within the borough precincts, in number about two hundred: the bailiff is the returning officer, and the parliamentary influence is possessed by Lord Hardwick and Lord Somers.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Surrey, and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £20. 5. 5., and in the patronage of Miss Snelson. The church, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene, is a substantial stone building, with an embattled tower of hewn stone at the west end, and with double buttresses: it contains some handsome monuments, amongst which is one to the memory of the Earl of Nottingham, Lord High Admiral in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, who commanded the naval equipment against the Invincible Armada. The Society of Friends and Independents have each a place of worship here. The free school was founded, in 1675, by the inhabitants, and ten boys, selected by the trustees from the parish, are instructed in reading, writing, and arithmetic, a house having been built for the master, who receives about £23 per ann. from endowments by Robert Bishopp and John Parker. There is also a National school, supported by voluntary contributions, in which about one hundred boys and girls are educated. The origin of Reigate castle, which stood on the north side of the town, within the precincts of the borough, is generally ascribed to the ancient Earls of Warren and Surrey, although some writers consider it to be of Saxon foundation, with subsequent erections: it is spoken of by Lambarde, in the reign of Elizabeth, as a ruin, although enough of it remained at the time of the parliamentary war to induce a committee sitting at Derby House to take notice of it; it appears to have been soon afterwards completely demolished, and little now remains to point out even its site. In the castle court is an entrance to a cavern, called the Barons' Cave, in which it is said that the barons met and settled the articles of Magna Charta, prior to meeting King John at Runymede. The priory was founded by William, Earl Warren, for canons regular of the order of St. Augustine, about the same period as the presumed erection of the castle: it was dedicated to the Virgin Mary and the Holy Cross, and, at the period of its dissolution by Henry VIII., was valued at £78. 16. 8.: a manor was attached to this foundation, for which courts are still held, many of the burgage tenements in the borough being holden of it: the noble mansion erected on its site retains the name of Reigate Priory. The walls and roof of an ancient chapel, dedicated to St. Lawrence, are still standing in the town, the building having been converted into a dwelling-house: another chapel, dedicated to the Holy Cross, supposed to have belonged to the priory, and which stood in the town, has been demolished, having been previously occupied as a barn; and a third, dedicated to St. Thomas the Apostle, and standing in the market-place, was used as a court-house and market-house until 1708, when it was taken down. John Fox, the martyrologist, resided in this town, in the family of the Duchess of Richmond, as tutor to her son, the Earl of Surrey, when expelled from New College, Oxford, on a charge of heresy, and continued under the protection of the family during the latter part of the reign of Henry VIII., that of Edward VI., and part of that of Mary, when his pupil, then Duke of Norfolk, sent him abroad, to avoid the malice of Gardiner.

REIGHTON, a parish in the wapentake of DICKERING, East riding of the county of YORK, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Bridlington, containing 217 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of the East riding, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £9. 10., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Sir W. Strickland, Bart.

REMENHAM, a parish in the hundred of BEYNHURST, county of BERKS, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N. by E.) from Henley upon Thames, containing 380 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Berks, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £20. 1. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Principal and Fellows of Jesus College, Oxford. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas. The river Thames flows through the parish. Park Place, in this parish, was formerly the residence of General Lord Conway, and subsequently of the Prince of Wales, grandfather to his present Majesty; the former established the growth and distillery of lavender in this neighbourhood, which are still carried on.

REMPSTONE, a parish in the southern division of the wapentake of RUSHCLIFFE, county of NOTTINGHAM, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Loughborough, containing 368 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Nottingham, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £13. 2. 6., and in the patronage of the Master of Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge. The church, dedicated to All Saints, which was consecrated in 1773, was erected with the materials of the former edifice of St. Peter in the Rushes, and of a chapel long before in disuse.

RENDCOMBE, a parish in the hundred of RAPS-GATE, county of GLOUCESTER, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Cirencester, containing 190 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £13. 6. 8., and in the patronage of Joseph Pitt, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

RENDHAM, a parish in the hundred of PLOMES-GATE, county of SUFFOLK, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Saxmundham, containing 452 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of certain Trustees. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. There is a place of worship for Independents. Thomas Neale, in 1722, bequeathed land, producing a small income, in support of a free school.

RENDLESHAM, a parish in the hundred of LOES, county of SUFFOLK, 3 miles (S. E. by S.) from Wickham-Market, containing 249 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £24. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Gregory. Here Suidhelm, King of the East Angles, was baptized by Cedda. Rendlesham gives the title of baron to the family of Thelusson, in the Irish peerage.

RENHOLD, a parish in the hundred of BARFORD, county of BEDFORD, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Bedford, containing 340 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Bedford, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £8. 3. 4., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of John Polhill, Esq. The church is dedicated to All Saints. The river Ouse runs through the parish. William Belcher, in 1723, gave £600 for the support of a school, in which from twenty to thirty children are educated; the annual income is about £20. In the neighbourhood are several ancient mounds, called "the Amphitheatre."

RENISHAW, a township in the parish of ECKINGTON, hundred of SCARSDALE, county of DERBY, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Chesterfield, containing 551 inhabitants, who are principally employed in the extensive iron-foundry established on the Chesterfield canal, which passes through the township. Thomas Camm, in 1702, bequeathed land and premises yielding about £46 per annum, which sum, and two subsequent bequests by Lady Frecheville and Peter Cadman, amounting to £10 a year, are applied for the instruction of about twenty-seven children.

RENNINGTON, a chapelry in the parish of EMBLETON, southern division of BAMBROUGH ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Alnwick, containing 272 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, united with that of Rock, in the archdeaconry of Northumberland, and diocese of Durham, endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £800 royal bounty. The chapel, dedicated to All Saints, is very ancient.

RENWICK, a parish in LEATH ward, county of CUMBERLAND, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Kirk-Oswald, containing 364 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Carlisle, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Carlisle. The church, dedicated to All Saints, was rebuilt in 1733, at the expense of the parishioners. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists, with a Sunday school attached.

REPPS, a parish in the western division of the hundred of FLEGG, county of NORFOLK, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Acle, containing, with the hamlet of Bastwick, 219 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Norwich. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

REPPS (NORTH), a parish in the northern division of the hundred of ERPINGHAM, county of NORFOLK, 3 miles (S. S. E.) from Cromer, containing 529 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £18, and in the patronage of the King, as Duke of Lancaster. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. On Tolls Hill, near a neat marine cottage called the Hermitage, is a remarkably distinct echo.

REPPS (SOUTH), a parish in the northern division of the hundred of ERPINGHAM, county of NORFOLK, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. W.) from North Walsham, containing 656 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £16, and in the patronage of the King, as Duke of Lancaster. The church is dedicated to St. James. On a lofty eminence about a mile from the village are the remains of an ancient beacon, whence Norwich and Yarmouth are discernible on a clear day.

REPTON, a parish in the hundred of REPTON and GRESLEY, county of DERBY, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E. by E.) from Burton upon Trent, containing, with the chapelry of Bradby, 2104 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Derby, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Sir George Crewe, Bart. The church, dedicated to St. Wyston, is principally Norman, but exhibits portions in the several later styles of English architecture: under it is a curious ancient crypt, believed to have been part of the conventual church, which was destroyed by the Danes. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. The navigable river Trent bounds the parish on the north, and on its banks are vestiges of a small Roman camp, near which is an immense rock of freestone. Here were anciently a market and a fair; there is now a statute fair at Michaelmas for hiring servants, and an annual court leet is held by the lord of the manor. Repton, anciently called Repington, is supposed to have been the Roman station Repandunum. Under the Saxon dominion it was called Repandum, and was the capital of the kingdom of Mercia. Before the year 660, here was a nunnery under the government of an abbess, in which Ethelbald and others of the Mercian kings were interred. The Danes having expelled Burhred, viceroy of Mercia, from his throne, wintered at Repandum in 874, at which period it is supposed that the nunnery was destroyed. The manor being possessed soon after the Conquest by the Earls of Chester, a priory of Black canons was removed hither, in 1172, from Caulk in this county, by Matilda, widow of Ranulph de Blundeville, Earl of Chester: its revenue at the dissolution was estimated at £118. The remains of the conventual buildings, which are principally in the Norman style, have been converted into the school-room and offices belonging to Repton grammar school; and the mansion-house, to which is attached a brick tower in the later English style, is rented by the governors, and occupied by the head master. In 1556, Sir John Port devised all his estates in Lancashire and Derbyshire, in trust, for the foundation and endowment of this school, and an hospital at Etwall. The Harpur family had the direction of these institutions until the year 1621, when Sir John Harpur assigned the superintendence of them to the Earl of Huntingdon, Lord Stanhope, and Sir Thomas Gerard, Bart., as heirs of the founder: the present hereditary governors are, the Marquis of Hastings, the Earl of Chesterfield, and Sir William Gerard, Bart. In 1621, the master of Etwall hospital, the schoolmaster of Repton, the poor men, and the poor scholars, were made a body corporate. The establishment consists of a head master, two ushers, and twenty scholars on the foundation: the master has a salary of £200, the first usher £100, and the second £80, and the scholars have an allowance of £20 per annum each, for seven years. The improved rental of the estates, which is now about £2500 per annum, has long since enabled the governors to increase the number of pensioners in the hospital, to augment the establishment of the school, and to give larger salaries to the masters. They elect the master of the hospital and the master and ushers of the school; the Harpur family have, by the original charter, a fourth term with them in the appointment of the pensioners of the hospital, and of the foundation scholars. The learned divine and Hebraist, John Lightfoot, was appointed first usher, on the original establishment of the school. Amongst eminent persons educated here may be noticed, Samuel Shaw, a learned nonconformist divine; Stebbing Shaw, the historian of Staffordshire; Jonathan Scott, translator of the Arabian Tales; W. L. Lewis, the translator of Statius; and F. N. C. Mundy, Esq., author of the poems of Needwood Forest and the Fall of Needwood. The sum of £200 was given by Mrs Mary Burdett, in 1701, and the like sum by Mrs. Dorothy Burdett, in 1718, for buying bread for the poor, and clothing and teaching poor children of Repton, Ingleby, and Foremark.

RESTON (NORTH), a parish in the Marsh division of the hundred of LOUTH-ESKE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E.) from Louth, containing 46 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £4. 11. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$., endowed with £200 royal bounty. Mrs. Jackson was patroness in 1827. The church is dedicated to St. Edith. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

RESTON (SOUTH), a parish in the Marsh division of the hundred of CALCEWORTH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Alford, containing 111 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £5. 10. 2 $\frac{1}{2}$., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the King, as Duke of Lancaster. The church is dedicated to St. Edith.

RETFORD (EAST), a borough, market town, and parish, having exclusive jurisdiction, though locally in the North-clay division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, county of NOTTINGHAM, 32 miles (E. N. E.) from Nottingham, and 144 (N. by W.) from London, containing 2465 inhabitants. This place is supposed to have derived its name from an ancient ford over the river Idle (on the eastern bank of which it is situated), at a place where the soil was a reddish clay, which abounds here; in Domesday-book it is written Redeford, and early in the thirteenth century Este Reddfurthe. The town is pleasantly situated, and is connected with West Retford by a bridge across the Idle: it is well built and paved, and the open square, or market-place, is surrounded by good houses: its situation on the great north road to York and Edinburgh gives it many advantages as a place of residence. There is a small but neat theatre, usually open for the six weeks preceding Christmas; and a news-room was erected by the corporation a few years since, to which Lord Galway presented portraits of George II. and his queen: there are about forty members, who subscribe £1. 11. 6. each annually. A considerable trade was formerly carried on in malt, but it is much reduced: hats and shoes are the principal articles manufactured, and a paper-mill is now in operation. The Chesterfield canal, which was opened in 1777, is conveyed by an aqueduct over the river Idle, to the south-west of the town; and the corporation paid £500 to the proprietors for making the canal from Retford to Stockwith, on a scale to admit the passage of vessels of greater burden than was otherwise intended: the company have here a spacious warehouse for the reception of corn, &c. The market is on Saturday, and is well supplied with all kinds of provisions, with the addition, in Autumn, of great quantities of hops; it has been much improved by the corporation having relinquished the tolls: there is also a large market for cheese and hops on the first Saturday in November. The fairs are on the 23rd of March, for horses and black cattle, and the 2nd of October for horses, cattle, cheese, and hops, which are brought in great quantities.

East Retford is an ancient borough by prescription, and a royal demesne. It was granted by Edward I., in 1279, to the burgesses at a fee-farm rent of £10 per annum, with the privilege, amongst others, of choosing a bailiff from among themselves: in 1336, Edward III. confirmed their privileges, and in 1424, Henry VI. granted them a charter, empowering the bailiff to hold courts of record, and to execute the duties of escheator and clerk of the market. These immunities were subsequently confirmed, and others added, by the charter of James I., under which the town is now governed by two bailiffs, the senior bailiff being chosen from among the aldermen, and the junior bailiff from such of the freemen as have served the office of chamberlain, and eleven aldermen (exclusively of the bailiff), who compose a common council; they are empowered to choose a high steward, a recorder, with two chamberlains, a town clerk, and two serjeants at mace: the two bailiffs and the recorder are justices of the peace, and have exclusive jurisdiction within the borough. A court of record, for the recovery of debts to any amount, is held every third Monday, or oftener, if the bailiffs require it, at which one or both of the bailiffs, assisted by the steward, or his deputy, preside; this court having fallen into disuse, was revived in 1827. General quarter sessions of the peace for the borough, and also for the northern division of the county, are held in the town hall, which was erected in 1755, and is a handsome and commodious edifice, surmounted by a neat cupola, the principal room being sixty feet long, twenty-six wide, and twenty feet high, with good shambles underneath. The petty sessions for the division are held here every alternate Saturday.

Retford first sent members to parliament in the 9th of Edward II.; but in the year 1330, the burgesses petitioned for a suspension of this privilege, on account of their poverty, and it consequently lay dormant until the year 1571, when it was again exercised. The borough has frequently been, since that period, the scene of electioneering dissensions; and it appears that within the last century, committees of the House of Commons have been engaged no less than seven times in determining the freedom: in 1705, it was decided by that house, "That the right of electing burgesses to serve in parliament for this borough is in such freemen only as have a right to their freedom by birth, as eldest sons of freemen, or by serving seven years apprenticeship, or have it by redemption, whether inhabiting or not inhabiting the said borough at the time of their being made free:" the two bailiffs are the returning officers. At the election in 1826, Sir H. W. Wilson, the unsuccessful candidate, protested against the whole of the proceedings, in consequence of the riotous transactions which occurred, and the intervention of the military; and on the assembling of parliament, in February 1827, he brought the matter before the House of Commons, a committee of which, after declaring the election void, directed the attention of the House to the very corrupt state of the borough; and after various motions had been made, with a view to transfer the elective franchise to Birmingham, Manchester, and other large places, it was settled, in 1829, that the franchise should be thrown open to the whole of the hundred of Bassetlaw, the freeholders of which, in common with the freemen of the borough, now exercise the right.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Nottingham, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £5. 5., endowed with £400 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £1000 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Sir Richard Sutton, Bart. The church, which is dedicated to St. Swithin, is a large and handsome structure, with a lofty square tower; it is composed of several styles of architecture, a portion being very old. It was formerly a very large church, and, in 1258, was presented by Roger, Archbishop of York, to his chapel of St. Mary and the Holy Angels, near York Minster; in 1392 it contained two altars (in a chapel at the back), dedicated to St. Trinity and St. Mary, endowed by the bailiffs of East Retford, who appointed two cantuarists to minister daily; in 1528, the chapel was pulled down to repair the church, both being in a ruinous condition; and in October 1651, the building was demolished by the fall of the steeple and tower, and a brief was granted by Richard Cromwell, during his short protectorate, for rebuilding it, which was done by the corporation, in 1658, at an expense of £1500. A handsome chapel of ease, in the later style of English architecture, has been erected at Moorgate, chiefly by subscription; the site and chapel-yard were given by H. C. Hutchinson, Esq., with a donation of £500, and the Incorporated Society for building and enlarging churches and chapels contributed £800; the whole cost was £4000: it contains sittings for one thousand and forty persons, six hundred of which are free. There are places of worship for General Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists, the two latter with Sunday schools attached to them. The free grammar school was founded by Edward VI., who endowed it with the possessions of the dissolved chantries of Sutton in Loundale, Tuxford, and Annesley, and placed it under the government of the bailiffs and burgesses, who appoint the master and under-master: the present school-house was built, in 1779, by the corporation, who, in 1797, built a house for the master, and in 1810, one for the second master: the present income is about £400 per annum, and there are at this time two boys only in the school. The corporation have been long in possession of considerable property in their own right, and as trustees for the grammar school, almshouses, &c., which, from the loss of some old deeds, has become so mixed, as to occasion a Chancery suit, at this time pending. A National school for boys was erected in 1813, to be supported by voluntary subscription, but it has been closed for want of sufficient support. Sloswicke's hospital was founded by Richard Sloswicke, in 1657, who gave his dwelling-house to be converted into a Maison de Dieu, and endowed it with property from which six poor men were to receive £3. 6. 8. each annually. It was rebuilt by the corporation in 1806, and is inhabited by aged burgesses, who receive 2s. each weekly: the estate now lets for £84. 10. a year. There are also nine other almshouses. The workhouse was built, in 1818, by the corporation, who receive five per cent. for the money expended on it: it is on a large scale, being intended for the poor of twenty-six incorporated parishes, which pay an annual rent of £3 each, and three shillings a week for each pauper they send; in the square is a relic of antiquity, called the Broad stone, supposed to be part of an ancient cross, which formerly stood near the town: the corn market is held round it.

RETFORD (WEST), a parish in the Hatfield division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, county of NOTTINGHAM, $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile (W.) from East Retford, containing 571 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Nottingham, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £9. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Mayor and Corporation of East Retford. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is a small edifice, with a tower and an elegant crocketed spire. The Chesterfield canal passes through the parish, which is separated from the borough and parish of East Retford by the river Idle. Richard Brownlow, in 1691, bequeathed £300 for the endowment of a free school, but the money has not been applied to that purpose. Stephen Johnson, in 1725, gave a house and land for the use of a schoolmaster, with a rent-charge of £10, which he receives for teaching poor children to read.

4 II

An hospital, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, was founded, in 1664, by Dr. John Darrell, and endowed with lands for the maintenance of a master and sixteen brethren: part of the original building remains, and, with some modern additions, is occupied as an almshouse by poor men. Dr. Darrell also founded a scholarship in Exeter College, Oxford, and endowed it with an estate in this parish, now producing £52 a year; the scholar to be chosen from the counties of Nottingham and Lincoln alternately, by the archdeacon of the former and the subdean of the latter. The old hall was formerly the residence of the family of Denman, from whom, by intermarriage, descended two queens of England, viz., Anne, consort of James II., and Anne her daughter, who succeeded William III.

RETTENDON, a parish in the hundred of CHELMSFORD, county of ESSEX, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Rayleigh, containing 580 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Essex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £32. 6. 3., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Ely. The church is dedicated to All Saints. The river Crouch is here navigable for barges. A school for twenty poor children was endowed by James Humphrey, Esq. Here is an ancient farm-house, formerly the residence of the Bishops of Ely.

REVELSTOKE, a parish in the hundred of PLYMPTON, county of DEVON, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by E.) from Earl's Plympton, containing 484 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Yealmpton, in the archdeaconry of Totness, and diocese of Exeter. The parish is bounded on the south by the English channel, and on the north and west by the river Yealm.

REVESBY, a parish in the western division of the soke of BOLINGBROKE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Bolingbroke, containing 572 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln. The church is dedicated to St. Lawrence. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. An abbey of Cistercian monks, in honour of the Virgin Mary and St. Lawrence, was founded here, in 1142, by William de Romara, Earl of Lincoln, which, at the dissolution, had a revenue of £349. 4. 10.

REWE, a parish partly in the hundred of HAYRIDGE, but chiefly in that of WONFORD, county of DEVON, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Exeter, containing, with the tything of Up-Exe, 280 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £22. 4. 2., and in the joint patronage of the Earl of Ilchester and the Hon. P. Wyndham. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. At Up-Exe, in this parish, are the ruins of an ancient chapel.

REYDON, a parish in the hundred of BLYTHING, county of SUFFOLK, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (N. W. by N.) from Southwold, containing 325 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Southwold, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £13. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Earl of Stradbroke. The church is dedicated to St. Margaret. The navigable river Blyth runs on the south of the parish.

REYMERSTON, a parish in the hundred of MITFORD, county of NORFOLK, 6 miles (S. S. E.) from East Dereham, containing 285 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £11. 3. 6., and in the patronage of T. T. Gurdon, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

RIBBESFORD, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of DODDINGTREE, county of WORCESTER, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile (S.) from Bewdley, containing, with the borough of Bewdley, 3798 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, rated in the king's books at £27. 19. 2., and in the patronage of the Rev. Edward Winnington Ingram. The church, dedicated to St. Leonard, is an ancient and curious structure, in a retired situation, surrounded by wooded heights, which environ the windings of the Severn. Coal exists in the parish, but it is not worked. A weekly market, and a fair on St. Margaret's day, were granted by Edward I.

RIBBY, a chapelry in the parish of KIRKHAM, hundred of AMOUNDERNESS, county palatine of LANCASTER, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (W. by N.) from Kirkham, containing, with Wrea, 500 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, endowed with £600 private benefaction, £800 royal bounty, and £300 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Kirkham. The chapel was consecrated in 1775. James Thistleton, in 1693, bequeathed £180 towards the establishment of a free school, to which Nicholas Sharples, in 1716, left the residue of his estate, amounting to £850; these bequests now produce an annual income of about £220, which is applied for the support of a school of forty boys, another of forty girls, erected in 1818, and for clothing the children of both once a year.

RIBBLETON, a township in the parish of PRESTON, hundred of AMOUNDERNESS, county palatine of LANCASTER, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N. E.) from Preston, containing 151 inhabitants.

RIBCHESTER, a parish comprising the township of Alston with Hatherall, in the hundred of AMOUNDERNESS, and the townships of Dilworth, Dutton, and Ribchester, in the lower division of the hundred of BLACKBURN, county palatine of LANCASTER, and containing 4198 inhabitants, of which number, 1760 are in the township of Ribchester, 6 miles (N. N. W.) from Blackburn. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Stidd annexed, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Chester. The church is dedicated to St. Wilfrid. This was a place of consequence in the time of the Romans, the Coccium of Antoninus, ranking as one of their first cities in Britain; in proof of which, numerous relics of antiquity have been and are still met with, such as ruins of temples, statues, coins, altars, and inscriptions. There are several cotton manufactories, also quarries of slate and stone, and the streams of the rivers Calder, Holder, and Ribble, wind through the parish. John Dewhurst, in 1771, founded a free school for poor children of the townships of Ribchester, Dutton, and Hathersall; the income is £19 a year.

RIBSTON (GREAT), a joint township with Walshford, in the parish of HUNTINGORE, upper division of the wapentake of CLARO, West riding of the county of YORK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Wetherby, containing, with Walshford, 155 inhabitants. It is almost surrounded by the river Nidd. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The fine apples, known by the name of Ribston Pippins, were first cultivated here, the original tree having been raised from a pippin brought from France. Here was a preceptory of Knights Templars, founded by Robert, Lord Ross, and afterwards granted to the Knights Hospitallers: at the dissolution it was valued at £265. 9. 6. per annum, and is now a private mansion, the chapel of which contains some memorials to the family of Goodriche; and in the cemetery is the sepulchral monument of the Roman standard-bearer to the ninth legion, which was found at York, in 1638. This township is within the peculiar jurisdiction of the Manorial Court of Hunsingore.

RIBSTON (LITTLE), a township in the parish of SPOFFORTH, upper division of the wapentake of CLARO, West riding of the county of YORK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Wetherby, containing 195 inhabitants. It is within the peculiar jurisdiction of the court of the honour of Knaresborough.

RIBTON, a township in the parish of BRIDEKIRK, ALLERDALE ward below Darwent, county of CUMBERLAND, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Cockermouth, containing 36 inhabitants. Here are the remains of an ancient chapel, which was dedicated to St. Lawrence.

RIBY, a parish in the eastern division of the wapentake of YARBOROUGH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 7 miles (W. by S.) from Great Grimsby, containing 168 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £4. 18. 4., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of W. E. Tomline, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Edmund.

RICCALL, a parish partly within the liberty of St. Peter of YORK, and partly in the wapentake of OUZE and DERWENT, East riding of the county of YORK, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Selby, containing 599 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Prebendary of Riccall in the Cathedral Church of York, rated in the king's books at £6, and endowed with £1000 parliamentary grant. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Twelve poor children are taught to read in a school erected by subscription in 1791, and supported by voluntary contributions, in addition to several trifling bequests amounting to about £6 per annum. The village, situated on the banks of the Ouse, is noted as the landing-place of the Danes under Harfager their king, in 1066, from a fleet of six hundred sail. Here are the remains of a once magnificent palace of the diocesan, encompassed by a triple moat. Seven human skulls and a rough flag-stone, with a sculptured cross, were discovered here several years ago.

RICHARD'S CASTLE, a parish partly in the hundred of WOLPHY, county of HEREFORD, and partly in the hundred of MUNSLow, county of SALOP, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Ludlow, containing, with the townships of Moor with Batchcott, Overton, and Woolferton, 490 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £15. 1. 3., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Worcester. The church, dedicated to St. Bartholomew, is situated in the county of Hereford: it is a fine old structure, exhibiting some beautiful remains of stained glass, and had formerly a spire, which several years ago was burned down. The Kington canal passes to the south-east of the parish, and coal is obtained in the neighbourhood. A charter for a market and a fair was granted by King John, but both have been long disused. A National school, established about eight years since, is supported, and the children occasionally clothed, by voluntary subscriptions. There are some remains of the keep and walls of the castle, built by Richard Scrope, in the reign of Edward the Confessor, but they are so embosomed in wood as to be scarcely perceptible: on the declivity of its mount, two thousand royalists under Sir Thomas Dundesford were defeated in the civil war, by an inferior force headed by Colonel Birch. A spring in this parish, called Boney well, is remarkable for casting up small fish or frog bones in spring and autumn.

RICHMOND, a parish in the first division of the hundred of KINGSTON, county of SURREY, 8 miles (W. S. W.) from London, containing 5994 inhabitants. This place, although not mentioned in Domesday-book, is noticed in a record of nearly the same date, under the name of Syenes, and it was afterwards called Shene, or Sheen: the manor became the property of the crown in the latter part of the reign of Edward I., who resided here, as also did his successors Edward II. and III., and the latter monarch either built a palace, or made very considerable additions to one already in existence, in which he ended his days; since this period it has belonged either to the crown or to some branch of the royal family, and has very frequently been the residence of the Sovereign. Queen Anne, wife of Richard II., dying here, it so affected that king, that he abandoned the palace, and allowed it to become ruinous: it was restored to its former splendour by Henry V., and, in 1492, was the scene of a grand tournament held by Henry VII.; and having been destroyed by fire in 1498, it was rebuilt by that monarch, when he changed the name of the place to Richmond, after the town of that name in Yorkshire, from which he had received his title of earl. Philip I., King of Spain, having been driven on the English coast by a storm, was entertained here, in 1506, with great magnificence; and Henry VII. expired in this palace in 1509. Henry VIII. also held a tournament here; and the Emperor Charles V., of Germany, was lodged in the castle, on his visit to England, in 1523. The Princess Elizabeth was confined at Richmond by her sister Mary, and it became her favourite residence after her accession to the throne; she died here in 1603, in which year, and in 1625, the courts of justice were removed hither, on account of the plague. In 1605, Henry, Prince of Wales, resided here; and it was the occasional residence of Charles I., who here formed a large collection of pictures, and of his queen, on whom it was settled: in 1649 it was surveyed by order of parliament, and sold in 1650; but shortly after the Restoration it was delivered to the queen mother, though in a very dilapidated state: it was shortly afterwards pulled down, and private houses erected on the site, the owners of which hold on lease from the crown. A park appears to have been formed in the reign of Edward I., and in the time of Henry VIII. there were two parks, distinguished as the Great and the Little Park, the second being probably formed on the rebuilding of the palace by Henry V. or VII. These parks were afterwards united, and called the Old, or Little, Park, by way of distinction from the New, or Great, Park, formed by Charles I., which was made one of the articles of his impeachment. The Old Park, commencing near Kew bridge, extends along the banks of the Thames to Richmond, and comprises the beautiful and extensive royal gardens, and a dairy and grazing farm, which was cultivated under the immediate direction of George III., who occasionally resided here, and who directed the old lodge to be demolished, with a view to the erection of a palace in its place, for which the foundation was prepared, but the building was never executed. It was given to the lord mayor and citizens of London, during the Protectorate, but after the Restoration, it reverted to the crown. The Observatory is also in this park, and was built in 1769, by Sir William Chambers: it is furnished with excellent astronomical instruments, apparatus for philosophical experiments, and some models, and until lately contained a collection of ores from the mines in the forest of Hartz, in Germany, which have been removed to the British Museum: on its summit is a moveable dome, containing an equatorial instrument. The New, or Great, Park, enclosed by Charles I., is situated to the southward of Richmond, extending from the hill to the road from London to Kingston: it is eight miles in circumference, being encompassed with a brick wall, and comprises about two thousand two hundred and fifty-three acres.

The village of Richmond, from the beauty of its situation and of the surrounding country, possesses attractions of a very rare character. The view from the summit of the hill, though not extensive, embraces every thing required to constitute a picturesque landscape, consisting of a fertile and richly-wooded plain, through which the Thames flows in a winding course, with its banks ornamented by numerous mansions and villas, and bounded by hills in the distance. Its proximity to the metropolis, combined with the attractions of scenery which it possesses, and the facility of conveyance both by land and water, causes it to be much resorted to. It in all respects resembles a town, and has a neat and genteel appearance, containing some very good houses, with several inns of a superior description; also a neat theatre, which is opened three or four nights in the week during the summer season: the repair of the highways, paving, and watching, is, by act of parliament, under the control of thirty-one select vestry-men. The Thames, which is here nearly three hundred feet wide, is crossed by a handsome bridge of five arches, the centre one being twenty-five feet high from low water mark, and sixty wide; the first stone was laid on the 23rd of August, 1774, and the structure was completed in December, 1777, at an expense of about £26,000.

The living is a vicarage, consolidated with that of Kingston, by act of parliament, in 1760, in the archdeaconry of Surrey, and diocese of Winchester. The church, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene, is a neat brick edifice, with a low square embattled tower, ornamented with buttresses, at its western end. Amongst other monuments is a brass tablet, erected by the Earl of Buchan, in 1792, to the memory of James Thomson, author of the Seasons, who died at Richmond, in 1748. The school was founded, in 1713, by contribution among several noblemen and gentlemen, and it was, in 1719, endowed by Lady Dorothy Capel, with part of the rental of an estate, from which it now receives £37. 10.: there are also £3700 New South Sea Annuities, and £100 four per cents., in the possession of the trustees, being the produce of benefactions and contributions, the dividends of which are applied to the use of the school, which is supported, in addition to the above, by an annuity of £30, originally given by George I., and continued by his successors, by an annual subscription, and by a collection made after a sermon preached for its benefit. The school-house, in which the master and the mistress reside, is a neat building in good repair, and all the poor children of the parish may here be educated in reading, writing, and arithmetic, about sixty of them being also clothed. The charitable institutions for the relief of the poor are on a very liberal scale; they consist of almshouses, called Queen Elizabeth's, supposed to have been founded, in the year 1600, by Sir George Wright, and originally situated under Richmond hill; but the present building was erected by private subscription, in 1767, at a place called the Vineyard, on a piece of ground given by William Turner, Esq.: the present income is about £132 per annum, arising principally from the dividends on £3800 three per cent. reduced annuities, which was purchased with money given, or bequeathed, by different persons to the charity, and from a fee-farm rent of £8 per annum, assigned by John Michell: it affords lodging and maintenance to eight poor women. On the hill is an almshouse, founded and endowed by Bishop Duppa, in 1661, the present income of which, with some small additional benefactions, is £206 per annum, and in which ten poor widows of Richmond are lodged and supported. Michell's almshouses were founded, in 1696, by Humphry Michell, for ten poor old men, and augmented by John Michell and William Smither, Esqrs.: the tenements were rebuilt, in 1810, in the Vineyard, at an expense of £3014, derived from savings from the income, which is at present about £420 per annum. The income of almshouses founded, in 1757, by Rebecca Houblon, is now about £280 per annum; nine poor women are supported in them. In addition to these charities, William Hickey, in 1727, bequeathed estates, which, with the interest of the accumulation of savings, now produces upwards of £700 per annum, and from which twenty pensioners receive £12 per annum each; and, from the excess of income beyond the expenditure, the trustees contemplate an application to the court of Chancery, for leave to erect almshouses for the pensioners, and such further extension of the charity, as may be deemed expedient. There is also another valuable charity, called the Church Estate, under the management of trustees, for repairing the church, the present income of which is about £600 per annum; of this, £250 is appropriated to the support of deserving poor, at the discretion of the trustees, who have applied also to the court of Chancery, for permission to build ten almshouses, for five poor men and five poor women, to which number they now allow weekly 5s. each, the surplus of the £250 being allowed to accumulate for building the almshouses. Lands in the manor of Richmond are holden by copy of court roll, and descend to the youngest son, or, in default of male issue, to the youngest daughter. A convent of Carthusians, called the House of Jesus of Bethlehem, was founded and richly endowed by Henry V., in 1414, at the hamlet of West Sheen, about a quarter of a mile from the palace; and, in 1416, a hermitage for a recluse was founded within this monastery: in the reign of Henry VII., Perkin Warbeck sought an asylum within its walls, when defeated by that monarch, and the body of James IV., King of Scotland, was brought hither, after his defeat and death at Flodden Field: at the time of its suppression, its revenue was estimated at £777. 12. 1. It was revived by Queen Mary, but finally suppressed at her death, a few months afterwards: an ancient gateway, the last remains of this priory, was taken down about sixty years since, and the hamlet of West Sheen was at the same time demolished, the site now forming a part of the royal enclosure. A convent of Carmelites had been previously founded here by Edward II., but it was removed to Oxford, at the expiration of two years from its foundation. Henry VII. is said to have founded a convent of Observant friars near the palace, in 1499, the suppression of which, in 1534, is recorded by Hollinshed. A mineral well, discovered here about 1680, appears to have attracted a great deal of company; it was in considerable repute for about half a century, but afterwards rapidly declined.

Arms.

RICHMOND, a borough, market town, and parish, having separate jurisdiction, though locally in the western division of the wapentake of Gilling, North riding of the county of York, 44 miles (N.W.) from York, and 234 (N.N.W.) from London, containing 3546 inhabitants. This place appears to have been founded in the reign of William the Conqueror, by his nephew Alan Rufus, to whom he granted the whole district called Richmondshire, with the title of Earl of Richmond, and who built the castle, and gave the place the name of "Rich Mount," indicating, it is presumed, the value he attached to it. The castle appears to have been inaccessible, from its situation and immense artificial strength, but was suffered to fall into decay at an early period, as, when Leland wrote his itinerary, in the reign of Henry VIII., it was in ruins: the town at the same period retained its walls, but the three gates, called French, Finkel, and Bar gates, were destroyed. The discovery of a great number of Roman silver coins near the castle, in 1720, led to the conjecture that the town was of Roman origin, but there is no farther confirmation of this opinion. Richmond is beautifully situated on the declivity of a hill, at the foot of which the river Swale winds in a semicircular course, and the vale to which it gives name, and the other parts of the country surrounding the town, are celebrated for their romantic and diversified beauties. It is a neat well-built town, chiefly of stone, and the society consists in a great degree of persons of independent property; the beauty of the town and surrounding country, and the moderate rate at which the necessary articles of consumption can be procured, attracting many of this class. The principal streets contain some good houses; the town is lighted with gas, and a handsome stone bridge of three arches, crossing the river Swale, was erected in 1789, at the joint expense of the corporation and the inhabitants of the North riding. In the market-place, where are some very good houses and handsome shops, is a column, under which a reservoir has been constructed, capable of containing about twelve thousand gallons of water, brought by pipes from Aislabeck spring, and conveyed in the same manner to the different parts of the town: there is also another reservoir, containing about three thousand gallons, at the spring head. From the period of its foundation, during several successive reigns, Richmond appears to have been a place of very considerable trade; but the grant of charters for markets to some of the neighbouring towns, and other causes, interrupted its prosperity, and the want of a water communication (the Swale from its rocky bed not being navigable) is a great bar to the increase of its trade, which is now principally in corn and lead, the latter being brought from the mines about fourteen miles westward; there are also some quarries of good stone. A very considerable trade in knitted yarn stockings, and woollen caps for sailors, was formerly carried on; they were manufactured here, and exported to Holland and the Netherlands, but it has nearly ceased. The market is on Saturday, and great quantities of corn are sold at it to the corn-factors and millers of the adjacent grazing and mining districts: there are three fairs, on the Saturday before Palm-Sunday, granted by Queen Elizabeth; on the Saturday before the feast of St. Thomas à Becket, and on the feast of the Holy Rood, granted by Edward I.; the first and last are for cattle, woollen goods, and various kinds of merchandise, and are numerous attended.

Corporate Seal.

The town, which is a borough by prescription, as well as by divers royal grants and charters, was fully incorporated by Queen Elizabeth, in the 19th year of her reign: and in the 27th of the same reign it first sent members to parliament. By a charter granted by Charles II., in 1668, the government is vested in a mayor, recorder, twelve aldermen, a town clerk, twenty-four common council-men, and subordinate officers: the mayor and late mayor are justices of the peace. A court of record is held every alternate Tuesday before the mayor, recorder, and three aldermen, at which actions under £100 may be tried. A meeting of magistrates is held every Monday, and a court leet at Easter and Michaelmas. The general quarter sessions for the borough are held in the town hall, which is a handsome building, erected by the corporation. The gaol for debtors, arrested by warrant from the sheriff of the county, directed to the chief bailiff, formerly belonged to the Earls of Richmond, and is now the property of Lord Dundas, and rented by the Duke of Leeds, as high steward and chief bailiff of the liberty and franchise of Richmond and Richmondshire, in which capacity His Grace has peculiar jurisdiction, with power of appointing courts and holding pleas of civil action under 40s. There is also a borough gaol. The borough first sent members to parliament in the reign of Elizabeth: the right of election is vested in the owners of ancient burgages in the borough, who have a right of common on Whitcliffe pasture; the number of voters is about two hundred and seventy: the mayor is the returning officer, and the preponderating influence is possessed by Lord Dundas.

The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £15. 5. 7½., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, which is dedicated to St. Mary, is conjectured, from the style of part of the building, to have been erected about the time of Henry III.: it presents some portions in the Norman style, but the variety of additions and alterations it has undergone has left little trace of its original architecture: it contains a few handsome monuments and armorial bearings, a beautiful font, and an excellent organ. The chapel of the Holy Trinity, in the centre of the town, is supposed to have been the original parish church: it formerly belonged to the abbey of St. Mary at York, but was suffered to become ruinous, and no service was performed in it from the year 1712 until 1740, at which period it was repaired by the corporation: the living is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Mayor and Corporation: in part of the ancient church, adjoining to this chapel, the Archdeacon of Richmond holds his consistorial court. There are places of worship for Baptists, Wesleyan Methodists, and Roman Catholics: in a window of the Roman Catholic chapel is a very fine painting of the Crucifixion. The Society of Friends had a meeting-house, but in consequence of there being none of that sect in the town it was disposed of, and has been converted to other purposes. The free grammar school, which enjoys considerable repute, was founded and endowed by the burgesses in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, who granted letters patent, authorising its institution, and vesting the government of it in the bailiffs of the borough, which power is now exercised by the mayor and aldermen, who appoint the master: the children entitled to be taught free are those who "are natives of the borough, or children of persons exercising any trade or occupation therein;" the average number of free children instructed is about eighteen, and the present produce of the endowment amounts to about £335 per annum. A rent-charge of £8 was bequeathed by Dr. Bathurst, in 1659, towards the maintenance of scholars going from this school to the University of Cambridge; the candidates are elected by the trustees, and may hold the exhibitions until they take the degree of M.A. In 1730, Dr. William Allen left his estate at Bures St. Mary, in Suffolk, for founding two scholarships at Trinity Hall, Cambridge, with preference to his next of kin, and afterwards to this school; they are now worth £17 per annum, with a prospect of considerable increase when the present leases expire. A National Sunday school was built in 1825; and the corporation have also a school for which they provide a master to instruct forty poor boys in reading, writing, and arithmetic. The Rev. Matthew Hutchinson's charity, bequeathed in 1704, and now producing about £68 per annum, is appropriated to the education of twelve poor boys, for which £10 per annum is paid; to the payment of £4 each to poor boys as apprentice fees, and £3. 3. per annum each to sixteen poor widows having a settlement in Richmond: there is also a rent-charge of £4, bequeathed by Dr. Bathurst, for apprenticing a poor boy, besides several other small charities distributed in various ways.

Bowes' hospital was founded, in 1607, by Eleanor Bowes, for three poor widows, two of Richmond, and one of Easby, with an endowment of £10 per annum: the management is vested in the aldermen, recorder, rector, and master of the free grammar school. Thompson's hospital was founded, in 1781, by William Thompson, and endowed with property now producing about £13 per annum, for four widows of tailors, who had been residents of Richmond; they are lodged, and receive £3 per annum each: the management is vested in four trustees, with power to fill up vacancies, the rector of Richmond being always one. Pinkney's hospital was founded, in 1699, by Mr. George Pinkney, for three poor widows, who receive £6. 10. a year between them: the management is vested in the mayor, recorder, rector, foreman of the common council, and two head churchwardens. The ruins and relics of antiquity possess extreme interest; of these, the principal is the castle, the site of which comprises nearly six acres: the remains shew the great strength of the building whilst entire, and the great square tower, or keep, which was supposed to have been built at a rather more recent period than the other parts, and which was repaired, in 1761, by the Duke of Richmond, is in good preservation. To the northward of the town are the ruins of a house of Grey friars, of which the tower is almost the only part remaining: it is a most beautiful structure, in the richest style of English architecture, ornamented with buttresses and pinnacles, and was erected shortly before the dissolution in 1538, at which time the society consisted of a master and fourteen brethren: the establishment was founded, in 1258, by Ralph Fitz-Randal, Lord of Middleham. St. Nicholas' hospital, for sick and infirm people, and pilgrims, a short distance from the town, is of uncertain origin, but is mentioned so early as the 18th of Henry II.: the present building is supposed to have been erected soon after the dissolution of the religious establishments, and contains little of the original edifice. Nearly opposite the castle, on the other side of the river Swale, are the ruins of the priory of St. Martin, which was granted to the abbey of St. Mary, York, and richly endowed by Whyomar, Lord of Aske, chief steward to the Earl of Richmond, and founded in 1100, under John de Poppleton, the first prior; some fine Norman arches are nearly the only remains of this edifice. Richmond gives the title of duke to the family of Lennox.

RICKERBY, a township in that part of the parish of STANWIX which is in ESKDALE ward, county of CUMBERLAND, 1½ mile (N.E. by E.) from Carlisle, containing 108 inhabitants.

RICKERSCOTE, a township in the parish of CASTLE-CHURCH, eastern division of the hundred of CUTLESTONE, county of STAFFORD, 1¾ mile (S.S.E.) from Stafford. The population is returned with the parish. It is situated on the banks of the river Peak, near its confluence with the Sow, amid scenery highly picturesque and beautiful, and is distinguished by its valuable spa, recently discovered, and found to be efficacious in the cure of various disorders, internal and external.

RICKINGHALL (INFERIOR), a parish in the hundred of BLACKBOURN, county of SUFFOLK, $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile (S.W. by W.) from Botesdale, containing 428 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, consolidated with that of Rickingham Superior, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £16. 5. 2 $\frac{1}{2}$. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

RICKINGHALL (SUPERIOR), a parish in the hundred of HARTISMERE, county of SUFFOLK, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile (S. by W.) from Botesdale, containing 705 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, with Rickingham Inferior, in the archdeaconry of Sudbury, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £9. 13. 11 $\frac{1}{2}$, and in the patronage of George St. Vincent Wilson, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

RICKLING, a parish in the hundred of UTTLESFORD, county of ESSEX, 5 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Stansted-Mountfitchet, containing 419 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the jurisdiction of the Commissary of Essex and Herts, concurrently with the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of London, rated in the king's books at £10, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of London. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

RICKMANSWORTH, a market town and parish in the hundred of CASHIO, or liberty of ST. ALBANS, county of HERTFORD, 24 miles (S.W. by W.) from Hertford, and 18 (N.W. by W.) from London, containing 3940 inhabitants. In the earliest records in which this town is named, it is written Rykmereswearth and Richmeresweard, signifying the rich moor meadow. The manor, which, with four others, constituted the lordship of Pynesfield, formed a part of the demesne of the Saxon kings, and was bestowed by Offa of Mercia on the abbot and monks of St. Alban's, to whom it was confirmed by succeeding kings, and who retained it until their dissolution, when it reverted to the crown, and was given by Edward VI. to Ridley, Bishop of London, after whose martyrdom, it was granted by Mary to his successor, Bonner, and in the reign of Elizabeth again became the property of the crown, and ultimately passed into private hands. The town is pleasantly situated in a valley, near the confluence of the rivers Colne and Gade with the Chess: these rivers are much frequented by anglers, being noted for trout, and the last, which rises in Buckinghamshire, turns several mills in its course. It is irregularly built, but its distance from London, combined with an agreeable adjacent country, renders it a desirable place of residence. Two constables and one headborough are appointed annually. Within the parish are several flour-mills, and six paper-mills, affording employment to nearly six hundred persons; there is also an extensive brewery; the manufacture of horse-hair seating for chairs, and straw plat, is carried on to a considerable extent; and the cultivation of water-cresses for the London market gives employment to many individuals. The Grand Junction canal passes through the town, and affords a communication with the metropolis and various parts of the kingdom. The market, formerly held on Wednesday, was granted by Henry III. for the benefit of the monastery of St. Alban's, during the abbacy of John of Hertford, but it has been discontinued of late years: there are fairs for cattle on the 20th of July and the 24th of November, and a statute fair on Saturday before the third Monday in September.

The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of St. Alban's, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £16, and in the patronage of the Bishop of London. The church, which is dedicated to St. Mary, has an embattled tower of hewn flints at its western end; the body has lately been rebuilt of brick, coloured in imitation of weather-stained stone, to defray part of the expense of which, £700 was granted by the Incorporated Society for building and enlarging churches: some ancient ecclesiastical coins, and leaden and stone coffins, were discovered in digging for the foundation: over the altar is a beautiful window of painted glass, representing the Crucifixion; it was brought originally from St. Peter's at Rome, and purchased in Paris, in 1800, for £200. There are places of worship for Baptists and Independents. A National school for boys and girls is supported by donations and subscription; and there is also a British school for boys at Mill-End, within the parish; another for girls being about to be opened in the town. There are two sets of almshouses, one belonging to the parish, and one endowed with £10 per annum by John Fotherley, Esq., in 1674. More Park, a splendid mansion in the vicinity, has been the residence of several distinguished characters, having been occupied at different times by Neville, Archbishop of York in the reign of Henry VI.; by Cardinal Wolsey; by the unfortunate Duke of Monmouth, son of Charles II.; and by Lord Anson. Rickmansworth was the birth-place, in 1553, of Sir Thomas White, a merchant-tailor, and lord mayor of London, who is honourably distinguished as the founder of Gloucester Hall (now Worcester College), and of St. John's College, Oxford; also of Merchant-Tailors' school, London; and for his extensive charitable benefactions.

RIDDINGS, a market town and chapelry in the parish of ALFRETON, hundred of SCARSDALE, county of DERBY, 3 miles (S.) from Alfreton, with which the population is returned. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Derby, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, and in the patronage of W. P. Morewood, Esq. The chapel having long been demolished, a new one is now being erected in the early English style, for the completion of which, £1000 has been subscribed, and the remaining expense is to be defrayed by the commissioners, appointed under the late act, for promoting the building of additional churches and chapels. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists. The new line of road from Manchester to Nottingham, and a branch of the Cromford canal, connected with Mansfield by a rail-road, pass through this place, which has recently obtained the grant of a market: there are extensive iron-works, and furnaces for smelting iron-ore, immense quantities of which and of coal are obtained in the immediate neighbourhood, and give employment to a large proportion of the inhabitants, of whom some are also employed in the adjacent mines, forges, &c., of Birch-wood and Codnor Park. These establishments, formed about 1801, have been the cause of greatly increasing the population of Riddings, which, prior to that period, was but small; although in early ages it was a place of considerable consequence.

RIDDLES-QUARTER, a township in the parish of LONG HORSLEY, western division of MORPETH ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, containing 206 inhabitants, who are chiefly employed at the neighbouring coal and lime works.

RIDDLESWORTH, a parish in the hundred of GUILT-CROSS, county of NORFOLK, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from East Harling, containing 83 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, with that of Gas-thorpe, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £11. 2. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$. T. Thornhill, Esq. was patron in 1815. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

RIDGE, a parish in the hundred of CASHIO, or liberty of ST. ALBANS, county of HERTFORD, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Chipping-Barnet, containing 390 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of St. Albans, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Earl of Hardwicke. The church, dedicated to St. Margaret, is principally in the later style of English architecture. The river Colne runs through the parish. Here was a religious house, formerly an appendage to the abbey of St. Albans, but now a private residence.

RIDGE, a tything in the parish of CHILMARK, hundred of DUNWORTH, county of WILTS. The population is returned with the parish.

RIDGMONT, a parish in the hundred of REDBORNE-STOKE, county of BEDFORD, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Woburn, containing 810 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, with Segenhoe, in the archdeaconry of Bedford, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £9, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and is held by sequestration. The church, dedicated to All Saints, has lately received an addition of ninety-one free sittings, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £100 towards defraying the expense. The church at Segenhoe has been long since demolished. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

RIDGWELL, a parish in the hundred of HINCKFORD, county of ESSEX, 5 miles (N. W.) from Castle-Hedingham, containing 551 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the jurisdiction of the Commissary of Essex and Herts, concurrently with the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of London, rated in the king's books at £10, endowed with £1400 private benefaction, £1000 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Catherine Hall, Cambridge. The church is dedicated to St. Lawrence. There are places of worship for Baptists and Independents.

RIDING, a township in the parish of BYWELL ST. ANDREW, eastern division of TINDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 6 miles (E. S. E.) from Hexham, containing 135 inhabitants. A bridge was erected, in 1822, across a dangerous ford of Dipton Burn. The Roman Watling-street passes through the township.

RIDLEY, a township in that part of the parish of BUNBURY which is in the first division of the hundred of EDDISBURY, county palatine of CHESTER, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Nantwich, containing 123 inhabitants. Sir Thomas Egerton, an eminent lawyer, Lord Chancellor under James I., by whom he was created Viscount Brackley, was born here in 1540; he died in 1617.

RIDLEY, a parish in the hundred of AXTON, DARTFORD, and WILMINGTON, lathe of SUTTON at HONE, county of KENT, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N.) from Wrotham, containing 74 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Rochester, rated in the king's books at £3. 14. 9 $\frac{1}{2}$, and in the patronage of M. Lambard, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

RIDLEY, a township in the parish of HALTWHISTLE, western division of TINDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by S.) from Haltwhistle, containing 231 inhabitants. It is environed by the rivers Allen and South Tyne, which afterwards form a junction.

RIDLINGTON, a parish in the hundred of TUNSTEAD, county of NORFOLK, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E.) from North Walsham, containing 203 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, with East Ruston, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £4. 6. 8., and in the patronage of — Norris, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

RIDLINGTON, a parish in the hundred of MARTINSLEY, county of RUTLAND, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Uppingham, containing 247 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £10. 1. 3., and in the patronage of Sir G. N. Noel, Bart. The church is dedicated to St. Mary and St. Andrew.

RIDWARE (HAMSTALL), county of STAFFORD, — See HAMSTALL-RIDWARE.

RIDWARE (MAVESYN), a parish in the northern division of the hundred of OFFLOW, county of STAFFORD, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by S.) from Rudgeley, containing 598 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Dean of Lichfield, rated in the king's books at £7. 2. 11., and in the patronage of Charles Chadwick and J. N. Lane, Esqrs. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas. The parish is bounded by the Trent, and intersected by the river Blythe and the Grand Trunk canal. A court leet is held annually for the Ridwares, at Hamstall-Ridware and Aldridge alternately. A free school is supported by subscription. About three miles north of the church are slight remains of Blythbury priory.

RIDWARE (PIPE), a parish in the northern division of the hundred of OFFLOW, county of STAFFORD, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E.) from Rudgeley, containing 114 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Dean of Lichfield, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Prebendary of Alrewas in the Cathedral Church of Lichfield. The church is dedicated to St. James. The river Trent and the Grand Junction canal pass through the parish.

RIGSBY, a parish in the Wold division of the hundred of CALCEWORTH, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (W. by S.) from Alford, containing, with Ailsby, 107 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Alford, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln. The church is dedicated to St. James.

RIGTON, a township in the parish of KIRKBY-OVERBLOWS, upper division of the wapentake of CLARO, West riding of the county of YORK, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N.E.) from Otley, containing 429 inhabitants. It is within the peculiar jurisdiction of the Court of the Honour of Knaresborough. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

RIGTON, a joint township with Bardsey, in the parish of BARDSEY, lower division of the wapentake of SKYRACK, West riding of the county of YORK, 4 miles (S.W. by S.) from Wetherby. The population is returned with Bardsey.

RILLINGTON, a parish in the wapentake of BUCKROSE, East riding of the county of YORK, comprising the chapelry of Scampston, and the township of Rillington, and containing 883 inhabitants, of which number, 683 are in the township of Rillington, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E.N.E.) from New Malton. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of the East riding, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £8. 14. 9½., endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists.

RILSDON, a chapelry in the parish of BURNSALL, eastern division of the wapentake of STAINCLIFFE and EWCROSS, West riding of the county of YORK, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Skipton, containing 145 inhabitants.

RIMMINGTON, a township in the parish of GIBURN, western division of the wapentake of STAINCLIFFE and EWCROSS, West riding of the county of YORK, 5 miles (N.E.) from Clitheroe, containing 698 inhabitants.

RIMPTON, a parish forming a distinct portion of the hundred of TAUNTON and TAUNTON-DEAN, county of SOMERSET, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N.E. by N.) from Yeovil, containing 219 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £9. 19. 9½., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Winchester. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

RIMSWELL, a township in that part of the parish of OWTORNE which is in the southern division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESS, East riding of the county of YORK, $16\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Kingston upon Hull, containing 129 inhabitants.

RINGEY, a chapelry in the parish of BOWDON, hundred of BUCKLOW, county palatine of CHESTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.E.) from Altrincham. The population is returned with the parish. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, endowed with £800 private benefaction, £1000 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of W. Egerton, Esq.

RINGLAND, a parish in the hundred of EYNSFORD, county of NORFOLK, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.W. by W.) from Norwich, containing 286 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at and £3. 6. 0½., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Ely. The church is dedicated to St. Peter; the east window exhibits some ancient stained glass, representing several persons kneeling before a crucifix, and underneath them labels with Latin inscriptions.

VOL. III.

RINGLEY, a chapelry in the parish of OLDHAM cum PRESTWICH, hundred of SALFORD, county palatine of LANCASTER, 7 miles (N.W.) from Manchester. The population is returned with the parish. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Rector of Prestwich. The chapel is dedicated to the Holy Trinity. A school-house was erected, in 1640, by Nathan Walworth, who endowed it with land now producing an annual income of about £50, for which from forty to fifty children are taught to read; four others from Kearsley are taught here, for a trifling bequest by William Baguley.

RINGMER, a parish in the hundred of RINGMER, rape of PEVENSEY, county of SUSSEX, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.E. by E.) from Lewes, containing 1271 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £13. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is in the later style of English architecture. The river Ouse separates this parish from that of Barcombe. On the Broyle road, about three quarters of a mile from Ringmer, are commodious barracks for a detachment of the royal artillery usually stationed there. Lady Barbara, Thomas, and Sybilla Stapley, in 1699, gave each £100, for teaching sixteen poor children; the annual income, amounting to £10, is applied in support of a National school, and upwards of one hundred children are instructed in a school-house, which has been lately enlarged by subscription.

RINGMORE, a parish in the hundred of ERMINGTON, county of DEVON, 4 miles (S. by W.) from Modbury, containing 328 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Totness, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £19. 10. 7½., and in the patronage of the Rev. R. Butland. The parish is bounded on the north by the river Teign, across which a bridge has lately been erected, affording a direct communication between Teignmouth, Torquay, and the places adjacent.

RINGSFIELD, a parish in the hundred of WANGFORD, county of SUFFOLK, 2 miles (S.W. by W.) from Beccles, containing 280 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, consolidated with Little Redisham, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £12, and in the patronage of the Rev. Gunton Postle. The church, dedicated to All Saints, is a small ancient building, covered with thatch. There are some remains of the chapel of Little Redisham. This parish enjoys the right of sending two children to the free school at Beccles.

RINGSHALL, a parish in the hundred of BOSMERE and CLAYDON, county of SUFFOLK, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S.W.) from Needham, containing 304 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £11. 18. 1½., and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Pembroke College, Oxford.

RINGSTEAD, a parish in the hundred of HIGHAM-FERRERS, county of NORTHAMPTON, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. by W.) from Thrapston, containing 583 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, with Denford, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough. Thomas Burton, Esq. was patron in 1822. The church, dediated to St. Mary, is principally in the early style of English architecture, with a tower and spire; it contains a plain ancient font on moulded shafts. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyan Methodists. At the hamlet of Mill Cotton are the remains of a square Roman camp, consisting of lofty ramparts, defended by a deep moat; and near it is the site of an ancient town, where fragments and foundations of walls, with a few coins, have been turned up by the plough.

RINGSTEAD (GREAT), a parish in the hundred of SMITHDON, county of NORFOLK, $7\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Burnham-Westgate, containing, with the hamlet of Chosell, 453 inhabitants. It comprises the consolidated parishes of St. Andrew and St. Peter, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, the former of which is a discharged rectory, rated in the king's books at £9, and the latter a rectory, rated at £11. 6. 8. H. Styleman, Esq. was patron in 1811.

RINGSTEAD (LITTLE), a parish in the hundred of SMITHDON, county of NORFOLK, 8 miles (W. by S.) from Burnham-Westgate. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £3. 6. 8., but the church dedicated to St. Andrew being demolished, it has been united to the vicarage of Great Ringstead. There is only a farmhouse remaining.

RINGSWOULD, a parish in the cinque-port liberty of DOVER, though locally in the hundred of Cornilo, lathe of St. Augustine, county of KENT, 3 miles (S. S.W.) from Deal, containing 495 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £13. 12. 6., and in the patronage of the Rev. John Monins. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas. A market and a fair were formerly held here, but both have been disused. Kingsdown, in this parish, lies adjacent to the sea-shore, and from its being noticed in ancient charters, appears to have been a place of considerable importance, though it is at present only a small fishing village: by means of a capstan, the fishermen wind on shore their boats, commonly called Kingsdown boats. In a valley between two downs in the vicinity are vestiges of an encampment supposed to be of Roman construction.

RINGWOOD, a parish partly in the northern division of the hundred of NEW FOREST, New Forest (East) division, but chiefly in that part of the hundred of RINGWOOD which is in the New Forest (West) division, of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, comprising the market town of Ringwood, the tything of Burley with the Ville of Bistern Closes, and the extra-parochial liberty of Burley Lodge, and containing, exclusively of the extra-parochial liberty of Woodgreen, 3804 inhabitants, of which number, 3471 are in the town of Ringwood, 20 miles (W. S. W.) from Southampton, and 91 (S. W. by W.) from London. This place is of great antiquity, having been of considerable importance during the Saxon times, and was originally named Regnum, or "the town of the Regni," mentioned by Antoninus; and afterwards Rinovid, and Regnewood, which, by a Saxon termination, denotes "the wood of the Regni." The town is situated on the eastern bank of the navigable river Avon, which, dividing eastward into three branches, over each of which is a stone bridge, afterwards collects its waters into a broad expanse, with an island in the middle, crossed by a causeway: it is well built, and consists principally of four streets; the inhabitants are supplied with good water, and the atmosphere is considered to be very salubrious. The manufacture of woollen cloth and stockings was formerly carried on to a considerable extent, but it has declined: here is a large brewery for ale. The market is on Wednesday, and fairs are held on July 10th and December 11th, principally for cattle and forest colts. Manorial courts are held twice a year, at one of which a constable is annually appointed; and petty sessions for the New Forest (West) division are holden here. The living is a vicarage, with the chapel of Harbridge, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Incumbent, rated in the king's books at £75. 5. 5., and in the patronage of the Provost and Fellows of King's College, Cambridge. The church, which is dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul, is an ancient and spacious structure, but has undergone much modern alteration. There are places of worship for Independents and Unitarians. The free grammar school was founded, in 1586, by Richard Lyne, who bequeathed a house and rent-charge of £13. 6. 8. for that purpose; this endowment having been subsequently increased by various bequests, the present annual income is upwards of £30: about sixteen children are instructed, but classical tuition has not been required for several years. An exhibition of £6 per annum to either of the Universities was founded by Thomas Lyne, by will dated 1621, for a poor scholar from this school.

RIPE, a parish in the hundred of SHIPLAKE, rape of PEVENSEY, county of SUSSEX, 6 miles (W. by N.) from Haylsham, containing 364 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Lewes, and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £11. 10., and in the patronage of the Rector and Fellows of Exeter College, Oxford. The church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, is a handsome structure, partly in the decorated, and partly in the early English, style; the windows were formerly filled with stained glass, of which there are now but slight remains. Here is a powerful chalybeate spring.

RIPLEY, a chapelry in the parish of PENTRICH, hundred of MORLESTON and LITCHURCH, county of DERBY, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. by W.) from Alfreton, containing 1635 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Derby, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, endowed with £2200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Duke of Devonshire, by whose liberality, and that of others, aided by a grant of £375 from the Incorporated Society for building and enlarging churches, &c., the present commodious chapel was erected in 1820, and consecrated in 1821. There are places of worship for Wesleyan Methodists and Unitarians. A free school, built in 1819, is supported by voluntary contributions, and attended by about thirty-five children. At Hartshay, in this township, are extensive collieries. Ripley was anciently a market town, chartered about the reign of Henry III., and is still a flourishing place. An urn, containing a number of coins of Gallienus, Carausius, Victorinus, and others, was discovered here in 1730.

RIPLEY, a chapelry in the parish of SEND, second division of the hundred of WOKING, county of SURREY, 6 miles (N. E.) from Guildford. The population is returned with the parish. The chapel has lately received an addition of one hundred and sixty sittings, of which one hundred are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £100 towards defraying the expense. There is a place of worship for Baptists. George Ripley, the famous alchymist, and Carmelite friar, whose works were printed at Cassel, in 1549, is stated to have been born here.

RIPLEY, a parish (formerly a market town) partly in the upper, but chiefly in the lower, division of the wapentake of CLARO, West riding of the county of YORK, 23 miles (W. by N.) from York, and 208 (N.N.W.) from London, containing, with the townships of Clint and Killinghall, 1182 inhabitants. This place is situated on rising ground, about half a mile north from the river Nidd, and consists of one broad street, the old houses in which having been recently taken down, and replaced by others of stone, in the English style of architecture, at the expense of Sir W. A. Ingilby, Bart., it presents a very pleasing appearance, and the country surrounding it is highly cultivated, and beautifully picturesque. The market was held on Wednesday, but it has fallen into disuse. The fairs are on Easter-Monday and Tuesday, and the 26th of August, principally for horses, sheep, and cattle.

The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £23. 8. 9., and in the patronage of Sir William Amcotts Ingilby, Bart. The church, dedicated to All Saints, contains some handsome monuments of the Ingilby family, among which is one to the memory of Sir Thomas de Ingilby, Justice of the Common Pleas in the time of Edward III., and in the churchyard there is a curious pedestal of an ancient cross, with eight niches, apparently intended for kneeling. A free school was founded and endowed, in 1702, by Mary and Catherine Ingilby; the present income is about £40 a year, and from fifty to sixty children are instructed in reading, writing, and arithmetic: this school is free for the children of the whole parish. A school at Burnt Yates was founded by Admiral Long, in 1760, and endowed with property, which, with some small additions subsequently made to it, now produces £200 per annum; of this sum £70 a year is paid to the master and mistress, £50 a year to a superannuated master, the remainder being applied to paying off a debt, and sundry expenses connected with the establishment. Children from the townships of Clint and Winsley are admitted, and instructed in reading, writing, and arithmetic; the average number is about twenty-two boys, and as many girls. There are charitable endowments to the amount of about £40 per annum in the town of Ripley, the principal of which are Lord Craven's and Mrs. Hardy's. Ripley castle, the seat of the Ingilby family, was erected in 1555, though so much modernised, as to retain few traces of the original structure. Oliver Cromwell passed the night succeeding the battle of Marston Moor in this castle.

RIPLINGTON, a township in the parish of WHALTON, western division of CASTLE ward, county of NORTHUMBRIA, 7½ miles (W. S.W.) from Morpeth, containing 25 inhabitants.

RIPLINGTON, a tything in that part of the parish of EAST MEON which is in the hundred of EAST MEON, Alton (South) division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 6 miles (W. by N.) from Petersfield. The population is returned with the parish. It is within the jurisdiction of the Cheyney Court held at Winchester every Thursday, for the recovery of debts to any amount.

RIPON, a parish comprising the borough and market town of Ripon, the chapelries of Bishop-Monckton, Bishop-Thornton, Patteley-Bridge, Sawley, and Skelton, and the townships of Aismunderby with Bondgate, High and Low Bishopside, Bishopton, Clothholme, Eavestone, Givendale, Grantley with Skeldin, Hewick-Bridge, Hewick-

Seal and Arms.

Copt, Ingerthorpe, Markington with Wallerthwaite, Mars-ton with Moseby, Newby with Mulwith, Nunwick with Howgrave, Sharrow, North Stainley with Leningford, Sutton-Grange, Warsill, Westwick, and Whitcliff with Thorpe, within the liberty of RIPON, and the chapelries of Aldfield and Winksley, and the townships of Beverley, Dacre, Shelding, Studley-Roger, and Studley-Royal, in the lower division of the wapentake of CLARO, West riding of the county of YORK, and containing 14,115 inhabitants, of which number, 4563 are in the town of Ripon, which possesses separate jurisdiction, though locally in the liberty of Ripon, 23 miles (N.W. by W.) from York, and 212 (N.N.W.) from London. This town, which is of considerable antiquity, is supposed to derive its name from the Latin Ripa, from its situation on the bank of the river Ure. The earliest record we find respecting it is about the middle of the seventh century, when a monastery was founded here by Eata, abbot of Melrose in Scotland (the town at that time consisting of only thirty houses), which was subsequently given by Alfred, King of Northumbria, to Wilfred, Archbishop of York, who not only improved the monastery, but by his patronage of the town very much increased its wealth and consequence. In the ninth century it was plundered and burnt by the Danes, and so complete was the devastation, that only the remaining ruins denoted its former existence; it, however, recovered so quickly as to be incorporated a royal borough by Alfred the Great, in 886, but it shared in the destruction which Edred, in suppressing the insurrections of the Northumbrian Danes, carried through that province; and it had scarcely recovered from this devastation when it suffered from the unrelenting vengeance of William the Conqueror, who, after defeating the Northumbrian rebels, in 1069, laid waste the country, and so effectually demolished this town that it remained for some time in ruins, and at the period of the Norman survey it lay waste and uncultivated. The monastery, after its destruction by Edred, was rebuilt, chiefly by Oswald and his successors, Archbishops of York, and was endowed and made collegiate by Archbishop Aldred, about the time of the Conquest. Profiting by a period of comparative tranquillity, Ripon had again begun to revive, when it was once more exposed to the ravages of war by the progress of the Scots, under Robert Bruce, in the reign of Edward II., who, after exacting from the wretched inhabitants all that could be wrung from them, destroyed the town by fire. Aided by donations from the Archbishop of York and the neighbouring gentry, and by the industry of the remaining inhabitants, it so rapidly recovered as to be selected by Henry IV. for the residence of himself and his court, when driven from London by the plague; and the same calamity induced the Lord President of York to remove his court hither in 1604. In 1617, James I. passed a night here, on his route from Scotland to London, and was presented by the mayor with a gilt bowl and a pair of Ripon spurs; and it was also visited by his unfortunate successor, Charles I., in 1633. In the great civil war it was taken possession of, and held for the parliament, by the troops under the command of Sir Thomas Mauleverer, who defaced and injured many of the monuments and ornamental parts of the church, and were at length defeated and driven from the town by a detachment of the king's cavalry, under Sir John Mallory of Studley.

Ripon is situated between the rivers Ure and Skell, and although the streets are narrow and irregular, the houses, which are chiefly of brick, are, with few exceptions, well built: it is well paved, and was first lighted with gas in November 1830: the inhabitants are plentifully supplied with water from the Skell, by an engine erected by Alderman Askwith. The theatre, built in 1792, has been converted into a riding-school. The river Ure, which is crossed, at a short distance from the town, by a handsome stone bridge of seventeen arches, two hundred and fifty-six yards in length, was made navigable as far as Ripon by an act passed in 1767, and a second act, obtained in 1820, incorporated the proprietors, by the style of "The Company of Proprietors of the River Ure Navigation to Ripon:" barges of from twenty-five to thirty tons' burden are employed in bringing coal and merchandise of various kinds from Hull, York, and other places to the town, and are laden in return with lead, butter, and other produce. This place was formerly celebrated for its manufacture of spurs and woollen cloths, both which have, however, ceased to exist, and its present trade is somewhat limited: linen is manufactured to an inconsiderable extent, and during the season there is a weekly market for wool, which is much resorted to by the manufacturers from Leeds, Halifax, &c. The market, which is on Thursday, is well supplied with provisions: in the market-place, a spacious and well-built square, is an obelisk, ninety feet in height, erected in 1781, by William Aislabie, Esq., on the top of which are a bugle-horn and a spur-rowel, the arms of Ripon. Fairs are held on the first Thursday after the 20th day after Old Christmas-day, May 13th and 14th, first Thursday and Friday in June, Thursday after August 2nd, first Thursday in November, and November 23rd, for cattle and various kinds of merchandise. By charter of James I., in 1604, and confirmed by James II., in 1687, the officers of the corporation consist of a mayor, twelve aldermen, and twenty-four common council-men, assisted by a recorder and town clerk: the mayor and his two immediate predecessors are magistrates for the borough and liberty. A court military, for the recovery of debts to any amount, the officers of which are appointed by the Archbishop of York, whose authority for their appointment existed by prescription before the Conquest, and has been subsequently confirmed by several charters of inspeximus; the last granted in the reign of George II., has jurisdiction within the borough and liberty; the latter of which, exclusively of the parish of Ripon, comprises the townships of Felix-Kirk and Sutton under Whitestone Cliffe, in the parish of Felix-Kirk, the township of Kilburn, in the parish of Kilburn, the parish of Nidd with Killinghall, and the township of Marton cum Moxby, in the parish of Marton. Justices of the peace for the liberty are appointed by the Archbishop of York, and, in conjunction with the mayor and the recorder, hold sessions for the borough and liberty; and petty sessions are held in the town hall every Friday, by the magistrates for the borough and liberty, occasionally for the North and West ridings of the county. The town hall, built in 1801, at the expense of Mrs. Allanson of Studley, is a lofty, spacious, and handsome structure of freestone, comprising assembly-rooms, and a committee-room for magisterial business and public meetings. The Archbishop of York has a criminal court and a prison here. This borough first sent members to parliament in the 23rd of Edward I.; in the reign of Edward II. the privilege was discontinued, but was revived in the time of Edward VI., and has been since exercised without interruption. The right of election is vested in burgage tenants, the number of voters being one hundred and seventy-seven; the mayor is the returning officer, and the principal influence is possessed by Mrs. Lawrence of Studley.

Ripon was formerly the see of a bishop, and is now the head of a deanery, in the patronage of the Crown: at the period of the dissolution of the monastic establishments, it possessed seven prebends and nine chantries, with subordinate officers; it was refounded by James I., in 1604, who added a dean to the seven prebendaries, and endowed it with £247 per annum: its present establishment consists of a dean, subdean, and six prebendaries, with inferior officers, and it sends a proctor to the convocation of the province of York. The dean and chapter have a prison, and are authorised, by charter of James I., to hold a court of pleas, called the Canon Fee Court, in which they appoint their own officers, the charter stating that such authority had long appertained to them, but this court has fallen into disuse. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Archbishop of York, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Ripon. The church, dedicated to St. Peter and St. Wilfred, is a large cruciform building, with two square towers at the western end, each one hundred and ten feet high, embattled and surmounted with pinnacles; and, in the centre, another square tower standing upon four pillars with arches, and ornamented with a cupola on its north-western angle: on each of these towers there was formerly a spire, those on the towers at the western end being each one hundred and twenty feet in height, and that on the central tower still higher; but the latter having been blown down in 1660, causing considerable damage to the roof, the others were taken down. The length of the side aisles is one hundred and ten feet, and that of the transverse aisle, one hundred and twenty-nine. The choir is ninety-two feet in length, and thirty-four in breadth; on its southern side is the chapter-house, over which is the library, containing a good collection of ancient works, and portraits of many of the kings and queens of England. Under the nave of the church is a chapel, in which is a place called St. Wilfred's Needle, which tradition says was used for the trial of female chastity. The bishop's throne and the stalls are ornamented with carved work; the east window, which is fifty-one feet by twenty-five, and in which are the arms of James I., of England and France, of the ecclesiastical society, and of the town, is very magnificent, the painted glass having been lately renovated: there are many beautiful and curious monuments in the church. A new church, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, erected at an expense of about £13,000, by the Rev. Edward Kilvington, was built in 1826: it is a handsome structure of freestone, in the later style of English architecture, with a tower seventy-one feet in height, upon which is a beautiful spire sixty-five feet high: the interior is neatly fitted up, and contains one thousand sittings, two hundred of which are free. There are two places of worship for Wesleyan Methodists, and one each for Independents and Primitive Methodists.

The free grammar school was founded and liberally endowed by Philip and Mary, in 1553: the management is vested in trustees, by whom the master and usher are appointed, the former of whom has a rent-free residence, and a salary of £180 per annum, and the latter £63 per annum: the school is open to the sons of resident inhabitants, and the number of scholars on the foundation varies from fourteen to nineteen. Jepson's hospital was founded and endowed by Zacharias Jepson, in 1672, for boarding, clothing, and educating twenty sons of poor freemen, or orphans: the number now in the establishment is only ten, who are admitted at seven years of age, and at fifteen are apprenticed, with a premium of £5 each: the present income is about £217 per annum. National schools for children of both sexes are supported by donations and subscription. The hospital of St. Mary Magdalene, situated in Stammergeate, was founded and endowed by Thurstan, Archbishop of York, early in the twelfth century, and rebuilt by Dr. Hooke, Prebendary of Ripon, and master of the hospital, in 1674; it affords an asylum to six poor widows, who have a yearly allowance: the Dean of Ripon is usually the master, the appointment being in the gift of the Archbishop of York. A chapel adjoins the hospital, in which, on certain days, divine service is performed. The hospital of St. John the Baptist was founded by an archbishop of York, probably so early as the reign of King John: it is a small building, in which two poor women, who are named by the master, are lodged, and have a small annual allowance. The dean is also master of this hospital, under the appointment of the archbishop. The hospital of St. Anne, in Agnes' Gate, under the management of the mayor and aldermen, was founded, in the reign of Edward IV., by one of the family of Neville, in which eight poor women are lodged, and receive a yearly allowance. At the eastern end of the town is a curious relic of antiquity, called Alla, or Ailo's, Hill: it is a tumulus in the form of a cone, composed of sand, gravel, and human bones, and is supposed to derive its name from Ælla, King of Northumberland, who was slain in 867, fighting against the Danes. The circumference of this hill, at the base, is about three hundred yards, and the height of the slope about seventy-four yards. In Studley park, about three miles from Ripon, are the magnificent remains of Fountains' abbey, supposed to be the most perfect and splendid in the kingdom; the ruins occupy a space of about two acres, and this noble institution, at the period of its dissolution, covered nearly twelve acres of ground, and was valued at £1173 per annum. The ancient custom of blowing a horn three times at the mayor's door, and at the market cross, at nine o'clock every evening, continues, though that part of it which imposed a tax of fourpence upon every housekeeper, if any house or shop was robbed between that hour and sunrise the next morning, has ceased. Ripon was the birthplace of Dr. Beilby Porteus, a recent Bishop of London.

RIPPINGALE, a parish in the wapentake of AVELAND, parts of KESTIVEN, county of LINCOLN, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N.) from Bourne, containing 611 inhabitants. The living is a rectory in three parts, consolidated in 1725, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln; two parts are rated in the king's books at £14. 7. 1., and the third at £7. 3. 9.; it is in the patronage of the Governors of the Charter-house, London. The church, dedicated to St. Andrew, is a large structure, partly in the decorated and partly in the later English style, containing several fine tombs, the principal of which being in a portion of the building used as a school, are much mutilated.

RIPPLE, a ward in the parish of BARKING, hundred of BECONTREE, county of ESSEX, 10 miles (E. by N.) from London, containing 361 inhabitants.

RIPPLE, a parish in the hundred of CORNILO, lathe of ST. AUGUSTINE, county of KENT, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Deal, containing 171 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £5. 19. $4\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Rev. R. Mesham, and C. F. Palmer, and Thomas Huddleston, Esqrs. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is in the early style of English architecture: near it is a military work, thrown up by Cæsar in his route from the sea to his principal camp on Barham Down. There is also, in another part of the parish, a small oblong intrenchment, enclosing several small mounds.

RIPPLE, a parish partly in the lower division of the hundred of PERSHORE, but chiefly in the lower division of the hundred of OSWALDSLOW, county of WORCESTER, 3 miles (S. E. by E.) from Upton upon Severn, containing, with the chapelry of Queenhill, and the hamlet of Holdfast, 963 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Incumbent, rated in the king's books at £42. 6. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Worcester. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. The river Severn passes through the parish, which abounds with good limestone. A court leet is occasionally held here. A monastery existed at Ripple so early as the year 770, in Bishop Mildred's time, and was granted to the church of Worcester, by Duke Ælfred, about the commencement of the ninth century.

RIPPONDEN, a chapelry in the parish of HALIFAX, wapentake of MORLEY, West riding of the county of YORK, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W.) from Halifax, with which the population is returned. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Halifax. The chapel, dedicated to St. Bartholomew, was rebuilt in the Tuscan order soon after the great flood that happened here in 1722, which not only did considerable injury to the ancient structure, but laid open many graves, and carried away bridges, mills, houses, and every other impediment to its progress. The cemetery is surrounded with ancient yew-trees cut in the form of Saxon arches. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

RIPTON (ABBOTT'S), a parish in the hundred of HURSTINGSTONE, county of HUNTINGDON, 4 miles (N.) from Huntingdon, containing, with Wennington, 379 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Huntingdon, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £21. 7. 6. Mr. and Mrs. Rooper were patrons in 1806. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew. There is a chapel of ease at Wennington, in this parish.

RIPTON (KING'S), a parish in the hundred of HURSTINGSTONE, county of HUNTINGDON, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Huntingdon, containing, with the hamlet of Sapley, 260 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Huntingdon, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £11. 19. 7., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

RISBOROUGH (MONKS'), a parish in the hundred of AYLESBURY, county of BUCKINGHAM, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Great Missenden, containing 934 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £30. The church is dedicated to St. Dunstan. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. William Quarby, in 1727, bequeathed £2 per annum for teaching poor boys. The great cross, called White Leaf Cross, cut on the side of the chalk hills near the village, is supposed to be a memorial of some victory obtained by the Saxons over the Danes.

RISBOROUGH (PRINCE'S), a market town and parish in the hundred of AYLESBURY, county of BUCKINGHAM, 6 miles (W. by N.) from Great Missenden, and 37 (W. N. W.) from London, containing 1958 inhabitants. This place, which is situated at the foot of the Chiltern hills, derives its distinguishing appellation from having been the residence of Edward the Black Prince, whose palace is supposed to have stood within the site of a spacious moat, now dry, in a field adjoining the churchyard. The manor had at an early period been granted by the crown to Richard, Earl of Cornwall and King of the Romans, who died in 1272; and at a later date it was assigned to Katherine, queen of Henry V., for her dower; it was sold by Charles I., in 1637, to certain citizens of London. The town, though greatly improved of late, is still badly paved and not lighted; it is abundantly supplied with water from wells. The market was established by charter of Henry III., who also granted the inhabitants other privileges, including exemption from toll, and from attendance at assizes, sessions, &c.; it was formerly on Saturday, but was changed to Thursday, on which day it is now held; it is a pitched market for corn, and pigs and sheep are also brought to it; there is an annual fair for cattle on the 6th of May: the market-house, a small brick building, was rebuilt in 1824: there is a small theatre.

The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, and diocese of Lincoln, endowed with £8 per annum, and £1100 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £2300 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of John Grubb, Esq. The church, which is dedicated to St. Mary, is an ancient structure, with a neat spire: it contains some monuments of crusaders, or Knights Templars, stone stalls, and other interesting relics of antiquity: an addition of two hundred and sixty-seven sittings, of which two hundred and forty-two are free, have been recently made, towards defraying the expense of which, the Incorporated Society for building and enlarging churches and chapels contributed £150. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyan Methodists. Mrs. Chibnall, who formerly owned the manor, gave a sum of money to provide clothing for twenty-four poor women annually.

RISBRIDGE (MONKS'), an extra-parochial liberty, in the hundred of RISBRIDGE, county of SUFFOLK, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W.) from Clare, containing 11 inhabitants.

RISBURY, a township partly in the parish of HUMBER, and partly in that of STOKE-PRIOR, hundred of WOLPHY, county of HEREFORD, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Leominster, containing 150 inhabitants. Here are the remains of a Danish camp, with triple intrenchments, enclosing an area of about thirty acres.

RISBY, a joint parish with Roxby, in the northern division of the wapentake of MANLEY, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 8 miles (N. W. by N.) from Glandford-Bridge. The population is returned with Roxby. The living is a vicarage, united in 1717 to that of Roxby, in the archdeaconry of Stow, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £5. 6. 8. The church is dedicated to St. Bartholomew.

RISBY, a parish in the hundred of THINGOE, county of SUFFOLK, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Bury-St. Edmund's, containing 293 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with that of Fornham St. Geneveve, in the archdeaconry of Sudbury, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £19. 10. 5. The church is dedicated to St. Giles.

RISCA, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of WENTLLOOG, county of MONMOUTH, 5 miles (N. W. by W.) from Newport, containing 358 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaff, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Bassaleg. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

RISE, a parish in the northern division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESS, East riding of the county of YORK, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from Beverley, containing 221 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of the East riding, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £10. 0. 5., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is an ancient structure, in a very dilapidated state, containing several marble monuments to the Bethell family.

RISEBROUGH (THORNTON), a township in the parish of NORMANBY, wapentake of RYEDALE, North riding of the county of YORK, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Pickering, containing 32 inhabitants.

RISEHOLME, a parish in the wapentake of LAWRESS, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Lincoln, containing, with the extra-parochial district of Grainge de Ligne, 73 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Stow, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £4, and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Balliol College, Oxford. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

RISHANGLES, a parish in the hundred of HARTISMERE, county of SUFFOLK, 4 miles (S.) from Eye, containing 208 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Sudbury, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £7. 13. 1½. John Vernon, Esq. was patron in 1821. The church is dedicated to St. Margaret.

RISHTON, a township in the parish of BLACKBURN, lower division of the hundred of BLACKBURN, county palatine of LANCASTER, 3½ miles (N.E. by E.) from Blackburn, containing 1170 inhabitants.

RISHWORTH, a township in the parish of HALIFAX, wapentake of MORLEY, West riding of the county of YORK, 4 miles (S.W.) from Halifax, containing 1588 inhabitants. The Baptists have a place of worship here. A free grammar school, founded by John Wheelwright in 1724, for the poorest of his tenants' children, is liberally endowed.

RISLEY, a parish in the hundred of STODDEN, county of BEDFORD, 5¼ miles (S.W. by W.) from Kimbolton, containing 790 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Bedford, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £8. 7. 6., and in the patronage of Lord St. John. The church is dedicated to All Saints. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists, and a Moravian establishment. A fair is held on Shrove Tuesday. Near Melchburne House, the seat of Lord St. John, are the remains of the old castle, from which the family derive their title.

RISLEY, a chapelry partly in the parish of SANDICRE, and partly in that of SAWLEY, hundred of MORLESTON and LITCHURCH, county of DERBY, 7½ miles (E. by S.) from Derby, containing 288 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Prebendary of Sawley in the Cathedral Church of Lichfield, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Earl of Stamford and Warrington. A school-house was erected, in 1718, by Elizabeth Gray, who endowed it with certain lands, now producing, with a rent-charge of £13. 6. 8. previously bequeathed by Catharine Willon, an annual income of about £380, for which from fifty to seventy boys, and about fifty girls, receive gratuitous instruction. The poor are entitled to be admitted into Smedley's almshouse at Ilkeston. Sir Hugh Willoughby, a native of this place, was employed to discover the north-west passage in the reign of Edward VI., but was frozen to death with his crew on the coast of Lapland, in 1554.

RISSINGTON (GREAT), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of SLAUGHTER, county of GLOUCESTER, 5¾ miles (S.) from Stow on the Wold, containing 446 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £22. 0. 5., and in the patronage of Lord Dynevor. The church is dedicated to St. John the Baptist. The parish is bounded on the west by the river Windrush, and on the east by Oxfordshire.

RISSINGTON (LITTLE), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of SLAUGHTER, county of GLOUCESTER, 3¾ miles (S.) from Stow on the Wold, containing 229 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £10. 3. 1½., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

RISSINGTON (WICK), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of SLAUGHTER, county of GLOUCESTER, 3 miles (S.) from Stow on the Wold, containing 231 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £16. 2. 6., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, has lately received an addition of fifty-five sittings, thirty of which are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £50 towards defraying the expense. The old Fosse-way bounds the parish on the north-east.

RISTON, county of NORFOLK.—See RYSTON.

RISTON, a joint township with Brompton, in that part of the parish of CHURCH-STOKE which is in the hundred of CHIRBURY, county of SALOP, 7 miles (N.W.) from Bishop's Castle. The population is returned with Brompton.

RISTON (LONG), a parish in the northern division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESS, East riding of the county of YORK, 6¾ miles (E.N.E.) from Beverley, containing, with part of the township of Arnold, 361 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, united to the vicarage of Hornsea, in the archdeaconry of the East riding, and diocese of York. The church is dedicated to St. Margaret. There is a place of worship for Independents.

RITTON-COLTPARK, a township in the parish of NETHERWITTON, western division of MORPETH ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 6 miles (S. by E.) from Rothbury, containing 64 inhabitants.

RITTON-WHITEHOUSE, a township in the parish of NETHERWITTON, western division of MORPETH ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 5¾ miles (S.) from Rothbury, containing 23 inhabitants.

RIVAULX, a township in the parish of HELMSLEY, wapentake of RYEDALE, North riding of the county of YORK, 2¾ miles (W. by N.) from Helmsley, containing 212 inhabitants. An abbey, the first of the Cistercian order in Yorkshire, was founded here in 1131, by Walter L'Espece, in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary, and at the dissolution possessed a revenue of £351. 14. 6. The venerable ruins of this once sumptuous monastery are situated near the rural village of Rivaux, in a sequestered valley, through which winds the river Rye, on every side encompassed by heights crowned with majestic woods. The principal remains, which are those of the church and the refectory, exhibit a mixture of Norman and early English architecture; the choir, in particular, is a beautiful composition still in good preservation; it is one hundred and forty-four feet long, by sixty-three feet wide, the transept one hundred and eighteen feet by thirty-three, and the probable length of the nave one hundred and fifty feet, dimensions which entitled it to rank amongst the largest, as it did with the most magnificent, abbey churches in the kingdom.

RIVENHALL, a parish in the hundred of WITHAM, county of ESSEX, 2¾ miles (N. by E.) from Witham, containing 591 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Colchester, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £21. 5. 5. C. W. Western, Esq. was patron in 1824. The church is dedicated to St. Mary and All Saints. Thomas Tusser, author of a popular work, entitled "Five Hundred Points of good Husbandry," was born here about the beginning of the sixteenth century.

RIVER, a parish in the hundred of BEWSBOROUGH, lathe of ST. AUGUSTINE, county of KENT, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W.) from Dover, containing 701 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £7. 1. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The church, dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul, is principally in the early style of English architecture, and has lately received an addition of one hundred and seventy-five sittings, of which one hundred and thirty-five are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £120 towards defraying the expense. Upon a hill on the north side of the parish several tumuli have been opened, each of which contained a skeleton, the head of a spear, and a sword about three feet long and two inches broad.

RIVER-GREEN, an extra-parochial liberty in the western division of CASTLE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 5 miles (W. S. W.) from Morpeth, containing 51 inhabitants.

RIVERHEAD, a chapelry in the parish of SEVEN-OAKS, hundred of Codsheath, lathe of SUTTON at HONE, county of KENT, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N. W. by N.) from Seven-Oaks, containing 1216 inhabitants. An episcopal chapel is now being erected by Lord Amherst and M. Lambard, Esq., by whom it will be endowed: the living will be a district incumbency, in the patronage of the founders, at whose decease the right of presentation will lapse to the Vicar of Seven-Oaks. There is a small endowment for instructing ten poor children in reading, writing, and arithmetic.

RIVINGTON, a chapelry in the parish of BOLTON, hundred of SALFORD, county palatine of LANCASTER, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Chorley, containing 583 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, endowed with £400 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Inhabitants. The Unitarians have a place of worship here. A free grammar school was founded, about 1586, by the inhabitants, pursuant to letters patent granted by Queen Elizabeth, on petition of James, Bishop of Durham. The original endowment amounted to only £15 per annum, but, in 1823, the governors obtained the permission of his late Majesty, to hold lands not exceeding the annual value of £400; the present income is upwards of £300: there are three masters, who instruct about one hundred and fifty children, many of whom receive a classical education. Veins of lead and calamine have been worked in the neighbourhood. On a lofty hill in this chapelry is an old building, called the Pike.

RIXTON, a township in the parish of WARRINGTON, hundred of WEST DERBY, county palatine of LANCASTER, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from Warrington, containing 990 inhabitants.

ROACH, or ROCHE, a parish in the eastern division of the hundred of POWDER, county of CORNWALL, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from St. Columb Major, containing 1425 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £20. Samuel Thornton, Esq. was patron in 1819. The church, dedicated to St. Gomonda, has lately received an addition of one hundred free sittings, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £70 towards defraying the expense. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. This place is believed to have derived its name from some remarkable rocks, commonly called Roche rocks, on the principal of which are the ruins of a small chapel and cell of a celebrated hermit, dedicated to St. Michael. Hainsborough, or Hensborough, one of the loftiest elevations in Cornwall, commanding a most extensive prospect, is partly in this parish.

ROAD, a parish in the hundred of FROME, county of SOMERSET, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Frome, containing 1217 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, with that of Wolverton, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, rated in the king's books at £11. 9. 4. Sir A. Baynton, Bart. was patron in 1812. The church is dedicated to St. Lawrence. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyan Methodists. A considerable manufacture of cloth is carried on here; and a fair for cattle and cheese is held on the Monday after August 29th. In the neighbourhood is a chalybeate spring.

ROADE, a parish in the hundred of CLELEY, county of NORTHAMPTON, 5 miles (S.) from Northampton, containing 480 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Collingtree, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a place of worship for Baptists.

ROBOROUGH, a parish in the hundred of FREMINGTON, county of DEVON, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by S.) from Great Torrington, containing 523 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Barnstaple, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £10. 8. 9., and in the patronage of the Rev. Thomas May. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

ROBURNDALÉ, a township in the parish of MEL-LING, hundred of LONSDALE, south of the sands, county palatine of LANCASTER, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Lancaster, containing 237 inhabitants.

ROBY, a township in the parish of HUYTON, hundred of WEST DERBY, county palatine of LANCASTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Prescott, containing 310 inhabitants.

ROCESTER, a parish in the southern division of the hundred of TOTMONSLOW, county of STAFFORD, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Uttoxeter, containing 1037 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Stafford, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £4, endowed with £400 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Mrs. Alsop. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, has lately received an addition of three hundred and thirty sittings, of which two hundred and seventy are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £250 towards defraying the expense. The rivers Churnet and Dove run through the parish, and unite a little below the village. A canal passes from Uttoxeter to the Potteries, by which coal and lime are brought for the supply of the neighbourhood, as also goods from Liverpool and Manchester. A large cotton-mill, built by the late Sir Richard Arkwright, is in active operation. Two poor children are taught for a trifling annuity, the gift of Mary Biddulph. An abbey for Black canons, in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary, was founded here, in 1146, by Richard Bacoun, the revenue of which, at the dissolution, was valued at £111. 11. 7.

ROCHDALE, a parish comprising the chapelries of Blatchinworth and Todmorden, and the townships of Butterworth Castleton, Spotland (Further Side), Spotland (Nearer Side), Walsden, Wardleworth, and Wuerdale with Wardle, in the hundred of SALFORD, county palatine of LANCASTER, and the chapelry of Saddleworth with Quick, in the upper division of the wapentake of AGRIGG, West riding of the county of YORK, and containing 61,011 inhabitants; the market town of Rochdale being situated partly in the townships of Castleton, Spotland, and Wardleworth, 50 miles (S. E.) from Lancaster, and 198 (N. N. W.) from London. This place takes its name from the river Roche, on which it is situated, and appears, from the name of a part of the vale below Castle Hill, which is called Killer Dane, or Deyne, to have been celebrated for the slaughter of the Danes, who having, in their predatory incursions, penetrated into this part of the county, met with a signal overthrow. The castle, from which the township of Castleton has its name, and of which the keep still remains, was one of the twelve Saxon forts which, probably, were destroyed in the frequent conflicts that took place between the Saxons and Danes in the tenth and eleventh centuries. The Roman Watling-street, leading from Man-cunium to Cambodunum, traversed this parish; and in the neighbourhood have been found various Roman antiquities, among which were some brass coins of the reign of Claudius, and the right arm of a silver statue of Victory, ten inches in length, and weighing nearly six ounces, having about the wrist a loose armilla, and another united to it above the elbow; attached to the former was a plate of silver, inscribed Victoriæ Leg. VI. Vic. Val. Rufus. V. S. L. M.; and near Rochdale, in 1820, was found a small iron box, containing a rouleau of brass coins of the Lower Empire in good preservation. Rochdale is not distinguished by any events of historical interest, but owes its importance to the extent of its manufactures, which are comparatively of recent introduction, and to the produce of the mines of coal, and quarries of slate and stone, with which the district abounds. The town is pleasantly situated in a valley on the banks of the river Roche, and consists of several streets, which, though formerly narrow and inconvenient, have been widened, and in other respects greatly improved, under the provisions of an act obtained in the 50th year of the reign of George III. In 1824, a company was formed for the purpose of widening the principal street, and the road from Yorkshire to Lancashire; in which, and in erecting a market-house and town hall, and other public improvements, they have expended more than £40,000. The stone bridge of three arches over the river Roche has been widened and greatly improved. Within a few paces to the east of it a handsome iron bridge has been constructed, for the accommodation of foot passengers; and about a quarter of a mile to the west is a stone bridge of one arch, connecting the town meadows with Pinfold, by a new line diverging from the old Bury road. The houses are chiefly built of brick, but several of the most substantial and respectable in the town and its vicinity are built of the fine freestone from the neighbouring quarries: the town is well paved, lighted with gas by a company established in 1824, whose works were erected at an expense of £12,000, and amply supplied with water brought from small rivulets near Moor-End, into four large reservoirs in Castleton, by a company established under an act of George III. The environs are pleasant, abounding with fertile vales sheltered by a range of high hills, called Blackstone Edge, and containing many handsome villas, and agreeable walks. From Summer Castle, an ancient mansion, the late residence of Charles Smith, Esq., a celebrated sporting character, an extensive view is obtained of the town, and the surrounding hills and dales. The public subscription library and news-rooms are well supported; a Horticultural Society has been established, and is extensively patronised; there are several billiard-rooms; and a small neat theatre is occasionally opened: concerts take place in the public assembly-rooms, and races are held annually during the first week in July, which are well attended. A cricket club has been recently established, and there are various other sources of recreation. The principal branches of manufacture are those of baize, flannel, coating, kerseys, and woollen broad cloth; calicoes and strong cotton goods are made to a very considerable extent, and, within the also last few years, the spinning of cotton has been introduced with success, and is making rapid progress; the making of hats also constitutes an important part of the trade of this place. The factories are very extensive, and are increasing in number, and the town is gradually assuming a due share of importance as regards others in the manufacturing districts of Yorkshire and Lancashire. Since the American Tariff took place, the flannel trade has considerably declined, but the other branches of manufacture are prosperous: the woollen trade employs twelve thousand persons, and produces about eight thousand pieces weekly; and the cotton trade furnishes employment to about six thousand persons. The number of steam-engines in the town and neighbourhood amounts to fifty-seven, being equal in power to nine hundred and forty-eight horses. The Rochdale canal, communicating with the Duke of Bridgewater's canal at Manchester, and the Aire and Calder canal, afford a facility of intercourse with the ports of Liverpool and Hull, and with the whole line of inland navigation: convenient quays and wharfs, for the loading and unloading of goods, have been constructed on the banks of the canal, and the basin is very capacious. The market days are Monday and Saturday, the former for corn, wool, and manufactured articles of flannel; the latter for provisions of all kinds. The fairs are, May 14th, Whit-Tuesday, and November 7th, for horses, cattle, and pedlary; there is also a fair, or rather a great mart, for wares, on the first Monday in every month, which is generally well attended. The parish is within the jurisdiction of the county magistrates, of whom some reside near the town; and the lord of the manor holds a court leet twice a year, and a court baron every third week, at which latter debts under 40s. are recoverable. The town hall is a neat and substantial building of brick, and contains an elegant saloon, in which the merchants and traders meet for the transaction of business, and for reading the news-papers. The gaol for the town, called the New Bailey, is a convenient building, adjoining the workhouse.

The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £11.4.9½., and in the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The church, dedicated to St. Chad, is a spacious and venerable structure, in the early style of English architecture, with a square embattled tower, crowned with pinnacles; the interior has some few remains of Norman character, and contains many ancient monuments, and an antique font: the churchyard is extensive, and a new cemetery has been added to it, which is peculiar for the neatness of its arrangement. The building stands on a lofty eminence, to which there is an ascent of one hundred and twenty-four steps from the lower part of the town. St. Mary's chapel, a neat brick building, was erected in 1744, as a chapel of ease to the vicarage. The chapel dedicated to St. James, a handsome edifice of stone, in the later style of English architecture, with a square embattled tower, was erected in 1820: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Vicar. There are several places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists, and Unitarians, and a Roman Catholic chapel. The free grammar school was founded, in 1565, by Archbishop Parker, and the school premises were erected, on a piece of ground given for that purpose, by the Rev. Richard Midgley, then vicar of the parish: the original endowment, £17 per annum for the master, and £2 for the usher, payable out of the archbishop's tithes, has been augmented by subsequent benefactions: the institution is open to all boys of the parish for gratuitous instruction in the classics only, and there are forty-five on the foundation, who pay £6.6. per annum to the master for the other branches of their education. The school has an interest, in turn with the schools of Middleton, in this county, and of Steeple-Aston, in the county of Oxford, in two scholarships founded at Brasenose College, Oxford, by Dr. Radcliffe, Principal of that college. The Moss school, so called from its situation on Vicar's Moss was founded, in 1769, by Mrs. Jane Hardman, who endowed it with two small estates, for the instruction of thirty boys and girls: the master's salary, originally £40, has, from the improvement in the funds, been increased to £100, and forty boys and twenty girls are instructed in reading, writing, and accompts; the latter are also taught sewing and knitting. A National school was erected in 1814, and is supported by subscription: there are nearly two hundred children instructed in this establishment, and there are Sunday schools in connexion with the established church and the dissenting congregations, in which more than three thousand children receive instruction. Numerous bequests have been made for the relief of the poor. About a mile and a half from the town, on the banks of the river Roach, is a romantic spot, called "Tyrone's bed," where, according to generally received tradition, the Earl of Tyrone was concealed, when he fled from Ireland, in 1603, after his unsuccessful efforts to release his countrymen from the English yoke: the whole transaction, with a sketch of his life, has been interestingly narrated by Mr. Roby, of this town, in his "Traditions of Lancashire." The eccentric Mr. John Collier, a schoolmaster, painter, poet, and caricaturist, better known by the appellation of Tim Bobbin, resided here for many years. Rochdale gives the title of baron to the family of Byron.

ROCHESTER, an ancient city and port, having separate jurisdiction, locally in the lathe of Aylesford, county of KENT, 8½ miles (N.) from Maidstone, and 29 (E. S. E.) from London, on the road to Dover, containing, with the precinct of the Cathedral Church, part of Chatham, and Stroud Intra, 9309 inhabitants. This place, the Durobrivæ of the Romans, and one of their stipendiary towns, was by the Saxons called "Hrove ceaster," from which by contraction its present name is derived. The Roman Watling-street from Canterbury passed through the city, which was defended by walls built, according to the Roman custom, in the direction of the Cardinal points, and extending for half a mile from east to west, and about a quarter of a mile from north to south. Little of its history has been recorded previously to the Saxon era, in the early period of which, Ethelbert, King of Kent, having been converted to Christianity by the preaching of St. Augustine, to whom he gave large possessions at Canterbury, founded a church in this city, which he erected into a see, and thus laid the foundation of its subsequent importance. In 676, Etheldred King of Mercia, having made an irruption into Kent, plundered and nearly destroyed the city, which also suffered severely from repeated attacks of the Danes, who committed the most barbarous outrages. In 839, these ferocious invaders having landed at Romney, and defeated the troops sent to oppose them, plundered the city, and massacred the inhabitants; and, in 885, another party of them, under their leader Hasting, sailed up the Medway, and laid siege to Rochester, before which they threw up a strong intrenchment; the inhabitants opposed a vigorous resistance, and defended their city till Alfred coming to their assistance obliged the enemy to raise the siege, and retire to their ships with considerable loss. Athelstan, about the year 930, established three mints at Rochester, which at that time was one of the chief ports in the island, of which two were for the use of the king, and one for the bishop. On another invasion of the Danes, who in 999 appeared in the Medway, with a large fleet, the inhabitants, struck with terror at their approach, abandoned the city to their fury, and fled into the interior of the county. At the time of the Conquest, Rochester was given by William to his half-brother, Odo, Bishop of Bayeux, whom he created Earl of Kent, and who, in the reign of William Rufus, having headed a conspiracy against that monarch, in favour of Robert, Duke of Normandy, was besieged in the castle, and deprived of his possessions, which reverted to the crown. In 1130,

Henry I., with several of his nobles, attended at the consecration of the church of St. Andrew, in this city, by Lanfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury; during the ceremony a dreadful fire broke out, which raged with such fury that the city was nearly reduced to ashes: in 1137, it was again burnt, and it had scarcely recovered from that calamity, when a third destructive fire spread with such rapidity and to such an extent, that traces of its devastation were visible for ages. In 1141, Robert, Earl of Gloucester, chief general and counsellor of Matilda, after having effected that queen's escape, was himself taken prisoner at Winchester, and confined in the castle of this city, but was exchanged for King Stephen, who was soon afterwards made prisoner by Matilda's party. In 1215, the barons seized Rochester castle, which they held against King John, who having invested it with his troops, obtained possession after an obstinate defence, and ordered many of the garrison to be hanged. In the reign of Henry III., the castle was considerably repaired, and the walls strengthened, and the city was, by that monarch's liberality, greatly restored from the dilapidation it had previously suffered; Henry held a grand tournament here in 1251, in which the English knights entered the lists against all foreigners, without exception. In 1254, the castle was besieged by Simon de Montfort, on the part of the confederate barons, and successfully defended for the king by Edward, Earl Warren; during this siege, the bridge, with the tower upon it, which were both constructed of wood, was burnt. On the insurrection of Wat Tyler, in the reign of Richard II., a party of the rebels assaulted the castle, and took away by force one of their comrades, who had been placed there in confinement. Edward IV. repaired the castle and the walls of the city, and bestowed several privileges upon the inhabitants. In 1522, Henry VIII., accompanied by the Emperor Charles V., visited Rochester; and, in 1573, Queen Elizabeth, during her tour in Kent, remained here for five days, and conferred many marks of her favour on the citizens, by whom she was hospitably entertained. On the restoration of Charles II., that monarch, on his arrival from the continent, passed through the city on his route to the metropolis, and was joyfully received by the mayor and corporation, who presented him with a silver basin and ewer; and, in 1688, James II., on his retreat from the capital, embarked privately at this port on board a tender lying in the Medway, which conveyed him to France.

The city is pleasantly situated on rather a low point of land, bounded on the west by the river Medway, which, pursuing a northerly course till it has passed the city, suddenly bends to the south-east, thus environing it nearly on three sides. On the river is a handsome stone bridge of eleven arches, connecting the city with Stroud, which was built on piles, chiefly at the expense of Sir Robert Knolles and Sir John de Cobham, who, with several other gentlemen, bequeathed estates now fully adequate for keeping it in repair. They are vested in two wardens and twelve assistants, chosen annually from the commonalty, and incorporated by patent of Richard II., their powers having been afterwards enlarged by charter of Elizabeth; it is a handsome building, five hundred and sixty feet long, and is defended by a stone parapet and balustrade. The bridge chamber, in which the records of the Bridge Company are kept, and the business of that trust transacted, is a neat building of Portland stone, with a handsome portico, occupying the site of an ancient chapel, erected near the east end of the bridge, by Sir John de Cobham. The approach from the bridge is peculiarly striking; the magnificent remains of the stately castle, on an eminence rising abruptly from the Medway, and the view of that noble river, which expands to a considerable breadth, immediately beyond the bridge, with Chatham lines, and the martello towers ranged along the shores, contribute to heighten the effect.

The town, within the ancient walls, consists principally of one spacious street, intersected by several smaller, and is bounded by the bridge on the west, and on the east by St. Margaret's bank, connecting it with Chatham; the houses are in general respectable and of ancient appearance, interspersed with several timber and brick buildings; the city is well paved, lighted with gas, and amply supplied with water, conveyed to the houses by pipes from an excellent spring near a field called the Vines. The environs are extremely pleasant, and contain several handsome villas; and on the north-west, on an easy ascent, are several streets of neat modern houses, called, from the owner of the estate, Troy Town: the air is salubrious, and the scenery pleasing, and on the banks of the Medway are extensive and beautiful promenades. The city is strongly fortified on the south side, and most of the works are of modern construction, having been erected since the peace of Amiens. Fort Pitt, partly in the parish of St. Margaret, and partly in Chatham, now used as a military hospital, and Fort Clarence, to the west of St. Margaret's church, now appropriated as a naval lunatic asylum, in conjunction with Chatham Lines, form a regular series of defensive works, commanding the river Medway from Gillingham fort to Rochester bridge. The theatre, a small neat building, is open occasionally; assemblies are held in a suite of rooms well fitted up, and there are floating baths, supplied with every requisite accommodation. The Rochester and Chatham Literary and Philosophical Institution is of recent establishment, and in concert with it, exertions are being made to erect a public library and museum. As regards mercantile pursuits, Rochester enjoys a favourable situation on the river Medway, and possesses a considerable share of commerce, but is not distinguished by any particular branch of manufacture. The number of registered vessels belonging to the port, in 1828, amounted to about two hundred and forty-three, averaging a burden of forty-two tons, most of them are colliers, or coasting vessels, which bring supplies for the dock-yards at Chatham. The average number of vessels entering the port annually is about three hundred and twenty foreign, and one hundred and twenty British. The trade of the town principally arises from the great number of persons employed in the dock-yards and victualling-office, and temporary residents connected with the army and navy, in addition to a small degree of ship-building. The oyster fishery is carried on to a considerable extent, and is a great source of profit to the inhabitants; large quantities of oysters are sent to London, Holland, and Westphalia. The market, on Friday, is well supplied with fish and provisions of every kind; a corn market, recently established, is held on Tuesday: the fairs, formerly on May 30th and December 11th, have nearly fallen into disuse, but there is a cattle market monthly on Wednesday.

The city received its first charter of incorporation from Henry II., in 1165, and its privileges have been ratified and extended by succeeding monarchs to the time of Charles I., by whose charter the government is vested in a mayor, eleven aldermen, and twelve common council-men, assisted by a recorder, town clerk, two chamberlains, a water-bailiff, a principal serjeant at mace, and two under-serjeants, with subordinate officers. The mayor is annually elected by the citizens, from among the aldermen, who, with the common council-men, fill up vacancies in their bodies as they occur; the recorder is chosen by the mayor and aldermen. The mayor, recorder, late mayor, and senior alderman, are justices of the peace within the borough and liberties; the freedom is inherited by birth, and obtained by servitude, purchase, or gift. The corporation hold quarterly courts of session for all offences within the city and liberties, which include part of Chatham; and a court of portmote, every fifteen days, for the determination of all pleas, and for the recovery of debts to any amount. A court of requests is held for the recovery of debts not exceeding £5, the jurisdiction of which extends over the parishes of Stroud, Frindsbury, Cobham, Shorne, Higham, Cliffe, Cooling, High Halstow, Chalk, Hoo, Burham, Wouldham, Halling, Cuxton, Chatham, Gillingham, and the ville of Sheerness, in the county of Kent.

The corporation have jurisdiction over the oyster fisheries in the creeks and branches of the Medway; and the mayor and aldermen, assisted by a jury of free dredgers, hold a court of admiralty, in which they make regulations for the opening, stocking, and shutting of the oyster beds: the free dredgers are governed by an act passed in the 9th of George II., and no one can be free who has not served an apprenticeship of seven years to one of that body. The town hall, erected in 1687, is a handsome brick building, supported on duplicated columns of the Doric order; the hall is commodiously fitted up for holding the several courts, and for the transaction of the public business of the city, and is forty-seven feet long, and twenty-eight feet wide: the ceiling is enriched with trophies, and with the city arms, together with those of Sir Cloudesley Shovel, at whose expense it was embellished; at the upper end are full-length portraits of King William and Queen Anne, by Sir Godfrey Kneller; there are also portraits of Sir Cloudesley Shovel, Sir John Jennings, Sir Thomas Colby, Sir Joseph Williamson, Richard Watts, Esq., and various other benefactors to the city: the area underneath is paved with Purbeck stone, and is appropriated to the use of the market; behind it is the gaol for the city, containing six wards, and adapted to the reception of sixteen prisoners. The clock-house was erected on the site of the ancient guildhall (in which the assizes for the county were formerly held), at the sole expense of Sir Cloudesley Shovel, in 1706; it is a neat brick building, and over the dial of the clock are the arms of the founder. The city first exercised the elective franchise in the 23rd of Edward I., since which time it has regularly returned two members to parliament: the right of election is vested in the freemen generally not receiving alms, whether resident or non-resident, of whom the number is about one thousand two hundred: the mayor is the returning officer.

The see of Rochester, which is the smallest in the kingdom, and the most ancient, except Canterbury, was established in 600, by Ethelbert, King of Kent, who, at the persuasion of St. Augustine, erected a church in this city, which he dedicated to St. Andrew, and establishing a monastery for Secular priests, appointed for their bishop, Justus, who had accompanied St. Augustine into Britain. The diocese comprehends the western division of the county, and includes ninety-one parishes, in the deaneries of Rochester, Malling, and Dartford, separated from the see of Canterbury by the river Medway. The ecclesiastical establishment consists of a bishop, dean, an archdeacon, six prebendaries, six minor canons, a chancellor, eight choristers, a grammar master, twenty scholars, six poor bedesmen, and subordinate officers. The cathedral church, dedicated to St. Andrew, and rebuilt by Bishop Gundulph, in 1080, is a spacious and venerable structure, in the form of a double cross, with a central tower surmounted by a spire; the west front is a fine specimen of Norman architecture, elaborately enriched with sculpture, but the great window over the entrance is an insertion in the later style of English architecture, as are many of the windows in the nave and other parts of the building. On each side of the west door is a square tower; that on the north side has been lately rebuilt, and has a niche in which is a statue supposed to be that of Gundulph: a descent of several steps leads into the nave, which, with the exception of the windows, and a part near the transepts, is in the Norman style; the roof is supported on massive piers and circular arches, and, though now flat, has evidently been much loftier, and is finely groined. From the nave an ascent of ten steps leads through the arch of the stone screen into the choir, which is in the early English style of architecture, the roof finely groined, and the columns of marble from the quarries near Petworth in Sussex: the altar-piece is decorated with a painting, by West, of the Angel appearing to the Shepherds, and on the north of the altar, within the railing, are two very ancient tombs, supposed to have been erected for Bishop Lawrence de St. Martin, and Bishop Gilbert de Glanville. There are several chapels, among which are the Lady chapel, where the bishop holds his consistory court; St. Edmund's, a square chapel, from which a door, now closed up, formerly led to the chapter-house; a small chapel in the south aisle of the choir, in which is a beautiful window in the decorated style; and at the north end of the eastern transept, the chapel of St. William, whose shrine is still preserved in it. On the east side of the north transept is a building, called Gundulph's Tower, but the style scarcely warrants the supposition of its having been built by him. The crypt, under the eastern part of the cathedral, is a fine specimen of the early English style; the roof is plainly groined, and in that part of it which extends under the north aisle, the architecture is scarcely to be distinguished from the Norman style. The length of the cathedral from east to west is three hundred and six feet, and the breadth along the greater transepts is one hundred and twenty-two feet, and along the smaller ninety feet. There are numerous ancient monuments, but they are much mutilated, and the inscriptions for the most part obliterated; among them is a statue in red-veined marble of Walter de Merton, founder of Merton College, Oxford: there are also monuments to Lord Henniker and his lady, by Bacon, Jun. This was anciently a priory of Secular priests, who were removed in 1087, by Bishop Gundulph, who placed in their stead Benedictine monks, whose revenue, at the dissolution, amounted to £486. 11. 5. The ancient chapter-house, now in ruins, has been a magnificent structure, and still displays the remains of several fine Norman arches; and the prebendal houses contain many relics of the monastic buildings.

The city comprises the parishes of St. Margaret and St. Nicholas, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Rochester. The living of St. Margaret's is a vicarage, rated in the king's books at £10, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter: the church is an ancient structure with a tower, and contains several ancient monuments and an antique font: five hundred and seventy additional sittings, of which three hundred are free, have been erected, at an expense of £600, defrayed by grant from the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels. The living of St. Nicholas' is a vicarage, with that of St. Clement's, rated in the king's books at £20. 8. 9., and in the patronage of the Bishop: the church, which has been extensively repaired at different times, is a substantial and commodious edifice, principally in the later style of English architecture, with a square embattled tower at the north-west angle: the roof of the nave is supported by a range of lofty columns and finely-pointed arches: there are some monuments of no great antiquity, and a very ancient stone font. The churches of St. Clement and St. Mary the Virgin have been demolished. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends, Independents, Wesleyan Methodists, and Unitarians.

The Royal free grammar school, founded by Henry VIII., for the education of twenty boys, forms part of the establishment of the cathedral church, and is under the superintendence of the Dean and Chapter: there are four exhibitions of £5 per annum each, two to each of the Universities, which, on taking the degree of master of arts, are augmented to £6, and subsequently to £6. 13. 4. per annum: this school has also, with that of Maidstone, two of four exhibitions of £15 per ann. each, with chambers, in University College, Oxford, founded by the Rev. Robert Gunsley. A free school was founded, in 1701, by Sir Joseph Williamson, who bequeathed £5000 for its erection and endowment; the present income is about £600 per annum, and about one hundred boys are instructed in the ancient and modern languages, the mathematics, astronomy, and navigation: the head master receives a salary of £100 per annum, with a gratuity of £200; and the second master £40 per annum, with a gratuity of £110. Several distinguished naval characters have been educated in this establishment. Sir John Hayward having, in 1635, devised estates for charitable uses, his trustee, Mr. Francis Barrel, in 1718, appropriated £33 per annum to the payment of £12 annually to a master for teaching twenty poor boys, and £8 per annum to a mistress for teaching twelve poor girls, of the parish of St. Nicholas, and £10 per annum to a mistress for teaching thirty children of the parishes of Stroud and Frindsbury. Mr. Henry Barrel, in 1764, bequeathed funded property producing £4 per annum, for the support of a charity school; and Mr. John Baynard left £300 for the support of a Sunday school in the parish of St. Margaret. There are also a National school, and several Sunday schools, supported by subscription. Near the site of the ancient market cross are the custom-house, and a house for the reception of poor travellers, founded by Richard Watts, Esq.: in this establishment six travellers, not being "rogues nor proctors," may claim a lodging for one night, and fourpence each: the term "proctor" was applied to concealed itinerant popish missionaries, who at that time were in the habit of wandering about the country to absolve the people from their allegiance: the funds originally left for the support of this institution, then amounting only to £36 per annum, now produce £1000 per annum; the surplus is, by a decree of the court of Chancery, appropriated to the support of the parochial poor. St. Catherine's hospital, founded in 1316, by Symond Potyn, for the support of lepers and other diseased persons, is now appropriated as an almshouse for the reception of twelve aged persons, among whom the sum arising from the endowment is divided. Dr. Lamplugh, Dean of Rochester, and Bishop of Exeter, bequeathed £50 in trust to the corporation, to be lent, without interest, in sums varying from £5 to £10, to young tradesmen for four years; and there are various other bequests for distribution among the poor, and for other charitable uses.

The remains of the castle, which was erected after the Conquest, on the site of the ancient Roman fortress, consist principally of the keep, or great tower, in the south-west angle of an enclosed quadrangular area, three hundred feet in length: it was built by Bishop Gundulph, and is considered one of the most entire and curious specimens of Norman military architecture now remaining; it is a square tower with angular turrets, one hundred and four feet high, and seventy feet in breadth at the base; the walls are twelve feet in thickness, and a winding staircase in the east angle, communicating with every story, leads to the summit, from which a most extensive view of the surrounding country is obtained: the state apartments are on the second story, communicating with which is an arched gallery in the thick wall, extending round the whole tower: the walls of the castle and of the keep are of Kentish rag-stone, cemented with mortar, which by time has been rendered harder than the stone itself, and the whole fabric has acquired such a degree of solidity, as to have baffled an interested attempt to demolish it, for the value of the materials, which was made about the beginning of the last century. Several estates in Kent being held by the ancient tenure of Castle guard, on St. Andrew's day, O.S., a banner is displayed on the castle, when every tenant who does not attend and discharge his arrears, is liable to have his rent doubled on every return of the tide, till payment is made. Some parts of the city walls remain entire, and the north-east angle in particular displays its height, form, and embrasures. Near Minor Canon-row is a small embattled tower, through which was the entrance into the cloisters of the priory, of which some parts are still remaining. At Boley Hill, to the south of the city, the Romans are supposed to have had a cemetery, and sepulchral urns and lachrymatories have been found there in great numbers: a part of the hill is, however, supposed to have been thrown up by the Danes, when they besieged the city, in 885. Under an elm-tree on this hill the corporation hold a separate court leet for this small district, in which the recorder presides as steward, and appoints an officer, called the Baron of Boley, to whom it is supposed the custody of this place was entrusted by the governor of the castle: a court of pie-powder is also held here, under the mayor and two "discreet" citizens. Rochester gave the title of earl to the facetious John Wilmot, in the reign of Charles II.

ROCHESTER-WARD, a township in the parish of ELSDON, southern division of COQUETDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 12 miles (N.) from Bellingham, containing 491 inhabitants. A small village, called High Rochester, situated on the brow of a rugged eminence, occupies the site of the ancient Bremenium, the strongest of the Roman stations in the north, and previously the chief fortification of the Ottodini. Portions of the walls on the west and south-west sides still remain; they were seven feet in thickness, chequered with ashlar-work, and defended by triple ramparts of earth. The hypocaust was in the north-eastern part of the walls, and the conduits leading to it were, a few years since, in a tolerably perfect state. Numerous altars, urns, and other relics, have been found here; and in the neighbourhood are several rude sepulchral monuments of the ancient Britons, which prove that it must have been the scene of many sanguinary conflicts between the Ottodini and the Romans, before the conquest of the former.

ROCHFORD, a market town and parish in the hundred of ROCHFORD, county of ESSEX, $19\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S.E.) from Chelmsford, and 40 (E. by N.) from London, containing 1382 inhabitants. It is situated on the small river Roche, from which it is supposed to derive its name, and is an irregularly built town, neither lighted nor paved, supplied with water from a spring, by a pump erected in the market-place. The trade is principally in corn. The river Crouch is navigable to Broomhills, within about a mile of the town. The market is on Thursday; and the fairs are on Tuesday and Wednesday in Easter week, and on the Wednesday and Thursday after the 29th of September, chiefly for toys: there is a market-house, built of wood, but not used as such, being occupied only as a store-room for wool. The magistrates for the hundred hold their sittings here on Thursday, once a fortnight, and occasionally weekly, for general business. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Essex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £20, and in the patronage of the Hon. W. T. L. P. Wellesley. The church, situated about a quarter of a mile west from the town, is dedicated to St. Andrew; it is a plain edifice, consisting of a nave, chancel, and two aisles, with a lofty tower of very fine ancient brickwork. A new gallery, the seats in which are free, was erected in 1827, at the expense of £40, by the Incorporated Society for building and enlarging churches and chapels, and the church was repaired and beautified in 1828. There is a place of worship for Independents. A National school, for an unlimited number of children of both sexes, is supported chiefly by subscription. Almshouses, in which six poor persons are lodged, and receive a weekly allowance, were founded and endowed by Lord Riche, about the middle of the sixteenth century. Rochford Hall, the greater part of which was destroyed by fire, about sixty years since, was the birthplace of the unfortunate Anne Boleyn, queen of Henry VIII.: it stands a short distance west of the town. Rochford gave the title of earl to the family of Nassau, which, on the death of the late earl, Sept. 3rd, 1830, became extinct.

ROCHFORD, a parish in the hundred of WOLPHY, county of HEREFORD, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. by N.) from Tenbury, containing 264 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Tenbury, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford. The church is dedicated to St. Michael.

ROCK, a chapelry in the parish of EMBLETON, southern division of BAMBROUGH ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N.N.E.) from Alnwick, containing 185 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Northumberland, and diocese of Durham, endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Embleton. The chapel is dedicated to St. Philip and St. James. Here is an endowed free school, with an income of about £7 per annum, for which and small quarterages from the parents, twenty children receive instruction.

ROCK, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of DODDINGTON, county of WORCESTER, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S.W. by W.) from Bewdley, containing, with the hamlets of Alton, Hightington, Lindons, and Snead, 1266 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £17. 11. 8. Mr. Woodhull and others were patrons in 1812. The church, dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul, is very ancient. There is a charity school, the salary of the master being paid out of the crown rent.

ROCK-SAVAGE, county palatine of CHESTER.—See CLIFTON.

ROCKBEAR, a parish in the eastern division of the hundred of BUDLEIGH, county of DEVON, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W.) from Ottery St. Mary, containing, with part of the tything of Rawleigh, 443 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £9, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Exeter. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. Lawrence Colesworthy, in 1702, bequeathed £4 per annum for teaching poor children.

ROCKBURNE, a parish in the hundred of FORDINGBRIDGE, New Forest (West) division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Fordingbridge, containing 464 inhabitants. The living is a donative, in the patronage of Lady Coote. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew.

ROCKCLIFF, a parish in the ward and county of CUMBERLAND, comprising the townships of Castle-Rockcliff and Church-Rockcliff, and containing 722 inhabitants, of which number, 362 are in the township of Church-Rockcliff, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W.) from Carlisle. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Carlisle, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and £1600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Carlisle. The parish is bounded on the north by the river Esk, on the north-west by the Solway firth, and on the south-west by the river Eden, the latter of which is navigable to the village of Rockcliff, which is situated opposite to Port Carlisle. Within reach of the tide is a remarkable spring, with a scum floating on its surface, which turns paper to a complete golden hue; and the banks of the river produce a medicinal plant, termed Mother of Thyme.

ROCKCLIFF (CASTLE), a township in the parish of ROCKCLIFF, ward and county of CUMBERLAND, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W.) from Carlisle, containing 360 inhabitants. The river Eden is here crossed by an iron bridge of three arches, on the road to Gretna-Green, three miles distant. Some remains of a small castle, built by the Lords Dacre, are still visible: it was garrisoned by Leonard Dacre, when in rebellion against Queen Elizabeth, in 1570, and was taken possession of by Lord Hunsdon, for the queen, in February of the same year.

ROCKFIELD, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of SKENFRETH, county of MONMOUTH, 2 miles (N. W.) from Monmouth, containing 335 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaff, rated in the king's books at £4. 3. $1\frac{1}{2}$., endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant. Robert Williams, Esq. was patron in 1807. The church is dedicated to St. Kenelm.

ROCKHAM, a hamlet in the parish of AMBERLEY, hundred of WEST EASWRITH, rape of ARUNDEL, county of SUSSEX, 6 miles (N. E. by N.) from Arundel. The population is returned with the parish. The chapel is demolished.

ROCKHAMPTON, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of LANGLEY and SWINEHEAD, county of GLOUCESTER, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Thornbury, containing 159 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £15, and in the patronage of Danvers Ward, Esq. The church is dedicated to St.

Oswald. The parish is partly bounded by the navigable river Severn.

ROCKINGHAM, a parish in the hundred of CORBY, county of NORTHAMPTON, 25 miles (N. N. E.) from Northampton, containing 278 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £10. 2. $3\frac{1}{2}$., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Lord Sondes. The church is dedicated to St. Leonard. The river Welland runs through the parish. This place, formerly a market town, is situated in the midst of Rockingham Forest. On the top of a hill, the declivity of which is occupied by the village, a castle was erected by William the Conqueror, for the defence of the extensive iron-works then existing in the adjacent woodlands. Here was convened, in 1094, the council of barons, bishops, and clergy, which sat for the purpose of determining the dispute between William Rufus and Anselm, Archbishop of Canterbury, respecting the right of episcopal investiture. Of the castle, the two massive bastions which flanked the gateway are the only remains. The tower and part of the body of the church were destroyed in the great civil war during the siege of the castle, which was garrisoned for the king by its proprietor, Sir Lewis Watson, afterwards created Lord Rockingham.

ROCKLAND, a parish in the hundred of HENSTEAD, county of NORFOLK, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by E.) from Norwich, containing 318 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, consolidated with that of St. Margaret, and a mediety of Holverstone, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the President and Fellows of Queen's College, Cambridge. The churchyard formerly contained two churches; that now in use is dedicated to St. Mary, but that of St. Margaret has been demolished.

ROCKLAND (ALL SAINTS), a parish in the hundred of SHROPHAM, county of NORFOLK, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Attleburgh, containing 267 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, with Rockland St. Andrew, annexed to the rectory of Caston, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £10. 19. $4\frac{1}{2}$..

ROCKLAND (ST. ANDREW), a parish in the hundred of SHROPHAM, county of NORFOLK, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from Attleburgh, containing 143 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, with Rockland All Saints, annexed to the rectory of Caston, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich.

ROCKLAND (ST. PETER), a parish in the hundred of WAYLAND, county of NORFOLK, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. N. W.) from Attleburgh, containing 349 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £4. 16. $5\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Rev. J. T. Bird.

ROCLIFFE, a township in that part of the parish of ALDBOROUGH which is in the lower division of the wapentake of CLARO, West riding of the county of YORK, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (W. S. W.) from Boroughbridge, containing 248 inhabitants. A school for children of both sexes is supported by voluntary contributions.

ROD, a joint township with Little Brampton and Nash, in that part of the parish of PRESTEIGNE which is in the hundred of WIGMORE, county of HEREFORD, 2 miles (S. S. E.) from Presteigne, containing, with Little Brampton and Nash, 148 inhabitants.

RODBASTON, a township in that part of the parish of PENKRIDGE which is in the eastern division of the hundred of CUTTLESTONE, county of STAFFORD, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (S. by E.) from Penkridge. The population is returned with the township of Penkridge.

RODBORNE, a chapelry in the parish and hundred of MALMESBURY, county of WILTS, 3 miles (S. by E.) from Malmesbury, containing 139 inhabitants.

RODBORNE-CHENEY, a parish in the hundred of HIGHWORTH, CRICKLADE, and STAPLE, county of WILTS, 3 miles (N. W. by N.) from Swindon, containing 544 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Wilts, and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £17, and in the patronage of Mrs. Evans. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

RODBOROUGH, a chapelry in the parish of MINCHINHAMPTON, hundred of LONGTREE, county of GLOUCESTER, 1 mile (S. W. by W.) from Stroud, containing 2038 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Minchinhampton, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, and in the patronage of the Principal and Fellows of Brasenose College, Oxford. The chapel, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, was a chantry to the priory of Minchinhampton, whence it had formerly a subterraneous passage. There is a place of worship for Independents. The river Stroud, and the Thames and Severn canal, pass through the parish. Henry King, in 1699, bequeathed the residue of his personal estate, in equal moieties, to the parish of Minchinhampton and to this chapelry, the proportion to each being about £25 a year: the parochial school, to which these sums have hitherto been paid, has been recently enlarged out of the funds of this charity. There is also a bequest of £100 three per cents., by Samuel Horrill, for teaching three girls, and another of £100 for teaching three boys, which, with accumulations from the sale of timber, &c., produce about £16 per annum. Here was born, in 1638, Richard Clutterbuck, who, though blind, was an extraordinary mechanical and musical genius; he also had the faculty of hearing in a remarkably acute manner.

RODDAM, a township in the parish of ILDETON, northern division of COQUETDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Wooler, containing 90 inhabitants.

RODDEN, a parish in the hundred of FROME, county of SOMERSET, 2 miles (E. by S.) from Frome, containing 272 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Wells, and diocese of Bath and Wells, endowed with £400 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Lord Heytesbury. The church was built at the expense of the parishioners, about 1640.

RODDINGTON, a parish in the Wellington division of the hundred of BRADFORD (South), county of SALOP, 5 miles (N. W. by W.) from Wellington, containing 445 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. George. The river Rode and the Shrewsbury canal pass through the village.

RODE (NORTH), a township in the parish of PRESTBURY, hundred of MACCLESFIELD, county palatine of CHESTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E.) from Congleton, containing 262 inhabitants. A school is supported by small annual donations.

RODE (ODD), a township in that part of the parish of ASTBURY which is in the hundred of NORTHWICH, county palatine of CHESTER, 4 miles (S. W. by S.) from Congleton, containing 1143 inhabitants. The Grand Trunk canal passes through the parish. A school is supported by annual subscriptions averaging about £25.

RODE - HUIISH, a chapelry in the parish and hundred of CARHAMPTON, county of SOMERSET, 3 miles (S. S. E.) from Dunster. The population is returned with the parish.

RODLEY, a township in the parish of WESTBURY upon SEVERN, hundred of WESTBURY, though locally in the duchy of Lancaster, county of GLOUCESTER, 5 miles (E. by N.) from Newnham. The population is returned with the parish.

RODMARTON, a parish in the hundred of LONGTREE, county of GLOUCESTER, 6 miles (W. S. W.) from Cirencester, containing 357 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £18. 1. 3., and in the patronage of the Rev. Daniel Lysons. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. The old Akeman-street passes near the south-eastern boundary of the parish. In a field called Hocbery, a tessellated pavement, with coins of Antoninus and Valentinian, was discovered, in 1636. A farm-house at Hasleden, in this parish, is supposed to have been at one time a monastery; and attached to the old manor-house at Tarlton are the remains of a chapel. Samuel Lysons, F.R.S., and F.S.A., author of the "Environs of London," and joint author of the "Magna Britannia," was born here, in 1763.

RODMELL, a parish in the hundred of HOLMSTROW, rape of LEWES, county of SUSSEX, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. by E.) from Lewes, containing 336 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Lewes, and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £15. 6. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Chichester. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, is principally in the early style of English architecture. There was formerly a chapel at Northese. The river Ouse runs through the parish, also a branch of the ancient Ermin-street, in a direction towards Newhaven. A school is supported by subscription, in which about sixty children are educated.

RODMERSHAM, a parish in the hundred of MILTON, lathe of SCRAY, county of KENT, 2 miles (S. E. by S.) from Sittingbourne, containing 307 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £8. 6. 8., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Wm. Lushington, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Nicholas, is in the early style of English architecture, and has in the chancel four elegant canopied stalls, thought to have been intended for the knights of St. John of Jerusalem, to whom the church belonged, when they came to visit their estate.

RODSLEY, a hamlet in the parish of LONGFORD, hundred of APPLETREE, county of DERBY, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Ashbourn, containing 208 inhabitants.

It is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. A school is supported by a trifling bequest from Lady Coke, and some small annual subscriptions.

ROEHAMPTON, a hamlet in the parish of PUTNEY, western division of the hundred of BRIXTON, county of SURREY, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from London. The population is returned with the parish. This place is pleasantly situated at the western extremity of Putney Heath, bordering on which are several handsome villas of the nobility and gentry, including that of the Earl of Besborough, built by Sir William Chambers, and containing some antique sculptures and paintings by Flemish and Italian artists. Here also is Roehampton House, formerly called Putney Park, which, in the reign of Charles I., belonged to the Earl of Portland, and was subsequently the property of Christiana, Countess of Devonshire, a lady distinguished for her talents, who is said to have had some share in the restoration of Charles II. A chapel attached to this mansion, erected by Lord Portland, was consecrated in 1632, and dedicated to the Holy Trinity: it was taken down in 1777, by Thomas Parker, Esq., then proprietor of Roehampton House, who built a new chapel at a short distance. This place suffered great injury from a violent hurricane which occurred October 15th, 1780, and extended from Lord Besborough's mansion to Hammersmith, tearing up trees in its course, and driving them to a considerable distance; some buildings were unroofed, and a windmill was thrown down.

ROFFORD, a liberty in the parish of CHALGROVE, hundred of EWELME, county of OXFORD, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Tetsworth, containing 31 inhabitants.

ROGATE, a parish in the hundred of DUMPFORD, rape of CHICHESTER, county of SUSSEX, 6 miles (W. N. W.) from Midhurst, containing 724 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £10. 5., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Bartholomew, is in the early style of English architecture. There is a place of worship for Independents.

ROGERSTONE, a hamlet in that part of the parish of BASSALEG which is in the upper division of the hundred of WENTLLOOG, county of MONMOUTH, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W.) from Newport, containing 662 inhabitants.

ROGGIET, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of CALDICOTT, county of MONMOUTH, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W.) from Chepstow, containing 42 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, with that of Ifton united, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaff, rated in the king's books at £12. 6. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of J. Morgan, Esq.

ROKEBY, a parish in the western division of the wapentake of GILLING, North riding of the county of YORK, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (N. W. by W.) from Greta-Bridge, containing, with Eggleston Abbey, 222 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £4. 3. 9., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, was formerly situated near the manor-house, and its site is now marked by heaps of rubbish and a few grave-stones; it was demolished about the middle of the last century, and the present small structure erected by Sir Thomas Robinson. Rokeby is situated on the rivers Tees and Greta, and the vicinity is replete with beautiful scenery, which has been celebrated by the poetry of Sir Walter Scott and Mr. Mason, the latter of whom made it his favourite retreat. A Roman road led through the parish, and here are vestiges of an ancient encampment, near which various inscribed stones and other Roman relics have been found. In a close adjoining the embattled keep of Mortham, the ancient residence of the Rokebys, is a large tomb, removed thither from Eggleston abbey, the sides of which are ornamented with shields.

ROLLESBY, a parish in the western division of the hundred of FLEGG, county of NORFOLK, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Acle, containing, with the inmates of the house of industry for the eastern and western divisions of the hundred of Flegg, 619 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £17, and in the patronage of—Fielding, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. George.

ROLLESTON, a chapelry in the parish of BILLEDON, hundred of GARTREE, county of LEICESTER, 10 miles (E. by S.) from Leicester, containing 31 inhabitants. The chapel is dedicated to St. John.

ROLLESTON, a parish in the northern division of the wapentake of THURGARTON, county of NOTTINGHAM, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Newark, containing 306 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Nottingham, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £10. 1. 3., and in the patronage of the Chapter of the Collegiate Church of Southwell. The church is dedicated to the Holy Trinity. The village is situated on the river Trent, which receives a smaller stream that bounds the parish on the west.

ROLLESTON, a parish in the northern division of the hundred of OFFLOW, county of STAFFORD, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Burton upon Trent, containing, with the township of Anslow, or Annesley, 869 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Stafford, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £13. 19. 7., and in the patronage of Sir Oswald Mosley, Bart. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The river Dove runs through the parish. A free school was founded, about 1520, by Robert Sherbourne, Bishop of Winchester, who endowed it with an annuity of £10, to which subsequent benefactions have been added, producing together an income of £37 a year, which is applied to the instruction of forty-five children. Near the school are ten almshouses, called the hospital, for aged people of both sexes, endowed in 1672, by Mr. Rolleston; six of the inmates have an allowance of coal and four shillings a week each, and the remaining four have three and sixpence each. Rolleston is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s.

ROLLRIGHT (GREAT), a parish in the hundred of CHADLINGTON, county of OXFORD, 3 miles (N. by E.) from Chipping-Norton, containing 419 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Oxford, rated in the king's books at £16. 9. 4 $\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Principal and Fellows of Brasenose College, Oxford. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew. The Rev. James Parker, in 1780, bequeathed £100 towards the support of a school for teaching poor children to read. This parish was noted among agriculturists for a peculiar species of cattle, called the Rollright breed.

ROLLRIGHT (LITTLE), a parish in the hundred of CHADLINGTON, county of OXFORD, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Chipping-Norton, containing 28 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Oxford, rated in the king's books at £5. 6. 8., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Sir John Chandos Reade, Bart. There are in this parish some stones set up in the form of a circle, the diameter of which is twenty yards, termed the King's Stones, and supposed to be remains of a Druidical temple.

ROLLSTONE, a parish forming a detached portion of the hundred of ELSTUB and EVERLEY, county of WILTS, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Amesbury, containing 41 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £7. 19. $5\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew.

ROLVENDEN, a parish in the hundred of ROLVENDEN, lathe of SCRAY, county of KENT, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by W.) from Tenterden, containing 1403 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £10, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £500 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Rochester. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is principally in the later style of English architecture, and has lately received an addition of two hundred and twenty sittings, of which one hundred and forty are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £200 towards defraying the expense. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Major John Gibbon, in 1707, bequeathed property amounting to £921. 4. three per cent. consols., producing £27. 2. 9., for teaching and apprenticing poor children of both sexes.

ROMALD-KIRK, a parish in the western division of the wapentake of GILLING, North riding of the county of YORK, comprising the townships of Cotherston, Holwick, Hunderthwaite, Lartington, Lune-Dale, Mickleton, and Romald-Kirk, and containing 2461 inhabitants, of which number, 377 are in the township of Romald-Kirk, 6 miles (N. W.) from Barnard-Castle. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £58. 14. 2., and in the patronage of the Earl of Strathmore. The church, dedicated to St. Romald, is an ancient cruciform structure, with a large square tower crowned with pinnacles: it contains several handsome monuments. John Parkin, in 1632, bequeathed £300, now producing about £20 per annum, for which all the poor children of the parish are entitled to free instruction.

ROMANBY, a township in the parish of NORTH-ALLERTON, wapentake of ALLERTONSHIRE, North riding of the county of YORK, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile (S. W.) from North Allerton, containing 294 inhabitants. It derived its name from the Roman road passing by it.

ROMANSLEIGH, a parish in the hundred of WITHERIDGE, county of DEVON, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. by E.) from South Molton, containing 214 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Barnstaple, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £10. 14. $9\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of Sir T. D. Acland, Bart. The church is dedicated to St. Rumon.

ROMFORD, a market town and parish in the liberty of HAVERING atte BOWER, county of ESSEX, 18 miles (S. W.) from Chelmsford, and 12 (E. N. E.) from London, containing 3777 inhabitants. This town is supposed by Dr. Stukeley to occupy the site of the Roman station Durolitum, and he considers its name to be a contraction of Roman-ford, in which opinion he is supported by the eminent antiquary Smart Lethellier, Esq.; others, however, derive it from a ford over a small stream running into the Thames, called the Rom, which intersects the town, and is crossed by a bridge. It is situated on the high road from London to Bury, Colchester, Ipswich, Harwich, Norwich, and Yarmouth, and is consequently a great thoroughfare, consisting chiefly of one long and wide street, which is well paved, and lighted with gas, according to the provisions of an act of parliament passed in the year 1819; the houses are tolerably good, and the inhabitants are well supplied with water. The market, held on Wednesday, was granted so early as 1247; it is the general market for all kinds of agricultural produce, cattle &c., and is numerously attended; another is held on Monday for hogs, and one on Tuesday for calves: there is an annual fair on Midsummer-day for horses and cattle, and a statute fair for hiring servants, on the market days next before and after the 29th of September: the market-place and tolls have been recently purchased of the crown by Hugh Macintosh, Esq. This town, which, with Hornchurch and Havering, constitutes "the liberty of Havering atte Bower," was formerly considered one of the wards of Hornchurch, but by an act of parliament passed for the regulation of the poor, in 1786, it is recognized, so far as relates to civil jurisdiction, as a separate parish, and comprises the wards of Collier Row, Harold's Wood, Noke Hill, and the Town; as regards ecclesiastical affairs it is still partly dependent on the parish of Hornchurch. The earliest charter was granted by Edward the Confessor, which has received several confirmations and additions: the government is vested in the high steward, the deputy steward, and one justice elected by the inhabitants of the liberty, all of whom exercise magisterial authority: they are a corporation, and have a patent authorising them at their own quarter sessions, which are held on the Friday after the county quarter sessions, to try for all manner of offences, high treason not excepted, upon payment of a trifling fee, but no commission of this kind has been applied for of late years; and also to hear and determine, every three weeks, all actions for debt, trespasses, ejectments, and replevins, in a court of ancient demesne. The tenants of this liberty claim exemption from toll every where throughout the realm, both for goods and cattle sold, and provisions purchased; from payment towards the county expenses, and also a personal exemption from being empannelled on juries and inquests, save within their own liberty, with various other privileges: the county magistrates have no jurisdiction within the liberty. The court-house is in the market-place, and beneath it is a small gaol for the liberty. During the war there were cavalry barracks, built of wood, but they have since been pulled down.

The living is in the nature of a vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Warden and Fellows of New College, Oxford, who appoint a commissary. The great and small tithes of the whole liberty, were given by William of Wykeham to the Warden and Fellows of New College, Oxford, founded by him; the great tithes being now demised to two laymen, and the small tithes of Romford to the chaplain of Romford, and those of Hornchurch to the chaplain of Hornchurch. The church, dedicated to St. Edward the Confessor, was erected in 1407, and consists of a nave, north aisle, and chancel, with a tower at the west end; in the east window is the figure of the patron saint, in fine old painted glass: there are several ancient monumental tablets and effigies, of which the most remarkable are, one to Sir Anthony Coke, Ambassador to Queen Elizabeth, who died in 1576, and was interred here; and two others to the memory of Sir George Hervey, Knt., and his daughter. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists, the first having a small endowment of £20 per annum, and a house for the minister. A free school, for children of both sexes, was erected in 1728, and has been endowed with various benefactions, amounting to more than £1300; it is further supported by voluntary contributions, and contains sixty boys and thirty girls. An almshouse was founded by Roger Reed, in 1483, for the support of five poor men, whose widows are allowed £20 a year for life, with clothes and coal; the present value of the endowment is £280 per annum: the almshouse was rebuilt in 1784. The workhouse is a commodious building, erected in 1787, at an expense of £4000, under the provisions of an act of parliament, whereby the management of the poor is confided to thirty guardians, exclusively of the two churchwardens. Here were anciently a guild and a chantry; the revenue of the former was valued, at the dissolution, at £4. 10. 2., and that of the latter at £13; also an hospital, a cell to that of Mount St. Bernard, in the Savoy, London, founded at an early period, and dedicated to St. Nicholas and St. Bernard. Francis Quarles, the poet, and author of "The Divine Emblems," cup-bearer to the Queen of Bohemia, and afterwards secretary to Archbishop Usher, whom he accompanied to Ireland, was a native of this place; he died in 1644.

ROMILY, or CHAD-KIRK, a chapelry in the parish of STOCKPORT, hundred of MACCLESFIELD, county palatine of CHESTER, 4 miles (E.) from Stockport, containing 1181 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, endowed with £400 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Rector of Stockport. The chapel, dedicated to St. Chad, was rebuilt by subscription in 1746. The Peak Forest canal passes through the parish.

ROMNEY (NEW), a cinque-port, market town, and parish, having separate jurisdiction, in the cinque-port liberty of ROMNEY, county of KENT, 34 miles (S. E.) from Maidstone, and 68 (S. E. by E.) from London, containing 962 inhabitants. The name is probably derived from the Saxon Rumen-æa, "a large watery expanse, or marsh." It arose from the decay of the haven at Old Romney, by the retiring of the sea, and, in contradistinction to that town, obtained the appellation of New Romney. At the time of the Conquest it was a place of considerable importance, divided into twelve wards, and containing five parish churches, of which that of St. Nicholas is now the only one remaining. It was soon after that period given by William the Conqueror to his brother Odo, Bishop of Bayeux, whom that monarch created Earl of Kent; subsequently to which it was made a cinque-port, and the towns of Old Romney and Lydd were included within its jurisdiction. In return for such privileges, it was charged with the duty of supplying five ships of war for the service of the king. In the 15th of Edward I. an irruption of the sea inundated an extensive tract of land, destroyed the populous village of Bromhill, and a considerable part of the town, diverted the course of the river Rother, and ruined its fine haven on the western shore; since which time it has shared the fate of its predecessor, and though still inhabited as a market town, has as a port fallen into comparative insignificance and decay. On several occasions, Romney, as a cinque-port, furnished a complement of five ships, duly manned and equipped for naval engagements, especially in the reigns of John, Edward III., Henry VII., and Henry VIII. The town is situated on rising ground near the centre of Romney-Marsh, and consists of one broad well-paved street, with a smaller one intersecting it almost at right angles. The chief trade arises from the grazing of cattle on Romney-Marsh. The market, on Saturday, is held under the guildhall; and there is a considerable fair for live stock on the 21st of August.

Romney is a borough by prescription; the inhabitants received the first charter of incorporation from Edward III., under the style of "Barons of the Town and Port of Romney;" a new charter was granted by Elizabeth, under which the town is now governed: the corporation consists of a mayor, twelve jurats, and common council-men, with a recorder, chamberlain, town clerk, and other officers, under the style of "Mayor, Jurats, and Commonalty:" the mayor is chosen annually upon Lady-day, from among the jurats. A court, called a Brotherhood and Guestling, connected with the business of the various cinque-ports and their members, is held, when necessary, on the Tuesday next after St. Margaret's day. A court of record for pleas to an unlimited extent was granted by Charles II., to be held by the mayor and jurats: no writs have been issued of late years, but the court is still used for levying fines. Sessions are held quarterly, and by adjournment every six weeks, in the guildhall, a neat structure of brick, cemented so as to resemble stone, recently erected. Two representatives, under the title of Barons, are returned to parliament: the right of election is in the corporation: the mayor is the returning officer, and the influence of the Deering family is predominant. This place enjoys all the exclusive privileges of the cinque-ports, and its barons are second in rank to bear the canopies over the king and queen at the coronation.

The living is a vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £6. 16. 3., and in the patronage of the Warden and Fellows of All Souls' College, Oxford. The church, dedicated to St. Nicholas, is a spacious edifice, consisting of three aisles and three chancels, and a square tower at the west end, with several portions of Norman architecture, and some in the later styles, and contains a variety of monuments and brasses. An hospital was founded in 1610, and endowed with land by John Southland, for the maintenance of a governor, who must be a scholar of Oxford or Cambridge, four poor persons, and two poor children, the latter to be instructed by the governor in the English language and arithmetic, until they are fourteen years old: the children are appointed by the mayor as vacancies arise. Here was formerly a cell, subordinate to the abbey of Pountney, or Pontiniac, in France, also an hospital for lepers, founded in the reign of Henry II., and afterwards converted into a chantry; of both which there are some trifling vestiges.

ROMNEY (OLD), a parish partly in the cinque-port liberty of NEW ROMNEY, and partly in the liberty of ROMNEY-MARSH, lathe of SHEPWAY, county of KENT, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (W. by N.) from New Romney, containing 153 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £15. 19. 2. The church is dedicated to St. Clement. This town had a good and much-frequented haven prior to the Conquest; but in the reign of Edward III. it sustained considerable damage from violent tempests, and its harbour being choked up and obstructed, and the river Rye having changed its course, it was superseded in its maritime privileges and prosperity by New Romney. An hospital for lepers, founded here by Adam de Cherring, and dedicated to St. Stephen and St. Thomas à Becket, was, in the fourteenth century, converted into a chantry, and in 1481 became annexed to the college of St. Mary Magdalene, in Oxford.

ROMNEY-MARSH, a liberty in the lathe of SHEPWAY, county of KENT, comprising the parishes of Broomhill, Burmarsh, Dymchurch with Blackmanstone, East-Bridge, Hope (All Saints), Ivy-Church, Lydd, St. Mary's, Midley, Newchurch, Orgarswick, New Romney, Old Romney, Snargate, and Snave; and parts of those of Aldington, Bilsington, Bonnington, Brenzett, Hurst, Lympne, and Orlestone. For a further account, see article on the county of KENT.

ROMSEY, a market town and parish having separate jurisdiction, though locally in the hundred of King's Sombourn, Andover division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 8 miles (N. W. by N.) from Southampton, and 75 (S. W. by S.) from London, containing 5128 inhabitants. This town is of great antiquity, and its name is of Saxon origin. An abbey for nuns of the Benedictine order was founded by Edward the Elder, whose daughter Elfleda was the first abbess: the foundation was augmented by Edgar in 967, and his son Edmund was interred in the abbey church. All the first abbesses were of royal birth, and eminent for their sanctity. About the year 992 it was plundered by the Danes, but the nuns, with the relics, and other articles of the greatest value, had been previously removed to Winchester, through the precaution of Elwina the abbess. An enumeration of some of the possessions of this monastery appears in Domesday-book, in which it is called the abbey de Romesyg. In 1085, Christina, cousin to Edward the Confessor, took the veil here, and to her was entrusted the education of Matilda, daughter of Malcolm, King of Scotland, and subsequently wife of Henry I. In the next reign, Mary, daughter of King Stephen, became abbess, and was induced to quit her charge by Matthew, younger son of Theodore, Earl of Flanders, to whom she was married, which step so excited the indignation of the Papal see, that she was compelled to return to her conventual duties after having borne two children. The benefactors to the abbey were numerous, and its revenue, at the dissolution, was valued at £528. 8. 10 $\frac{1}{4}$: in the 35th of Henry VIII., the site was granted to the inhabitants of the town, and three years afterwards to John Bellew and R. Bigot.

The town is situated on the river Test, which falls into the Southampton water, in a flat country, on the road from Southampton to Bath, and is surrounded by an amphitheatre of hills and fertile and pleasant meadows, which are rendered more productive by the occasional overflowing of the river: it consists of several good streets, which are lighted and paved under the provisions of an act of parliament: the inhabitants are well supplied with water: there are a news-room and some book clubs: concerts are held annually, and musical festivals occasionally. The clothing trade was formerly carried on to a considerable extent, but has long declined; employment is given to nearly three hundred persons in three paper-mills, one flax-mill, and three sacking manufactories; there are also some tanneries, malting establishments, and several corn-mills upon the river Test. The town is supplied with coal and other commodities by means of the canal from Redbridge to Andover, which passes through it. The market, which was formerly on Saturday, has been recently changed to Thursday, by letters patent granted to the lord of the manor; it is chiefly for corn, and on alternate Thursdays is also supplied with cattle: the fairs are on Easter-Monday and Tuesday, August 26th, and November 8th, for horses, cattle, cheese, cloth, and other articles of merchandise. The inhabitants were first incorporated by charter of James I., which was confirmed by William III.: the government is vested in a mayor, lord high steward, recorder, six aldermen, and twelve burgesses, assisted by a town-clerk, two serjeants at mace, and two ale-tasters. The mayor, late mayor, the recorder, and three senior aldermen, are justices of the peace, and are empowered to hold quarter sessions for the trial of felons and misdemeanants: the mayor, recorder, and aldermen, hold a court of record every Thursday, for the recovery of debts not exceeding £40, the jurisdiction of which is confined to the borough: the county magistrates cannot preside at either of these courts. Romsey Extra is within the jurisdiction of the Cheyney Court held at Winchester every Thursday, for the recovery of debts to any amount. The new court-house, or town hall, in which the quarter sessions and assemblies are held, is situated in the abbey precinct, and was built by the corporation in 1820: near it is a gaol.

The living, which comprises the two parishes of Romsey Infra and Romsey Extra, is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £20. 18. 1½., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Winchester. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, and formerly belonging to the abbey, is a very magnificent cruciform structure, with a low tower rising from the intersection: the principal portion was erected in the middle of the tenth century, and exhibits some fine specimens of the Norman style of architecture; within are various admixtures of round and pointed arches, with zigzag and other ornaments; the more modern parts of the edifice are in the early English style. The interior contains several ancient memorials of the abbesses who were interred here; an elegant sepulchral inscription to Frances, Viscountess Palmerston, who died in childbed, in 1769; and a neat tablet to the memory of Sir William Petty, a native of this town, and ancestor to the present Marquis of Lansdowne: there is also a remarkable monument, with effigies and a curious inscription, to the family of John St. Barbe, Esq., a representative of this county in parliament in 1654. An apple-tree, supposed to be at least two hundred years old, grew on the roof until lately, but it is now dead. This venerable edifice has lately received an addition of eight hundred sittings, of which seven hundred and twenty-seven are free, the Incorporated Society for enlarging and building churches and chapels having contributed £450. At the east end of the building several stone coffins were discovered some years ago; at the angle of the southern transept are the remains of a fine Norman doorway, and in its western wall is a very ancient image of Christ on the Cross, in basso relievo: the west end is separated from that part of the building appropriated to divine service by a curious and ancient oak screen: about fourteen years since, some curious old paintings were found behind the altar-piece. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, Wesleyan Methodists, and Sandemanians. A free school, in which thirty boys are educated and annually clothed, and some apprenticed every year, having been founded, probably, by subscription, was, in 1718, endowed from the estate of John Nowes, Esq., with an income of £30 per annum, for the instruction of twenty poor boys, and £60 per annum to clothe them: this endowment was augmented, in 1723, by a rent-charge of £25, for clothing and teaching ten boys, under the will of Sir John St. Barbe. The National school for three hundred boys is a neat building, erected in 1827, the site, and £150 towards the erection, having been given by Lord Palmerston: it is supported by voluntary contributions. The Union school for eighty boys, on the Lancasterian system, is supported by subscription. Almshouses for six widows were founded, in 1692, by John Hunt, Esq.; and six others for single women, in 1809, by John Bartlett, Esq. The only vestiges of the ancient abbey, exclusively of the church, are a few fragments of the old walls. Mr. Giles Jacob, author of the Law Dictionary, was born here, in 1686.

ROMSLEY, a liberty in that part of the parish of ALVELEY which is in the borough of BRIDGENORTH, county of SALOP, 8 miles (S. E.) from Bridgenorth, containing 144 inhabitants.

RONTON, a parish in the southern division of the hundred of PIREHILL, county of STAFFORD, 4 miles (S. by E.) from Eccleshall, containing 334 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Stafford, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, and in the patronage of the Earl of Aboyne. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

RONTON-ABBEY, an extra-parochial liberty, in the southern division of the hundred of PIREHILL, county of STAFFORD, 3½ miles (S. by E.) from Eccleshall, containing 11 inhabitants. A priory of Black canons, subordinate to the abbey of Haughmond in Shropshire, was founded, in the reign of Henry II., by Robert Noel, in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary, and at the dissolution was valued at £102. 11. 1. per annum: the tower and a small portion of the cloisters still remain, with the moat that enclosed the grounds, comprising thirty acres.

ROOKWITH, a township in the parish of THORNTON-WATLASS, eastern division of the wapentake of HANG, North riding of the county of YORK, 4¼ miles (W. S. W.) from Bedale, containing 76 inhabitants.

ROOSDOWN, an extra-parochial liberty, though locally in the parish of Axminster, hundred of AXMINSTER, county of DEVON, 3¼ miles (W. S. W.) from Lyme-Regis, containing 14 inhabitants.

ROOSS, a parish in the middle division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESS, East riding of the county of YORK, 14 miles (E.) from Kingston upon Hull, containing 442 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of the East riding, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £19, and in the patronage of the Rev. C. Sykes. The church, dedicated to All Saints, is partly in the decorated and partly in the later style of English architecture. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Jane Hogg, in 1754, bequeathed a rent-charge of £6 for teaching poor children.

ROOTHING (ABBOT'S), a parish partly in the hundred of DUNMOW, but chiefly in that of ONGAR, county of ESSEX, 5¾ miles (N. by E.) from Chipping-Ongar, containing, with the hamlet of Barwick, 236 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Middlesex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £14. 10., and in the patronage of the Rev. Thomas Dyer. The church is dedicated to St. Edmund.

ROOTHING (AYTHORPE), a parish in the hundred of DUNMOW, county of ESSEX, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Great Dunmow, containing 234 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the jurisdiction of the Commissary of Essex and Herts, concurrently with the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of London, rated in the king's books at £12, and in the patronage of the Rev. J. Oldham. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

ROOTHING (BEAUCHAMP), a parish in the hundred of ONGAR, county of ESSEX, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Chipping-Ongar, containing 211 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Middlesex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £16. 13. 4., and in the patronage of Mrs. Jane Foxcroft. The church is dedicated to St. Botolph.

ROOTHING (BERNERS), a parish in the hundred of DUNMOW, county of ESSEX, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Chipping-Ongar, containing 93 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Middlesex, and diocese of London, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £500 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of T. G. Bramston, Esq.

ROOTHING (HIGH), a parish in the hundred of DUNMOW, county of ESSEX, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. W. by S.) from Great Dunmow, containing 388 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Middlesex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £20, and in the patronage of Lord Rodney. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

ROOTHING (LEADEN), a parish in the hundred of DUNMOW, county of ESSEX, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. S. W.) from Great Dunmow, containing 157 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the jurisdiction of the Commissary of Essex and Herts, concurrently with the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of London, rated in the king's books at £12. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Crown. Five pounds per annum, the gift of an unknown benefactor, is applied for teaching poor children.

ROOTHING (MARGARET), a parish in the hundred of DUNMOW, county of ESSEX, $7\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Chipping-Ongar, containing 209 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Middlesex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £10. 12. 6., and in the patronage of Mrs. Harding. The church is dedicated to St. Margaret.

ROOTHING (MORRELL), a hamlet in the parish of WHITE ROOTHING, hundred of DUNMOW, though locally in the hundred of Ongar, county of ESSEX, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W.) from Great Dunmow. The population is returned with the parish.

ROOTHING (WHITE), a parish in the hundred of DUNMOW, county of ESSEX, $6\frac{3}{4}$ miles (S. W.) from Great Dunmow, containing, with Morrell-Roothing, 439 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Middlesex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £26. The Rev. Henry Budd was patron in 1808. The church is dedicated to St. Martin.

ROPE, a township in the parish of WYBUNBURY, hundred of NANTWICH, county palatine of CHESTER, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by N.) from Nantwich, containing 95 inhabitants.

AMPTON, 4 miles (E.) from New Alresford, containing 730 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Bishop's Sutton, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. Ropley is within the jurisdiction of the Cheyney Court held at Winchester every Thursday, for the recovery of debts to any amount.

ROPSLEY, a parish in the wapentake of WINNIBRIGGS and THREO, parts of KESTIVEN, county of LINCOLN, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W.) from Falkingham, containing, with the hamlet of Little Humby, 554 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £11. 14. 2., and in the patronage of the Duke of Rutland. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. James Thompson, in 1719, bequeathed a rent-charge of £6 for teaching six poor children.

ROSEACRE, a joint township with Treales and Wharles, in the parish of KIRKHAM, hundred of AMOUNDERNESS, county palatine of LANCASTER, 4 miles (N. by E.) from Kirkham. The population is returned with Treales.

ROSE-ASH, a parish in the hundred of WITHERIDGE, county of DEVON, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from South Molton, containing 436 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Barnstaple, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £18. 19. 7., and in the patronage of the Representatives of the families of Esse and Giffard. A charity school is partly supported with two small endowments, by Ann Vicary in 1753, and John Bray in 1764.

ROSEDALE (EAST SIDE), a township in the parish of MIDDLETON, PICKERING lythe, North riding of the county of YORK, 10 miles (N. N. W.) from Pickering, containing 339 inhabitants. Thomas Pierson, in 1720, gave a rent-charge of £5 for teaching five children.

ROSEDALE (WEST SIDE), a chapelry in the parish of LASTINGHAM, wapentake of RYEDALE, North riding of the county of YORK, 11 miles (N. W. by N.) from Pickering, containing 179 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cleveland, and diocese of York, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Middleton. The chapel is dedicated to St. Lawrence. A convent of Benedictine, or Cistercian, nuns, in honour of St. Mary and St. Lawrence, was founded here in the reign of Richard I., by Robert, son of Nicholas de Stutevil, which at the dissolution possessed a revenue of £41. 13. 8.

ROSEDON, a township in the parish of ILDETON, northern division of COQUETDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 5 miles (S. E. by S.) from Wooler, containing 74 inhabitants. On Rosedon Edge are the remains of a semicircular intrenchment of earth, with an inner wall of loose stones, supposed to be of British origin, and subsequently improved by the Romans.

ROSLEY, a township in the parish of WESTWARD, ALLERDALE ward, below Darwent, county of CUMBERLAND, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Wigton, containing 302 inhabitants. A great fair for horses, cattle, sheep, cloth &c., is held on Whit-Monday and every alternate Monday following till All Saints' day, at which it is computed that two thousand head of cattle, and five hundred horses, are exhibited for sale; forty acres of land on Rosley Hill were allotted for holding this fair under the enclosure act of 1811.

ROSLISTON, a parish in the hundred of REPTON and GRESLEY, county of DERBY, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by W.) from Burton upon Trent, containing 359 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, with the rectory of Walton upon Trent, in the archdeaconry of Derby, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, which was rebuilt by subscription in 1827, has received an addition of two hundred free sittings, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £150 towards defraying the expense.

ROSS, a township in that part of the parish of BELFORD which is in ISLANDSHIRE, a detached portion of the county palatine of DURHAM, 3 miles (N. E.) from Belford, containing 55 inhabitants.

ROSS, a market town and parish in the hundred of GREYTREE, county of HEREFORD, 14 miles (S. E.) from Hereford, and 120 (W. N. W.) from London, containing 2957 inhabitants. Tradition reports this place to have been founded from the ruins of the Roman town Ariconium, which stood at a short distance. It was formerly a free borough, having been made so by Henry III. In the thirty-third year of the reign of Edward I. it sent members to parliament, but this privilege was relinquished, on the petition of the inhabitants, the following year, and has never been resumed. Henry IV. passed a night here, on his way to Monmouth to see his queen, at the time his son and successor was born; and the unfortunate Charles I. slept here, in 1645, on his way from Ragland Castle. The town is situated on an eminence, at the foot of which the river Wye runs, in a meandering course, in the midst of a richly-cultivated, beautiful, and picturesque country: it consists chiefly of two streets, crossing each other, which are narrow and badly paved; and the houses generally are old and ill-constructed, though the town has of late years been much improved, and some good houses have been built: the inhabitants are well supplied with water, raised by an engine from the Wye. A Horticultural Society has been established, by which three hundred prizes and thirty silver medals are annually distributed, with flowers and fruit; and there is an annual display of the works of artists; besides a mechanics' institution, and four reading societies. Ross had formerly a considerable trade in iron, which has long declined, cider and wool being the principal articles of produce at present. A weekly market was granted by King Stephen to Bishop Betren, to be held on Thursday; it is well supplied with cattle and provisions: there are fairs on Thursday after March 10th, Ascension-day, June 21st, July 20th, Thursday after October 10th, and December 11th. The town is divided into two parts, called the Borough and the Foreign; and a serjeant at mace, four constables, and some other subordinate officers, are chosen at a court leet and baron, which is held about Michaelmas, by the nominal mayor, for the former, and two constables for the latter: the petty sessions for the hundred are holden here.

The living is a rectory and a vicarage united, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £38. 16. 3., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Hereford. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is an irregularly built, though handsome, edifice, with a lofty well-proportioned spire, in an extremely beautiful situation: the east window is ornamented with stained glass, and contains a figure of Thomas de Cantelupe, Bishop of Hereford, in the act of giving benediction. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, and Independents. In the churchyard is a free school, called St. Mary's, founded and endowed with £10 per annum by Lord Weymouth, in 1709: it has lately been rebuilt, and two sons of poor tradesmen of the borough are instructed here. The Blue-coat school was founded, in 1709, by Dr. Whiting, Lord Scudamore, and others, and endowed, in 1786, with £200 per annum, by Walter Scott, who had been educated in it; sixty boys and girls are clothed and instructed. Two National schools for boys and girls are supported by voluntary contributions, as well as a dispensary, and an infant school recently established. There is an hospital for seven poor parishioners, who receive a weekly allowance, founded by Mr. Webbe, a native of the town. The Bishops of Hereford, who were lords of the manor, had formerly a palace here, but it has been long since demolished; and the prison belonging to them was pulled down about ninety years since: an old stone cross, called Cob's Cross, a corruption of Corpus Christi Cross, is still standing, supposed to be commemorative of the ravages of the plague in 1635, and the two subsequent years. Ross was the birthplace of John de Ross, a celebrated Doctor of Law, who was established by the pope in the bishoprick of Carlisle, without any election, in 1318, and died in 1331. The benevolent John Kyrle, "Pope's man of Ross," died here in 1724, aged eighty-eight, and lies buried in the church, where a rich monument, with a medallion, was erected to his memory, in 1776, from a bequest by Lady Betty Duplin for that purpose. At the castellated mansion of L. Merrick, Esq., near Ross, is a celebrated collection of ancient armour, and other antiquities, which attracts numerous visitors.

ROSSINGTON, a parish in the soke of DONCASTER, West riding of the county of YORK, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Bawtry, containing 383 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Nottingham, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £11. 1. $5\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of R. Bower, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. In the churchyard are several good monuments, and near the entrance to the choir, under a stone, lie the remains of James Boswell, the King of the Gipsies, who died in January 1708. Annual visits were formerly made to his grave by gipsies, who, amongst other ceremonies, used to pour a flagon of ale on it. A free school, founded here in 1650, by William Plaxton, is supported by a rent-charge of £6. 13. 4., left by him, and £10 per annum allowed by the corporation of Doncaster, for which twenty children are taught free.

ROSTHERN, a parish comprising the chapelries of High Leigh and Peover (Superior), and the townships of Agden, Bollington, Martall with Little Warford, Mere, Millington, Rosthern, Tabley (Superior), and Tatton, in the hundred of BUCKLOW, and the township of Snelson, in that of MACCLESFIELD, county palatine of CHESTER, and containing 3791 inhabitants, of which number, 373 are in the township of Rosthern, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Nether Knutsford. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £10, endowed with £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of W. Egerton, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, contains several ancient monuments, and in the chapel of the Egerton family is a sumptuous one, by Bacon, to the memory of Samuel Egerton, Esq., who died in 1780.

ROSTON, a township in the parish of NORBURY, hundred of APPLETREE, county of DERBY, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W.) from Ashbourn. The population is returned with the parish. It is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s.

ROTHBURY, a market town and parish in the western division of COQUETDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, comprising the townships of Bickerton, Caistron, Chartington, Debdon, Fallowlees, Flotterton, Hellinghill, Hepple, Hepple-Demesne, Hesley-Hurst, Lee-Ward, Mounthealy, Newtown, Paperhaugh, Raw, Rothbury, Rye-Hill, Snitter, Thropton, Great Tossen, Little Tossen, High and Low Trewhitt, Warton, Whitton, and Wreigh-Hill, and containing 2609 inhabitants, of which number, 891 are in the town of Rothbury, 30 miles (N. W. by N.) from Newcastle, and 300 (N. N. W.) from London. The name of this town was anciently written Roberie, Rathbury, and Routhbyrig; by some derived from the British Rhath, a cleared spot, or the Gaelic Ruth, denoting a place of security, but more probably from the Saxon Ruth, red, expressive of the ferruginous appearance arising from the iron-stone and ochre that exist in the parish. Its situation, though low, is very beautiful, being in a sequestered and romantic glen, through which the river Coquet flows near the southern extremity, where it is crossed by a handsome stone bridge of four arches. On the brow of a hill on the south side of the river is Whitton Tower, formerly the seat of the Umfravilles, whose arms decorate the western front, now used as the parsonage-house; on the west the beautiful vale opens gradually on the view, almost encircled with hills and ridges of broken rocks, interspersed with trees, among which numerous goats browse, the milk and whey being in considerable request by valetudinarians, who resort hither during the summer season. The parish also contains an abundance of coal and limestone, and some inconsiderable veins of lead-ore. The ancient Forest of Rothbury, occupying a tract seven miles long and five broad, has long been cleared of its trees, and is now under cultivation, except a very small portion, which is depastured by sheep. The town, which is wide and airy, consists of three streets irregularly built, diverging from the market-place, which is decorated with a neat cross: it is neither paved nor lighted: the inhabitants are supplied with water from several springs. A small subscription library was established in 1815. The market, granted, in the reign of John, to Robert Fitz-Roger, Baron of Warkworth (of which this manor was a member), to be held on Thursday, is now on Friday, but is almost grown into disuse. Fairs for horses, cattle, and sheep, are held annually on Whit-Monday, October 2nd, and November 1st, and a statute fair for hiring servants on the Friday in Easter week. The town is within the jurisdiction of the county magistrates, and its local affairs are under the superintendence of two bailiffs, appointed annually by the lord of the manor, on the first Tuesday in October, assisted by two constables, two bread-weighers and ale-conners, and two land-meters.

The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Northumberland, and diocese of Durham, rated in the king's books at £58. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Carlisle. The church, which is dedicated to All Saints, is a fine old structure in the form of a cross, with a square tower; against a pillar near the south door is the effigy in stone of a man in armour, with a pistol in his right hand, and a powder bag in his belt: the head has been broken off: there are some handsome monuments, and a very antique font, on which is rudely sculptured a representation of the Redeemer sitting in Judgment. Near the church is the free school, with a dwelling-house and garden for the master, to the erection of which, the Rev. Mr. Thomlinson, rector of the parish, gave £100, and £20 per annum as an endowment, to which have been added £6 per annum by George Fletcher, Esq., High Sheriff of Northumberland, and some other benefactions, producing about £240 per annum, of which the master receives £50 per annum as a salary, part of the funds being applied, according to the will of Dr. Thomlinson, in sending a few scholars to the university, and apprenticing poor children. A subscription school, called the Central school, has lately been united with this institution, which is now conducted on the Madras system. Dr. John Brown, vicar of St. Nicholas' in Newcastle, and author of some essays, poetical pieces, and dramatic writings, was a native of this parish; and Bernard Rumney, an ancient northern bard and musician, lived and died here. At a distance of one mile to the east, on a bold eminence, is a circular intrenchment, with a double ditch and rampart, called Old Rothbury, an asylum or place of refuge in times of public danger, to which the inhabitants retired from the incursions of the Scots, prior to the union of the two kingdoms.

ROTHERBY, a parish in the eastern division of the hundred of GOSCOTE, county of LEICESTER, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Melton-Mowbray, containing 143 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Leicester, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £8. 8. 4., and in the patronage of the Rev. Mr. Browne. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

ROTHERFIELD, a parish in the hundred of ROTHERFIELD, rape of PEVENSEY, county of SUSSEX, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. S. W.) from Wadhurst, containing 2782 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Lewes, and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £27. 12. 6., and in the patronage of the Earl of Abergavenny. The church, dedicated to St. Denis, is principally in the early style of English architecture; it has an arched roof of chesnut wood. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyan Methodists. The river Rother has its source in this parish, and there are several chalybeate springs in the neighbourhood. Sir Henry Fermor, in 1732, bequeathed £3000, now producing an annual income of £260, which is appropriated to the instruction and clothing of thirty children of both sexes. Berthwald, Duke of the South Saxons, founded here, about 800, a monastery, subordinate to the abbey of St. Denis in France, but not the slightest vestige of it can now be traced.

ROTHERFIELD-GRAYS, a parish in the hundred of BINFIELD, county of OXFORD, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W.) from Henley, containing 717 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Oxford, rated in the king's books at £10. 12. 8½., and in the patronage of the President and Fellows of Trinity College, Oxford. The church contains a font of singular shape: in the chancel is a brass effigy of a warrior, in good preservation, under a tabernacle, with a Latin inscription in old letter, to the memory of Robert de Grey, Lord of Rotherfield, who died in 1387; and in one of the aisles a splendid monument, of the period of James I., to Sir Francis Knollys, his lady, and their numerous progeny. Here are the remains of a castellated mansion of the de Greys, erected in the reign of Edward I.

ROTHERFIELD-PEPPARD, a parish in the hundred of BINFIELD, county of OXFORD, 3¼ miles (W. by S.) from Henley upon Thames, containing 401 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Oxford, rated in the king's books at £9. 9. 4½., and in the patronage of the Principal and Fellows of Jesus College, Oxford. The church is dedicated to All Saints. The river Thames runs through the parish.

ROTHERHAM, a parish, comprising the market town of Rotherham, the chapelry of Tinsley, and the townships of Brinsworth, Catcliffe, Dalton, and Orgreave, in the southern, and the chapelry of Greasbrough, and the township of Kimberworth in the northern, division of the wapentake of STRAFFORTH and TICKHILL, West riding of the county of YORK, and containing 9623 inhabitants, of which number, 3548 are in the town of Rotherham, 49 miles (S. S. W.) from York, and 159 (N. N. W.) from London. The town is situated in the midst of a district abounding in mineral wealth: it is built partly on the declivity of an eminence, and partly in a vale, near the confluence of the rivers Don and Rother; from the latter, which forms its western boundary, the town derives its name, and it is bounded on the north-west by the former, over which a handsome stone bridge connects it with the village of Masborough, which is of nearly equal extent with the town. The houses are in general built of stone, and most of them are low and of mean appearance, though occasionally intermixed with some of more modern erection; in the immediate neighbourhood of the church, several substantial and respectable dwellings have been recently erected, and at the east end of the town are two elegant mansions, called Clifton and Eastwood. The streets are narrow, and irregularly formed; and though from its situation the town is capable of very great improvement, comparatively little has been effected. It is well paved, lighted with oil, and amply supplied with water. The environs are pleasant, and abound with varied scenery, and coal and iron-ore exist in great profusion. Within a short distance, on the road to Barnesley, is Wentworth House, the magnificent seat of Earl Fitz-William. The public subscription library contains several thousand volumes in the general departments of literature, and is liberally supported by a proprietary, and by annual subscribers of £1. 1. each. The extensive iron-foundries belonging to Messrs. Walker were celebrated for the casting of cannon of the largest calibre for government, and of works of great magnitude; the iron bridges of Sunderland, Yarm, Staines, and the Southwark bridge over the river Thames, were cast in these foundries, in which at present the principal branches are the manufacture and rolling of iron. The manufacture of sail-cloth was formerly carried on, but it has been discontinued. The spinning of flax affords employment to about sixty persons; there are also roperies, a manufactory for starch, a large malting establishment, two extensive ale and porter breweries, several oil and chemical works, and a small glass-house. The river Don, which is navigable to Sheffield, communicates with the river Aire on the north-east, with the Stainforth and Keadby canal on the east, with the Dearn and Dove, and Barnesley canals on the north-west, and consequently with the river Calder, by which means Rotherham obtains a facility of intercourse with all the principal towns in the great manufacturing districts of Yorkshire and Lancashire. The market is on Monday, for corn, cattle, and provisions; and on every alternate Monday there is a celebrated market for fat cattle, sheep, and hogs, which is numerously attended by graziers from distant parts of the country. Fairs are held on Whit-Monday and December 1st, for cattle. A court leet is held annually, at which constables and other officers for the internal regulation of the town are appointed. The Midsummer sessions for the West riding are held here in the court-house, a handsome stone building recently erected, at an expense of £4000, in which also the justices of the peace hold their sittings, and all public business relating to the town is transacted. On the bridge leading to Masborough is an old structure, in the English style of architecture, now used as the town prison, but supposed to have been formerly a chapel of ease to the church.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £16. 8. 6., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Lord Howard, of Effingham. The church, dedicated to All Saints, is situated on an elevated knoll near the centre of the town, and is a spacious and venerable cruciform structure, in the later style of English architecture, with a central tower and spire highly enriched with panels, canopies, and crockets: the exterior is profusely, but tastefully and correctly, ornamented with sculptures of beautiful design, the doorways richly moulded, and the sides strengthened with panelled and crocketed buttresses: the south porch, of appropriate character, is highly enriched. The interior is lofty and finely arranged; the roof of the nave, which is of oak elaborately carved, is supported on piers of graceful elevation, and the windows, with a very few exceptions, are enriched with tracery of elegant design: the chancel is separated from the nave by a screen of elaborate workmanship, and there are some excellent monuments in the transepts, and near the altar a beautiful monument of marble to the memory of Samuel Buck, Esq., a native of the town, and late recorder of Leeds, who died in 1806. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, Wesleyan Methodists, and Unitarians. The free grammar school was founded, in 1584, by Lawrence Woodnett and Anthony Collins, of London, Esqrs., who endowed it with a small portion of land in and near the town: the endowment was subsequently augmented by a grant of £10. 15. 4. per annum, from the revenue of the crown lands, the government being in the feoffees of the common land. The school is kept in a room under the court-house, and is open, for gratuitous instruction in the classics only, to all boys of the town; the master's salary is £22. 19. 6. per annum, and his house was rebuilt in 1810: this school, in conjunction with those of Pontefract, Leeds, and Wakefield, is entitled to two scholarships, founded in Emanuel College, Cambridge, by John Frieston of Altofts, in the county of York, in failure of candidates from Normanston school. A charity school was founded by Mr. Scott, and the funds for its support, now under the superintendence of the feoffees of the common lands, were originally vested in separate trustees: the premises, comprising a school-room and apartments for the master, were erected by the feoffees, on a site of land given for that purpose by Lord Howard of Effingham: the income, arising from the original endowment, increased by subsequent benefactions, among which is a bequest of £20 per annum by Mr. Ellis, is about £80 per ann.: there are twenty-eight boys and twenty girls instructed and clothed with these funds, the deficiency being made up out of the rents of the common lands.

The Rotherham Independent College, at Masborough in this parish, for the education of young men intended for the ministry among that denomination of Protestant dissenters, was removed from Heckmondwicke, where it had subsisted for nearly forty years, and established here, in 1795, under the superintendence of the late Edward Williams, D.D.: the students are instructed in the classics, mathematics, rhetoric, and composition, and attend regular lectures in theology, to which all their studies are subservient. The premises, which are handsomely built, and occupy a healthy and pleasant eminence, were originally intended for the reception of sixteen students, but have been since adapted to the accommodation of twenty-five: the funds for the support of the institution arise solely from donations and annual subscription. A school for the instruction of thirty poor children of dissenters was founded by Thomas Hollis, Esq., whose trustees appoint the master, with a salary of £20 per annum, for teaching reading, writing, and arithmetic, to the children on the foundation, for which he also receives quarterly payments. The new dispensary, a handsome stone building, erected by subscription, at an expense of £2000, contains on the ground-floor, in addition to the offices requisite for the institution, a spacious room for the grammar school, which it is intended to remove from the court-house, and on the upper story an elegant room for the reception of the library, and a commodious news-room. Almshouses for four aged widows, or unmarried women, were founded in 1780, by Mrs. Mary Bellamy, who bequeathed £250, to be vested in the purchase of land for their endowment. She also left £200 in trust to the feoffees of the common lands, directing the interest to be applied to the apprenticing of two poor boys, and £200 for the use of the poor of the parish. Mr. Edward Bellamy, in 1776, bequeathed £200, the interest to be divided among four poor housekeepers in reduced circumstances and not receiving alms.

In 1480, Thomas Scott, usually called Thomas of Rotherham, who was then Bishop of Lincoln, founded a college in this town, for a provost, five priests, six choristers, and three schoolmasters, which he dedicated to the Holy Jesus: of the buildings, which subsisted for nearly a century, there remain the inn in Jesus' gate, and the opposite buildings now used as stables. This prelate was master of Pembroke Hall, chaplain to Edward IV., and, in 1475, made Lord Chancellor of England; he was soon after Bishop of Lincoln, and subsequently Archbishop of York; after the death of Edward, he was committed to the Tower by the Duke of Gloucester, who, on his ascent to the throne, released him; he died in 1500. Dr. Saunderson, Bishop of Lincoln, and a very eloquent preacher, in the time of Charles II., by whom he was particularly distinguished, was also a native of this town. On the summit of a hill, called Wincobank, about four miles from the town, and commanding a variety of extensive prospects, is the site of a military encampment, of nearly circular form, the mound and vallum of which may be distinctly traced; and at the foot of this hill, near the village of Grimesthorpe, is a quarry of stone, in which are imbedded various vegetable remains, chiefly calamites.

ROTHERHITHE, a parish in the eastern division of the hundred of Brixton, county of Surrey, 1 mile (S.E.) from London, containing 12,523 inhabitants. This place, corruptly called Redriff, was anciently a village and marsh south-eastward of London, to which it now forms an extensive suburb, on the opposite side of the river. The trench cut by Canute, in order to besiege the metropolis, commenced in this parish, and reached to Vauxhall; and the channel through which the river was turned, in 1173, for the rebuilding of London bridge, is supposed to have taken a similar course. In the reign of Edward III., a large naval armament was fitted out here, preparatory to an invasion of France, by Edward the Black Prince and the Duke of Lancaster; and during the commotions in the reign of Richard II., respecting the poll-tax, that monarch came hither in his barge, in order to pacify the malcontents; but his refusal to land so enraged the rioters, that, with their leaders, John Tyler, alias Jack Straw, and Wat, his brother, they broke open the Marshalsea and King's Bench prisons, liberated the inmates, and having proceeded to the house of the Duke of Lancaster, in the Savoy, destroyed it and all the valuable furniture and jewels by fire. In 1785, a dreadful fire broke out here, which in a few hours consumed two hundred and six houses, and did other extensive damage; but since the period of rebuilding them the population of the parish has nearly doubled its former amount, and is still on the increase. The situation of Rotherhithe, on the southern bank of the Thames, has induced numbers of seafaring men, watermen, and others, to reside here, and its inhabitants are now almost exclusively engaged in pursuits of this nature: in that part of the parish which forms the bank of the Thames are eleven dock-yards, for the building of East India ships and small merchant vessels; boat and lighter builders' wharfs; seven timber wharfs; three deal-yards, and a mast-yard; besides anchor-wharfs, ship-breakers' wharfs, and numerous warehouses for rigging and victualling the navy: the rest is occupied by the residences of masters of ships, seafaring people, and the tradesmen whose interests are dependent on navigation. The principal of the docks on this side of the river are, the Commercial dock, the several basins of which are capable of containing upwards of two hundred ships of burden; and the East Country dock, adjoining, appropriated to vessels for those parts and for America: the business connected with this place in general has been much circumscribed since the opening of the London, the East and West India, and St. Katherine's docks, on the opposite side of the river. The manufactures comprise the works carried on in the ordnance department at the three government wharfs, employed in making gun-carriages, &c. ; extensive iron-works, chiefly for the construction of iron bolts out of old iron hoops and other materials ; and the king's mills for grinding corn, some years ago occupied by the London Flour Company. A canal, leading from the Thames by the Gun wharf through Deptford to Mitcham, and begun in 1801, pursuant to act of parliament, now communicates with the Croydon canal at Deptford ; and by the same act authority was given to make a collateral cut thence to Greenland dock. The Thames Tunnel, a passage attempted to be formed beneath the bed of the river, intended to facilitate the communication with the opposite shore, having been projected and begun on a small scale in 1809, was again commenced here, from a design and under the direction of Mr. Brunel, in 1825, and carried on so far, that the archwork reaches within two hundred and thirty feet of the opposite shore, but this ingenious project is for the present discontinued : for a more detailed account of it, see article on London. The inhabitants possess a charter for two weekly markets and two annual fairs, but both have been long disused. A court of requests, for the recovery of debts not exceeding £5, the jurisdiction of which comprises the town and borough of Southwark, and the eastern division of the hundred of Brixton, is held here.

The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Surrey, and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £18, and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Clare Hall, Cambridge. The church is dedicated to St. Mary : in the churchyard is the tombstone of Prince Lee Boo, son of Abba Thule, King of one of the Pelew islands, who died of the small pox, in 1784, and whose memoirs have been transmitted to posterity, in the interesting narrative of Mr. Keate. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists. A free school, originally founded by Peter Hills, and Robert Bell, Esqrs., for the education and clothing of eight sons of seamen, and afterwards united with another, which was refounded in 1745, affords instruction to one hundred and fifty boys and fifty girls : it has a permanent income of £32 per annum, and is further supported by subscription. The Amicable school, founded in 1739, educates forty-five boys ; and in the United Society school, established in 1755, are thirty-one ; both these institutions are supported by voluntary contributions : there is likewise a school of industry for twenty girls.

ROTHERSTHORPE, a parish in the hundred of WYMERSLEY, county of NORTHAMPTON, 4 miles (S. W.) from Northampton, containing 272 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £5. 9. 4 $\frac{1}{4}$, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of T. S. W. Samwell, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul. The Northampton canal passes through the parish.

ROTHERWICK, a parish in the hundred of ODIHAM, Basingstoke division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 5 miles (W. by S.) from Hartford-Bridge, containing 402 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Chancellor of the Cathedral Church of Salisbury. A school-house was erected, in 1713, by Frederick Tylney, who in 1716 endowed it with a rent-charge of £10, for teaching ten children of each sex.

ROTHLEY, a parish comprising the chapelries of Keyham, Wartnaby, and Wycomb with Chadwell, in the eastern, and the chapelry of Mountsorrel, and the extra-parochial liberty of Rothley-Temple, in the western, division of the hundred of GOSCOTE, county of LEICESTER, 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S. by E.) from Mountsorrel, and containing 1349 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, rated in the king's books at £11. 0. 5., and in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of Thomas Babington, Esq., as lord of the manor and soke of Rothley. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is large and ancient, and contains some curious old monuments : it was given, with the manor, by Henry III. to the Knights Templars, who settled a commandery at Rothley Temple, which mansion is remarkable as being one of the few founded by that order, now remaining in the kingdom : it subsequently came to the Knights Hospitallers, and at the dissolution, was valued at £87. 13. 4. per annum. In the churchyard is the shaft of an ancient stone cross ; and, in 1722, a Roman pavement, with foundations of walls, was discovered in the village. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The official of the lord of the manor holds visitations and a spiritual court twice a year, both for ecclesiastical and civil matters ; its jurisdiction not only extending over the parish, but to several other parts of the county, in which it is the most extensive manor, enjoying the privileges of court leet, court baron, &c., oyer, terminer, and gaol delivery, independent of the rest of the county. The custom of gavelkind is still observed throughout the soke. The river Soar forms a boundary of the parish. Bartholomew Hickling, in 1691, founded and endowed a school for fourteen boys ; and, in 1736, Elizabeth Daniel bequeathed a small sum, to be applied for teaching six girls.

ROTHLEY, a township in that part of the parish of HARTBURN which is in the western division of MORPETH ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 11 miles (W. by N.) from Morpeth, containing 150 inhabitants. On a rocky eminence to the northward of the village is Rothley castle, which, though erected by the late Sir W. C. Blackett, has all the appearance of an ancient baronial residence. In the park are two large lakes, in one of which the river Font has its source. A depôt for cattle formerly here was attacked, during the border warfare, by the Scots, who were defeated with great loss, and the slain buried at a place called Scots' Gap.

ROTHLEY-TEMPLE, an extra-parochial liberty, in the western division of the hundred of GOSCOTE, county of LEICESTER, 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ mile (S.) from Mountsorrel. The population is returned with the parish of Rothley, which see.

ROTHWELL, a parish in the wapentake of BRADLEY-HAVERSTOE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 2 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Caistor, containing 197 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £7. 10. 10., and in the patronage of Lord Viscount Midleton. The church is dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene.

ROTHWELL, a parish (formerly a market town) in the hundred of ROTHWELL, county of NORTHAMPTON, 19 miles (N.N.E.) from Northampton, and 79 (N.W. by N.) from London, containing, with the chapelry of Orton, and the hamlet of Thorpe-Underwood, 1845 inhabitants. This town is supposed to have been much more extensive in former days than it is at present, and to have been surrounded with a wall and gates: it is situated on the southern side of a rocky hill. A small priory of nuns of the order of St. Augustine was founded here, probably by some of the Clare family; at the dissolution its revenue was estimated at £10. 10. 4. The market, which was considerable, has fallen into disuse, but one of the largest fairs in the county for cattle is held on Trinity-Monday: the ancient market-house, begun by Sir Thomas Tresham, but left in an unfinished state, is a curious ruin. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £7. 18. 11., endowed with £800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Rev. W. Smythe, and W. T. Smythe, Esq. The church, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, has an embattled tower at the west end; the door is a fine specimen of the early style of English architecture. In a vault beneath is a remarkably curious collection of skulls and other bones, discovered about two hundred years ago by some workmen, whilst examining the lower part of the church. Here are two springs, one of a strong petrifying quality, and in the other are found numerous small bones.

ROTHWELL, a parish in the lower division of the wapentake of AGBRIGG, West riding of the county of YORK, comprising the townships of Carlton, Lofthouse, Middleton, Outton, Rhodes-Green, Rothwell, Rothwell-Haigh, Thorp, and Woodlesford, and containing 6253 inhabitants, of which number, 2155 are in the township of Rothwell, 6 miles (N. by E.) from Wakefield. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £19. 12. 11. The Rev. R. H. Brandling was patron in 1804. The church, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, is in the later style of English architecture, and has lately received an addition of eight hundred and four sittings, of which six hundred and forty-four are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £800 towards defraying the expense. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. This ancient parish derived its name from a well near the church, adjacent to which are the remains of a castle, or mansion-house. Here are manufactures of woollen cloth, stuff, and hair sieves, and there are extensive coal mines in the neighbourhood.

ROTHWELL-HAIGH, a township in the parish of ROTHWELL, lower division of the wapentake of AGBRIGG, West riding of the county of YORK, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.) from Wakefield. The population is returned with the township of Rothwell.

ROTSEA, a township in the parish of HUTTON-CRANSWICK, Bainton-Beacon division of the wapentake of HARTHILL, East riding of the county of YORK, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E. by S.) from Great Driffield, containing 23 inhabitants.

ROTTINGDEAN, a parish in the hundred of YOUNSMERE, rape of LEWES, county of SUSSEX, 4 miles (E. S. E.) from Brighton, containing 772 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Lewes, and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £9. 10., and in the patronage of the Earl of Thanet. The church, dedicated to St. Margaret, is in the early style of English architecture, with a low massy tower in the centre: it was originally a larger structure than at present, and has lately undergone a thorough repair. This place, in ancient records termed Rottington, was, in the reign of Richard II., the landing-place of the French, who, in revenge for their loss of the battle of Cressy, burned Rye and Hastings, and would have also destroyed Lewes, but for the gallant resistance made by the prior of Lewes, Sir Thomas Cheney, and Sir John Falseley, at the head of the armed peasantry, who attacked and compelled them to retreat to their ships. The village is pleasantly situated near the coast of the English channel, on the Newhaven road, and is celebrated for its wells, which are nearly empty at high water, but rise as the tide ebbs, and which, from their salubrious qualities, are in considerable repute. It has within the last few years become a bathing-place, frequented by such families as prefer the privacy of a secluded village to the more open beach and gaiety of Brighton. The old road hence to Brighton approached so close to the edge of the cliff, which is here two hundred feet high, as frequently to cause the most lamentable accidents to travellers; which circumstance has occasioned the formation of a new one considerably to the northward, and by a more circuitous, though pleasant, route. From Rottingdean the cliffs gradually become more elevated, as far as Beachy Head; those called the Three Charles's, or Cheorls, the highest on the Sussex coast, rising about five hundred feet above the level of the sea. Two apartments cut in the chalk rock under the cliff bear the name of "Parson Danby's Holes," from his having formed and occupied them, till he fell a victim to the dampness of the situation. Semi-translucent pebbles of agate and chalcedony, of a blueish grey colour, abound on the sea-shore, which, when cut and polished, are used as ornaments in bracelets, &c., under the name of Rottingdean Pebbles. In 1757, on opening a tumulus in the neighbourhood, a Roman dagger was discovered.

ROTTINGTON, a township in the parish of ST. BEES, ALLERDALE ward above Darwent, county of CUMBERLAND, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. by W.) from Whitehaven, containing 56 inhabitants. Here was formerly a small nunnery, subordinate to that of St. Bees.

ROUDHAM, a parish in the hundred of SHROPHAM, county of NORFOLK, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W.) from East Harling, containing 72 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £4. 16. $5\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of Sir J. S. Sebright, Bart. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew.

ROUGHAM, a parish in the hundred of LAUNDITCH, county of NORFOLK, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by E.) from Swaffham, containing 330 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £1. 8. $6\frac{1}{2}$., endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Mary: attached to the south side is a library, built by Mr. North, and containing several volumes presented by that individual and others.

ROUGHAM, a parish in the hundred of THEDWESTRY, county of SUFFOLK, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (E. S. E.) from Bury-St. Edmunds, containing 778 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Sudbury, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £23. 18. 6½. Philip Bennett, Esq. was patron in 1815. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. Edward Sparke, in 1720, bequeathed land now producing about £40 a year, to be applied in support of a school for eight children of Rougham, and four of Thurston; and Thomas Sparke, in 1721, gave a rent-charge of £4 for a similar purpose. There are several other bequests, the principal of which is that of Roger Kerrington, in 1702, for apprenticing poor children, with a premium of £30 each.

ROUGH-LEE-BOOTH, a township in that part of the parish of WHALLEY which is in the higher division of the hundred of BLACKBURN, county palatine of LANCASTER, 3¼ miles (W.) from Colne, containing 958 inhabitants. The Wesleyan Methodists have a place of worship here.

ROUGHTON, a parish in the soke of HORNCastle, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 4 miles (S. S. W.) from Horncastle, containing 110 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, united in 1741 to Haltham upon Bain, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £6. 15. 2. The church is dedicated to St. Margaret. The river Bain and the Horncastle and Witham canal run through the parish.

ROUGHTON, a parish in the northern division of the hundred of ERPINGHAM, county of NORFOLK, 3¼ miles (S.) from Cromer, containing 337 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £6, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Ely. The church is dedicated to St. Mary.

The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Clent, in the archdeaconry of Stafford, and diocese of Worcester. The church is dedicated to St. Giles. There is a place of worship for Baptists. Lady Elizabeth Monnins, in 1703, founded a free school, with an endowment of £15 a year, for the education of twenty-four children; and in 1790, George Macklinnan gave a rent-charge of £21, which is applied to teaching thirty children. Coal is obtained in the vicinity.

ROWLSTON, a joint township with Mappleton, in the parish of MAPPLETON, partly in the liberty of St. PETER of YORK, and partly in the northern division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESS, East riding of the county of YORK, 14 miles (E. N. E.) from Beverley. The population is returned with Mappleton.

ROWLSTONE, a parish in the hundred of EWYAS-LACY, county of HEREFORD, 13 miles (S. W. by W.) from Hereford, containing 145 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecon, and diocese of St. David, endowed with £800 royal bounty. Mrs. Price was patroness in 1803. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. A court leet is occasionally held here. Limestone is obtained in the neighbourhood, and the soil in general is well adapted for the cultivation of apples, of which cider is made. Six boys of the parish are entitled to be taught free in Grosmont school.

ROWNER, a parish in the hundred of TITCHFIELD, Portsdown division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 3 miles (S.) from Fareham, containing 138 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £6. 0. 2½. The Rev. C. P. Brune was patron in 1805. The parish is bounded on the east by Portsmouth harbour.

ROWSLEY (GREAT), a township in the parish of BAKEWELL, hundred of HIGH PEAK, county of DERBY, 3½ miles (S. E. by E.) from Bakewell, containing, with part of the township of Aport, 238 inhabitants. The village is situated near the confluence of the rivers Derwent and Wye. The township is entitled to partake in the benefit of Lady Manners' school at Bakewell.

ROWTON, a township in the parish of CHRISTLETON, lower division of the hundred of BROXTON, county palatine of CHESTER, 3¼ miles (E. S. E.) from Chester, containing 108 inhabitants. The Chester canal passes by this township. Here was fought the battle which terminated so fatally for the cause of Charles I.; and on Rowton Heath the Cheshire gentry assembled, and declared for a free parliament, on the attempt of Sir George Booth to restore Charles II., in 1659.

ROWTON, a township in that part of the parish of ABBERBURY which is in the hundred of FORD, county of SALOP, 7 miles (W.) from Shrewsbury, containing, with the township of Amaston, 227 inhabitants.

ROWTON, a joint township with North Skirlaugh, in that part of the parish of SWINE which is in the northern division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESS, East riding of the county of YORK, 9 miles (E. by N.) from Beverley. The population is returned with North Skirlaugh.

ROXBY, a joint parish with Risby, in the northern division of the wapentake of MANLEY, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 9 miles (W. S. W.) from Barton upon Humber, containing, with Risby, 350 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, with that of Risby, in the archdeaconry of Stow, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £6. 3. 4. R. C. Elwes, Esq. was patron in 1816. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. Near it was found, some years ago, a tessellated pavement, about seven yards square, also fragments of red and yellow plaster, bones of oxen, &c.

ROXBY, a joint township with Pickhill, in that part of the parish of PICKHILL which is in the wapentake of HALLIKELD, North riding of the county of YORK, 7 miles (W. by N.) from Thirsk. The population is returned with Pickhill.

The living is a discharged vicarage, united to that of Great Barford, in the archdeaconry of Bedford, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £10, and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Trinity College, Cambridge. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a place of worship for Independents. The river Ouse bounds the parish on the east.

ROXWELL, a parish in the hundred of CHELMSFORD, county of ESSEX, 4½ miles (W. N. W.) from Chelmsford, containing 817 inhabitants. The living is a donative, annexed to the perpetual curacy of Writtle, in the jurisdiction of the peculiar court of Writtle with Roxwell. John Blencowe, in 1774, founded a school for teaching poor children of Roxwell and Writtle.

ROYDON, a parish partly in the hundred of WALTHAM, but chiefly in that of HARLOW, county of ESSEX, 4½ miles (W. by S.) from Harlow, containing 796 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Middlesex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £12, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Hon. W. T. L. P. Wellesley. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. John Manning, in 1768, founded a free school, and endowed it with a house and lands for teaching the children of the parish. Here is still standing the curious ancient gateway of the mansion of Nether Hall, demolished about 1773.

ROYDON, a parish in the hundred of DISS, county of NORFOLK, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile (W.) from Diss, containing 601 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £9, and in the patronage of the Rt. Hon. J. H. Frere. The church is dedicated to St. Remigius.

ROYDON, a parish in the Lynn division of the hundred of FREEBRIDGE, county of NORFOLK, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S.E. by E.) from Castle-Rising, containing 205 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, consolidated with that of Castle-Rising, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Rector of Castle-Rising, rated in the king's books at £5. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

ROYSTON, a market town and parish, partly in the hundred of ARMINGFORD, county of CAMBRIDGE, but chiefly in the hundred of ODSEY, county of HERTFORD, 20 miles (N. by E.) from Hertford, and 38 (N.) from London, (parts of the town, exclusively of its own parish, extending into the parishes of Barkway and Therfield, county of Hertford, and into those of Melbourn, Basingbourn, and Kneesworth, county of Cambridge,) containing 1474 inhabitants. This place is supposed to have had its origin in the reign of William the Conqueror, and to derive its name from a cross having been erected at that period in the highway here, by the Lady Roysia, Countess of Norfolk, which was called Roysie's Cross; and a monastery having been established shortly afterwards, by Eustachius de Mere and others, which led to the erection of houses, it acquired the appellation of Roysie's town, whence its present name. It had become a considerable town in the reign of Henry IV., when it was nearly consumed by fire; and again, in 1747, it was subjected to the same calamity. A house was built here by James I., who made it his occasional residence, for the enjoyment of hunting and hawking; and it was here that his favourite, the Earl of Somerset, was arrested in his presence, for the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury. At the commencement of the civil war, Charles I. removed to this house from Hampton Court, previously to setting up his standard at Nottingham; and here this unfortunate monarch passed two nights, in June 1647, when a prisoner to the army, which had its headquarters at this place. The survey of this palace, made during the Commonwealth, describes it as in good repair, but it has since gone to ruin, and but few vestiges of it can be traced. Royston is situated at the intersection of the Ikniel-way and the Ermin-street, in a very bleak open country, near a chain of high hills, and, though improved of late, is very irregularly built: it consists of one long and narrow street, crossed by two shorter ones, and neither lighted nor paved; there is a very scanty supply of water, which the inhabitants generally are obliged to purchase. A public walk, planted with trees, has been lately opened, at the expense of Lord Dacre. The malting business is carried on to a considerable extent, and there is a large corn trade. The market, which was granted by Richard I., who also granted a fair, is on Wednesday, for corn, sheep, and pigs, and also for straw-plat; and there are fairs on Whit-Wednesday, attached to which is a pie-powder court; on Shrove-Wednesday; the feast of St. Thomas à Becket, and the Wednesday in Easter week, pleasure fairs; and one for hiring servants, on the first Wednesday after the 10th of October: a market-house was built in 1830, at the expense of Lord Dacre. A petty session is held every alternate Wednesday.

The living is a vicarage, in the jurisdiction of the Commissary of Essex and Herts, concurrently with the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of London, rated in the king's books at £10, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £700 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Lord Dacre. The church was originally that of the priory, and dedicated to St. Thomas à Becket, but was purchased by the inhabitants at the dissolution of the monastery, and, by an act passed in the 32nd of Henry VIII., is called the parish church of St. John the Baptist in Royston: it is a rude, though venerable, structure, with a low square massive tower at its western end, and contains some very ancient monuments; in the vestry-room is a library, comprising about one hundred and fifty volumes, chiefly theological. There is a place of worship for the Society of Friends, and two for Independents. A grammar school was erected by subscription in 1716, but it possesses no endowment, and a house has been recently erected for a free school. In 1769, Mrs. Glover bequeathed £3500 for building and endowing a charity school, but it was never received. An infant school is supported by subscription; and there are Sunday schools in connexion with the different places of worship, in which nearly three hundred children of both sexes are educated. The monastery, at the period of its dissolution, was valued at £89. 16. per annum, and, with the exception of the church, has been entirely demolished. Here was also an hospital, dedicated to St. John and St. James, but there are no vestiges. Many relics of antiquity have been discovered in and about Royston, among which is an ancient chapel, or cave, found near the site of the present market-house by some workmen, in 1742, which had been dug out of the chalk rock, and had an opening from the top: it has been conjectured to have been the oratory and burial-place of the Lady Roysia, although this opinion has been strongly controverted. Tumuli, or barrows, are found on the summits of the adjacent hills, and the discovery of a number of bones and corroded spear heads near the town, renders it probable that it was the scene of an engagement with the Danes. A species of crow, with a whitish head, denominated the "Royston Crow," is found on the neighbouring hills, and is peculiar to this part of the kingdom; it emigrates to Sweden in the spring, where it breeds, and returns to pass the winter here. Henry Andrews, many years a resident in this town, was employed by the Board of Admiralty in assisting to compute the celestial observations for the Nautical Almanac; and he was longer and more extensively engaged in making the calculations for Moore's Almanac: he died in 1820, and is buried here.

ROYSTON, a parish in the wapentake of STAIN CROSS, West riding of the county of YORK, comprising the chapelries of Monk-Bretton, and Woolley with Emley, and the townships of Carlton, Chevet, Cudworth, Notton, and Royston, and containing 3126 inhabitants, of which number, 549 are in the township of Royston, 4½ miles (N. N. E.) from Barnesley. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £17. 3. 4., endowed with £1000 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Archbishop of York. The church is dedicated to St. John the Baptist. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The free grammar school is endowed with an annuity of £4. 6. 11. from the revenue of the duchy of Lancaster, also with a house and land granted by the crown in 1605; the total annual income is £82. 15. 1., for which the master is bound to teach the classics and writing, but for arithmetic he receives a quarterage from the children, whose average number is about thirty-five. At Monk-Bretton are the remains of an ancient monastery.

ROYTON, a chapelry in the parish of OLDHAM cum PRESTWICH, hundred of SALFORD, county palatine of LANCASTER, 3½ miles (E. N. E.) from Middleton, containing 4933 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £1400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Rector of Prestwich. The chapel, dedicated to St. Paul, was built by subscription in 1754. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists, with a Sunday school attached to the last; the Friends' meeting-house is said to be coeval with the foundation of that sect. The cotton and fustian manufactures are extensively carried on, and there are considerable coal mines in the parish. The village, forty years ago, contained only a few straggling cottages, but within the last twenty years it has assumed the appearance of a considerable town, by the erection of several regular streets and large manufactories. There is a school in connexion with the established church, attended by about five hundred children.

RUAN (MAJOR), a parish in the hundred of KERRIER, county of CORNWALL, 8 miles (S. S. E.) from Helston, containing 187 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £10. 10. 2½., and in the patronage of Philip Vivian Robinson, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Rumon.

RUAN (MINOR), a parish in the hundred of KERRIER, county of CORNWALL, 9½ miles (S. E. by S.) from Helston, containing 293 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £4. 4. 4½., and endowed with £200 royal bounty. The Rev. W. Robinson was patron in 1814. The church is dedicated to St. Rumon. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The parish is bounded on the east by the English channel, upon which is situated Cadgwith Cove, the resort of fishermen.

RUAN-LANYHORNE, a parish in the western division of the hundred of POWDER, county of CORNWALL, 2½ miles (S. W.) from Tregoney, containing 376 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cornwall, and diocese of Exeter, rated in the king's books at £12, and in the patronage of the President and Fellows of Corpus Christi College, Oxford. The church is dedicated to St. Rumon. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The Tregoney river is navigable on the north-west. The petty sessions for the division are held here, on the first Monday in every month. John Whitaker, B.D., the learned historian and antiquary, was for thirty years rector of this parish; he died in 1808, and was buried in the church.

RUARDEAN, a parish in the hundred of ST. BRIAVELLS, county of GLOUCESTER, 6¼ miles (N. W.) from Newnham, containing 729 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Walford, in the archdeaconry of Hereford, and diocese of Gloucester. The church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, is partly Norman, but principally of later date, and the west window is finely enriched with tracery. There is a place of worship for Independents. The navigable river Wye forms the eastern boundary, and the Severn and Wye railway passes through the parish. A small school is endowed with about £5 per annum, the united bequests of the Rev. Richard Greenaway, in 1744, and Thomas Richards, in 1763. There are a few remaining fragments of an ancient castle.

RUCKINGE, a parish in the hundred of NEWCHURCH, lathe of SHEPWAY, county of KENT, 6½ miles (S. by E.) from Ashford, containing 331 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Canterbury, rated in the king's books at £14. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The church, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene, is principally in the early style of English architecture. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The Grand Military canal passes through the parish.

RUCKLAND, a parish in the Wold division of the hundred of LOUTH-ESKE, parts of LINDSEY, county of LINCOLN, 6¼ miles (S. by E.) from Louth, containing 33 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, with that of Farforth and the vicarage of Maiden Well, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £6. 3. 9., and in the patronage of Lord Yarborough. The church is dedicated to St. Olave.

RUCKLEY, a township in the parish of ACTON-BURNELL, hundred of CONDOVER, county of SALOP, 7 miles (W.) from Much-Wenlock, containing, with the chapelry of Langley, 75 inhabitants.

RUDBY in CLEVELAND, a parish in the western division of the liberty of LANGBAURGH, North riding of the county of YORK, comprising the chapelry of Middleton upon Leven, and the townships of Hutton, East Rounton, Rudby in Cleveland, Skutterskelfe, and Sexhow, and containing 1311 inhabitants, of which number, 76 are in the township of Rudby in Cleveland, 3¼ miles (W. S. W.) from Stokesley. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cleveland, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £30, endowed with £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Lady Amherst. The church is dedicated to All Saints. The river Leven runs through the parish. Five poor children are educated for £5 a year, in a school built by subscription.

RUDDINGTON, a parish in the northern division of the wapentake of RUSHCLIFFE, county of NOTTINGHAM, 5 miles (S.) from Nottingham, containing 1138 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Nottingham, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Rev. C. Simeon. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, has lately received an addition of three hundred and ninety-four sittings, of which three hundred and fifty are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £500 towards defraying the expense. About one mile from this structure is an extensive churchyard, and the site of an ancient church, called Flawford, thought by some to have been originally the parish church. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyan Methodists. Frame-work knitting and the weaving of lace is carried on in the village, which is of considerable size. A free school was founded, in 1641, by James Peacock, citizen of London, who endowed it with lands in the parish, now producing an annual income of £75, for teaching all the children of parishioners. There is also an infant school, supported by Lady Parkyns. Ruddington is in the honour of Tutbury, duchy of Lancaster, and within the jurisdiction of a court of pleas held at Tutbury every third Tuesday, for the recovery of debts under 40s. A college for a warden and four chaplains was founded here, in the reign of Henry VI., by William Babington, Esq., who endowed it with a revenue which was valued, in the 26th year of the reign of Henry VIII., at £30.

RUDFORD, a parish partly in the hundred of BOTLOE, and partly in the lower division of the hundred of DUDSTONE and KING'S BARTON, county of GLOUCESTER, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. W. by W.) from Gloucester, containing, with the hamlet of High Leadon, 189 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Hereford, and diocese of Gloucester, rated in the king's books at £10, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Gloucester. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. The river Leadon separates this parish from that of Hartpury, and the Gloucester and Ledbury canal passes through it.

RUDGE, a township in that part of the parish of PATTINGHAM which is in the hundred of STOTTESDEN, county of SALOP, $7\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Bridgenorth, containing 69 inhabitants.

RUDGWICK, a parish in the hundred of WEST EASWRITH, rape of ARUNDEL, county of SUSSEX, 7 miles (N. W. by W.) from Horsham, containing 974 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £7. 10., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Chichester. The church is dedicated to the Holy Trinity. The river Wanford runs through the parish.

RUDHAM (EAST), a parish in the hundred of GALLOW, county of NORFOLK, $6\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Fakenham, containing 807 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, with the vicarage of West Rudham, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £6. 6. 8., and in the patronage of Marquis Townshend. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

RUDHAM (WEST), a parish in the hundred of GALLOW, county of NORFOLK, $7\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Fakenham, containing 376 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, united with the rectory of East Rudham, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £7. 6. 8. The church is dedicated to St. Peter.

VOL. III.

RUDHEATH, a township partly in the parishes of GREAT BUDWORTH and SANDBACH, but chiefly in that of DAVENHAM, hundred of NORTHWICH, county palatine of CHESTER, 4 miles (N. E.) from Middlewich, containing 363 inhabitants.

RUDSTON, a parish in the wapentake of DICKERING, East riding of the county of YORK, 5 miles (W.) from Bridlington, containing 417 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of the East riding, and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £9. 13. $6\frac{1}{2}$., and in the patronage of the Archbishop of York. The church is dedicated to All Saints. In the churchyard is a lofty pyramidal stone, which probably gave name to the place, Rod, in Saxon, signifying a cross.

RUDYARD, a joint township with Caudery, in that part of the parish of LEEK which is in the southern division of the hundred of TOTMONSLOW, county of STAFFORD, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. W.) from Leek, containing 112 inhabitants.

RUFFORD, a parish in the hundred of LEYLAND, county palatine of LANCASTER, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. E. by N.) from Ormskirk, containing 1073 inhabitants. The living is a rectory not in charge, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, and in the patronage of Pierce Starkie, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. This parish was formerly a chapelry in the parish of Croston, but was made parochial by act of parliament. The Leeds and Liverpool canal passes through it. Sir Thomas Hesketh, Bart., in 1816, erected a school, which is supported at his own expense, for the education of all the poor children of the parish. The petty sessions for the division are held here once in five weeks, alternately with Chorley, Cuerdon, Leyland, and Penwortham.

RUFFORD, an extra-parochial liberty, in the Hatfield division of the wapentake of BASSETLAW, county of NOTTINGHAM, 2 miles (S. S. W.) from Ollerton, containing 323 inhabitants. An abbey for Cistercian monks, in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary, was founded in 1148, by Gilbert, Earl of Lincoln, which, at the dissolution, possessed a revenue of £254. 6. 8.

RUFFORTH, a parish in the ainsty of the city, and East riding of the county, of YORK, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W.) from York, containing 295 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £4. 13. 4., endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Mrs. Thompson. Eight children are taught for £4 a year, the gift of Lady Hewley.

RUGBY, a market town and parish in the Rugby division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, county of WARWICK, $16\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E. N. E.) from Warwick, and 83 (N. W. by N.) from London, containing 2300 inhabitants. At this place, anciently called Rocheberie, is supposed to have been one of those fortresses which Stephen, expecting Matilda's invasion, permitted his nobles to erect upon their estates; it obtained also the name of Rokeby from its owner, Henry de Rokeby, in the reign of Henry III., and from this its present appellation is derived. The town is pleasantly situated upon rising ground, on the south side of the Avon: it consists of one street leading to the market-place, parallel with which, on the one side, is a narrower street, in which the shambles are placed, and on the other a handsome and spacious street leading to the church. The houses are in general well built of brick, and of modern appearance, though occasionally intermixed with some of ancient character, with plastered walls and thatched roofs. The Oxford canal passes in the vicinity. The market, which is well attended, and abundantly supplied with corn, and provisions of every kind, is on Saturday: thirteen fairs are held annually, but the greater number are only cattle markets; these are held on the second Tuesday after Twelfth day, February 17th, March 31st, the last Monday in April, May 5th (which is chiefly a pleasure fair), the second Monday in June, July 7th, the ninth Monday before New Michaelmas-day, August 21st, the Monday before Michaelmas-day, the Monday preceding the 22nd of October, November 22nd (which is a very great horse fair), the Tuesday before St. Thomas' day, and the Monday after Christmas-day. A constable and headborough are appointed at the court leet of the lord of the manor.

The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Coventry, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £17. 19. 2., and in the patronage of Earl Craven. The church, dedicated to St. Andrew, is an ancient structure, in the early style of English architecture, with a massive square embattled tower, strengthened by buttresses, and a turret at the south-east angle, to which there is no entrance but from within the church, and which appears to have been erected as a place of security, after the demolition of the castle; the roof of the nave is supported on massive octagonal pillars and sharply-pointed arches, of which those nearer to the chancel are much more lofty than the others: the building is at present undergoing considerable enlargement, from a plan by Mr. Rickman. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyan Methodists. The grammar school, which is the distinguishing feature in Rugby, is a noble and magnificent establishment, and has for many years maintained a high degree of reputation. It was founded in the 9th of Elizabeth, by Lawrence Sheriff, of London, grocer, a native of Brownsover, a neighbouring hamlet, in the parish of Clifton, who endowed it with a house and land in that parish, and with about eight acres of land, called the Conduit close, near the Foundling Hospital, London. At that time the income was inconsiderable, and in the year 1780, the rental did not exceed £116 per annum; but from the subsequent improvement of the estate, by the erection of numerous dwelling-houses, and the laying out of several streets upon the site, the revenue has been augmented to more than £5000 per annum. The school is under the superintendence of twelve trustees, who appoint the head master, with a fixed salary of £113. 6. 8., a house and some land, and an annual payment of £16. 5. 6. for every boy on the foundation, of which latter sum he pays £6. 6. to the six assistant classical masters, £2. 2. to the master of modern languages, and £1. 11. 6. to the mathematical master; instruction in these two last branches of literature forming a part of the regular course of education pursued at the school. The assistant classical masters also receive severally from the trustees a permanent salary of £120 per annum, and salaries are also given to a writing-master and a drawing-master. By a late regulation of the trustees, the number of boys not on the foundation is never to exceed two hundred and sixty; the actual number at present (November 1830) is about two hundred and thirty, besides about forty foundationers. Belonging to this noble establishment are twenty-one exhibitions of £60 per annum, tenable for seven years, in either of the Universities; and several fellowships, varying in value from £100 to £300 per annum, but not exceeding £1000 per annum in the aggregate amount, which are given exclusively to the head master and ushers, who may choose to retire after having been ten years in the establishment. The school premises were taken down and rebuilt in 1808; they form a splendid range of building, in the Elizabethan style of architecture; the principal entrance is under a square gateway tower, with octagonal turrets at the angles, through a richly-groined archway, above which is a beautiful oriel window embellished with stained glass, into a spacious quadrangle, of which two sides are cloistered. The school-rooms are lofty, and the great school, as it is called, in which the annual Prize Compositions are recited, on the Wednesday in Easter-week, is of large dimensions and of stately elevation. The room in the gateway tower, over the principal entrance, is appropriated to the school library. Through an archway diagonally opposite to the principal entrance is the approach to the chapel, a detached and elegant edifice, in the later style of English architecture, to which there is also an entrance from the public road: the sides of the building are strengthened with ornamented buttresses, and relieved by three elegant windows with dripstones resting on antique heads; and the east and west ends are decorated with crocketed pinnacles at the angles, and a cross on the apex of the gable. The interior is fitted up like the choir of a cathedral; the roof, which is flat and painted to resemble oak, is panelled, and ribbed with diagonal intersections; the east window is enriched with tracery, and at the west end are two canopied seats for the head master and the chaplain, over which is a gallery, with an organ of appropriate design. On the south side, near the altar, is a white monument of marble, by Chantrey, erected to the memory of the late Dr. James, head master, in which he is represented in a sitting posture, reading, with several volumes at his feet. The entrance to the head master's apartments is through a large octangular turret forming the hall and staircase, and the whole range of buildings is relieved with turrets at various intervals. From the funds of this institution are supported twelve almshouses, lately rebuilt in a corresponding style of architecture, for twelve aged men, who have each two apartments and a garden, a gown, two tons of coal annually, and a weekly allowance of seven shillings and sixpence. Boys are eligible to the school, and men to the almshouses, who live within ten miles of the town, if in the county of Warwick, or within five miles, if in any other county. A charity school was founded, in 1707, by Mr. Elborough, who endowed it with a house and fifty acres of land for the instruction of thirty boys and girls: it is under the direction of six trustees, who appoint the master, with a salary of £20 per annum, a house, and two acres of land. Adjoining the school, and supported out of the same funds, are six almshouses for six aged widows, who receive half a ton of coal annually, a stuff gown every two years, and an allowance of three shillings per week. There are various charitable bequests for distribution among the poor. At Lawford, one mile west from Rugby, are large quarries of blue lias, covered with a thick bed of gravel, in which elephants' bones, and the remains of other animals, have been found in considerable quantities. On the road to Lawford is a Roman tumulus; and at Brownsover, one mile north-west of Rugby, is an earthwork, supposed to be a British camp, surrounded by the rivers Swift and Avon; skeletons buried in the ancient British manner, with the limbs contracted, have been discovered here.

RUGELEY, a market town and parish in the eastern division of the hundred of CUTTLESTONE, county of STAFFORD, 9 miles (E.S.E.) from Stafford, and 127 (N.W. by N.) from London, containing 2677 inhabitants. This town is agreeably situated near the south bank of the river Trent, on the road from Stafford to Lichfield; it is of remarkably clean and respectable appearance, and consists of several good streets, two of them recently formed, called Albion-street and Church-street; many of the houses in the latter are of a very superior order. Cannock heath is within a mile of the town, on the south. The trade of the place is greatly promoted by the proximity of the Grand Trunk canal, which connects the navigation of the rivers Trent and Mersey, and passing northward of the town, between it and the river, communicates with Brereton collieries by a rail-road, and not far distant is carried over the Trent by a fine aqueduct. Here are an iron-foundry, and mills for rolling sheet-iron, also a small manufactory for sugar of lead and verdegris; hats were formerly made to a considerable extent, but this branch of trade has very much declined. At Brereton, in this parish, are extensive coal-works belonging to Earl Talbot and the Marquis of Anglesey: the depth of the shaft is one hundred and twenty-seven yards; the strata of coal is five yards in thickness, and generally good, exclusively of some thin veins not yet worked: about four hundred persons are employed in these works, most of whom reside in cottages on the estate. In sinking, good iron-ore is found in detached pieces, but not in sufficient quantity to pay the expense of working it. The market is on Thursday: fairs are held on April 15th; June 6th, a very large horse fair, which continues eight or nine days; and October 21st, for cattle, sheep, and horses. A court leet is held annually in October, by the lord of the manor, at which two constables are appointed. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Lichfield, rated in the king's books at £5. 2., and endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty. The church, dedicated to St. Augustine, has been lately but indifferently rebuilt, with stone given by the Marquis of Anglesey; it contains eight hundred sittings, of which four hundred and thirty-two are free, the Incorporated Society for the building and enlargement of churches, &c., having contributed £800 towards defraying the expense. Of the old church, the tower and chancel remain entire, the latter being used as a school-room; the arches are in ruins. There is a place of worship for Independents, and one for Wesleyan Methodists at Brereton. The free grammar school was founded, in the 8th of James I., by Walter Wolsley, and endowed by him with estates now producing about £320 per annum, which is paid to the master, who has also a good residence: there are twenty boys on the foundation, besides which the master is allowed by the trustees to take boarders, and eleven day scholars, who pay for their education. Bamford's school was founded by John Bamford, who by will dated Feb. 11th, 1733, gave £400 for the education of sixteen poor boys: this benefaction having been augmented by £50 left by Mrs. Mary Jenks, and further, in 1802, by a gift of £500 from John Riley, the income is now £35 per annum, and thirty-five boys are on the foundation, all of them appointed by the minister and churchwardens. A National school for girls was founded by the Hon. Mrs. Curzon; another at Brereton, by Mrs. Sneyd; and an almshouse here, for four old women, by Mrs. Hopkins.

RUISHTON, a parish in the hundred of TAUNTON and TAUNTON-DEAN, county of SOMERSET, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.) from Taunton, containing 329 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Taunton, and diocese of Bath and Wells, endowed with £250 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty. John Guy, Esq. was patron in 1800. The church is dedicated to St. George. The navigable river Tone passes on the northern side of the village. Nine poor children are educated for about £4 per annum, arising from £100, the gift of Elizabeth Strong, in 1742.

RUISLIP, a parish in the hundred of ELTHORNE, county of MIDDLESEX, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N.E.) from Uxbridge, containing 1343 inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Middlesex, and diocese of London, rated in the king's books at £12, and in the patronage of the Dean and Canons of Windsor. The church is dedicated to St. Martin. Here was formerly a cell to the abbey of Bec in Normandy, the revenue of which at the suppression was valued at £18.

RUMBOLD'S WYKE, a parish in the hundred of BOX and STOCKBRIDGE, rape of CHICHESTER, county of SUSSEX, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile (S.E.) from Chichester, containing 303 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £4, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Chichester. The church is dedicated to St. Rumbald. A branch of the Arundel and Portsmouth canal passes near the parish.

RUMBURGH, a parish in the hundred of BLYTHING, county of SUFFOLK, 4 miles (N.W. by N.) from Halesworth, containing 445 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, with the rectory of South Elmham St. Michael, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, endowed with £10 per annum and £400 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. Here was a cell to the abbey of St. Ben'et at Holme; it was dedicated to St. Michael, and was one of those suppressed in 1528, and granted to Wolsey, towards the endowment of his college at Ipswich.

RUMNEY, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of WENTLOOG, county of MONMOUTH, 3 miles (N.E.) from Cardiff, containing 255 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaff, rated in the king's books at £5. 10. $7\frac{1}{2}$., endowed with £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Bristol. The church is dedicated to St. Augustine.

RUMWORTH, a township in the parish of DEAN, hundred of SALFORD, county palatine of LANCASTER, 3 miles (W.S.W.) from Great Bolton, containing 847 inhabitants. James Crompton, in 1636, bequeathed £100 towards the support of a school, to which subsequent bequests have been added, producing an annual income of £36. 17., for which about fifty children are taught to read only, in a school-room rebuilt in 1820, at an expense of £750.

RUNCORN, a parish in the hundred of BUCKLOW, county palatine of CHESTER, comprising the chapelries of Aston by Sutton, Daresbury, Halton, and Thelwall, and the townships of Acton-Grange, Aston-Grange, Clifton, alias Rock-Savage, Hatton, Keckwick, Moore, Newton by Daresbury, Norton, Preston on the Hill, Runcorn, Stockham, Sutton, Walton (Inferior), Walton (Superior), and Weston, and containing 7738 inhabitants, of which number, 3103 are in the township of Runcorn, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. by W.) from Frodsham. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £10. 4. 2., and in the patronage of the Dean and Canons of Christ Church, Oxford. The church, dedicated to St. Bartholomew, is partly in the early, and partly in the later, style of English architecture; of the north door and the piers in the nave, the design is very uncommon, yet good in execution. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. In 915, Ethelfleda, sister to King Edward the Elder, and widow of Ethelred, Earl of Mercia, built a town and castle near the river Mersey, at this place, then called Romicofan, some traces of which are visible at a place called Castle-Rock, by the river side, about three hundred yards below the church: this part of the Mersey is called Runcorn Gap, and at high water is about four hundred yards broad. This ancient fortress commanded the passage from the kingdom of Mercia to that of Northumberland. In 1133, William Fitz-Nigel founded here a monastery of canons Regular, which, about the reign of Stephen, was removed to Norton. The Duke of Bridgewater's canal passes through a great part of this parish: at Runcorn it is sixty feet above the level of the Mersey, with which it communicates by a chain of ten locks. Runcorn, which had previously been a very poor village, has, in consequence of the trade on the canal, and its having become a place of considerable resort for bathing, grown very populous, and been improved in its appearance by the erection of many handsome buildings. The township abounds in fine stone quarries, from which considerable quantities of hewn stone are sent by water to Chester, Liverpool, Manchester, &c. The chapel at Aston was rebuilt on an enlarged scale in 1737.

RUNCTON (NORTH), a parish in the Lynn division of the hundred of FREEBRIDGE, county of NORFOLK, 3 miles (S.S.E.) from Lynn-Regis, containing, with the hamlet of Hardwick, 314 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with that of Hardwick and Setchy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £8. 10., and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Trinity College, Cambridge. The church, dedicated to All Saints, was rebuilt about 1710, the ancient structure having been injured by the fall of its steeple.

RUNCTON (SOUTH), a parish in the hundred of CLACKCLOSE, county of NORFOLK, $4\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N.N.E.)

from Downham - Market, containing 123 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, with Holme and Wallington, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £12. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew.

RUNFOLD, a tything in the parish and hundred of FARNHAM, county of SURREY. The population is returned with Badshot.

RUNHALL, a parish in the hundred of FOREHOE, county of NORFOLK, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N.W. by N.) from Wymondham, containing 160 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £6. 18. $1\frac{1}{2}$., endowed with £1200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Lord Wodehouse. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

RUNHAM, a parish in the eastern division of the hundred of FLEGG, county of NORFOLK, $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by S.) from Caistor, containing 211 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £4, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Ely. The church is dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul: a sum of money was bequeathed, in 1501, by Rose Dook, for erecting the steeple. A market, and a fair on the vigil and festival of St. Peter ad Vincula, were granted by King John to Robert de Evermere.

RUNNINGTON, a parish in the hundred of MILVERTON, county of SOMERSET, 2 miles (W.N.W.) from Wellington, containing 90 inhabitants. RUSCOMB, a parish in the hundred of SONNING, county of BERKS, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles (E.N.E.) from Reading, containing 208 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Dean of Salisbury, and in the patronage of the Prebendary of Combe and Harnham in the Cathedral Church of Salisbury. The church is dedicated to St. James. In the chancel lie buried the remains of Lord Chief Justice Eyre, who occasionally resided here. There is a place of worship for Independents.

RUSHALL, a parish in the hundred of EARSHAM, county of NORFOLK, 3 miles (W.) from Harleston, containing 279 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £4, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Joseph Sewell, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. A farm-house here is called the Priory, from having once belonged to the priory of Buckenham.

RUSHALL, a parish in the southern division of the hundred of OFFLOW, county of STAFFORD, 1 mile (N. E. by N.) from Walsall, containing 670 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Stafford, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £4. 5., endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Rev. Edward Mellish. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. The Wyrley and Essington canal passes through the parish, in which there are considerable quarries of limestone, and the ruined walls of an ancient castellated mansion.

RUSHALL, a parish in the hundred of SWANBOROUGH, county of WILTS, 3½ miles (S. W.) from Pewsey, containing 248 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £12. 11. 8., and in the patronage of the Wardens of New and Merton Colleges, and of the Principal of Brasenose College, Oxford, for a scholar on Jackson's foundation at Merton College. The church is dedicated to St. Matthew.

RUSHBROOK, a parish in the hundred of THEDWESTRY, county of SUFFOLK, 3 miles (S. E. by E.) from Bury-St. Edmunds, containing 194 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, with that of Bradfield St. George, in the archdeaconry of Sudbury, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £8. 1. 5½., and in the patronage of the Marquis of Bristol. The church is dedicated to St. Nicholas. Lord Jermyn, in 1700, founded and endowed with property, now producing £32 a year, almshouses for one man and three women. Other almshouses were erected, in 1724, by Sir Jermyn Davers, for four poor persons, which, not being endowed, are kept in repair by the proprietor of the Rushbrook estate.

RUSHBURY, a parish in the hundred of MUNSLOW, county of SALOP, 4¾ miles (E. S. E.) from Church-Stretton, containing, with the townships of East-Wall, Gretton, Lutwyth with Stanway, Rushbury, Stone-Acton, and Wall under Haywood, 478 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £19. 7. 8½., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Worcester. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. This is presumed to be the site of the Roman station Bravinium, situated between Old Radnor and Worcester. A market and a fair, granted by Edward I., were formerly held here.

RUSHDEN, a parish in the hundred of ODSEY, county of HERTFORD, 4¾ miles (W. N. W.) from Buntingford, containing 333 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Huntingdon, and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £8. 1. 10½., and in the patronage of the Dean and

Chapter of Lincoln. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, contains the handsome monument of Sir Adolphus Meetkerke, which was removed hither, in 1754, from the church of St. Botolph, Aldersgate: there is also a memorial to William Love, late a servant in the Meetkerke family, who in 1819 left £233. 6. 8. three per cents. towards the support of a Sunday school. The late Rev. James Ford, vicar of the parish, bequeathed £300 three per cents. for the benefit of future incumbents.

RUSHDEN, a parish in the hundred of HIGHAM-FERRERS, county of NORTHAMPTON, 1½ mile (S.) from Higham-Ferrers, containing 1077 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £12. 16. 3., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is large and handsome, partaking of the different styles of English architecture; the tower, a fine specimen of the later style, is surmounted by an elegant crocketed spire; the transepts are in the decorated style; and in the chancel are three early English stalls: there are also some remains of screen-work, and ancient stained glass. There are two places of worship for Baptists. Daniel Whitby, a learned scripture commentator, and writer on controversial divinity, was born here in 1638; he died in 1726.

RUSHFORD, a parish in the hundred of GUILT-CROSS, county of NORFOLK, 4 miles (E. S. E.) from Thetford, containing, with Snarehill, 168 inhabitants. The living is a donative. The church is dedicated to St. John the Evangelist. A chapel and college for a master and six priests was founded upon the site of the parsonage-house, about 1342, by Sir Edmund de Gonville, the rector and founder of Gonville Hall, Cambridge; it was dedicated to St. John the Evangelist, and at the dissolution was valued at £85. 15. per annum.

RUSHMERE, a parish in the hundred of CARLFORD, county of SUFFOLK, 2 miles (N. E. by E.) from Ipswich, containing 437 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £4. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Marquis of Bristol. The church is dedicated to St. Andrew.

RUSHMERE, a parish in the hundred of MUTFORD and LOTHINGLAND, county of SUFFOLK, 5 miles (S. W.) from Lowestoft, containing 114 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Suffolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £7. 6. 8., and in the patronage of Charles Gurney, Esq. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

RUSHOCK, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of HALFSHIRE, county of WORCESTER, 5½ miles (W. by N.) from Bromsgrove, containing 181 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Worcester, rated in the king's books at £10. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. William Norris, in 1702, bequeathed a house and land in support of a school for teaching fifteen children of this parish, and the same number of that of Elmbridge.

RUSHROFT, a hamlet in the parish of AINSTABLE, LEATH ward, county of CUMBERLAND, 3 miles (N. W. by N.) from Kirk-Oswald. The population is returned with the parish.

RUSHTON, a village in the hundred of ROTHWELL, county of NORTHAMPTON, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Rothwell, containing 366 inhabitants, and comprising the parishes of All Saints and St. Peter, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough; the former, a rectory, rated in the king's books at £10. 12. 1., and the latter, also a rectory, rated at £11. 13. 4., both in the patronage of W. Haggitt, Esq.

RUSHTON-JAMES, a township in that part of the parish of LEEK which is in the northern division of the hundred of TOTMONSLOW, county of STAFFORD, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W.) from Leek, containing 354 inhabitants.

RUSHTON-SPENCER, a chapelry in that part of the parish of LEEK which is in the northern division of the hundred of TOTMONSLOW, county of STAFFORD, 5 miles (N. W. by N.) from Leek, containing 359 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Stafford, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, endowed with £1200 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Leek. The chapel, dedicated to St. Lawrence, is a small stone building fast falling to decay. Cotton-spinning affords employment to a few of the inhabitants.

RUSHULME, a township in the parish of MANCHESTER, hundred of SALFORD, county palatine of LANCASTER, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. S. E.) from Manchester, containing 913 inhabitants.

RUSKINGTON, a parish in the wapentake of FLAXWELL, parts of KESTEVEN, county of LINCOLN, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Sleaford, containing 678 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Lincoln, rated in the king's books at £3. 17. $3\frac{1}{2}$., endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to All Saints. Lady Hodgson, in 1719, bequeathed a rent-charge of £42. 16., in support of three aged women, and a school for ten children, with a fund for apprenticing them. There is also a trifling annuity left by Martha Chamberlain, in 1702, for educating children.

RUSLAND, a chapelry in the parish of COULTON, hundred of LONSDALE, north of the sands, county palatine of LANCASTER, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Ulverstone. The population is returned with the parish. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, endowed with £400 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Trustees. The chapel, dedicated to St. Paul, was consecrated in 1745.

RUSPER, a parish in the hundred of SINGLECROSS, rape of BRAMBER, county of SUSSEX, $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles (N. N. E.) from Horsham, containing 487 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £9. 10. 10., and in the patronage of the Rev. Peter Wood. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is in the early style of English architecture, and has lately received an addition of one hundred and seven sittings, of which ninety-nine are free, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels having granted £70 towards defraying the expense. There are slight remains of a priory of Black nuns, founded by Gervase of Canterbury, who flourished in the reign of Richard I.; it was dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene, and at the dissolution possessed a revenue of £39. 13. 7.

RUSSELS, a hamlet in the parish of DANBURY, hundred of CHELMSFORD, though locally in that of Dengie, county of ESSEX, 1 mile (E.) from Danbury. The population is returned with the parish.

RUSTINGTON, a parish in the hundred of POLING, rape of ARUNDEL, county of SUSSEX, 2 miles (E. N. E.) from Little Hampton, containing 327 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £6, endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Chichester. The church is in the early style of English architecture.

RUSTON (EAST), a parish in the hundred of HAPPING, county of NORFOLK, $5\frac{3}{4}$ miles (E. by S.) from North Walsham, containing 613 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the rectory of Ridlington, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £11. 11. 10., endowed with £200 royal bounty. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. Professor Porson, celebrated as a critic and classical scholar, was born here in 1759.

RUSTON (PARVA), a parish in the wapentake of DICKERING, East riding of the county of YORK, $3\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. E.) from Great Driffield, containing 140 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of the East riding, and diocese of York, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of W. T. St. Quintin, Esq.

RUSTON (SOUTH), a parish in the hundred of TUNSTEAD, county of NORFOLK, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile (N. E.) from Coltishall, containing 103 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Tunstead, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich. The church is dedicated to St. Michael.

RUSWARP, a township in the parish of WHITBY, liberty of WHITBY-STRAND, North riding of the county of YORK, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (S. W. by S.) from Whitby, containing 1918 inhabitants. There is a handsome suspension bridge across the river Esk.

RUTCHESTER, a township in the parish of OVINGHAM, eastern division of TINDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by N.) from Newcastle upon Tyne, containing 31 inhabitants. In the reign of Edward I., Rutchester tower was occupied by a family of the same name. This was the site of the Roman station Vindobala, which was garrisoned by the Cohors Prima Frixagorum. A broken statue of Hercules, coins of the Lower Empire, silver fibulae, and numerous other relics, have been found here; and, in 1766, an urn full of gold and silver coins, among which was an almost complete series of those of the Higher Empire, was discovered at Castlestead, in the neighbourhood. Adrian's wall, the remains of which are still visible, passed from its east and west ramparts, which, towards the enemy's frontier, were defended by strong towers.

RUTHALE, a joint township with Ashfield, in that part of the parish of PRIOR'S DITTON which is in the hundred of MUNSLow, county of SALOP, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Bridgenorth, containing, with Ashfield, 40 inhabitants.

RUTLANDSHIRE, an inland county, bounded on the north-west and south-west by Leicestershire, on the south and south-east by Northamptonshire, and on the east and north-east by Lincolnshire. It extends from $51^{\circ} 31' 28''$ to $51^{\circ} 45' 34''$ (N. Lat.), and from $25'$ to $48'$ (W. Lon.) This is the smallest county in England, its extreme length being only eighteen miles, its greatest breadth fifteen miles, and its circumference fifty-eight miles, containing, according to Parkinson's Agricultural Survey, drawn up for the consideration of the Board of Agriculture, ninety-one thousand and two acres and twenty-nine perches, or about one hundred and forty-two square miles. The population, in 1821, was 18,487. This district, at the period of the Roman invasion, formed part of the territory of the Coritani; and, under the Roman dominion, was included in the division called Flavia Cæsariensis: on the complete establishment of the Saxon Octarchy, Rutlandshire was comprised in the kingdom of Mercia. For the name Rutland, in Saxon Roteland, no probable derivation has been assigned. In Domesday-book Roteland is spoken of as comprising the two wapentakes of Alstoe and Martinsley, which, according to the same record, belonged to the sheriffdom of Nottingham, so far as the king's tax was concerned. The rest of the county was, at that period, included in Northamptonshire. Rutland is first mentioned as a distinct county in the 5th of King John, at the coronation of whose queen, Isabel, it was amongst other lands, assigned in parliament for her dower. Owing to its inferior size, and its containing no important military post, few memorable events have occurred within its limits. In 1016, however, near Essendine, the invading Danes were repulsed by the inhabitants of Rutlandshire, and the men of Stamford, under the command of the baron of Essenden; but the Saxons, abandoning order in the pursuit, were finally routed. In 1311, at Burley, Henry Spencer, the warlike Bishop of Norwich, assembled the troops with which he afterwards defeated the Norfolk insurgents under John Letester, who had taken up arms at the time of the formidable insurrection headed by Wat Tyler. In 1470, on April 27th, an army of Lancastrians, consisting chiefly of Lincolnshire men, was defeated by Edward IV., at Horn, with a loss of thirteen thousand men, when their commander, Sir Thomas Wells, and Sir Thomas de Launde, were taken prisoners and shortly after beheaded: this engagement has been jocularly styled "the battle of Lose-coat field," from the fugitives having cast off their coats, in order to be less incumbered.

Rutlandshire lies within the diocese of Peterborough (excepting the parishes of Empringham, Ketton cum Tixover, and Liddington cum Caldecott, which are included in that of Lincoln), and in the province of Canterbury: it forms a deanery, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and contains fifty parishes, of which thirty are rectories, thirteen vicarages, and the remainder perpetual curacies. For civil purposes it is divided into the four hundreds of Alstoe, East, Martinsley, and Wrandike, and the soke of Oakham. It contains the market towns of Oakham and Uppingham. Two knights are returned to parliament for the shire, and are elected at Oakham. This county is included in the Midland circuit: the assizes and quarter sessions are held at Oakham, where is the county gaol; there are seven acting magistrates. The rates raised in the county for the year ending March 25th, 1827, amounted to £14,029. 7., the expenditure to £13,873. 14., of which £9,479. 18. was applied to the relief of the poor.

The general appearance of the county is of an interesting character, more especially where it has abundance of timber, being greatly diversified by gently rising hills, running in the direction of east and west, between which are vallies about half a mile in width, so that the prospects, which are always agreeable and lively, are also pleasingly varied. Some of the finest views may be obtained from Manton, which is the highest ground in the county; Beaumont Chase, Burley House, Rakesborough Hill, the village of Teigh, the Whissendine Hills, and Witchley common. The soils are for the most part fertile, but in their nature vary greatly, and sometimes abruptly. The eastern and south-eastern parts have in general a clay soil of shallow staple, resting upon limestone rock, with a small mixture of cold woodland; the rest of the county has a strong red loamy soil, amongst which ironstone is found; some of this is provincially termed keal: there are also some small tracts of rich clay, and others of a blueish clay. The substratum of the greater part of it is a very strong blue clay. The thin-stapled soils are well adapted for the production of turnips, barley, clover, wheat, and all other green crops, though they make but poor meadow land: abundant crops of grass are produced upon the red keal. Upwards of forty-two thousand five hundred acres are under tillage: the course of crops observed on the thin limestone soil is, first, turnips; second, barley; third, clover; fourth, wheat: on the other soils it is various. The crops commonly grown are, wheat, barley, oats, peas, beans, turnips, cabbages, tares, and lentils. The average crop of wheat is twenty-two bushels and three quarters per acre; that of barley thirty-two; the latter grain is here of a very superior quality. The average produce of oats per acre is forty-two bushels and a quarter; that of peas, twenty-four and three quarters; and that of beans, twenty-three and three quarters. The turnips are for the most part eaten on the land by sheep: the greater part of the tares is consumed as green food for horses in the stable: the lentils are greatly esteemed as winter food for sheep. The artificial grasses are clover, trefoil, ray-grass, and sainfoin. The quantity of grass land rather exceeds that under tillage, being almost forty-five thousand acres: the meadows are chiefly upland, the only tracts ever flooded being those on the margins of the rivers Welland, Guash, and Chater. In this case the waters of the two latter streams quickly subside; but the river Welland having very little fall, and the meadows in its vicinity being very flat, the water retires but slowly, frequently continuing so long upon the land, that the pasturage is rendered unwholesome, and produces the rot amongst sheep that are put upon it: the average produce of hay is from a ton to a ton and a half per acre. Much of what is called Stilton cheese is made in the district of Leafeld Forest, and in the Vale of Catmose. About one half of the grass land is good feeding land; the rest is of an inferior quality, and is used to feed store cattle:

in general the ground is healthy for sheep and cattle, and the management of the grazing lands is considered to be well understood. The cattle reared are of no particular breed, and in general of rather an inferior kind; many of the calves are sold fat to the butcher; the dairies are few, grazing being the chief object. The cattle most in request are the Irish and small Scotch, which, after one summer's grass, are in general sent to the London market. Some long-horned and a few short-horned heifers of the Durham breed are brought in at two years old, and when three years old, are sold out to jobbers, who take them to the dairy counties, or to London. Some of the cattle grazed here obtained are from Wales, and others from Lancashire. The sheep are nearly all of the polled, long-woolled kind, and in the open fields of a very poor sort, little care being taken of them; in the enclosures, however, they are better attended to, but are for the most part very inferior, being small in size and light in flesh: their wool also is light, short, and mossy. The breeds are the Old and the New Leicester; but in that part of the county bordering on Lincolnshire, the breed of that county, with a cross of the New Leicester, prevails. The horses are of an inferior kind, being strong, but very ill shaped. The county contains several very large orchards. There are nearly three thousand acres of native wood and of plantations, containing very little oak timber: the coppice wood is felled at from ten to fifteen years' growth. The woodlands were formerly much more extensive, the forest of Leafield, or Lyfield, having once occupied the greater part of the soke of Oakham; and Beaumont Chase, forming a part of the same forest, having extended over much of Martinsley hundred: several townships in its vicinity, as well as those within its limits, still claim certain forest rights; and the whole tract is now a particularly rich and beautiful scene of woodland and high cultivation. The forestship of Leafield, together with the property of the manor of Leigh, from which it is supposed to take its name, became vested, in the reign of James I., by purchase, in the family of Noel, and are now possessed by its present representative, Sir Gerard Noel, Bart. Limestone of two kinds, softer and harder, is obtained in many parts of the county; and at Ketton, an excellent stone for building is procured. Coal is brought by the Milton canal to Oakham, and forms the chief fuel of the county, but is mostly used in conjunction with wood, while in some few parishes wood is still the principal article of fuel.

The river Welland forms the south-eastern boundary of the county, separating it from Northamptonshire: the small river Eye, which rises in Leicestershire, and takes a south-easterly course to the Welland, is its south-western boundary for some miles in the latter part of its course. The two principal streams which run through it are the Guash, or Wash, and the Chater, both which have their sources beyond its western boundary, in Leicestershire, and take an easterly course to the Welland. The Melton-Mowbray canal, from the river Soar to Melton-Mowbray, was extended to Oakham, in the centre of the county, by virtue of an act of parliament obtained in the year 1793. This is the only line of navigation that Rutlandshire possesses: from Leicestershire it enters it near Teigh, and proceeds by Market-Overton, Barrow, Cottesmore, and Burley, to the northern side of Oakham, in the level of the vale of Catmose: that part of its course contained within its limits is about six miles and a half in length, and on one level: it has a reservoir for its supply with water, near Langham, in this county: the expense of the whole was £86,000: the principal articles of traffic upon it are coal, timber, and agricultural produce. The great north road from London to Edinburgh passes through the easternmost portion of the county, which it enters a little to the north of Stamford. The Leeds mail-road enters the county from Kettering in Northamptonshire, and passes through Uppingham and Oakham to Melton-Mowbray in Leicestershire.

At Great Casterton was a Roman station, but antiquaries disagree concerning its name. The castle, church, county-hall, and hospital, of Oakham, present some interesting relics of antiquity. There were not more than four or five religious houses and hospitals in the county. Of ancient church architecture, the chancel of Tickencote church is a fine specimen of the early Norman. The following are also worthy of notice, viz., Essendine church, more particularly its southern doorway; that of Exton, considered the handsomest in the county; that of Ketton, which is remarkable for its fine lofty spire; and those of Empingham, Stretton, and Tinswell: there are some ancient and handsome monuments in the churches of Ashwell, Drystoke, and Exton. Liddington hospital, originally a palace of the Bishops of Lincoln, and Preston manor-house, are also remarkable for their antiquity. Among the seats of the nobility and gentry, Burley, that of the Earl of Winchelsea and Nottingham, is the most distinguished. Chalybeate springs are numerous in almost every part of the county; but the strongest, which has long been noted, and some years ago was much resorted to, is situated between Teigh and Market-Overton. Numerous marine exuviae are found in the limestone. Rutland gives the titles of duke and earl to the family of Manners.

RUXTON in the ELEVEN TOWNS, a parish in the hundred of OSWESTRY, county of SALOP, 10½ miles (N. W.) from Shrewsbury, containing 862 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £5. 18., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. John the Baptist. The river Perry runs on the eastern side of the parish.

RYALL, a chapelry in the parish of STAMFORDHAM, north-eastern division of TINDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 9½ miles (N. E.) from Hexham containing 118 inhabitants. The chapel, an ancient structure, has undergone frequent repairs.

RYALL, a parish in the hundred of EAST, county of RUTLAND, 2½ miles (N. by E.) from Stamford, containing, with the hamlet of Belmishorp, 439 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Essendine, in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and diocese of Peterborough, rated in the king's books at £13. 17., and in the patronage of the Marquis of Exeter. The church is dedicated to St. John the Evangelist.

RYARSH, a parish in the hundred of LARKFIELD, lathe of AYLESFORD, county of KENT, 6¾ miles (N. W. by W.) from Maidstone, containing 359 inhabitants.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Rochester, rated in the king's books at £8. 10., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to St. Martin.

RYBURGH (GREAT), a parish in the hundred of GALLOW, county of NORFOLK, 4 miles (S. E. by E.) from Fakenham, containing 525 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, with the vicarage of Little Ryburgh, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £14. 16. 10½. S. Clayton, Esq. was patron in 1820. The church, dedicated to St. Andrew, contains an altar-tomb, with several armorial bearings, but no inscription.

RYBURGH (LITTLE), a parish in the hundred of GALLOW, county of NORFOLK, 3¾ miles (E. S. E.) from Fakenham, containing 111 inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, united to the rectory of Great Ryburgh, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, rated in the king's books at £7. 13. 4., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

RYCOTE, a chapelry in the parish of GREAT HASELEY, hundred of EWELME, county of OXFORD, 2½ miles (W. by S.) from Thame. The population is returned with the parish. The chapel is dedicated to St. Michael and All Angels.

RYDAL, a chapelry and joint township with Loughrigg, in the parish of GRASMER, KENDAL ward, county of WESTMORLAND, 1½ mile (N. W.) from Ambleside, containing, with Loughrigg, 299 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Richmond, and diocese of Chester, endowed by Lady le Fleming with land and money, and with £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Lady le Fleming, who, at the expense of £1500, erected the chapel, which is a small but handsome edifice, with an octagonal spire, consecrated in 1825, and dedicated to the Virgin Mary. Day and Sunday schools are supported by her ladyship, for the instruction of the poor children of the township. Rydal water, which winds through the valley for nearly a mile, and in its course forms two beautiful cascades, is surrounded by fine romantic scenery of wood and mountain, and is remarkable for the beauty of its small circular islands. Rydal Hall, the seat of the Le Flemings, was plundered in the great civil war by Sir Wilfrid Lawson, one of Cromwell's partisans.

RYDE, a market town and chapelry in the parish of NEWCHURCH, liberty of EAST MEDINA, Isle of Wight division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 6¼ miles (E. N. E.) from Newport, and 77 (S. W.) from London. The population is returned with the parish. This place, anciently denominated La Rye, was at that period a post for sentinels who guarded this part of the island, and in the reign of Richard II. was burnt and laid waste by the French. It is situated on the shores of the Solent, opposite to Stokes bay, and commands a fine view of Spithead and the Motherbank, with a more distant prospect of Haslar hospital and the town of Portsmouth; from an insignificant fishing hamlet it has, within the last thirty years, assumed the appearance of a neat, improving, and populous town; the original distinction into Upper and Lower Ryde is still preserved, but they are now united, the former comprising the more elevated buildings, the latter those near the seashore. The town consists chiefly of three streets, the principal of which is spacious and well paved; the houses are irregularly built, and are in general either in clusters or detached marine cottages; several handsome lodging-houses have been recently erected, and near the chapel is a fine range of well-built houses, called the Terrace: the facility and accommodation for sea-bathing, and the delightful walks and rides in its vicinity, the constant communication with Portsmouth by means of steam-boats, and the rapid increase of residences on its eastern and western sides, afford every indication of its increase and prosperity. Assembly-rooms, libraries, and a small theatre, erected by the late Mr. Thornton, which is open during the season, add to its attractions. A fine pier, erected under the provisions of an act granted in 1814, at the expense of £12,000, is an object of general admiration: the entrance is through an arched gateway to a fine promenade one thousand seven hundred and forty feet in length, and from twelve to twenty feet in width, which is protected on each side by a neat iron railing; the admission to it is by periodical subscriptions, or a demand of twopence is made upon the visitors each time they enter the gateway, to which a neat porter's lodge is annexed: certain regulations have been established to secure the convenience of passengers, and all impositions are punishable by a fine to be levied by the acting magistrate for this division. The herring fishery affords employment to several persons. The markets are on Tuesday and Friday; and there is an annual fair on the 5th of July, for pedlary. Constables and other officers are chosen annually at a court leet for the manor, held at Ashey farm, and designated Ashey Court. The chapel, dedicated to St. Thomas, was originally built, in 1719, by Thomas Player, Esq.; a new one, erected in 1827, by George Player, Esq., is a neat edifice in the ancient style of English architecture, with a lofty tower and spire. A little to the westward is an episcopal chapel, erected in the same year, and licensed by the Bishop of Winchester: it is of modern architecture, and surmounted by a small cupola. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. A free school, recently erected by subscription among the inhabitants, is supported by voluntary contributions.

RYE, a joint tything with Stapeley, in the parish and hundred of ODIHAM, Basingstoke division of the county of SOUTHAMPTON, 2½ miles (E. by S.) from Odiham, with which the population is returned.

RYE, a cinque-port, borough, market town, and parish, having separate jurisdiction, locally in the hundred of Gostrow, rape of HASTINGS, county of SUSSEX, 76 miles (E. by N.) from Chichester, and 63 (S. E. by E.) from London, containing 3599 inhabitants. This place belonged originally to the monastery of Feschamp in Normandy, from which it was separated, and, together with Winchelsea, annexed to the cinque-ports of England in the reign of Henry III., in all the charters granted to which, these towns are invariably styled "ancient towns." In the reign of Edward III., Rye was surrounded by a strong wall defended by several towers, erected by William of Ypres, Earl of Kent, the only one now remaining being called Ypres' tower. An inundation of the sea having formed a natural harbour, which was subsequently much improved by a similar recurrence, the town began to flourish, and soon became so considerable a port, that it furnished nine ships of war towards the invasion of France in the reign of Edward III., and was the place at which that monarch landed on his return from the conquest of that country. In the following reign it was burnt and plundered by the French, and from that calamity and others which it subsequently experienced it suffered so much, that in 1464, Henry VI., to indemnify the corporation for their losses, annexed to it Tenterden, which he separated from the county of Kent. From this time the town began to revive, and in the reign of Elizabeth it was a place of considerable importance; it has since been invested with several additional privileges, and a confirmation of all preceding charters. The town occupies the declivity of a hill, on a peninsula bounded on the south and west by the sea, and on the east by the river Rother, and consists of several regular and well-formed streets: the houses are in general well built of brick, but mostly old-fashioned, and command fine views of the channel, and the surrounding country, which abounds with interesting scenery: the town is well paved, lighted, and supplied with water by pipes from a reservoir under Playden heights, and there are a public subscription library and a small theatre. It is in contemplation to make a road to the sea-side along the banks of the harbour, and to drain the marshes in the neighbourhood of the town, which improvement, combined with the natural advantages of its situation, will contribute greatly to its eligibility as a watering-place. The harbour, which flows up to the town, receives the rivers Rother, Tillingham, and Brede, and under proper management might be rendered safe for vessels of any burden; and the rivers, in their course through the interior of the country, afford valuable commercial advantages. The old harbour having been choked up with sand, a large canal was cut to communicate with the sea, and vessels of two hundred tons' burden can now come up to the quay. On the north side of the town, about a mile from the original entrance, a great improvement was effected by throwing across the old channel a dam of peculiar construction, the invention of the Rev. Daniel Pope; but the harbour is still incomplete, and the water rises to such a height at spring tides, as materially to annoy the inhabitants. The trade is principally in hops, corn, coal, bark, wool, and timber, and several sloops are constantly employed in conveying chalk from the cliffs at Eastbourne, for the purpose of being burnt into lime. The herring and mackerel fisheries are carried on to a considerable extent, and the fish, which are sent to the London market, are in great estimation; flat fish are also taken in abundance. This port comprises within its jurisdiction the port of Hastings, and there are seventy-one vessels, averaging a burden of fifty-eight tons, belonging to it. The market days are Wednesday and Saturday, the former for corn, of which there is a good supply, and the latter for provisions of all kinds; there is also a large cattle market every alternate Wednesday: the fairs are on Whit-Monday and August 10th.

The borough has received a succession of charters: the earliest that can be traced is that of Richard I., which recites and confirms some previous privileges, that have been further ratified and extended in successive reigns to that of Charles II. The government is vested in a mayor, twelve jurats, and an indefinite number of freemen. The mayor is chosen annually from the jurats by a majority of the freemen, and the jurats are nominated by the mayor immediately after he has been sworn into office: the freedom is inherited by the eldest son of a freeman, or acquired by election of the corporation, and by nomination of the mayor, who has the privilege of appointing one freeman during his mayoralty. The mayor and jurats are justices of the peace, and hold regularly courts of session and general gaol delivery for all offences not capital; and, every alternate Wednesday, a court of record, for the recovery of debts to any amount. The town hall is a convenient building in the centre of the town, in which the sessions and other courts for the borough are held, and the public business of the corporation is transacted; the area underneath it is appropriated to the use of the market. Ypres' tower is now the borough gaol, a small building comprising two wards, and adapted to the reception of about twelve prisoners. The borough has exercised the elective franchise from the earliest period of parliamentary representation, and has regularly returned two barons to parliament, as well as canopy bearers, to assist in supporting the royal canopy at coronations—two to each canopy. The right of election is vested in the mayor, jurats, and freemen, of whom the number qualified to vote is nearly fifty, and will probably be much increased: the mayor is the returning officer.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Lewes, and diocese of Chichester, rated in the king's books at £42. 13. 4., and in the patronage of Lord G. H. Cavendish. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a spacious and ancient cruciform structure, partly in the Norman, and partly in the early, style of English architecture, with a central tower, in which is a clock of peculiar mechanical construction: the interior is lofty, and lighted with windows, of which many are of modern insertion; the aisles of the chancel have narrow lancet-shaped windows, and in several parts are some portions in that style; the east window, in the later English style, is of large dimensions and of elegant design. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists. A school was founded, in 1644, by Mr. Thomas Pecock, who endowed it with a rent-charge of £32, the interest of £50, and a school-house, which is still remaining in the principal street; and in 1702, another school was founded by Mr. James Saunders, who endowed it with estates producing £116 per annum; these schools, according to a decree of the court of Chancery, in 1818, are to be both conducted under one master in the school-house built by Mr. Pecoek; seventy boys upon the latter foundation, and fifty on the former, who are nominated by the corporation, will be instructed in reading, writing, arithmetic, the mathematics, and navigation, as soon as the funds are released from the expenses of the Chancery suit, with the payment of which they are at present charged. A monastery of friars of the order of St. Augustine was founded near the town, prior to the reign of Edward III., of which the principal remains have been converted into a store-house. An arched gateway, leading into the town from the London road, is in tolerable preservation; and some portions of the ancient walls are also remaining.

RYE-HILL, a township in the parish of ROTHBURY, western division of COQUETDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 3 miles (W.) from Rothbury, containing 49 inhabitants.

RYHILL, a hamlet in the parish of EPPING, hundred of WALTHAM, though locally in the hundred of Harlow, county of ESSEX, $2\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. by W.) from Epping. The population is returned with the chapelry of Epping-Upland.

RYHILL, a joint township with Camerton, in the parish of BURSTWICK, southern division of the wapentake of HOLDERNESS, East riding of the county of YORK, 3 miles (S. E. by E.) from Hedon, containing, with Camerton, 315 inhabitants. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists.

RYHILL, a township in that part of the parish of WRAGBY which is in the wapentake of STAINCROSS, West riding of the county of YORK, 7 miles (S. E.) from Wakefield, containing 147 inhabitants.

RYHOPE, a township in the parish of BISHOP-WEARMOUTH, northern division of EASINGTON ward, county palatine of DURHAM, 3 miles (S.) from Sunderland, containing 368 inhabitants. A chapel of ease was erected in 1826. Ryhope bay has a smooth sandy beach convenient for bathing; and the village, which is a considerable place, containing some good inns, affords excellent accommodation for those who frequent it for that purpose.

RYLE (GREAT), a township in the parish of WHITTINGHAM, northern division of COQUETDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, 9 miles (N. N. W.) from Rothbury, containing 99 inhabitants.

RYLE (LITTLE), a township in the parish of WHITTINGHAM, northern division of COQUETDALE ward, county of NORTHUMBERLAND, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles (W. by S.) from Alnwick, containing 48 inhabitants.

RYME-INTRINSICA, a parish and liberty in the Sherborne division of the county of DORSET, $6\frac{1}{4}$ miles (S. W.) from Sherborne, containing 159 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, united with the vicarage of Hermitage, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Dean of Salisbury, rated in the king's books at £6. 5. 8. The church is dedicated to St. Hyppolite. A market and fair were granted to be held here in the 26th of Edward I., both which have been long disused. Within this liberty there was anciently a royal mansion and park; the site of the former, which was standing in the reign of James I., is still called Court Hill, and commands a fine view over the park, of which the boundary or terrace is yet distinguishable, being called the Keeper's walk. It borders upon Somersetshire, and was termed White Hart Forest, from a white deer, celebrated for its size and beauty, chased in it by Henry III. Buckshead, Bucksland, Buckshaw, Stagford, and several other places in the neighbourhood, derive their names from this deer, which was hunted and slain, contrary to the king's command, by Thomas de Linde and other gentlemen of Dorset, whose lands for this were laid under a pecuniary mulct, paid into the Exchequer by the name of White Hart Silver.

RYSTON, a parish in the hundred of CLACKCLOSE, county of NORFOLK, $1\frac{3}{4}$ mile (S. S. E.) from Downham-Market, containing 25 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, with that of Roxham, in the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and diocese of Norwich, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Norwich. The church is dedicated to St. Michael.

RYTHER, a parish partly in the upper, but chiefly in the lower, division of the wapentake of BARKSTONE-ASH, West riding of the county of YORK, $6\frac{3}{4}$ miles (N. W. by N.) from Selby, containing, with the townships of Lead-Hall and Ozendike, 385 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of York, rated in the king's books at £6. 11. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church is dedicated to All Saints.

RYTON, a parish in the western division of CHESTER ward, county palatine of DURHAM, comprising the townships of Chopwell, Crawcrook, Ryton, Ryton-Woodside, Stella, and Winlaton, and containing 5763 inhabitants, of which number, 445 are in the township of Ryton, $8\frac{3}{4}$ miles (W. by N.) from Gateshead. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Durham, rated in the king's books at £42. 10. 10., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Durham. The church, dedicated to the Holy Cross, is principally in the early style of English architecture, with a tower surmounted by a lofty spire; in the chancel are some ancient oaken stalls and screen-work, carved in open tracery. Near the northern wall of the churchyard is a large barrow planted with trees, which does not appear to have been opened; but in a similar one at Bradley Hall the remains of a human body were discovered a few years ago. There are two places of worship for Methodists. This parish, which is bounded on the north by the Tyne, and on the east and south by the river Derwent, contains some very extensive works for the preparation of iron and steel, coal and ironstone being obtained here in abundance: there are also quarries of limestone. The village is well built, and in the neighbourhood are many neat villas. The petty sessions for the division are held here on the first Monday in every month; and a statute fair for hiring servants takes place twice a year, in May and November. Ryton savings bank was the first established in England. The school, built in 1791, is supported by subscriptions, and an endowment of £5 per annum by Lord Crewe's trustees. Ryton has frequently suffered from the incursions of the Scots, particularly in 1297, when the village was reduced to ashes by Wallace, who at that time occupied Hexham.

Here is a spring, the water of which is impregnated with sulphur.

RYTON, a parish in the Shiffnall division of the hundred of BRIMSTREE, county of SALOP, 4 miles (S. by E.) from Shiffnall, containing 131 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £5. 12. 1., and in the patronage of G. Molineux, Esq. This place had anciently a weekly market, and an annual fair for four days, both which have been long disused. Ryton gave the title of baron to John, second son of Sir William Craven, Knt., and brother to William, Earl of Craven, but it is now extinct.

RYTON, a hamlet in the parish of BULKINGTON, Kirby division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, county of WARWICK, containing 345 inhabitants.

RYTON, a township in the parish of KIRKBY-MISPERTON, PICKERING lythe, North riding of the county of YORK, 3 miles (N. by E.) from New Malton, containing 212 inhabitants.

RYTON upon DUNSMOOR, a parish in the Rugby division of the hundred of KNIGHTLOW, county of WARWICK, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles (S. E.) from Coventry, containing 498 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Coventry, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, rated in the king's books at £11. 6. 8., endowed with £800 private benefaction, and £1400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Prebendary of Ryton in the Cathedral Church of Lichfield. The church, dedicated to St. Leonard, is partly in the early style of English architecture.

RYTON-WOODSIDE, a township in the parish of RYTON, western division of CHESTER ward, county palatine of DURHAM, $8\frac{1}{4}$ miles (W.) from Gateshead, containing 1057 inhabitants. Coal is obtained within the township.
